“Cutting the telephone wires, silly! I got into the kitchen after Miss Higgins left and dumped some of that sedative into George’s coffee. Remember, I told you the plan.”

I couldn’t remember now, but I knew it was all right. Lucy and I went out through the hall, past George’s room, and he never stirred. Then we went downstairs and out the front door and the street-lights hurt my eyes. Lucy made me hurry right along, though.

We took a streetcar around the comer. This was the difficult part, getting away. Once we were out of the neighborhood, there’d be no worry. The wires were cut.

The lady at the rooming house on the South Side didn’t know about the wires being cut. She didn’t know about me, either, because Lucy got the room.

Lucy marched in bold as brass and laid my fifty dollars down on the desk. The rent was $12.50 a week in advance, and Lucy didn’t even ask to see tire room. I guess that's why the landlady wasn't worried about baggage.

WE GOT upstairs and locked the door, and then I had the shakes again.

Lucy said, "Vi—cut it out!"

"But I can't help it. What'll I do now, Lucy? Oh, what'll I do? Why did I ever—"

"Shut up!" Lucy opened my purse and pulled something out. I had been wondering why my purse felt so heavy but I never dreamed about the secret.

She held the secret up. It glittered under the light, like the scissors, only this was a nice glittering. A golden glittering.

"A whole pint!" I gasped. "Where did you get it?"

"From the cupboard downstairs, naturally. You knew George still keeps the stuff around. I slipped it into your purse, just in case."

I had the shakes, but I got that bottle open in ten seconds. One of my fingernails broke, and then the stuff was burning and warming and softening—

"Pig!" said Lucy.

"You know I had to have it," I-whispered. "That's why you brought it."

"I don't like to see you drink," Lucy answered. "I never drink and I don't like to see you hang one on, either."

"Please, Lucy. Just this once."

"Why can't you take a shot and then leave it alone? That's all I ask."

"Just this once, Lucy, I have to."

"I won't sit here and watch you make a spectacle of yourself. You know what always happens—another mess."

I took another gulp. The bottle was half-empty.

"I did all I could for you, Vi. But if you don't stop now, I'm going."

That made me pause. "You couldn't do that to me. I need you, Lucy. Until I'm straightened out, anyway."

Lucy laughed, the way I didn’t like. “Straightened out! That’s a hot one! Talking about straightening out with a bottle in your hand. It’s no use, Vi. Here I do everything I can for you, I stop at nothing to get you away, and you’re off on another.”

“Please. You know I can’t help it.”

“Oh, yes, you can help it, Vi. But you don’t want to. You’ve always had to make a choice, you know. George or the bottle. Me or the bottle. And the bottle always wins. I think deep down inside you hate George. You hate me.”

“You’re my best friend.”

“Nuts!” Lucy talked vulgar sometimes, when she got really mad. And she was mad, now’. It made me so nervous I had another drink.

“Oh, I’m good enough for you when you’re in trouble, or have nobody else around to talk to. I’m good enough to lie for you, pull you out of your messes. But I’ve never been good enough for your friends, for George. And I can’t even win over a bottle of rotgut whiskey. It’s no use, Vi. What I’ve done for you today you’ll never know. And it isn’t enough. Keep your lousy whiskey. I’m going.”

I know I started to cry. I tried to get up, but the room was turning round and round. Then Lucy was walking out the door and I dropped the bottle and the light kept shining the way it did on the scissors and I dosed my eyes and dropped after the bottle to the floor. . . .

WHEN I woke up they were all pestering me, the landlady and the doctor and Miss Higgins and the man who said he was a policeman.

I wondered if Lucy had gone To them and betrayed me, but when I asked the doctor said no, they just discovered me through a routine checkup on hotels and rooming-houses after they found George’s body in his bed with my scissors in his throat.

All at once I knew what Lucy had done, and why she ran out on me that way. She knew they’d find me and call it murder.

So I told them about her and how it must have happened. I even figured out how Lucy managed to get my fingerprints on the scissors.

But Miss Higgins said she'd never seen Lucy in my house, and the landlady told a lie and said I had registered for the room alone, and the man from the police just laughed when I kept begging him to find Lucy and make her tell the truth.

Only the doctor seemed to understand, and when we were alone together in the little room he asked me all about her and what she looked like, and I told him.

Then he brought over the mirror and held it up and asked me if I could see her. And sure enough—

She was standing right behind me, laughing. I could see her in the mirror and I told the doctor so, and he said yes, he thought he understood now.

So it was all right after all. Even when I got the shakes just then and dropped the mirror, so that the little jagged pieces hurt my eyes to look at, it was all right.

Lucy was back with me now, and she wouldn't ever go away any more. She'd stay with me forever. I knew that. I knew it, because even though the light hurt my eyes, Lucy began to laugh.

After a minute, I began to laugh, too. And then the two of us were laughing together, we couldn't stop even when the doctor went away. We just stood there against the bars, Lucy and I, laughing like crazy.

Once a Sucker

There's one born every minute, and that's what I was—in a business where I thought that title belonged to everyone else

I WAS FINISHED. I had never actually begun, but that didn't matter. I was finished. In Hollywood I was a failure, and it hurt.

I walked into my agent's office and sat down to wait for the privilege of telling the great man to go to hell. That wouldn't get me anywhere, but at least I'd have the satisfaction of doing something constructive: Tell Larry Rickert to go to hell; then get drunk.

I was still waiting outside Rickert's office when Peter Lorre walked in. It wasn't Lorre, of course—Rickert didn't have any top names—but the resemblance was there, and strong. He walked deliberately over to the reception window. He wasn't much: Black suit, unusual for out here, but nothing special. White shirt, quiet foulard tie. Flashy ring on little finger of left hand—probably a fake stone. And a monocle. That's right—a monocle. I ignored him until Larry Rickert condescended to see me.

I walked down the hall to the big layout in the back and Larry smiled at me across the desk and waved me to a chair.

"What can I do for you?" he asked. "That's exactly what I want to know," I told him.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean I came in here two months ago because your ads say you're a good agent, and that's what I needed. You didn't sign me up or anything like that, but you did manage to get over three hundred bucks out of me for a retainer fee and for photographs and the transcriptions I did for audition disks. What I want to know is, when do I see a little action?"

HE gave me the same grin he used for his advertising photos.

"Take it easy, Eddie. Relax."

"I've been taking it easy—for ten weeks now. I want to know why you haven't sold me, or my show." Rickert stopped smiling. He leaned forward and waved the chewed end of his cigar at me.

"Listen, son," he said, "this isn't Iowa. That package idea of yours—the Radio Psychologist—may have sounded pretty good when you dreamed it up back there. And I was willing to give it a whirl. I sent audition disks out for you to all the network reps. I've been in there pitching. But it's just no dice."

"So I stink, eh?" I stood up. "All right, Mr. Rickert. But it's a pity you didn't tell me so before I spent three hundred bucks with you."

"Hold on, now—"

I was holding on, hard. I knew there was no use getting mad. He'd given me the answer: I was washed up but good. Now I didn't even feel like telling him to go to hell.

"No hard feelings, Eddie," said Rickert. "Go on home and think it over. Maybe something will still break. I'll let you know."

I went out and through the hall, back to the outer office. The little man with the monocle, was still sitting there. He looked up and started to open his mouth.

"Pardon me," he said.

I didn't stop; I opened the door and emerged on the sunlit street.

He padded after me. "Please—" he murmured.

“Go away.” I shook him off. “Go away. Can’t you see I’m busy? I have to kill somebody.”

Hurrying around the corner, into the crowd, I wondered who it was I meant to kill.

The sunshine swept around me, and so did the people, hurrying along. But I had nowhere to go. I searched my pockets: crumpled bills and some change—four dollars and thirty-five cents.

Why had I ever come out here, anyway? I was just a hick, like all the other Iowa farmers who dream of it for years, save up for years, finally travel two thousand miles to get here, and then have nothing but a souvenir to send the folks back home—a miniature wooden outhouse with the name of the city stamped on it.

I was a fool. But I couldn’t go back; they’d laugh at me. My brother would laugh at me. I was laughing at myself.

EDDIE HAINES, the Boy Wonder—the star of the senior play. Just a high-school kid who never grew up. I used to think I was pretty good. They all thought so, then: “You ought to be in the movies. Or on the radio.”

Why not? It sounded great—in high school. Then I wasn’t in high school any more, and after a while they all got jobs and I was still bumming around, waiting for my big chance.

Then I got the idea for this Radio Psychologist program, and I thought I was all set. I read and studied and worked out a format for presentation and it was in the bag. Yeah, sure it was!

Now all I had left was four dollars and thirty-five cents. Not enough to get drunk on, but I tried. When that didn’t work, I went home.

Then I remembered Charlie—my big brother, Charlie. Always ready to hand out advice. But one thing he had told me I’d never forgotten:

Well, I’d taken the whisky. And I had my razor. It was time to cut the comedy; time for the unkindest cut of all . . . Shakespeare . . . High-school plays . . . To hell with that. To hell with everything—

A headache began to blind me, sending sharp pains against my eyes. But it wasn’t sharp enough—not nearly as sharp as the straight edge of my razor, pressing against my throat. As I moved my hand I was thinking that the edge of a razor is the sharpest thing in the world.

It was the only thing in the world.

Chapter Two

THERE WAS SOMETHING ELSE in the world, after all: Noise. Knocking. Persistent knocking. Rattling. Knocking on my door, rattling the knob.

“Go away!” I yelled.

The doorknob rattled again. The voice was plainly audible as I moved into the living-room.

“Open up, please. I want to see you.”

“Go away!”

Silence.

I stood there, waiting for the sound of receding footsteps. Another moment now, and I’d be alone again. Another moment and I could go back into the bathroom and—

Rustling. . . . Something was sliding under the door; something green slithered into view.

It was a hundred-dollar bill.

I bent down and picked it up in my left hand. Then I turned the bolt, opened the door.

He came in—the little Peter Lorre guy again. Only this guy was bald. He took his hat off and the light from the bathroom shone on an absolutely hairless skull.

All I could do was stand there and look at him, stand there and try to slip the straight razor into my pocket without his noticing, or without cutting off my leg.

He turned on the living-room light, walked over to the sofa, sat down, and pulled out the monocle. Then he looked up at me and smiled.

“You’re Eddie Haines,” he said. “Pleased to meet you. I am Professor Hermann.”

My left hand held the money, and my right hand stayed in my pocket with the razor. So I only nodded at him. All at once I felt I had to sit down. He watched me, still smiling.

“You will pardon my intrusion. I tried to call, but it seems your telephone has been disconnected. And it was important that I see you at once.”

“How did you—”

He waved his hand, the one with the diamond ring on the little finger. I wasn’t so sure any more that it was a fake diamond.

“Mr. Rickert gave me your name and address. You recall, I think, that I was in his office this afternoon?”

“But—”

Again the wave. “I happen to have heard your voice, on a record.”

“Are you in radio, Mr.—uh—Professor Hermann?”

“No. But I am greatly interested in voices. And I have something in mind which may interest you.”

I was sobering up, fast. I needed a cigarette. I moved my hand in my pocket.

“Ouch!” I’d cut my finger on the straight edge of the razor. I pulled the hand out of the pocket without thinking. He was looking at me, and I forced a grin as I swabbed at the blood with my handkerchief.

“Afraid I must apologize to you,” I said. “You see, I happened to be shaving when you rang, and I got a little confused. I carried my razor out with me and forgot I’d stuck it into my pocket.”

The Professor nodded gravely. “I see there are a few things I must teach you. For example, you haven’t yet learned how to tell a lie.”

"What do you mean by that crack?"

His gravity disappeared with a chuckle.

"My dear young man! You'll find it's no use trying to deceive me. I happen to know you weren't shaving; you were getting ready to cut your throat."

I gaped at him, and again he chuckled.

"That would have been very silly of you, my friend. Very, very silly. Because you and I are going to make a million dollars—together."

IT was hard for me to realize that so much had happened in so short a time. But the clock in the little restaurant told me that it was only nine. We'd been sitting here a good hour already, eating and talking.

That is, I'd been doing the talking. The Professor didn't say much. He nodded, smiled, shook his head—all on cue. It wasn't until I had several jolts of coffee inside of me that I came out of my talking jag long enough to realize that I was a fool to let him pump me without knowing what he wanted.

I lit a cigarette and pushed my cup away.

"Seems to me I'm doing the talking."

His bald head bobbed. "Go ahead. I like to listen to you. You have a wonderful voice."

"Tell that to the radio executives. They won't listen to me."

"Radio executives!" I caught the familiar wave of the hand, the glittering arc of the diamond swirling through space. "Your voice is too fine an instrument for radio. It must not be wasted in an effort to sell laxatives and gasoline. That would be sheer prostitution."

I took the bull by the horns. "Speaking of prostitution," I said, "you haven't yet told me what you're interested in. Why did you get hold of me in such a hurry?"

"But I did tell you! Because of your voice. I've spent several weeks now, listening to voices. Auditioning, I believe they call it. I have heard recitations in the offices of agents, recordings and transcriptions of available talent. I heard your voice quite by accident, just the other day, in an advertising agency. Apparently Mr. Rickert had sent them the record.

"Right then and there I was almost certain I had found my man. Because you do have a very fine voice, Mr. Haines. I'm not speaking of diction or phrasing; I'm speaking of pitch and timbre. You have a persuasive voice; you sound sincere, convincing. Women like your voice, don't they, Mr. Haines?"

What was the matter with this guy? I stared at him—a fat, ugly, baldheaded little stranger who tossed around hundred-dollar bills and talked about voices. Was he looking for another "Continental" ?

He smiled. "You don't understand, of course. But you will—I'm sure of that. I think that with proper training, you will go far. You have the voice, the personal attributes, and the youth. It was no accident that brought us together; it was Destiny."

HE wasn't smiling now. He hunched forward over the table and his eyes were glittering to match that diamond.

"Cut out the violin music," I said. "What's your proposition?"

He glanced at the restaurant clock and rose quickly. "We haven't time to discuss that now," he said. "It's getting late. We're due at the meeting."

"What meeting?"

"Come and see. It's important that you arrive before the testimony starts."

The Professor led me down the street for about half a block and halted before my idea of a beautiful animal—a handsome new black Jaguar convertible.

"Climb in," he said.

We pulled away, headed down the boulevard, then northwest toward Beverly Hills. Neither of us said anything for a while, and the Jaguar just purred.

The Professor glanced at the dashboard clock. “Right on time,” he said. “We’ll pick her up and then go to the meeting.”

“Her?”

“Oh, I forgot to mention that we’re bringing a guest. You will probably like her—I don’t imagine you’ve ever met a movie star before.”

“Movie star?”

“Well, featured player. Seven hundred and fifty a week. Lorna Lewis—you know of her?”

Lorna Lewis—of the glamorous gams. The censor’s delight. I’d heard of her, all right. This was going to be interesting after all.

“The movie colony is particularly impressionable,” remarked Professor Hermann. “I expect great results from them in our future work. For example, consider their interest in astrology. I can name you dozens of actors, actresses, producers, executives, who won’t make a move unless the stars are right.

“I always think of one top name out here—she’s been in pictures since the original Lassie was a pup—who lives according to a carefully plotted horoscope based on her date of birth. Ridiculous, of course. As she gets older she keeps moving her birth-date forward. She’s changed her age four times now, and each time she gets a new astrologer and a new horoscope. Yet she won’t as much as sleep with an assistant producer without consulting the stars.”

“This Lorna Lewis,” I said. “Is she gone on astrology too?”

Professor Hermann shook his head. “No. Spiritualism.”

I blinked and sat up. “Mean to tell me that’s what you have in mind for us—some kind of spook racket?”

“Far from it. My dear boy, don’t underestimate me. You and I will not be engaged in any such vulgar fakery. Our paths lead to a higher destiny. But we’ll speak of all that at another time. Right now your cue is to observe—and be silent.”

We entered the driveway on a hillside. Beyond the palm-bordered path rose a rambling California-Spanish hacienda. I caught a glimpse of a side terrace and a swimming-pool in the back. Then we drew up before broad stone steps.

Professor Hermann led me to the door. The usual buzzer produced the usual chimes, and we waited.

“Come in,” said a voice. I recognized it immediately. I recognized the black curls, the full thick lips, the slim sweep of perfectly modeled legs. It was Lorna Lewis.

“Come in. Be with you in a minute.” She waved us to a love-seat in the hall alcove and then dashed up the stairs, treating us to a rear view of the finest pair of peach-colored slacks I’d ever seen.

“Don’t stare!” hissed the Professor. “And from now on, take your cues from me.” He produced his monocle and bent forward to polish it with a handkerchief, as though it were a rare scientific lens.

“Remember, now, not a word. Let me do the talking.”

“But—”

She was running down the stairs again, still wearing the peach-colored slacks and a green blouse. I hadn’t fully appreciated the blouse before, but it was even better than the slacks.

“Ready? Let’s go, then—our appointment’s for eight and we mustn’t be late.” Suddenly she seemed to notice me. “Who’s he?” she asked.

“Miss Lewis—Judson Roberts.”

That was me, apparently. I rose and started to open my mouth, but the Professor coughed.

“Mr. Roberts cannot answer you. He is committed to silence until midnight.”

This time her blink was genuine. “Oh—a vow, or something?”

PROFESSOR HERMANN smiled. “Certainly not, my dear child! Mr. Roberts is no fake mystic. He’s a scientist. As such he is engaged in an experiment of psychological conditioning. He has just arrived from the University of Lima and plans to collaborate with me in my work. I'd like to have him tell you about it sometime—I'm sure you would be interested."

"I know I will." She gave me a long look and seemed to mean it.

"I've invited Mr. Roberts to accompany us as an observer this evening, if you don't mind."

"That's fine with me. But I don't know if Mrs. Hubbard will approve. I hear she's very particular about who she admits."

"More than likely." The Professor led us outside and slid behind the wheel of the car. Lorna Lewis followed and I edged into the front seat beside her. The peach-colored slacks pressed against my thigh. I pressed back.

The Professor was doing most of the talking as he nosed the Jaguar south, then east. "Your Mrs. Hubbard probably doesn't care for strangers at all. I wouldn't, either, if I were working a nice, soft racket—preying on motion-picture people with phony spiritualism."

Lorna Lewis tossed her head.

"You'll see! Mrs. Hubbard is different; she doesn't try to fool anyone with tricks or hocus-pocus."

"No ectoplasm or apparitions? What about rope escapes and raps? Does she produce apports?"

"You're making fun of me." Her slim hands caressed a silver cigarette-case. "Mr. Roberts?"

"Mr. Roberts does not smoke," snapped the Professor. That was news to me. I wondered if I also did not drink. Probably I fasted a lot, too. Certainly I had nothing to do with women.

Eyeing Lorna Lewis, I decided that was one rule to be changed in a hurry.

"My dear Miss Lewis," purred the Professor, "I am by nature a skeptic and by profession a psychologist. As such I have devoted much time to the investigation of so-called psychic phenomena. I am sorry to report that I've never seen a genuine medium."

"But Mrs. Hubbard doesn't put on a show," the girl protested. "Why, I've only been there once before and it was just like sitting down for a visit. The lights were on and everything. But the things she told me, the things she knew about me—it was simply uncanny!

"She knew my name—my real name, that is—and my age, and where I lived, and who my folks were, and what my next picture would be and who would direct. She even told me I'd get Lester Vance opposite me and I didn't hear about it from the studio until three days later!"

The Professor chuckled. "You're in pictures, my child. Such information is virtually public property."

"But my real name, and my real age—"

"It's all listed somewhere. Your birth certificate is available by mail. And certainly an unscrupulous woman would be willing to spend a few dollars on investigation. She probably has a line into the studio, paying someone to feed her advance tips on activities. She hopes to make you a regular client and attract others. Didn't you say your hairdresser told you to go there in the first place? It's very obvious."

I SUDDENLY realized he was talking to me more than he was to her, trying to tell me the angles. I listened carefully.

"If you are gullible enough, I predict that sooner or later your little five-dollar readings won't satisfy Mrs. Hubbard. She'll give you some good advice about the future and some even more intimate information about yourself, feed it to you bit by bit just to keep you coming back for more. She'll enmesh you more and more. Sooner or later she'll find out that you too have mystic powers, that you're clairvoyant, clairaudient, a natural medium. She'll give you slate-writing and then the old psychic-force routine."

"Psychic force?"

"Moving inanimate objects without touching them. Waving her hand over fruit, walnuts, coins. They'll obey her, move and follow her hand.

Psychic force. I’ll show you sometime how it’s done.”

“Tell me.”

“Simple. She wears a magnetized ring. There’s another magnet inside the walnut or fruit or fake coin. Naturally, it moves. By varying the weight of the object she can produce just a stir or a pronounced movement. It sounds stupid and simple, but wait until she gives you the buildup—in a dim, quiet room with her voice pitched low, and the spirits abroad.”

Lorna Lewis shook her head. “No, Mrs. Hubbard isn’t like that at all. You’ll see.”

“Very well. But remember, I’m here to protect you. Just introduce us as friends; I promise not to interfere in any way, but I want to observe what happens.”

“That’s right, Professor,” said Lorna Lewis, with the roguish smile that endeared her to millions. “Just keep your eyes open.”

Chapter Three

WE TURNED INTO A STREET that looked like the butt-end of Tobacco Road. Lawns of brown weeds and sand, withered palmettos decorated by dogs, houses sagging behind rusted iron fences. We parked and then walked across the sidewalk in single file. I fancied I saw the shades move slightly in a window to the left of the porch, but I was more interested in the movement of Lorna’s peach-colored slacks. We followed the slacks up the porch steps.

She pressed the buzzer and a sour whine echoed from within the house.

A sallow-faced Mexican girl opened the door. She brushed the perspiration from her mustache, wiped her hand on her stringy hair and said, “Yes, please?”

“We’ve come to see Mrs. Hubbard. We have an appointment.”

“I tell her. Wait here.”

She ushered us into the hallway and left us.

We settled down in wicker chairs and waited. Lorna Lewis found a cigarette. The Professor polished his monocle. I sat and read a copy of an ancient fan magazine.

The silence was emphatic. It grew hotter, mustier. The hall became an oversized coffin. Lorna Lewis stepped on her cigarette. The Professor put his monocle into the left orbit. I put down the fan magazine and sat there listening to the worms bore through the woodwork.

Then the door opened, we jumped, and the Mexican girl said, “In here, now.”

The center of the room was occupied by a “dining-room suite”—six chairs and a round table. Mrs. Hubbard sat in one of the chairs, her elbows on the table top.

She wasn’t exactly Mrs. Hubbard—“Mother Hubbard” would have been more accurate. A fat, blowsy, redfaced woman in mid-menopause, with pork-bristles on her arms and chin. Coarse brown hair nestled in a bun against the back of her high-necked black dress. There was something tragic about her deep-set eyes. Here, if I ever saw one, was a woman who had been suffering. From a hangover.

“Greetings.”

Her voice was as big as her body. It bounced off the walls and exploded against our ears.

“You are prompt, Miss Lewis. And I see you have brought guests.”

“I thought you wouldn’t mind. This is—”

“I know.” Mrs. Hubbard smiled slightly. “Please be seated, and I will endeavor to convince the skeptical Professor Otto Hermann, Ph.D., that I am indeed a psychic sensitive.”

We selected chairs and sat around the table. The Mexican girl opened the door again and ushered four more people into the room. We turned and stared at a fat little red-faced man with a mustache, a portly matron in a flowered print dress, a pale, bespectacled blonde girl, and a gaunt, gray-haired woman who constantly fiddled with her coral beads.

Mrs. Hubbard, unsmiling, waved them to places at the table. The Mexican girl brought in some extra chairs, and then produced a card-table which she set up in the corner of the room. Mrs. Hubbard retreated to a seat behind the card-table and we sat around the larger one, facing her in a semicircle.

Nobody said a word. Lorna Lewis watched Mrs. Hubbard. I watched Lorna Lewis. The Professor was watching me. Mrs. Hubbard didn't appear to be watching anybody. The whole affair began to take on the charm of an inquest.

I was waiting for something to happen. I was waiting for the closing of the blinds, the whisperings in the darkened room, the rappings and the wailings, the screech of chalk moving across a slate, the phosphorescent phantom issuing from the mouth of the moaning woman.

THE Mexican girl appeared again. She carried a tablet of cheap blue-ruled paper, a package of envelopes, and a handful of yellow pencils. This assortment made a nice little mess on Mrs. Hubbard's card-table.

We watched and waited as the Mexican girl rotated chunky thighs toward the door. The red-faced man fingered his mustache, the matron played with her purse, the girl with the glasses coughed, the gray-haired woman used her coral beads for a rosary. The Professor had his monocle to divert him, and I had Lorna Lewis. That black hair had a living luster; I wondered how it would feel to dig my hands into those curls, press that head back, and—

"Will everybody please take a pencil, a sheet of paper and an envelope?"

Mrs. Hubbard was ready to go into her routine. We filed past the bare card-table, took up pencils and paper, and returned to our places.

"Because our group today is a little larger than usual, and because there is a natural reticence in the presence of strangers, I feel it best to have you put your problems in writing." Mrs. Hubbard patted her brown pug and smiled.

“I suggest that each of you write down one question, to begin with. If we have time, I shall be glad to work with your further inquiries personally—and privately, if you wish.

“At the moment, the important thing, frankly, is to gain your complete confidence. Without it, you will have no faith in my power, nor in my ability to help you. Since some of you are visiting me for the first time today, I’m going to make use of a rather spectacular device to convince you of my extra-sensory perception.”

The deep voice roiled smoothly, easily, persuasively.

“I’m not very much of a showman—I cannot offer you a dark room, table-tipping, ghostly presences. But if each one of you will write on a piece of paper a question you’d like answered, fold the paper up as much as you like, and personally seal it in, an envelope, perhaps I can demonstrate an interesting psychic phenomenon.”

There was a pause, a shared feeling of hesitation. Mrs. Hubbard didn’t have to be a mystic to sense the indecision.

“Please! It’s very simple. I am going to read your questions back to you as you have written them, without opening the envelopes. There’s no trickery. You can examine the paper, the pencils, the envelopes. You won’t find any carbon, or wax or acid-treatments. There will be no waiting and no switches. I’ll read your questions back to you immediately, right here at this table. Then I will give you your answers. So if you’ll write whatever is closest to your mind and heart—”

The red-faced man scrawled something on his ruled sheet and folded it carefully four times. The matron licked the tip of her pencil and frowned. Lorna Lewis pouted. I watched her lips pucker as if seeking kisses—or bites. The spectacle suggested several questions to my mind: but not the kind I cared to have read back to me in public.

I shielded my paper and wrote, “Will my new venture be successful?” It sounded corny, but I wanted to know.

There was much business of folding and sealing. Lorna Lewis ran her tongue across the flap, drawing it in and out like a kitten lapping cream.

Mrs. Hubbard lumbered around the table and took up the sealed envelopes. I watched her, for obvious reasons; we all did. But I could detect no sleight-of-hand. She collected seven envelopes, shuffled them carefully, and placed them on the table, in the corner. She spread them out fanwise before her and frowned. Our chairs scraped back as we faced her. She switched on a lamp behind her and produced a wire filing basket.

"I'll read your questions and answer them one at a time," she told us. "In order that the answers be confirmed, I shall ask the writer of each question to raise his or her hand and let me know if my reading is correct. Then I'll open the envelope. Is that agreeable?"

We nodded. I looked at Professor Hermann. His face was utterly immobile. I wondered what he was making out of this—what he would do if Lorna Lewis seemed sold on Mrs. Hubbard. So far he hadn't opened his mouth.

Mrs. Hubbard stared down at the envelopes. Her forehead corrugated. A fat hand reached out at random and lifted an envelope from the center of the fan. She placed it against the corrugations above her eyes. Her eyes closed.

Then she was speaking, and her voice came from far away—far away inside herself, far away inside the envelope.

"Should I sell my property to the syndicate or hold out for the original figure?" she whispered.

A red-faced Jack-in-the-box popped up. "That's it!" he shouted. "By golly, that's my question!"

Professor Hermann never blinked. Everyone else was leaning forward, tense with excitement.

Mrs. Hubbard smiled. "Please, control your enthusiasm. It makes it more difficult to concentrate." She opened the envelope, unfolded the sheet, glanced at it carelessly, and placed it in the wicker basket. And all the while she continued to talk.

"As it comes to me, Mr. Rogers, this property that you speak of consists of a block of eight lots situated just south of San Juan Capistrano, on 101-A, the coast drive. This syndicate of which you speak, the—"

Rogers opened his mouth and she paused. “Oh, of course, I will not mention their names, if you prefer. But it is true, isn’t it, that they plan to build a hotel on this site? And that yesterday they offered you $18,000 cash for an outright sale, while you are holding out for $25,000? I thought so. It appears that if you refuse, they will offer you $20,000 on Thursday. If you still refuse, on Monday they will meet your price.”

Without pausing, the plump hand sought another envelope, pressed it to the red forehead. Eyes closed and mouth opened.

“Will Mike leave me?”

Lorna Lewis leaned forward. “Yes,” she murmured. “That’s my question.”

Mrs. Hubbard nodded, slitting the envelope. She tossed the unfolded paper into the basket, nodding again as she glanced at it.

“Mike will leave you soon—forever. He is preparing for a long journey right now. He hasn’t told you yet, because he does not know about it himself. But I see him going away from you, far, far away—”

The girl’s mouth opened. Mrs. Hubbard was apparently used to this reaction, for she hurried on. “I could tell you much more, but it would not be discreet. Alone, perhaps, and later, if you desire me to.”

I tried again to pierce Professor Hubbard’s bland stare. I tried to figure it out. There must be an angle, there was some kind of fakery somewhere, but—

“Will my new venture be successful?”

She was reading my question!

My own mouth opened now. I sucked in air as I watched Mrs. Hubbard carelessly unseal the envelope and withdraw the folded paper. She unfolded it—and then her mouth fell open.

Something red fluttered to the table: something bold and brazen, with a picture of a half-naked girl emblazoned on its crimson background.

It was the cover of the fan magazine I’d been reading in the hall!

Professor Hermann was on his feet. “My question, I believe,” he said.

Mrs. Hubbard’s open mouth gulped for words. When they came, they were short and sweet.

“You son of a bitch!” said Mrs. Hubbard.

SHE couldn’t escape. We were crowded around the table and the Professor, inarticulate no longer, was holding forth.

“You see, it’s very simple. The whole trick is old as the hills—while the audience is looking for mirrors, radio-eyes and all kinds of elaborate devices, the fake mystic is merely using the old ‘one-ahead’ system. All she needs for that is a stooge. In this case it was Rogers, here.”

The red-faced, mustached man who had popped up like a Jack-in-the-box now looked as though he would collapse like one. But the Professor held his arm firmly.

“Here’s how it works. The stooge writes his question and seals it like all the others, but he marks his envelope—with his fingernail, here at the flap. Just a nick. The medium looks for it and can tell at a glance, naturally, which one belongs to her confederate. Here—”

He held up an envelope—unopened. “This envelope she saves until the last. What she does is call out the., stooge’s question, which has been agreed upon in advance. Then he jumps up and makes a big show about hearing the correct question and she opens the envelope she’s held to her forehead. Naturally, it’s one of the other envelopes with a legitimate question, which she reads as she puts it in the basket. While answering the stooge’s question, in convincing detail, she was actually reading Miss Lewis’ question from the envelope she opened. Then, with the next envelope, she answered Miss Lewis; opened the Hap and found Mr. Roberts’ question.

“But when she called Mr. Roberts’ question, she opened my envelope—and that was her mistake.”

“You clever bastard,” muttered Mrs. Hubbard. “What do you want?” The Professor shrugged. “Nothing at all, really, from you—except your promise to quit working a racket on people who are in need of genuine assistance from reputable consultants.

I don’t think you’ll be trying these tricks around here very much longer.”

“Why, you goddam—”

“Careful, now! Watch your language. You aren’t very ladylike, Mrs. Hubbard. Of course, appearances are deceptive; you ladies and gentlemen must always remember that. For example, Mrs. Hubbard here does not use ladylike language because she really isn’t a lady. In fact—”

The Professor’s hand descended to pat Mother Hubbard’s head. It rose again, clutching a brown-bunned wig. We gaped down on a fat, baldheaded man who gripped the edge of the table with brawny knuckles and cursed.

Professor Hermann ignored his victim as he turned to us with a little bow.

“My friends,” he said, “I think that our little session with the supernatural is over.”

Chapter Four

WE DROVE LORNA LEWIS HOME. It was hard for me to remember that I was “Judson Roberts,” and that I was under a vow of silence. But the Professor was in the driver’s seat. He drove, I fidgeted, and Lorna Lewis babbled.

“You were so right,” she kept repeating to him. “And I’m so grateful to you. If that racketeer had found out about me—I mean, if I’d trusted him and really told him a lot of things I need advice on—”

She shivered. It felt good against me.

Professor Hermann smiled. “Perhaps in the future you will be more discreet. Only a reputable consultant should be trusted with your intimate problems.”

"That's what Mike tells me." She lit a cigarette, and it was agony for me to sit there and smell the smoke. "About Mike—there's something I must know."

"Bothering you, is he?"

"Yes. And I want you to help me; I can trust you, now. When could we talk about it?"

"Miss Bauer makes all my appointments. Call her at my office whenever you wish."

HE left it at that, and we dropped Lorna at the house. She said good-by to me and hoped that we'd meet again. I nodded calmly. Then, as her peach-colored posterior wriggled its way up the walk, I was tearing open a package of cigarettes, fumbling at the matches. I got a light as we drove west.

"Can I talk now?" I asked.

The Professor nodded, grinning.

"I don't get the pitch yet, but I can see that you've sold her a bill of goods."

He nodded again, carelessly.

"That was a sweet idea, using the magazine cover. But what if it had been some other racket—were you sure of being able to expose it anyway?"

"Certainly. There is no possibility of failure, the way I work. You will learn that in due time."

"Where are we heading for now?"

"You shall see."

"When are you going to tell me about those plans of yours?"

"Soon."

I shut up and watched the lights of Santa Monica flash by. We kept going. A lemon moon was in the sky as we neared the flickering streetlights of Long Beach. Flic Professor parked on a side-street and led me down a ramp to. the Boardwalk. We jostled through the late evening crowd and emerged on the midway.

“Come along,” he said, and led the way to a stand near the entrance.

Sideshow banners proclaimed the presence of Seero the Mystic-Secrets of Past, Present and Future. Gaudy horoscopes decorated the sides of the ticket-booth. A horsefaced woman with yellow hair—and teeth to match—smiled at us from behind the glass.

“Is he here yet?” asked the Professor, returning the smile.

“Just came in. There’s nobody with him yet.”

We entered the pitch, going through a short passageway and emerging into a darkened, banner-draped room. A man sat behind a covered table, peering into a crystal ball. He wore a bathrobe and a turban. When he saw us he rose, went to the door, latched it, and returned to his seat at the table.

No one spoke for a moment. I stared at the mystic, wondering where I’d seen that fat face before. He must have caught my thought, because he took his turban off and laid it on the table. I saw the bald head, and then I knew. The man was “Mrs. Hubbard.”

“You got here fast.” he said.

“I always keep my promises.” The Professor smiled. “Is everything all right, Jake?”

“Yeah, sure. All fixed but the payoff.” Jake gave me the kind of stare that would have cracked his crystal ball. “Who’s the savage?”

“This is Judson Roberts, my new associate. He’ll be working with me from now on.”

Jake favored me now with his normal smile. “Please to meet up with you. You a dummy?”

“I can talk,” I said. “But I learn more just from listening.”

“A wisey, huh?” Jake swung around to the Professor. “Rogers said for me to collect his split, too.”

“Very well.” Professor Hermann reached for his wallet and laid three portraits of Benjamin Franklin on the table. Jake covered them with a big fist.

“Thanks,” he said.

We left. The Professor walked out to the beach and headed for the water’s edge. He stood frowning off into the darkness.

“Now I understand,” I said. “You rigged the whole thing up, didn’t you? Planted a phony medium just to pull that stunt, so there really wasn’t a chance of anything going wrong.”

The wind tore the chuckle out of his mouth and carried it away across the water. “Of course. I never permit the possibility of an error. And this little affair tonight was more important than you know. Lorna Lewis had to be convinced. She is my opening wedge into the movie colony and the big money beyond that.

“You will find that I plan everything perfectly. Everything we do must be planned in detail, in advance. That way we cannot fail. I want your complete confidence and I am prepared to justify it—and pay for it. Not with hundred-dollar handouts; I’m talking about important money now—thousands, or perhaps millions. For me. For you.”

His white face stared up at me. “We can take over this town, you and I. Not with a phony cult or a fly-by-night racket. We’re going to go after the top, the cream. We’ll get right next to them, get under their skin, get into their minds. We’ll start out by advising and analyzing them—but we’ll end up by actually running their lives. We’ll own them, body and soul.

“Today you saw me arrange events so that Lorna Lewis would ask me for help. If my plans work out, six months from now I’ll be able to tell her—and dozens of others—to do anything I wish. And they’ll do it.

“That’s why I need you. That’s why I found you. Because this calls for a front man—young, good-looking, persuasive—to work with the women and with the men, too. Of course, you must be trained and it will take time, and it will not be easy. There is much that you must know: Metaphysics. Psychiatry. Theology. The arts of social presence. Your personality must be molded for aggression and command. I am the guiding hand—you will be the instrument, ground to perfection for our work.

"I shall demand strict obedience, strict adherence to the program of study I will lay down for you. But in return you shall receive everything you've always wanted: Fame, wealth, power.

"You'd like that, wouldn't you? I can sense it in you—the same drive, the same urge for power that I feel. Power over them all; the sleek, slim women you've never been able to have, the hard, smug, domineering men who've always ignored you. You can rule them if you wish; make them do anything you desire. There will be no laws you cannot break. Judges, doctors, politicians, financiers—the whole pack will come fawning at your heels, licking your fingers and whimpering for what you can give them."

I HAD to say something. "But look, you can't just do that to people. Maybe they'll fall for a line, but sooner or later they find out. I don't feel right, selling a bill of goods."

He laughed. "And yet you wanted to become a radio announcer."

"That's different."

"Is it? Is it any more honest to read off gaudy lies about the nonexistent benefits of soap and toothpaste than it is to advocate self-help? You'd be perfectly willing to tell millions of pimply, bloated hags that they will become lovely and alluring if they buy a cake of perfumed fat to drop into their bathwater. Isn't that the same thing?"

"Well, not exactly. I mean—"

"Be honest with yourself, now. You'd have no scruples about trying to run people's lives as a radio anouncer, would you? You'd sell anything, use any method. Fill little adolescent know-nothings with self-conscious fear, droning horrible warnings about acne and bad breath and perspiration odors. Frighten old folks with grave hints about the dreadful dangers of constipation and upset stomach. You'd promise wealth, success and happiness by implication to anyone who obeys your commands—who runs down to the corner druggist or the neighborhood grocer, who buys this, uses that, eats whatever it is you want to sell. Yes, and if your studio handed you the script, you'd use your best voice to proclaim the merits of a crooked politician, the virtues of a dishonest business policy. And yet you talk against running people's lives!"

It sounded good. I wasn't completely convinced, but I nodded. "Maybe you're right. But I still don't think you can get away with it. There may be a few screwballs who want to be fooled—who go for all the isms and ologies that come along. But most people are pretty sensible and normal. I don't see —"

"You will. Come along and I'll show you."

He led the way back across the beach. It came alive all around me:

A cannibalistic circle huddled around a small fire, gorging on halfraw hot-dogs and dill pickles. Troglodyte faces gaped in the firelight—a wrinkled, wizened old man's head with white, bushy hair and beetling black brows that moved convulsively as he chewed with his whole face at a tongue sandwich. There was a fat, blobby woman with stringy hair and a red neck; the rest of her flesh hung in dead-white folds, broken here and there by bulging purplish veins that stood out like mountain ranges on a relief map. She slapped at a screaming brat with one beefy hand. A bullet-headed youth squatted next to a portable radio, fiddling with the volume control and scratching the hairy recesses of his armpits.

"Welcome to the world," chuckled the Professor.

There was sand in my shoes. I was hungry. I stepped through a tangle of crumpled paper, greasy paper plates and broken pop-bottles. A small dog rushed up and nipped at my ankles.

"You see?" murmured the Professor. "Here are your normal people."

"All right," I said. "They stink. I hate 'em. But that doesn't prove anything. It doesn't prove they'll fall for a line of hooey about their lives and futures."

The wind sent a dirty newspaper flying against my leg. I bent down and pushed it away, glimpsing the red letters of the headline: Sex Maniac

Sought in Hatchet Slaying.

“Perhaps this will help,” the Professor told me. We turned onto the midway.

Fluorescence and incandescence blinded me. My lungs gulped in popcorn oil, lard, the reek of frying meat, the stink of decayed fruit, and a rancid stench composed of tobacco, sweat and whisky.

Banners swirled all around me—before me, behind me, on either side, overhead. Congress of Freaks. Flea Circus. Arcade. Eats. Fun House. Learn Your Future. Three Shots for a Dime. Play the Winners. Man-Eaters. Red-Hots. A dozen juke-boxes blared and boomed. A merry-go-round seethed. Against this background rose the whirling, rattling, clanking and grinding of the Whip, the Dodger, the plane-rides and the roller-coaster. The sharp crack of rifles echoed from the shooting gallery. Barkers shouted in command, and amplifying systems carried exhortations, roars, and raucous bawlings of invitation. From the rides overhead I heard screams, shrieks, wails, and high, hysterical laughter.

“Close your eyes,” said the Professor. “Don’t look at them. I won’t even make you look at them. Just listen. What do you hear?”

I closed my eyes and stood there, jostled and pitched by the crowd.

The harsh music in the background suggested bands; the boom-boom beat was in marching tempo. War. Yes, war—with rifle-shots and shouted orders. Grinding of machinery; tanks and planes and armored cars, artillery going into action. And over that, the screams: the screams of the wounded, the dying; the screams of the killers, boring for blood with their bayonets.

I DON’T know whether the Professor was a “psychic sensitive” or not, but abruptly he said, “Dachau.”

“Huh?”

“Dachau. The prison-camps in Germany, during the last war. The victims shrieked that way, I should imagine.”

“Funny, I was thinking of war, myself.”

"Not funny. Perfectly natural. Normal. As normal as these people and their actions. Look around you—see what they're doing. They're seeking entertainment—having fun, as they call it.

"This is an amusement park, my friend. People come here to find what they want out of life—entertainment. They put their pennies into the peep-show slots because they want to. They know they're being swindled—and they love it. They love the phoniness, the lies, the cheats. They know the freak shows are fakes, that the barkers lie. They know the spielers are conning them about stepping up and winning the electric clocks. They don't believe in our friend Sefro the Mystic, but they pay their money and go inside because they want to be fooled.

"This is not a new concept. Your showman, Barnum, said it long ago—and it was known and spoken of in ancient Egypt. But it is a truth that survives, for the desire tor self-delusion never dies.

"People long for escape. Some of them pay their pennies to find it here. Others are able and willing to pay fortunes for something a little more convincing—for the sort of escape we will give them. Those are the ones we shall rule: the seekers."

"Suckers," I said.

"The seeker is always a sucker," said Professor Hermann.

Chapter Five

THERE HAD NEVER BEEN any question about my going through with it. Why not? I had nothing to lose. If it got bad, or risky, I could always pull out.

That's the way I thought when I left the Professor. That's the way I thought when I went to his office the next morning.

Somehow I'd never pictured him in a downtown office. But there was the sign on the door, in neat, discreet lettering:

OTTO HERMANN Ph D. Ps.D.
Psychological Consultant

The waiting-room was cool and dark, well-furnished without the flash of Larry Rickert's fake modern layout. The receptionist's desk stood right out in the open. Behind it sat a plump, middle-aged brunette wearing a loose white smock and a tight red smile. She smiled up at me and her words filtered through a thick accent.

"You would be Mr. Haines?"

"I would."

"The Professor is expecting you. Please to enter."

I pleased to enter the private office. The Professor sat in a chair at the side of his desk. He was wearing the same black suit, or a reasonable facsimile. He glanced at his watch.

"Good morning. You are late."

"Sorry. I overslept. Yesterday took a lot out of me, I guess."

"You are rested now?"

I nodded.

"Good. Then we can proceed to business." He opened a drawer of his desk and drew out a thick sheaf of legal-bond typing paper.

"What's that?" I asked.

"Your book. The one you wrote." I stared at the title page and read.

Y-O-U
by
Judson Roberts

"Take it and read it," he said. "Memorize it. After all, you wrote it. Remember, you're Judson Roberts." I riffled the pages and sat back. "What's it all about?"

"Did you ever read Dale Carnegie? Walter Pitkin? Stuart Chase? They're all in there. And Doctor Frank Crane and Elbert Hubbard. Also Madame Blavatsky, Mrs. Eddy, plus a touch of Thorstein Veblen. And of course, Herr Freud, and Jung, and Aldous Huxley and Ouspensky and Spengler—a bit of everyone."

"Did you actually write it?"

"No. Rogers wrote it—you remember, the little man with the mustache at the seance. He has talent, when controlled. I had him start it a year ago, when I began to plan all this."

"What's the point?"

"Perfectly obvious. Now that I've found my Judson Roberts, the book will be published. I can arrange for printing and for distribution—but there will be more profit in selling it ourselves. Rogers can set up a direct-mail campaign, and over a period of years the book will make money—a small, steady income, although that's not important at all. But a published book is needed to establish Judson Roberts as an authority. That is most desirable. By the way, I've already sent in your name for a course and a diploma."

"Diploma?"

"You're going to be a Doctor of Psychology, just as I am. There's a correspondence school in the East. Fifty dollars gets you a degree, and no questions asked. . . . What are you grinning about?"

"It just struck me funny. All of a sudden I'm a Doctor of Psychology and the author of a book."

"There's nothing funny about that. It's window-dressing. And speaking of window-dressing—" The Professor rose and surveyed me critically. "Watch your posture. You have a tendency to slouch, your shoulders aren't squared. And you slump when you sit in a chair. We'll correct that. You'll need a wardrobe, of course, but that will come later. Hold your head a trifle higher and emphasize your height. You gain a certain advantage when people have to look up to you during a conversation. You might experiment with a different hair style. Those sideburns are all right for a cheap salesman, but I want more dignity. Ah, well, we'll come to these matters in due time. But right now, you have work to do."

"Such as?"

Reading your book."

I picked up the manuscript. "I'll run through it tonight," I promised.

THE PROFESSOR shook his head. "Only the beginning," he said. "You'll read it again—and again—and again. The content is the key to our whole system. It must be correlated with your other reading. For the next three months you're going to sit in that apartment of yours and read. I'll see that you eat, meanwhile."

"Sounds pretty soft."

"It won't be. You're going to study and sweat. I'll quiz you. You'll take tests. By the time I'm done, you'll be able to hold your own conversationally with any metaphysician, real or phony, and sound convincing."

"Okay. You're the Professor."

"And you're Judson Roberts."

That's how it started. I walked into the office as plain Eddie Haines, and I walked out as Judson Roberts, with my book under my arm.

Judson Roberts took his book home and studied it. Then he studied the basic, selected writings of Freud, Adler, Jung, Brill, Moll, Stekel. He subscribed to the Journal of Psychiatry. He read Swedenborg and Isis Unveiled. He read Frazer in bed, Charles Fort at the lunch-counter. Briffault in the bathroom. He waded through it all, the good and the bad alike—Lully, Flammarion, Toynbee, Nietzsche.

At first I couldn't make sense out of it all; nothing seemed related.

But gradually, Judson Roberts made sense of it. For as I read, Judson Roberts took shape. He was born out of the books, weaned on the Professor's nightly question-sessions.

JASON ROBERTS answered questions, written and oral. He learned to discourse on effects and autistic phenomena. He could give a Rorschach test. He could explain the symbolic derivatives of a matriarchic culture-pattern and analyze the inherent masochism of Kafka's works. Roberts could improvise a relationship between the Sung Dynasty, Apollonius of Tyana, and enuresis.

It takes a few minutes to read, but it took months to do. Eight hours of reading a day, seven days a week, plus two or three hours of talk, questions, answers. But wading through theories and ideas, I began to understand people a little better: Motivation and compulsion and compensation. Sublimation and projection. And not all of it came from college texts and reference works, either. I got some excellent insights from the Seventh Book of Moses. And even some from hex- and voodoo-supply catalogues.

The Professor kept taking me around to astrologers, palmists, phrenologists, spiritualists—men like Jake on the boardwalk and top operators working out of mansions in the hills north of Hollywood.

I learned that suckers are all alike, and the methods of handling them basically the same.

And through it all, he kept after me with questions. One afternoon toward the end of the third month, for example—

"What are the twelve divisions of normal interest?" droned Hermann.

"Time, personal magnetism, sex and marriage, investments, friends, obstacles, enemies, health, money trouble, changes and trips, surprises, and warnings."

"What is Yoga?"

"Yoga means unity, right action. Yogi is the practice of Yoga by a Guru, or teacher, and a Chela, or pupil. There are five divisions of Yoga:

"Raja-Yoga, the development of consciousness. Jnana-Yoga, or knowledge. Katma-Yoga, right action, and Bhakti-Yoga, right religious action. Then Hatha-Yoga, or power over the bodily functions. Govern your body and you govern the universe through Asana, the system of bodily posture, breath control, and control of the circulation and nervous system."

"Good enough. Now, define Turi-ya, Dharma, Kalpa, Manvantara. And recite the laws of Mann."

"Hey, take it easy! You've got me so full of that stuff it's coming out of my ears."

"I know. But there is so much to do, so little time. You must be ready soon."

"Yeah. Ready for Utter McKinley's embalming staff! Have a heart, Professor, I'm only human."

"You must be more than human for this job. You might apply some of the principles of Hatha-Yoga for exercise."

"I don't need exercise. I need a rest, a chance to get out of this damned hot apartment. I haven't had a drink for months, haven't seen anybody to talk to but you."

"That was our bargain."

"Our bargain was for me to make a million dollars, to have anything I wanted. And what do I get? A little cigarette-money and enough studying to kill Einstein! Look—I'm not Judson Roberts all the time, you know. I like a little fun once in a while."

"SO!" The Professor's fat fingers crawled over the nakedness of his skull. "How would you like to go to a party tonight?"

"What kind of a party—another seance in Pasadena?"

"No, I'm talking about the real thing. As a matter of fact, you're invited to attend. She's been inviting you for weeks, but I didn't tell you."

" 'She' ?"

"Lorna Lewis. She has inquired about you frequently. Yes, maybe that would work out—if you're interested."

"Count me in. I'll be there with bells on."

"No bells. You'll be there in a nice, conservative gray Palm Beach suit. You'll behave yourself and do the job I've laid out for you."

"But—"

"You'll do one thing and one only: Be nice to Lorna Lewis."

"That," I said, "is just ginger-peachy. I might even teach her a few Yoga positions."

Chapter Six

At the party the Professor planted me on the sofa; then he wandered away, after acknowledging a nod from our hostess. I was a little disappointed with the nod—I didn't expect Lorna Lewis to throw herself into my arms and nibble my ears, but even so, her cool reception didn't sit well with me after so much of a buildup. After the Professor vanished, I fidgeted. All I'd got from that greeting was a distinct letdown.

Plump little Miss Bauer from the Professor's office accompanied us, and it was she who identified the stocky, freckled, curly-haired man who dug his fingers possessively into Lorna Lewis' forearm.

"Mike Drayton. Iss her husband."

"Husband? Didn't know she was married."

"Yess. He iss a professional player."

"Playboy?"

"No, player. Of hockey."

"Oh, sure. I remember, now." I remembered Lorna Lewis' references to "Mike." Some problem of hers. Well, he looked like a problem to me; if we tangled, I'd be a dead duck.

But now it appeared that I'd never reach the tangling stage. Lorna was flitting around, greeting sports-jackets and evening wraps, offering glasses to Aloha shirts and gabardine slacks at the bar, being kittenish with a tall, red-haired man who was obviously a producer and obviously aware of it.

Mike Drayton, the husband, had disappeared. So had Miss Bauer and the Professor. I caught a glimpse of him as I went to refill my highball glass; he was stalking Lorna Lewis on the terrace. Maybe he'd steer her over to me.

The highballs were good, and after my long layoff, the second drink took hold. I had a third, but I was too nervous to enjoy it.

A trio of Filipinos wandered around making noises on mandolins and ukeleles—very corny. But most of the guests seemed to be far past the third drink, and they shouted requests. A small group gathered around a blonde who kicked off her shoes for a hula. Another, much smaller group, sat out on the stairs and talked shop. Through an archway I saw a fringe of bald, partially bald and gray heads huddled over a card-table.

It looked too damned typical, too pat and according-to-formula for me. Too much like the Hollywood party you read about. I don't know what I'd been expecting—certainly anything but this. And on top of it, I was all alone, ignored, off in a corner with no Lorna Lewis to finger the lapels of my Palm Beach suit.

I thought I'd better get drunk in a hurry and forget it.

I thought I might as well get out of here.

I thought—

She had hair the color of ripe apricots. She even smelled like apricots—well, apricot brandy, then. Because she was carrying a load.

She sat down beside me, and smiled up with green eyes. They were nice eyes, but right now a bit on the glassy side.

"Hello."

"Hello, yourself."

"What's the angle?"

"Angle? There's no angle."

"Come, now—everybody's got an angle. Are you trying to get Himberg's eye?"

"Who's Himberg?"

"The redheaded personality—the producer. You're trying to break into pictures, aren't you?"

"Not me, sister."

"I could never feel like a sister toward you, pal. And you aren't exactly the brotherly type, yourself. So why the gloom act?"

"Sorry. I was just watching the show."

"Well, you might get me a drink. And seeing as how you're getting so intimate and making advances, my name is Ellen Post."

"No relation to Emily?"

"I'm going now; I can see I misjudged you. You didn't look like the type to pull that one."

"Sorry. No, please, sit down. I'll get you a drink. Bourbon, straight?"

"Extremely straight, if you please."

"I please."

"Quit your bragging and run along." I went up to the bar and got a straight shot and another highball. Ellen Post watched me as I crossed the room toward her.

"So you're Judson Roberts."

"Who told you?"

"A little bird. A little baldheaded bird, with a monocle. A little sparrow, hopping after Lorna Lewis."

"I see you don't think much of psychological consultants."

"Not much." She gulped her shot. "You in pictures?" I asked.

"No. This is my line." She tapped her glass. "Prescribe me another, Doc."

I finished my drink and made my way back to the bar. Professor Hermann was sitting on the terrace with Lorna Lewis. They glanced up as I passed and the Professor winked. I didn't know what that was supposed to mean, so I ignored it. I liked apricots better, anyway.

"Here we are." I gave Ellen Post a glass and clicked my highball tumbler against its rim. "Forbidden fruit."

"What kind of a toast is that?"

"You be the psychologist and figure it out. Anyway, I was thinking of apricots."

"Apricots?"

"Yes. You—your hair, your skin." She chuckled. It was a husky sound, from deep within the throat, but it sounded surprisingly feminine.

"I've been called a lot of things in my time, but that's a new approach. I might add that I like it, Dr. Roberts. Or is it Judson? Or Judd?"

"Whichever you prefer."

She frowned and rose. "God damn it!"

"What's the matter?"

"I'm going."

"Have I said something wrong?" She shook her head. A scent came from her hair; it was a pleasant scent, but it didn't match her mood. Her face was depressed and strained.

"No—you didn't say anything wrong. That's the trouble, they never do. It's always the right thing, and I have the right answer, and the drinks get good and the conversation gets better. It's no use. I'm going home."

"Could I—"

"You could. But I won't let you." She walked swiftly, a little uncertainly, toward the terrace. "Good-by, Dr. Roberts. See you in Alcoholics Anonymous."

"But—"

"There you are!" Another scent, behind me. Not perfume, but something more vital than that—heavier. Tiger-lily. Not golden, but white. I didn't have to turn to know that Lorna Lewis was smiling up at me.

"I was coming to rescue you," she said.

"From what?"

"The Post. Miss Pillow-to-Post. Did she ask you to go to bed with her? She always does when she gets a few quick ones into her. Drinks, I mean."

"What kind of a person is she?"

"Can't you tell? A lush. One of those rich-bitch society types—she always crooks her little finger, even when she drinks out of the bottle. I can't stand her; but Mike likes her. He would—he's a rummy himself."

I looked around for the Professor, waiting for a cue, a signal. He'd tell me just how nice I was supposed to be. But the Professor had disappeared. That meant I was on my own.

Maybe I should have remembered that I now was Judson Roberts, Ps.D. Maybe I should have figured out how to play it carefully, watch my step. Instead I looked down at those white legs, looked up into the blue, blazing insolence of Lorna's eyes.

"It's hot in here," I said.

"It might be even hotter, outside."

"You mean, your husband?"

"Don't call him that. He hasn't been my husband since the Toronto game, when somebody hit him with a stick. All he wants now is his bottle—understand?" She leaned close.

I understood, all right. I understood that she was a cheap, two-timing little tramp. But she had those legs and she was a movie star, or almost a star. And I was Eddie Plaines, a nobody from nowhere. I was Eddie Haines, trying like hell to hold my liquor, trying like hell to remember my name was Judson Roberts.

There was only one answer.

"Let's go outside." I said.

Dark curls tumbled from side to side. "No, not now. I'm the hostess, remember? Wait until later, when I get rid of this gang. I'll throw them out and check on Mike."

"When?"

"Tell you what: It's after eleven, so you come back about twelve-thirty. I'll be waiting for you dawn at the coach-house. You know where it is—on the side, behind the swimming-pool."

"Right."

"Clear out, now. I don't want us to be seen together—you understand."

I understood. She squeezed my arm and rose. I made one last attempt to find the Professor. He wasn't in the big room, and he wasn't on the terrace. The night air was cool. I breathed slowly, deeply, evenly—but inside my chest, my heart was going like a dynamo.

There was nothing to do for an hour and a half. Just nothing to do but wait—and drink.

I found a little place down the road and stopped in for a quick one. It had to be quick; the bars close at twelve. When I found that out, I had another, and another.

Then I staggered out into the night. It was a good night. Cool, but not too cool, and very clear. Stars. Millions of them.

The house was dark. Too damned much shrubbery on the lawn. And the swimming-pool—mustn’t stumble and fall in the swimming-pool! Show up all wet. Stars in the swimming-pool, too. . . . Star light, star bright, first star I see tonight, wish I may, wish I might—

I found the door to the coach-house and it opened and somebody was waiting for me. Sure enough, I could see her; she was waiting, and now she came forward and what was I waiting for?

“You’re not cold.”

“You’re not sober.”

“Do you mind?”

“What do you think?” She laughed.

I wanted to stop that, so I did. My mouth closed down on hers, and through the doorway I could see the stars; and then a faint sliver of a pale moon that rose over the black outline of the terrace.

“Wait a minute. What’s that?”

“Forget about it, honey.”

“No. I hear something outside. Somebody’s coming.”

Now I heard it too, the crunch of gravel and then the fumbling, and the squeaking of the door.

“Mike!”

He stood there in the doorway. I tried to focus on him. He was a big man, and it was hard to see him clearly or separate his bulk from the monstrous, menacing black shadow.

He stood there and cursed us—cursed us in a low, steady, monotonous voice, ripping his words off back-alley fences, off privy walls. He said other things, too.

"I'm gonna kill ya. I'm gonna rip out ya guts an'—"

He was in the light, I was in the dark, and now was the time, if ever.

I WENT toward him; he reached out those hairy ape-arms of his, and I hit him, hard. But not hard enough. He backed away, and then he came up with one on the side of my head. I felt it, soft and far-away, and as I wobbled he hit me again.

Then we were outside and Lorna said, "No! Stop—please—" But it was phony, cheap-movie dialogue; it was a corny scene, a couple of drunks fighting over a tramp.

That made me mad, so I hit him again. He swung—not to hit, this time, but to gouge at my eye with his thumb. He was good at it. I pushed my knuckles against his mouth, hard. He grunted and tried to tackle me.

He was heavy, he was strong, and he pushed me back toward the edge of the pool. I could see him gritting his teeth in the moonlight, and the blood running out of the corners of his mouth looked bright and heavy as quicksilver.

Then everything went dim and I felt something tightening around me. He had my neck; he was choking me. Lorna yelled and he yelled; but I could only gasp from far away.

I kicked up and in. The tightness suddenly relaxed. I could get to my feet and watch him. He stood doubled-up at the edge of the pool, waiting for the pain to ease, waiting to come in again and kill me.

I couldn't wait. I moved toward him. He was ready, now. He spread his hands and poised. I closed my eyes and swung from the waist.

My hand hurt. I wobbled there, rubbing my fingers, watching him fall backward into the pool. It took a million years before the splash came when he hit the water.

Lorna stopped yelling. Everything got very quiet.

I walked over to the pool and looked down. There was nothing to see but bubbles—pretty little silvery bubbles, gleaming in the moonlight.

Chapter Seven

THE WATER STABBED ME with a million novocained needles. I gulped, paddled, then dived. Silver pressed my eyeballs, but I could see through silver. I could see something dark and huddled, bobbing down there at the bottom of the pool.

I reached it, tugged at it. Heavy . . . Heavy as the weight inside my lungs, my head. I went up for air, got it. Then I dived again, tugged again.

This time I could lift; we came to the surface together, live and dead weight. Dead weight! He couldn’t be—I had to get him out.

“Help me lift him up!” I yelled.

Lorna stared over the edge of the pool. Her lips twitched, and then her mouth tried to run away from her face. But she reached down and held Mike’s collar as I pulled myself over the side and then grabbed him under the arms.

I tugged and lifted. He was heavy as lead. Lead. . . . Dead. No—he was all right. He must be all right.

Then he was sprawled out on the grass, face down, and I was kneeling over him, pressing his back and lifting him, pressing and lifting—

“Iss wrong, perhaps?”

I jerked and Lorna jerked. Mike just lay there.

We stared up at the plumpness of Miss Bauer.

“What are you doing here?”

“She’s with me.”

Professor Hermann emerged from the shadows of the walk. “What goes on here? We’ve been looking all over for you. When the party broke up we left, and I called your apartment from a filling-station. No answer, so I came back. Apparently it was wise that I did.”

“We were fighting,” I said. “I hit him and he fell into the pool. I fished him out. But—”

The Professor pushed me aside. He knelt and took off his hat. The bald moon of his skull shone down over Mike's face as he turned Mike over on the grass. A fat hand fumbled beneath the soggy wet shirt.

It rested there; the wind stopped moving, the grass stopped rustling, the stars stopped twinkling. The trees bent forward, listening—listening for a heartbeat.

"He's dead," said Professor Hermann.

Then everything was moving again, fast—too fast.

"Steady up!" Miss Bauer was holding me.

"But he can't be! We've got to work on his lungs, get the water out! He couldn't have been under more than a minute or so—"

"He was unconscious," the Professor said. "It is too bad."

"Too bad?" We all looked at Lorna. "I'll say it's too bad! Wait until the papers get hold of this, wait until Lolly finds out! I'm through—Himberg will tie a can to me—and the cops—Christ—somebody do something—"

I shook her. It only jumbled the sounds together.

"Oh, Christ—Himberg—gotta—"

I slapped her mouth shut. "Cut that out!"

The Professor put on his hat, rose, and put his hand on Lorna's shoulder. "He's right. Hysteria will not help, now. We must be calm. We must think."

"Think? What good will thinking do? Mike's dead and they'll find out, they'll get us—"

"No; not if we're calm. Listen to me, Miss Lewis. I may have a solution, but you'll have to help me."

"How?"

"By answering questions. Here—"

HE gave her a cigarette, lit it for her. He watched it wobble between her lips, then steady as she inhaled.

"There! Now listen to me, and answer. Are there any servants in the house?"

“No. I told Frieda to clear out when the gang left. And George is on vacation this week.”

“Mike? No—I don’t want to talk about him—”

“You must. It’s important. Your life, your career.”

He knew how to get to her, all right—not with “life,” but with “career.” She sobered.

“What time did Mike go upstairs with his bottle?”

“How did you know about that?”

“I saw him. Miss Bauer saw him. Others must have seen him—that group on the stairway.”

“That’s right. Let me see; it was around eleven, I guess.”

“Was he drunk?”

“No more than usual.”

“He drank frequently?”

“You can say that again. The last six months he’s always been lushed up.”

“And people know that? Your friends?”

“He pulled that stunt at every party I’ve given, or every one we ever went to. Not that he’d come with me very often, the louse. And when he did, he generally sneaked off in the middle of the evening and took the car with him.”

“You say he’d get drunk and then leave a party—drive off somewhere alone?”

“Sure. He wrecked the station-wagon about four months ago. Drove it into a piling near Santa Barbara. How the hell he ever got ’way up there, I don’t know. He didn’t know, he was that stiff. It was in the papers.”

“That time he wrecked the car—how long was he gone?”

“Two days, nearly. The cops picked him up. He wasn’t hurt, but I had a hard time helping him beat the rap. Himberg fixed it somehow.”

“Your friends know his habits?”

“They should. Please, Professor, don’t ask me anything more. I think I’m going to be sick.”

She weaved away and was sick—very sick—over near the trees. I turned and watched Miss Bauer as she worked silently, furiously, over Mike.

“Please,” said the Professor. “That is useless. Besides, I have a plan.”

He turned to me. “Did anyone else know of your—your visit—here at the coach-house?”

I shook my head. “I stopped in a tavern below the hill here, but there was no one around except the bartender. I didn’t spill anything to him, either.”

“Good. Then will you please take my car and drive yourself home? I will get in touch with you tomorrow.”

“But Mike—the police—”

“I am taking care of Mike. And there will be no police, if you do what I say. Go, now. I must talk to Miss Lewis alone.”

Miss Bauer tugged at the Professor’s sleeve.

“I do not like this,” she said. “Let me continue; the water iss leaving the lungs. If we send for a rescue squad, he may yet be alive.”

The Professor faced her. “That is for me to decide.”

It was more than a statement; it was a command. Miss Bauer bowed her head. The Professor went over to Lorna and took her arm. She sobbed against him and he began whispering to her. His voice was soft, soothing, gentle. I couldn’t hear anything he said.

I walked to the car, climbed in, drove away. I went home, walked up to the apartment, closed the door. I ripped off my damp clothes and fell down on the bed and slept. . . .

Then, coming up out of the darkness, into the sunlight, I felt like a new man. A man who needed a shower, a shave, breakfast, a cigarette.

I had them all. But when I lit the cigarette, my hand trembled. The old Yoga wasn’t working for Judson Roberts today.

I wondered if Professor Hermann was working. I wondered whether he had dumped the body in the ocean, tried to make it look like suicide. I wondered if something had gone wrong, if they were looking for me. . . . Better pull down the blinds, quick, and—

No, that was wrong. I must trust him; I had to trust him. He had told me to wait, that he'd get in touch with me. So I'd wait.

I picked up Flugel's "Psychology of Clothes" to read about canes as symbols of personal extension, and wondered what Ellen Post was doing this fine day. Did she have a hangover? Did she remember me? I tried to picture her, place her in a setting. A hall bedroom? Obviously not the place. An apartment like this one? Wrong, again. A big house? Room next to her parents? Did she have money, live alone?

Why hadn't I found out more about her, got her address, made a date?

This was no time to think about it. This was no time to read about canes as phallic symbols, either. I wanted to know what was going on. It was already past noon.

I dialed the Professor's office. He'd paid up my phone bill for that reason, last month.

"Yess?"

"Miss Bauer, this is Judson Roberts. Did he—Is the Professor back?"

"No."

"Have you heard—anything?"

"No."

"I see. If he should come in, you'll ask him to call me at once?"

"Certainly."

"Thanks."

I hung up. As I reached for a cigarette, the doorbell rang.

I started to get up, then sank back. Once before, the doorbell had rung and I'd been afraid to answer it. I'd waited, and a hundred-dollar bill had slid under the door for me.

What would happen if I waited now?

I decided to find out. I sat there, as the bell sounded again. Then came an eternity of silence. I stared at the door.

Something rustled, crept, slithered under the door. It wasn't green, like money. It was white, like paper.

A newspaper.

I rose and walked over to the door on tiptoe. I looked down. The newspaper had been reduced to a single sheet, and the top portion of a column was inserted under the door upside down. I cocked my head and read a headline:

HOCKEY STAR VICTIM IN TRAIN
SMASHUP.

I opened the door and let Professor Hermann in.

Chapter Eight

"I DON'T SEE how you did it!" I shook my head and tried not to shake anything else.

"It was simple. The newspaper tells the story, does it not? Drunken driver, stalled on the tracks near the curve at La Placentia, just outside of town. The express hit the car, dragged it for a quarter of a mile. Michael Drayton, thirty-one, husband of Lorna Lewis, Imperial starlet. Wife hysterical at news of accidental death. End of story." The Professor put down the paper and shrugged.

"Didn't they find water in his lungs?"

"There was no water left, thanks to Miss Bauer's work. I checked on it. Lorna's story about smashing the station-wagon gave me the idea. I told her it would cost her a car. She gave it to me without question. I bundled the body into the back and drove over in time to catch the train that pulls through at 4:10 a.m. It was still dark and the side road was deserted. I got out, stalled the motor, and propped Mike up in the front seat. Then there was nothing to do but wait for the express to come, and watch it hit. The car was smashed to bits, and I suppose that Mike—"

He saw my face, and broke off without finishing the sentence. "I walked a few miles and caught a bus," he concluded. "Then I phoned Lorna and told her what to say when she was notified. After that I went home to sleep. I slept until I knew it was time to get up and look at the papers." The Professor told it that way, without inflection, without emotion. I began to feel cold all over.

"You make it sound so simple," I told him. "But if you hadn't figured it out, I'd be finished. The whole thing is like a nightmare, from the beginning. It was all an accident, you know that. But I never could have proved it. Maybe he was no damned good, maybe he had it coming—but I'm still guilty of his death. And you saved me. I don't quite know how to say it—"

He sat there, smiling at me. "Never mind. I understand. You can forget last night. It was just lucky that I happened to be there."

The black hat came off. The bald head looked like a skull. I shuddered, and lit a cigarette. He was right, better drop it. I was lucky, lucky he happened to be there.

Luck . . . Happened. Something clicked.

"What's the matter?" he asked. "Nothing. I was just thinking—how come you didn't give me any instructions last night?"

"I don't understand."

"You remember, you were going to build me up with Lorna."

"I did. I spent much time talking of you."

"Yes. But you didn't tell me what to do with her. You left me alone, disappeared."

"I saw you were getting along all right. There was no need to stay."

"But you came back."

"I phoned you from the filling-station, after midnight. I got worried when there was no answer."

"Didn't you figure I might be keeping a date with the lady?"

"Yes, of course. But I wanted to check on you." He smiled. "You know, I am very careful about everything I plan."

"You must have been."

"What do you mean?"

I stood up. "I mean, the whole thing looks queer to me now. How did you know where to find us when you returned? How did you know we weren't in the house, upstairs? Yes, and Mike Drayton—he was supposed to have passed out, with a bottle. What made him come to the coach-house and surprise us?"

The top of his head had the dull luster of old ivory. I stared down at him, panting.

"You've told me yourself you never leave anything to luck. Things don't just happen when you have a hand in them. You went upstairs and woke Mike. You told him where we'd be. You sent him to us, knowing there'd be a quarrel, a fight. Perhaps you even planned on murder."

"Sit down. You sound like Lorna. now."

"Well, I'm not Lorna; I'm not a hysterical little tart. I know what I'm saying, and I know you. You did plan it this way, didn't you?"

HE looked up at me and smiled. His mouth smiled, but his eyes didn't change. They looked blank, empty; they seemed just holes in an old ivory skull.

"Yes. There is no reason why you shouldn't know. I planned it this way."

"But why—why would you do such a thing?"

"Sit down. Keep your voice low. I'll tell you. Better still, I'll show you—on the first of next month, when I get a check from Lorna Lewis for a thousand dollars. . . . Consultation fee. There will be such a check, every month, from now on."

"Blackmail!"

"I do not like that word."

“I don’t like what you did. I don’t like the way you messed me up in this deal.”

“It just worked out that way. It seemed—”

“Never mind how it seemed! Nothing just works out around you. You had a reason. I want to know.”

“Very well, my young friend. You will know. I’m sorry you forced me to say this, but perhaps it’s for the best.” The skull leaned forward. The eyes, dead no longer, bored through my scowl.

“I have plans for you, big plans. I have taught you many things, and you will learn more. When we start our project, you will be perfectly equipped to handle any problem that arises. And you will meet the public, not I. I’ll stay in the background.

“If things had gone along without any trouble, you’d take your place as Judson Roberts, gain a reputation, make contacts. In a little while you’d start getting delusions of grandeur. You’d begin to wonder why you couldn’t run the show alone, why you must continue to play Trilby to my Svengali. And you’d try to dump me.

“Mind you, I don’t say you’d succeed; but you’d try. I know you better than you know yourself.

“So I planned this, and it worked. Now you won’t try to step out of line. You’ve killed a man. You know it, and Lorna Lewis knows it. But more important still, I know it—and I’m not afraid to talk, if I must.”

I laughed harshly. “I can just hear you talking, Professor. You’re an accessory—”

“Perhaps. It might cost me a year or two in prison. But you would burn for it! And, as you so aptly remarked, I leave nothing to chance. That’s why I brought Miss Bauer along. She’s a good witness; an innocent bystander who saw it happen.

“So now you know, my friend. And now you will never try to cross me, you will never attempt to take over. You will do just as I say, and not try anything rash, like running away.”

I stood up again. “You think of everything,” I whispered. “But did you ever think that I might try to—kill you?”

I was lightning; I struck from the side. My hand went down, aiming for the fat crease in his neck—

Something was wrong. I stumbled. His foot was out. I was going down. And then there was a pressure on the back of my own neck, an intolerable pressure, crushing the spine up into my brain—

His voice found me in the darkness.

“You’re a fool! Don’t ever try that again. I warn you, I have powers you’ve never dreamed of! Now, get up—if you can.”

I DRAGGED myself over to the chair. My head rested on a red-hot lance that bored through my backbone.

“I told you once before to forget everything that happened last night. That was good advice. You had better follow it. Forget today, too; because we’re starting over again.”

He was still sitting there, perfectly calm.

“Yes, we’re starting,” he repeated. “The time has come. I’ve got the office lined up, and the decorators hired. Next month we’ll be on our way, both of us—on our way to the top.

“That’s why you must forget all this. The past is dead, safely dead. Only the future is alive. I’m going to make those promises come true, for both of us.

“I am your friend, Eddie—believe that. I’m the only friend you ever had. You can trust me—you must trust me—you will trust me.”

It was like something you hear in a dream, something you hear when you’re under ether, something you hear when you’re under hypnosis. Hypnosis! Those slitted eyes of his, staring and staring at me—

“You’ll have everything,” droned the voice. “I’ll stay in the background and you’ll get the glory, the fame, the money, the power. That’s the way it’s going to be. Never doubt it for an instant. You're Judson Roberts, remember? And I'm just—nobody."

I shook off the voice, shook off the stare, and looked at "nobody," sitting there in the chair. His head was like a skull. . . . And then it changed. Maybe it was the slitted eyes and the slitted mouth; maybe it was something else. But all of a sudden, it hit me.

For the first time I realized that Professor Hermann looked like the Devil.

He sat there, and his pudgy hands closed over a shadow. It was only a shadow, but he held it tightly and I knew he would never let it go.

It was my soul.

Chapter Nine

A TALL YOUNG MAN with wavy hair and a professionally precise mustache stared at a tall young man with wavy hair and a professionally precise mustache, who stared at a tall young man with wavy hair and a professionally precise mustache, who—

But you get the idea.

It went on that way, endlessly. The man wearing the soft, sand-colored suit, the white shirt and the solid black knit tie gazed at himself in each of the eight mirror surfaces covering the octagonal office walls.

This octagonal inner office was as big as a barn, with a high ceiling and recessed lighting. The degree of brightness was controlled by a knee-switch behind the desk. That desk and its chair, set in the center of the room, was the only visible furniture. The rest was all space, light and mirrors—mirrors multiplying the presence and personality of Judson Roberts. Mirrors that dazzled and confused the client.

The mirrors caused self-consciousness, and self-hypnosis, too. Of course, I wasn't susceptible any more. Three months here had made me acquainted with the layout, and with the man in the mirror that I had become—Judson Roberts.

It had cost Professor Hermann a lot to set up Y-O-U—“Your Opportunities Unlimited.” There was a big nut in the overhead, too, but already it was starting to make ample return.

I sat behind the desk and studied myself in those mirrors. Mr. Judson Roberts smiled back at me from all over the room.

And why not? The book was selling through direct mail, there was a big play for the weekly lectures at the hotel, the appointments poured in regularly. Strangers kept calling, mail arrived. And Judson Roberts was taking the suckers over the jumps, just as the Professor had predicted.

I didn’t resent the Professor any more, either. He was right, and our successful operation proved it. The Lorna Lewis mess was forgotten; I never saw her any more.

FOR that matter, I saw very little of the Professor. As he had promised, he got me started and then left me alone. He handled his own office and I handled mine.

Of course, he’d assigned little Sid Rogers to help steer me over the hard spots—and to keep an eye on me too, I suppose. Rogers even took an upstairs room in the new house I’d rented on New Hampshire near Wilshire. But he didn’t intrude, and his assistance was welcome at the office.

He briefed May, our secretary. He ghosted my weekly lectures. He made the appointments, sized up clients, checked on the backgrounds of potential prospects. He offered sensible advice:

“Always dress conservatively; flash is out—this isn’t the Boardwalk. Remember to keep your voice soft, low—make it just a little hard for them to hear you . . . then they’ll have to concentrate, and that’s half the battle. Never turn your back on a sucker, don’t give him a second to think about anything else.”

Tricks, gimmicks, angles. Always something to learn, something to remember, something to try out.

At first I had been afraid, wondering if the bluff would work. Now I wondered why I'd ever wondered. The Professor was right—the seeker was always a sucker. And I wasn't finding it difficult to keep up a front any more. The face smiling back at me from the mirrors was different now, somehow. Poised. It wasn't only that I wore a new mustache; I wore a new look of confidence. I looked like Judson Roberts now, I felt like Judson Roberts, I was Judson Roberts.

The phone rang. I lifted the receiver from the concealed alcove inside the round desk.

May's voice, crisply confident: That meant business was in the office.

"Mr. Roberts? A Mr. Caldwell to see you. He wishes to make an appointment."

"Wishes" was a code-word. It meant money. "Appointment" was another code-word. It meant a ten- or fifteen-minute stall, until Rogers could check on the client.

"O.K.," I said, softly. "Tell Mr. Rogers to give me what he can. I'll buzz you when I'm ready. Meanwhile, give Caldwell the consultation routine."

That meant that May would phone the Professor's office and ask for Doctor Altschuler. There would be a discussion of psychiatric treatment over the phone. "Mr. Roberts advises—Mr. Roberts recommends that the patient—Mr. Roberts finds indications of fixation." All for the benefit of the poor guy fidgeting in the handsome but contrivedly uncomfortable chair in the outer office.

I knew what Rogers was doing, too. He was working on Caldwell's name in the little office down the hall. He and the girl we hired to play "nurse" were tracing Caldwell's history with the aid of three telephones and an entire wall-cabinet full of city directories, phone books, detailed city and county street maps. They were looking for biographical sketches in "Who's Who," in business directories, fraternal publications, school annuals. They were phoning for credit-ratings, phoning newspaper morgues. They were checking cross-indexed files furnished by the Professor's friends in similar rackets. And they would get results fast—almost spectacular results.

GIVEN a little luck, Rogers could work even without a sucker's name. All he needed was a glimpse of the license plate of the car he drove. In fifteen minutes, working according to plan and system, he could come up with name, address, occupation, age, financial status—wife's name, names of children and ages, names of parents and close relatives—present residence and previous residences from date of birth on. In addition, there were the little convincing touches; hobbies and club memberships, school background and nickname, and a fairly detailed description of his home and its landmarks. From this it was often easy to guess the character and present problems of the sucker. Yes, Rogers was a good man.

He came in through the hidden entrance behind the rear-wall mirror and laid the typewritten cards on my desk.

"Got a live one, it looks like," he said. "Airlines corporation counsel; inherited money, too. But it's all down here."

"Thanks, Sid. You're a fast worker."

"Good luck."

He vanished. I read the dossier very carefully. Then I read it again. I looked at my watch. Fourteen minutes since May had called. Time enough.

I put the cards down next to the phone, picked up the receiver, and buzzed May.

"Send him in," I said. I leaned back and pressed the light-switch. The mirrors seemed to rise out of the walls, glaring and pressing forward.

The door opened and Edgar Clinton Caldwell stepped into the room.

THERE are three ways to use the information I'd just received from Sid Rogers. The first is to put on the old mystic act—telepathic impressions. It works well with women, and with swishes. The second method is the "arch, inscrutable" gag: "yes, we have our own sources of information, you know." That's for the wise guys, the blusterers.

Looking at Edgar Caldwell, I decided to use the third routine.

He stood there, fat and frightened under the blinding light, gazing at his rumpled reflection in the mirror. He had been sweating, and his coat hung soggily from broad, stooped shoulders. The lower button was open, revealing a wrinkled white triangle with a broad base over a protruding stomach. His gray hair was plastered back over a high, ruddy forehead. He was fat, and he was also big—all his features seemed a little larger than life-size.

I could tell he was frightened, but he didn't know I could tell. He thought he was looking fierce. His eyes glowered; his chin, and its accessory folds, thrust forward aggressively.

But I was watching his hands: large, red, knob-knuckled hands, the hands that clenched and unclenched in unconscious, uncontrolled apprehension. Those hands were looking for something to hang on to in a room of emptiness. Those hands wanted to smash out at the mirrors that multiplied and distorted their reflections. Those hands wanted to come up, cover the eyes and shut out the glare of light, shut out the spectacle of my complacency. The hands could not grasp, they could not destroy, they could not conceal.

I looked at Caldwell's hands and knew the third approach would work.

"You are Edgar Clinton Caldwell?" Soft voice, but phrase the question as though the man is on trial.

"Yes. Mr. Roberts?"

Good! His voice trembled a little on my name. Got him!

"I am Judson Roberts. Won't you come in?"

Get him to cross the room. Make him sweat and falter as he tries not to watch himself in all those mirrors. He'll notice everything he's tried to hide from others and himself—the way he looks from the side, the unflattering angles of his head, his poor posture, his ridiculous waddling butt sticking up behind. Get him to cross the room and he's licked before he starts.

"Trick layout you got here."

Start the third gambit. Frank, open smile. Look up. Let him feel superior, for just a moment.

"It's meant to impress the credulous. I must apologize to you, sir. There's obviously no need of stage-effects with you."

I dimmed the lights. He blinked his relief, standing there and waiting for me to confide in him.

Third gambit, now.

I reached into the desk-recess and drew out the typed notes. I held them out to him.

"Here, Mr. Caldwell—I'm going to ask you a small favor before we go any further. Will you please verify the accuracy of these statements?"

He took the cards and I watched them disappear in the red folds of his huge hands. I watched him read, watched his eyes dilate, watched the eyebrows as they tried to climb his forehead.

"What the—Where the devil did you get all this dope?"

Smile. Let it hit him, let it sink in. Wait until he's sold.

"I could make it sound mysterious, Mr. Caldwell, but the whole thing is really quite simple. I have a trained research staff, you know. The moment your name was announced, they went to work on the files. Naturally, a man in your position has left his mark in many places; newspapers, trade publications, directories. Our references yielded this preliminary data. Undoubtedly a more comprehensive checkup would afford us much more information on your background and position.

"Now the reason for all this is obvious to you, Mr. Caldwell. I am a professional psychologist and as such, a business man. I conduct my affairs on a business basis, just as you do. Naturally, it is helpful for me to know as much as possible about a client before I see him; just as you endeavor to find out what you can about a prospect. I'm sure that you, too, have your sources, Mr. Caldwell."

WATCH him grin. He isn't frightened. now. He thinks you're taking him into your confidence. He's flattered. You wouldn't pull any tricks on him, he can see that; you've sized him up as an equal. In a word, the poor fish is hooked.

"I might as well be perfectly frank with you, Mr. Caldwell. Our relationship to come will demand such frankness, mutual frankness. Don't you agree?"

He nodded. I wanted to keep him nodding, now.

Build up a dependency. The patient develops a fixation upon the analyst. Keep it in that stage. Flatter him with questions, inquire after every detail, endlessly. Everyone wants to talk about himself. That's Y-O-U, the whole secret of it. Complete catharsis.

"And now, Mr. Caldwell, let's talk about you and your problems. You have a problem, don't you, Mr. Caldwell?"

Problems. They all have problems. Every one is different, and they're all the same. Always a common denominator—the basic fear:

The rabbity little man, Mason, who came on Thursday afternoons. He was afraid of his own desires. Mrs. Finch, Mondays and Fridays by appointment in her home, feared what happened to her when she tried stopping or cutting down the dosage of her sleeping-powders. Maxwell Solomon, very confidential ("apt to call you any time I need you"), attempted to conceal in pyrophobia his dread of Divine retribution for saving himself rather than his wife and child in the crash of their private plane. Miss Eudalie Vinyer was afraid of me because I was all men and all men were her brothers and at thirteen she had been too young to derive any enjoyment from the opposite sex. Baker feared his boss; Klotscher feared God; Mrs. Annixter feared tuberculosis, which was a polite term for her more deep-seated neurosis, which was a polite term for the fact that her husband was steadily driving her to the brink of a genuine and frustrating nervous breakdown. By a strange coincidence, Mr. Annixter came too. He feared Mrs. Annixter.

It was all very simple, and all very complicated. Some of them knew, and some of them didn't know. Some of them had to be told, some of them couldn't be told. Some of them needed a doctor, some a psychiatrist, some a lawyer, some a priest, some an executioner. But all of them needed me. They needed an audience, a father-confessor, a child, a mother, a lover to listen and understand and flatter and cajole and condone.

They needed Y-O-U.

Detail—endless detail; they wanted to tell everything.

They wanted every test I could give them—co-ordination, color determination, mnemonics, word-association and free fantasy sessions, work with charts, slides, ink-blots and anything else I could think up.

I would send them to a pal of ours, Dr. Sylvestro, for a complete preliminary physical checkup, and they loved that too.

That was the answer. They feared, and they wanted love. Love in the form of attention, interest, an affirmation of their own self-importance.

Y-O-U gave it to them. For Y-O-U, with all the metaphysical and practical psychology hokum boiled away, was simply an extension of the old saws, "Know thyself" and "Be yourself." The whole routine was built up to flatter the individual, make him think about himself. There were touches of the "charm school" and the "expand your personality" routine here; we sent people to beauty parlors and plastic surgeons and dress designers and dancing schools. But in the end, we took them to the cleaners.

It was fascinating to watch the spectacle. There was only one difficulty—I kept wanting to go outside and vomit.

Now here was Mr. Caldwell and his problem. Edgar Clinton Caldwell, 57. Wealthy, father of three, a "successful business man," a typical example of middle-class respectability and sublimated eroticism.

Dr. Sylvestro had recommended me to him. "Nerves." Hemorrhoids and constipation. "But there are some things you can't tell even a doctor—you understand that, Roberts. Like the string. Sounds silly; I wouldn't mention it even to Mrs. Caldwell. But I save twine and old string—every bit. I have boxes full of it down in the office, in the safe. It's just a habit; I know it's nothing serious—but why do I do such a thing?"

I knew why. But I didn't tell him. I let him do the talking, twice a week. First a routine probing. Then a gradual, almost imperceptible hypnotic technique. That's something I was picking up from Professor Hermann. I suspected he used it on Miss Bauer, and that he had been tempted to try it with me.

It worked with Caldwell. He grew to depend on the sittings. And I kept taking notes: notes about him—notes about his business dealings. I wasn't quite sure what the angle would be, yet. Those things I left to the Professor.

When I had enough, I asked Hermann.

He read, listened, and twirled his monocle. Then:

"Get him to retire. Liquidate his holdings. We'll need cash for this."

"Retire? But he loves his business—I can't take that away from him. Oh, I can probably force the issue, but the results will be bad. He'll just go to pieces. Inside of six months he'll be a wreck."

"I know that." The bald head bobbed, the monocle twirled. "Get him to retire."

"BUT I don't want to retire, man!" Caldwell expostulated. "It isn't that I don't place any faith in you, Roberts; you know better than that. But here I am, in the prime of life, with a fine position—why, I own better than fifteen per cent of the airline stock. I've worked years to get where I am; and now you advise me to chuck everything. Why?"

"Because you're not happy."

"Dammit, man, who says I'm not happy? I've got a net worth of upward of two hundred thousand, no debts; a house in town and one at the beach. Marge and I get along great—the sex part doesn't bother me, you know; I told you about Eve—and those boys of mine—"

"You're not happy."

"Don't keep saying that! Just because of those goddam piles, and a few dreams—"

"I'm sorry to keep interrupting you, Mr. Caldwell. I'm sorry to keep repeating myself. But you are not a happy man. And you know it. Your very defensive attitude reveals it. Happy men are under no compulsion to save string. Happy men do not wash their hands until the flesh is red and chafed, the knuckles constantly rubbed raw from frequent cleansing with strong abrasive soaps. Happy men do not require sexual stimulation from a mistress."

"Please, let's not mention that part again; I wish I'd not let that slip out."

"You will be thankful some day that you were utterly frank with me. And you will be thankful that I am utterly frank with you. I want you to retire. These sessions are stimulating, but they are not enough. In order to remake your life, you must devote your life to the task.

"Your present habit-patterns and associations keep you chained to the reflexes and conditioning which make you unhappy. You'll never be free, never emancipate your personality, until you are willing to start afresh.

"I don't want to be an alarmist, Mr. Caldwell, but unless you undertake the step now, it may be too late ever to escape. You aren't getting any younger, you know. What you can do today, voluntarily, you will be unable to do five years, three years, or even one year from now. This is your last chance."

"I don't see it, Roberts—don't see it at all. You talk as though I were a sick man. Just because I get down in the dumps once in a while, same as everybody—"

"Are you the same as everybody, Mr. Caldwell? Can you say that honestly to me, to yourself? After what we both know about those dreams, about your relations with Eve, about what happened at that fraternity initiation—"

"That was an accident!"

"But your impulses, your desires; those were not accidental. They were fundamental, implicit in your disorder."

“You can’t frighten me, Roberts.”

“Please—I’m not trying to frighten you. Have I ever resorted to any mumbo-jumbo or trickery, since the first time you came to me? Have I ever been anything but straightforward and sincere? I haven’t preached or lectured or put on any of the cheap front you despise. I haven’t attempted to delude you in any way. That’s what makes it so hard for me to impress you now. But you must be impressed with the importance, the necessity, of taking this step. Or else—”

“Else what? What are you driving at?”

“There’ll be a psychosomatic reaction, to begin with. The old-fashioned ‘nervous breakdown.’ You’ve seen it happen to others. In your case, with an sex fixation, it will be painful. And Eve will take over. She’s almost done so now; from what you say, she’s practically blackmailing you as it is. Suppose your wife finds out? Suppose something else happens? It could, easily enough. Remember the Arbuckle affair—”

WHEN a fat man trembles, his flesh quivers all over. Acres of gray jelly, quaking and oozing perspiration—

“But what do you want me to do? Suppose I retire, then what?”

“I’m going to take you back forty years. We’ll start all over again. We’ll go back to the time before the initiation and the scandal, before you had to leave school. You know what your ambitions were then. We’ll recapture that personality, make it dominant once more, make a young man of you, a new man.”

“How?”

“I’ll work with you personally. Every day. Oh, nothing spectacular, and nothing drastic. You love Marge, and the boys; I won’t take them away from you. But you must make a major alteration and adjustment. You need help.

“And you can afford it. Even if you weren’t in need of treatment, I’d advise retirement on the general principle that any man who is financially independent should retire from business and begin living. You’ve tried to retreat from life into your work, and it isn’t successful. So now you must retreat from work into life again.”

“So that’s it, eh? I can afford it, you say—meaning here is where you make a killing. Big fees, is that the angle, Roberts?”

“Please! You’re antagonistic—not to me, but to the truth. You know my fees: twenty dollars a consultation. That is not exorbitant! I shall not be able to give you more than three days a week. Our program will take about a year. Say three thousand dollars, at the most. I assure you I do not need your money, nor would I particularly care to undertake this treatment if the prognosis were not favorable. Besides, frankly, I have a personal interest in your problem, Mr. Caldwell. And you know I can help you.”

“Yes, I do. I’m going to think over what you said—think it over very seriously. It would be worth it, just to get rid of Eve. Do you think—”

“That you will be strong enough to give her up? Yes, I can definitely promise you that, Mr. Caldwell. Quite definitely.”

Chapter Ten

THERE WERE EMTPY GLASSES and filled ashtrays all over the small apartment. I could smell Scotch and smoke and Tabu and stale food and Lysol—everything but fresh air. Fresh air wouldn’t have suited Eve Ireland, anyway.

I didn’t exactly suit her, either.

I sat facing her on the sofa, pretending to examine my drink while I sized up the tall blonde with the brunette’s complexion. Her hair was dark at the roots, her eyes were red at the corners, her mouth was lined at the edges where the lipstick tapered off.

She gave me a look that would have made her a fortune as a glass-cutter and said, “Well, now that you’re here, what’s the big idea?”

"No big ideas. Just a little one."

"Cut the cute stuff. Speak your piece and get out."

"I'll bet you didn't handle your old customers this way."

"Say, what is this?" She stood up, bracelets jangling.

"Sit down. Don't be afraid."

"Afraid? Listen, you—"

That told me all I wanted to know. Not a clever woman—not subtle; just a pushover. And I knew how to handle her. I kept my voice loud, made it harsh.

"You've come up in the world, haven't you, kid? This guy Caldwell must treat you all right."

Her eyes narrowed as my mouth widened.

"Of course he goes for your little tricks," I went on. "Where'd you pick up those fancy ideas, anyway—when you worked Las Vegas?"

Her earrings quivered and danced. "So it's a shakedown, huh? Well, let me tell you—"

"No—I'll tell you, instead. This isn't a shakedown, Edith—"

"Eve."

"Edith Adamowski. I know your name; I know all about you. Don't get excited, this isn't a frame. If you want to know who told me, it was Caldwell himself."

"Caldwell? What kind of a gag is this, anyway?"

I told her what kind of a gag it was.

SHE sat down, after a while, and drank her drink. She nodded. I went right on talking.

"The important thing is, he doesn't know anything about it. He mustn't know. Like I told you, he's willing to pay five grand to get rid of you for good. He thinks he's a new man, that he can frighten you into it. All you have to do is let him. Take the five grand, and blow. Then stand by for orders and the big killing. That's five grand more for you."

“Well—I dunno. I got a good setup here.”

I walked over to her and sat down. I smiled into her eyes. “Do you mean to tell me you like it?” I asked softly. “Do you like it when Caldwell—”

“Shut up! Goddam you, don’t say it! I hate the filthy dog; why the hell you think I’m on the sauce all the time if it isn’t because of him? He gives me the creeps, but—”

“Then do as I tell you. There’s ten grand in it for you. Five now, and five in a little while.”

“How can I make sure you don’t double-cross me on the other five?”

“How can I be sure you don’t double-cross me by taking his first five and then spilling your guts?”

She grinned. “Yeah! Yeah, I never thought of that.”

I grinned right back at her. “Well, don’t start thinking of it, either. Because, if you do sing to him, you’re going to have an awfully sore throat.”

“Huh?”

“Come here.” I led her to the window, pushed aside the gray strand of a curtain that had once been white. “See that man down there? The big one, standing next to the car?”

She saw him. She saw Jake, waiting for me.

“I see him. What about him? Who is he?”

“I’m not going to introduce you. I hope I never have to. But he’s the man who has orders to kill you if you don’t play ball.”

“So that’s it, huh?”

“That’s it. Are you in?”

Eve Ireland gulped the rest of-her drink. She drank fast, man-fashion. She was furious, through and through. If Jake didn’t kill her, some cop or thug surely would. I watched her mouth dispose of the drink and waited for it to form the words I knew would come.

“All right. Count me in.”

"My God, Roberts, you were right! I did it!" Caldwell's knobby knuckle slammed against the desk.

"I knew you would, Ed. Did you say what I told you?"

"Bet your life! And it was just the way you predicted it would be. She turned on the tears, and then she tried to get me hot again, and then she had hysterics, and then she threatened me. But I remembered what you said, and it worked out."

"Good for you."

"You know something? I almost couldn't go through with it. When she started loving me up, I—"

He went into details, and I tried to keep from shuddering. It wasn't easy, but I managed. I even kept the smile on my face and remembered to nod in the right places.

"But the important thing is, she's gone now, Roberts. Left town today. I paid her off in cash."

"That isn't the really important thing, Ed."

"No?"

"The important thing is what you've proved to yourself. That you have the courage to start over, start fresh. That you are already beginning to become the kind of man I want you to be—and that you want to be."

I stood up and looked down at him. "I'm anxious to get started. How soon will you be through winding up your affairs?"

"Be about three weeks more. They took it pretty hard down at the office, you know. And I don't know what I'd have done if you hadn't told me how to handle Marge. But I'll be a free man in three weeks."

"Except for the stock."

"You can't talk me out of that one, Roberts. That's one setup where I'm the expert. Dumping fifteen per cent of the company stock on the market right now would sink them. The Imperial outfit is just waiting to close in and reorganize. Besides, as it is, the stuff keeps bringing in dividends. It's a sound investment. And I won’t have to watch it, just let it sit. I’m going to be a free man.”

“That’s right,” I said. “In three weeks you’ll be a free man.”

WE stood on the corner of Wilshire and Western, bucking the breeze.

“What’s the big idea of the briefcase?” Caldwell asked. “I don’t get it.”

“You will, soon enough. Just follow me and obey orders.”

“Right. Oh, damn it to hell—”

His hat blew off. I watched it swirl away over the car tops, then spiral into the street. It rolled. He started to rush after it.

I grabbed his arm. “Wait a minute, Ed. Let it go.”

“Let it go? But that’s a twenty-dollar panama! I’m not going to—”

“Hold it. Your first lesson in living begins right now. Look, Ed: Never chase your hat in the street. You might be killed by a car. Besides, who wants to get sweated up and out of breath chasing a hat?”

“But—”

“Let the other fellow do it for you, Ed. Don’t you understand? There’s always somebody else who’s willing to chase your hat. Willing? He’s crazy to death to do it for you. It makes him a hero. And if you thank him for it, he’ll fall all over you.”

I turned and gestured.

“You see? That man without a coat, between those two sedans. He’s getting it for you. Wait here.”

“THIS yours, mister?” said a voice. “Yes, it is. Thank you very much. I appreciate your kindness.”

“Oh, that’s all right.”

“Look at him blush,” I murmured, as we turned away.

Caldwell held back. “I ought to give him something for—”

"Certainly not. As it is, he's happy. He's done his good deed for the day. He feels superior. If you offered him a dollar it would be like kicking him in the face. He's on top of the world now, and you have your hat back without exertion. Just remember that in the future."

He nodded. "Guess your theories aren't as impractical as they sound."

"Well, we'll test another one right now. Follow me down this block." We walked quickly, without speaking. At the corner I halted and led him to my car.

"Get in."

"We going somewhere?"

"Not yet. First, you've got a job to do. Take this pencil and paper."

"Yes."

"Now, write down everything you can remember seeing during our walk down the block."

"How's that again?"

"It's very simple. Just write down everything you saw as we walked. People. Costumes. Faces. The names of stores. What was in the windows. Everything."

"Why?"

"Don't ask questions. I'm trying to find out something about your powers of observation, and association."

He grumbled, and he sweated, but he wrote. And he was flattered at the attention. This was something like it!

Here was somebody who really took an interest in what a man thought, what he could do, what made him tick. Nobody had ever cared about those things before—Marge didn't, that slut Eve didn't, the fellows at the office didn't, even his friends. In the old days his teachers, his father, his own mother hadn't cared.

I watched him, knowing what he was thinking, knowing what he was doing, knowing what I was doing.

In a way I almost felt sorry for the man. He looked so pathetic, so eager, as he sat there scribbling away like an anxious schoolboy. I was giving him something nobody else had ever bestowed upon him in his lifetime—something few men ever get or ever realize they want—personal interest. I suddenly realized that I could do what I had said I would; remake him, remold him into a better, more integrated, healthy personality.

But to hell with that! Suddenly it all came back to me: a picture of Caldwell, dozens of men like Caldwell, and what they had done to me in the past.

"Sorry, Mr. Caldwell is busy now and cannot be disturbed. . . . Afraid there's nothing doing right now—if you'd care to leave your name. . . . No, I have no time to discuss it with you—"

Yes, there were a lot of Caldwells, a lot of fat, well-fed brutes ready and waiting to push little guys around. Ready to play Boss—and play God, if you let them.

Well, I wasn't having any more. From now on, I was Boss, I was God. and the Caldwells would dance!

"All right, that's enough," I snapped.

"But I'm not finished yet."

"Sorry, another time." I looked at my watch. "I've got an assignment for you."

And so we started.

I GAVE him assignments galore—I went through the whole bag of tricks.

I supplied him with a card, an order-pad, and a briefcase full of sample neckties and sent him into a haberdashery, cold, to pose as a tie salesman and get an order.

Another day I got him lost in the canyons and made him drive us back.

I kept him awake for two days and two nights; denied him food or water for twenty-four hours; ordered him to grow a beard.

It was silly, it was pathetic, it was as simple as A-B-C, and he loved it—because I kept up a fast line of patter about personality development, exposing one’s self to new experience variants, developing dormant skills and realizing and utilizing psychic potential.

The very simplicity of the methodology is what made it so effective. I was always at his side, always ready with a new problem, always eager to discuss his reactions, listen to him talk about himself. He was completely sold.

As a matter of fact, it didn’t hurt him a bit—as therapy. He dropped about ten pounds in three weeks, took on some color, stopped washing his hands. He was still a string-saver, but the change of pace and the absence of Eve combined to restore his sex-drive and focus it upon more normal goals.

It surprised me, at first, to see him benefit. But why shouldn’t he benefit? The fake religions, the fake healers, the fake mystics, all have a history of success with sufferers and seekers. The fact that this success is often illusory or temporary, the fact that in the end most converts plunge still further into a morass of maladjustment, just doesn’t seem to matter to anyone.

Certainly, the notion never occurred to Caldwell. He felt free, uninhibited, readjusted.

“I’m ready to get started now,” he kept telling me. “And thanks to you, I know what I want to do. I was never happy in corporation law, anyway. Handling other people’s affairs, other people’s funds—that’s living your life second-hand. You’ve shown me I know how to sell, how to analyze a situation. And I do have a background of business experience. Seems to me I ought to take advantage of it.”

“What did you have in mind, Ed?”

“Real estate. There’s a boom building up again in the south, you know. Beach development, housing. I’ve had my eye on some property for a long time now. But I was always too cautious, too afraid. I kept putting it off. Now I’d like to try my hand. Why don’t you take a run down south with me one of these days? I’ll show you what I have in mind.

“And here’s something else, Roberts: You’ve done a lot for me. Don’t think I’m not appreciating it. I’d like to cut you in on this little deal.”

"But remember, your funds are tied up," I reminded him. "That stock you own—"

He laughed. It was a surprisingly energetic laugh, in which his chins and belly joined. "That was a lot of damfool nonsense. I was talking like an old woman in those days! Sure, if I sell the company will probably have to reorganize, and Imperial will take over. But what's that to me? It's my money; I can pull out whenever I please.

"Don't get me wrong, Roberts. I'm not going back into business—no more ten-hour days for me. You showed me the light. But this investment proposition is different: it calls for less time, and it's something I've always wanted to try my hand at. What do you say?"

"Well, I don't know if you're ready yet. Give me a little time to analyze the elements involved. I trust you won't do anything rash until we work things out."

"Naturally, I wouldn't make a move without your say-so. But I want action."

"All right." I nodded. "I think I can promise you some action very shortly." And he agreed to this.

My new place on New Hampshire was a white frame affair, seven rooms, fireplace—conventional enough, because I didn't operate from here. Rogers had a bedroom on the second floor and he kept out of my way. I wasn't home much, anyhow; ate out, and the night work didn't give me a chance to try out the fireplace-and-slippers act. Once in a while we used the front room for a little private conference.

This time the Professor, Rogers, and Doc Sylvestro joined me. I had all my stuff in waiting, and they kept passing around the notes and making notes of their own.

I sat there and watched my companions: little Rogers, with his hypersensitive twitchings; the Professor, an ivory Buddha in a black suit; and Dr. Sylvestro, a gaunt gargoyle whose specialty was silence.

"Good." The Professor's soft voice addressed me. "You say he will sell the stock?"

"Tomorrow."

The Professor was speaking to Rogers, now.

"I'm depending on you to handle this deal. Buy Imperial, preferred, as soon as the sale is completed. Get all the cash you can lay your hands on. Buy Imperial."

"Check."

"That leaves our string-saving friend in possession of a cool hundred and fifty thousand in cash, does it not?"

Sylvestro's deep voice: "You have plans for that money too, haven't you, Hermann?"

The bald head inclined slowly. "Naturally. In fact, my plans are already in effect. When Jake arrives—"

"Wait a minute," I said. "I've got an idea for you, Professor. As I told you, Caldwell wants to go into real-estate speculation. You know I have his complete confidence. He'll follow my advice. Now suppose you were to arrange a tie-up with some promoters who own beach property, and we could split the profits—"

A fat hand rose and pushed the rest of the sentence back down my throat.

"That is too risky, too uncertain. I'd considered it, of course, but I have found a better way—with your friend, Eve Ireland."

"Eve? But I paid her off; she went away."

"Before Caldwell broke with her, before the payoff, there was a lapse of two weeks during which he continued to see her. You know that."

"Yes."

"But what you do not know is that Rogers also contacted Eve Ireland."

"Meaning you didn't trust me to pull off the agreement?"

"No. We checked on you, naturally. That is my policy. But we had something else in mind. We anticipated this situation. Has it ever occurred to you, my friend, that if a man is willing to pay five thousand dollars, he will also be willing to pay a great deal more?"

"I don't get it."

"Let Jake tell you. That sounds like his ring."

I got up and answered the bell. It was our Neanderthal friend, all right—the man whose forehead was voted most likely to recede.

"How's tricks?" he grunted.

"You're the mystic," I told him. "Come on in."

Our little family circle watched impatiently as he extracted an envelope from the pocket of his sports shirt. "Here they are," he said.

The Professor opened the envelope. Five 3¼ x 4¼ negatives and an equal number of prints were shuffled fan-wise through his fingers. His face bore the blankness of a professional poker-player. The others leaned forward.

"What'd he get?" Rogers asked. "See for yourself."

Rogers grabbed at the photos. Doc Sylvestro got up and leaned over his shoulder.

"Jesus!" Rogers whispered. "How the hell did you manage this?"

"The babe co-operated."

"I'll say she did! But I mean, you must have been pretty close."

"Bathroom. I used that new-type flash the Professor got me. No light, see? When she heard how much the take would be, she fixed me up. Got 'em all the same night."

"Jesus!" Rogers repeated. "Hot stuff."

Sylvestro's gargoyle grimace deepened. "Care to look?" he asked.

I looked, then turned away. I hoped the Professor wouldn't see my face. I heard myself saying, "But what are you going to do with this?"

"What are we going to do? We're going to shake down your pal Caldwell for about fifty Gs, to start with. I bet he'll think it's worth it not to have his wife see what he does in his spare time—why, they put guys away for less than this! Them ropes—"

"Never mind." The Professor silenced Jake and retrieved the photographs.

"I think you understand our plan now," he told me. "Here's what's going to happen—"

I listened and nodded. Then I shook my head. "No," I said. Pleads jerked around in surprise. "You aren't going to pull a dirty trick like that. You don't expect me to take a hand in such a stinking, rotten setup!"

"Oh, yes, I do." The Professor smiled. "Remember Mike." Everybody smiled. After a moment, I smiled, too. But all the while I kept saying to myself: It's all right, this isn't real, it's just a nightmare, it's going to end, it's got to end. . . .

"MY God, Roberts, say something!" Caldwell shook my shoulder. Maybe he just put his hand on it, but he was trembling so that he shook anything he touched.

"Don't you understand?" he panted. "This woman, she came back; she wants fifty thousand, she says she'll go to Marge with those pictures—"

I shrugged his hand off. "I can't help you. If you'd only taken my advice and broken with her immediately after I suggested it, this wouldn't have happened."

"But it has happened! Something must be done." He gulped. "Couldn't you see her again, talk her out of it?"

"Please, Ed! Obviously she's determined. And I can't afford to get mixed up in anything like this. You understand."

"But can't we fix up a trap, or something, with the police?"

"Then they'd see the pictures, wouldn't they? And Marge would hear the whole story."

"God, what can I do? What can I do?"

"I'm afraid you'll have to pay her off."

Silence.

"Look, Roberts, you're sure there is no other way? I'd make it worth your while."

"It's too late now."

"Well, will you come with me tomorrow night when I meet her?"

I gave him a refrigerated smile. "That would be very unwise. And I'm afraid, until this matter clears up, that we had better not see one another."

"But who can I go to? Who is there to help me?"

He waited, but I didn't answer. I couldn't answer. There was no answer left for him.

I could only sit there and watch him cry, watch his jelly-flesh dissolve in his clothes, watch the red hands as they scrabbled and twisted across my desk, endlessly raveling and unraveling a piece of dirty string.

The buzzer sounded, by prearrangement, and I left the room. When I returned, ten minutes later, Edgar Caldwell was gone.

I never saw him again. . . .

Of course, I heard all about it, later. Imperial put through their consolidation act, and the Professor's newly acquired stock went up twelve points before he sold.

They took Caldwell for his fifty grand, and then after a while they put the bite on him for another fifty, using a set of duplicate negatives.

He phoned me and tried to see me at the office, but I was always out. This was several weeks after, and I was working on Orlando Lightwick, Mrs. Penworthy, and Benny Cole, the gambler. Even if I had wanted to, I couldn't have seen Caldwell right then.

Besides, the job was over. The Professor was satisfied, Jake and Rogers and Sylvestro were happy. I suppose Eve Ireland was happy, too—even though she took all the risk and they finally chiseled her down on her percentage of the take. But that was no concern of mine. I didn't know and I didn't care.

It must have been about six weeks later that the Professor broke the news to me.

"Did you see the papers?" he asked. "Caldwell is dead."

"Dead?"

"He committed suicide—down at his beach-house, last night.

"How?"

"Can't you guess? The string fixation, the ropes in the photographs—remember? He hung himself."

"No!"

"Curious, isn't it, how we follow an unconscious pattern? But that's the way it goes. Once a string-saver, always a string-saver."

Chapter Eleven

IT WAS AFTER Caldwell's death that everything began to go wrong. Everything, and nothing. Perhaps it was only I who went wrong.

Strangely, Mike's death had upset me, but not like this. That had been an accident and somehow I couldn't accept the complete guilt or responsibility-even though the Professor held it over me as a threat.

With Caldwell, things were different. Oh, he was no great loss to the world—he'd lied and cheated and stolen, and his behavior with Eve Ireland was bestial enough to be punished.

But I hadn't the right to do the punishing—or to execute him. He saved the string, but I tied the hangman's knot, I placed the noose around his neck, I kicked the chair away and left him dangling there, gray jelly quivering on the end of a rope, gray jelly jerking and then the rope cutting into his chin, cutting into his neck and stretching it long and thin. They say, sometimes, when they cut down a corpse, the neck is no bigger around than a child's wrist—

Thoughts like that were what made me start to sit in the house and drink, just like Rogers, going upstairs to his room with a pint every night. Maybe he had something to drink about, too. Like Ellen Post, the apricot girl. I wondered about her, but there was no sense wondering. I couldn't think clearly. There was always the rope, dangling and twisting back and forth, to and fro. . . .

That's the way I was thinking, that's the way I was living after Caldwell died. I happened to be going through my Hamlet act one night when the doorbell rang. It was the Professor.

"Good evening."

"Hello. I didn't expect you."

"That is obvious."

"You mean the whisky? I was just having a nightcap."

He sat down at the table and crossed his arms. The sleeves made a black X on the tablecloth. X marks the spot. Black suit again—all that money coming in and he still dressed in the same clothing. Like a minister. Or an undertaker. . . .

"What's the matter with you?"

"Not a thing. Should there be?"

"Rogers tells me you do a lot of this."

Rogers was a little rat. I raised my glass and drank to holes in his cheese. "Not so much. Besides, what else is there for me to do?"

"You might keep up your studies. There is no end to learning, you know."

"I'm doing all right. The money's coming in, isn't it?"

"Yes. I really cannot complain on that score."

"Then I'm entitled to my own way of amusing myself."

"Amusing yourself!" The Professor ran a hand across his gleaming skull and stared at me across the table. "So you are still interested in amusement, eh? That's the end-all and be-all of everything you do: your sole purpose in living is to justify and pay for your amusement, as you call it. In other words, you have the psychology of a garage mechanic."

"That would pretty accurately describe my income and my status, too." The word-choice was that of Judson Roberts—but the bitter intonation was strictly Eddie Haines.

"You're dissatisfied?"

"A shrewd analysis," I said.

"But when you think of where you were just eight months ago—"

"I'd rather think about the big promises you made me. Fame, fortune, anything I wanted. You remember?"

"Yes. Those things will come, if you desire them. Although for a while, I had hoped they would not be necessary. That you would reach a stage where you'd no longer desire them."

"I don't know how you figure that angle."

"It was only a hope on my part. I thought perhaps, in your reading and study, you might develop a genuine interest in some phases of metaphysics. Then you and I might have gone on to the next phase together. But I misjudged you—you want, as you term it, amusement."

"Let's call it more money and be done with it. You'll never get to me with any nonsense about 'spiritual riches,' if that's what you thought." He smiled. "I've trained you too well, I see. You're always sure of an ulterior motive, aren't you?"

I could smile, too. "Well, you certainly aren't going to try to sell me on the idea that you've gone overboard on theosophy yourself, are you?"

"No, Eddie. I'm not going to try to sell you anything. Some day, perhaps, you will learn, as I have, that there are certain truths behind ageless symbols, a reality beyond all allegory, an attainment—" He stopped. "But I bore you."

"Not at all." I reached for the bottle. "Nothing bores me, as long as I have this."

He took the bottle from my hand, set it down.

"That's out."

"Look, now—"

"Would a guarantee of five hundred a week help to keep you on the wagon?"

"Look. It's not just the money part that gets me down."

"I know. You didn't like what happened to Caldwell, did you?" He took out his monocle and began to polish it with the same careful attention they bestow on lenses at Mount Palomar. "Well, I think I can reassure you on that score. We won't be trying extortion again; it's far too risky. Besides there's no longer any need. From now on things will run smoothly, on the momentum we've gained.

“Here is another thing. I shall be devoting less and less time to this operation in the future. If you keep away from liquor, I promise to give you a free hand. Run things as you choose. The clients are coming in and you know how to handle them. You see, you’ll be earning your money.”

I stood up. “That suits me. Just as long as I can run things my way. Without threats, without frame-ups.”

“It’s a bargain.” The Professor didn’t shake hands. He never shook hands. Somehow, that suited me. He had hands like fat blind spiders. . . .

“By the way, I’ve been thinking. It might not be a bad idea to put you on the air.”

“Radio?”

“A fifteen-minute program, once a week. To sell the book, sell your name. I’m having Rogers check into the costs and possible time. Then you might work up an expansion program; train a few assistants for this personal-supervision stuff. We’ll discuss it all some other time. Right now I have another appointment.”

He left us alone then, and there we sat—the bottle and I. The bottle was half-empty; I was half-full.

I looked at it. “Did you hear what he said?” I asked. “Five hundred a week. And I’m going on the radio! That’s a laugh. I came out here to get on the air, but Rickert said I wasn’t good enough. And now—”

The bottle didn’t answer me. . . .

There was another bottle sitting on another table, a couple of nights later. I was drinking club soda, straight, in a little bar off the Strip.

That was the Professor’s idea—I’d meet him here and we’d go over our radio plans.

But he was late. He was always late, these days. I talked to him on the phone but I never saw him. Rogers reported that business was slack; Miss Bauer kept the office open as a matter of policy, although the Professor had cut his own practice down to a minimum.

Nobody seemed to know just what he did or where he went. Doc Sylvestro was with him a great deal of the time, but it was all very hush-hush.

Everything the Professor did was hush-hush stuff. I found myself doing a little objective thinking for the first time in months.

Professor Hermann was a type—a West Coast type; more specifically, a Southern California type. He would not be tolerated anywhere else; he wouldn't exist, let alone flourish, in another setting.

But this was a land of Messiahs and miracles; of Peter the Hermit and Isaiah the Evangelist; a land where red flowers and green skyscrapers sprang up overnight. A land of fabulous fertility, luxuriant lushness.

THE rod smote the rock and gold gushed forth in 1849. The rod waved as a magic wand and lo, there was Hollywood. The rod smote the rock again, and oil spewed fortunes to the skies. The rod pointed and there was real estate, and aircraft factories, and an entire civilization that bought cars from Madman Muntz and cemetery lots at Forest Lawn. At night, the flying red horse heralded the Apocalypse in advertising from a dirigible. The searchlights stabbed at heaven to proclaim the presence of a new fruit-stand.

But the sky was too blue, the sun too radiant, the exaggeration of all natural phenomena too pronounced. It led to extremes in individuality—eccentricism rampant. Its ultimate end was the Professor, and those who accepted and believed in him.

Sitting there, trying to figure it all out, I suddenly realized that I was as deluded as the rest of the seekers out here. The sun-worshipers, the gold-worshipers, the sudden success-worshipers. I had accepted the distortion of values and attitudes as normal. If the rod suddenly pointed at the rock and called forth the fury of an earthquake, I'd rush to the Professor for salvation.

He couldn't help me. He was just a faker in a black suit, a self-acknowledged charlatan. Yet I depended upon him for my way of living. He had made me, created Judson Roberts. My life was in his hands. Yes, quite literally—my life was in his hands.

Why had I never attempted to find out anything about him? It was important that I know who he was, what he wanted. I tried to utilize the Judson Roberts technique, but it was hard to do an analysis on club soda.

I looked around the quiet bar. Perhaps I could order just one drink before he—No. He had forbidden it. Yet who was he to forbid? Yes, who was he?

Otto Hermann, Ph.D. Not listed in "Who's Who" or any professional directory. The degree had never been granted by an American university.

German, perhaps Austrian. Age, forty-odd. When had he come to this country? And why?

Miss Bauer would know. But who was Miss Bauer? Why did he keep her around?

Every answer was a new question.

Professor Hermann, the man who wore black. Why black? What was the symbolism? Black, in a land of light. Deliberate exhibitionism might be the answer. That big diamond ring he wore—

No, that was out. Because he didn't wear the ring all the time; only when keeping an appointment with strangers, or at the office. And he never added to or augmented his jewelry, despite increased income. That diamond was merely for misdirection—he wanted you to watch its glitter as he did something else with his other hand, or with his voice. A focal point for hypnosis.

Hypnosis. Mastery. Superiority. He was always the leader, the director, the dominator. Why?

Why did he want wealth and power? Not for obvious display or to satisfy obvious compulsions. I wondered about his sex-life. Apparently it was nonexistent. That was the key: Sublimation, some physical defect?

The bald head—not shaven, but hairless. What disease-process might result in permanent depilation, absence of nictation? Encephalitis? But there were other stigmata of degeneration, and nictation usually increased.

Disease. Mania. Megalomania. I wasn't being objective. Because he reminded me of some movie villain. That didn't brand him as psychotic or even as a potential psychotic. Everything he did seemed actuated by a high degree of logic—too high a degree, perhaps. There was an abnormal degree of conscious and unconscious emotional inhibition.

There was an abnormal degree of half-baked phrase-making in my analysis too. Judson Roberts, the great psychiatrist! Nevertheless, if I could find the clue to the Professor—

I grinned at the bottle of club soda. The glass circle of its mouth remained motionless. "It's a hard job," I told the bottle. "A hard job, trying to psychoanalyze the Devil."

"What you need is a drink," the bottle said.

I blinked, then realized the words hadn't come from the bottle. They were spoken by Ellen Post.

Chapter Twelve

I STUDIED HER OVAL FACE. That exotic look was caused by a doublefold of the upper eyelids—a simple explanation. made by the practised observation of Judson Roberts, but it didn't keep Eddie Haines from admiring her features.

Right now I felt more like Eddie Haines than I had felt in a long time. "Your order?"

I looked at the waiter. I looked at her. Then, "Two apricot brandies." She smiled. Judson Roberts could have analyzed that smile before you could say "Mona Lisa"—but I wasn't Judson Roberts tonight. She smiled, and that was enough for me.

"So you remembered?"

"Like an elephant. A pink one." I took another look at her. She was sober, and that made a difference. She seemed taller than I'd remembered her as being, and her voice was softer. "What brings you here?" I asked. "A convertible."

"Nuts."

"Ooh, Doctor Roberts, what you said!"

"I mean it. Let's not be smart tonight. I want to know all about you. I've been wondering who you are, where you live, why I've never seen you since that party—"

The drinks arrived. She stared at her glass with the same concentrated awe usually bestowed on the Grand Canyon. When she spoke, her voice was almost a whisper.

"That party—when I heard about Mike, it did something to me. Not that I cared about him especially. It was just that—oh, to make a long story short, I quit drinking. For quite a while. I went down to the beach and took some more lessons."

"What kind of lessons?"

"Singing. But I didn't stick at it this time, either. I'm just not good enough. As with everything else, I'm a might-be. That's not even as good as a has-been. I just can't do anything well, except drink."

"So you're back here."

"Yes and no. I haven't gone out for months; this was just an impulse. I cut the crowd and the parties completely. You know poor Lorna has gone completely batty."

"I didn't know."

"She's mixed up in some cult or other; your friend the Professor is in on it too." Her gaze was candid. "You really don't know?"

"That's right. I haven't seen much of the Professor lately. I was supposed to meet him here tonight, but he hasn't showed. Now about this cult—"

"Oh, I really don't know anything but gossip. There is some kind of secret meetings going on. Lorna just hints things to her friends. But if I know her, there's an orgy in the background somewhere."

I watched her pick up the drink. Apricot brandy, apricot lips. . . . She swallowed, made a face.

"Brrrrr!"

"Then why do you do it?"

"What else is there?"

"You were going to tell me about yourself," I said patiently. "About the house you live in, the clothes you buy, the things you like to eat. How you wore your hair when you were a little girl. Do you like fireplaces—and sunsets? And does your nose get red when you have a cold?"

"Really, I'd like to, but I have to run along now." She rose.

"Sit down."

"Say—you really mean it, don't you?" She sat down again.

"Why do you always run away when somebody asks you about yourself?"

"That's my business."

"You told me once that drinking was your business. Is that part of the running away, too?"

"Good old Doctor Roberts! Do you think, in your benevolent, homespun way, that you're going to help me? I've heard that line before, too."

"All right, so it's a line," I said. "I can't help you. Nobody can help you; you help yourself. Either that, or you keep on drinking. And in two hours you'll be up at the bar, telling everything you wouldn't tell to me. Spilling drinks and intimacies in front of the bartender. He'll help you."

"YOU know something?" She wrinkled her nose. "I like you when you get mad. You drop that phony front, then. I made a mistake when I walked out on you. We could have had a lot of fun together."

"Sure," I nodded. "A lot of nice clean drunken fun. We're adults, aren't we? We know what we want—a great big bottle, and a chance to suck on it. A chance to drool our way back to infancy. Babies don't know what they're doing, they're not responsible if they go to bed with each other and make messes. Yes, we could have had a lot of fun. And I’m damned glad we didn’t.”

“So am I.”

She leaned forward. I smelled apricots. The suntan had ripened her.

“Another drink?”

“No. Let’s talk. If you’ve been trying to scare me off drinking, you’re succeeding.”

“Good. Try to pretend that I’m God for a change.”

“I don’t get it.”

“Your god is the bartender. The bartender is always God, or haven’t you noticed?”

“I hadn’t, but go on. You will, anyway.”

“Drinkers are all alike. They go to the bartender for peace, for release. They tell him their troubles in confessional. Like God, he dispenses wisdom, judgment, guidance. He rules supreme in his own world. He is quick to punish the transgressor. He can also reward with his favor—or with free drinks. He is omniscient and all-powerful. He knows everything about everybody within the microcosmic universe of the tavern. He is father-confessor, mediator, dispenser of solace and consolation. And he is worshiped in libations, with sacramental wine that produces divine intoxication. He is also, I might add, the father-image. Or more exactly, an idealization of the father. The infantile regressions of the dipsomaniac fit into this pattern of unconscious symbolism.”

“Funny you should say that. I never drank until Dad was killed. He was one swell guy. Drank a lot himself, though. Geoffrey Post, industrial designer—you recall the name? He got into plane-building in the ’thirties. That’s how he died; piloting one of his own planes. Cracked up.”

“So you cracked up. No mother, and the father-image. He drank, so you drank. You couldn’t have anything to do with men, sober, because of the part he played in your sexual imagery. You drank, and then the men you slept with became identified with him, and that made you feel guilty so you drank again. And—”

“Wait a minute. I’m not crazy.”

“They call it ‘dipsomania’, you know, and rightly so. Most psychotic states have their inception in some sexual deviation. Unconscious homosexual urges, incestuous desires—”

“Why do you drink, then? Are you in love with your mother?”

“I’m an orphan.” I grinned. “But seriously, doesn’t it make some kind of sense to you?”

She nodded. The empty glass between her fingers nodded with her.

“I suppose it does. I was beginning to figure some of those things out for myself. We were always together, he and I; traveling around, never stopping long enough in one place to make friends. When I was eighteen he’d take me dancing; we went to parties together. Strangers took us for—” she bit her lip—“lovers.”

“They were right, weren’t they?”

“In a way, yes. Although neither of us knew, consciously, that we had those feelings. It wasn’t until after Dad died that it hit me. Then I went to pieces, and now I’m trying to put those pieces back together.”

“You can’t do it alone very easily. You’ll need help.”

“Are you suggesting professional treatment?”

“Nonprofessional. Please, Ellen—I want to help you.”

“But the Professor—he’s your friend, and he’s a—”

“I’m not like that. You can trust me. You must trust me.”

“We’ll see. I want to think things over, first.” She rose, and this time there was no dissuading her.

“When will I see you again?”

“I’ll call you. At your office.”

“Good night, Ellen.”

“Goodnight—Judd.”

“THAT girl, who is she?” The Professor shot up out of a trapdoor, or appeared in a burst of flame—I didn’t particularly notice his arrival, because I was thinking of apricots.

"Her name's Ellen Post. We met at the Lorna Lewis party."

"That's right. She was attracted to you, I remember. Have you seen much of her since?"

"This is the first time, and our meeting was accidental. But I hope I'll be seeing more of her."

"I do, too. She might be useful."

"Useful?"

The Professor slid into the booth, removed his hat, and gave me a glimpse of how his skull looked under dim blue neon lighting.

"I've checked on her. Something Lorna Lewis let drop one day aroused my interest. She's Geoffrey Post's daughter, isn't she?"

"Yes."

"Well fixed?"

"I don't know." I was weary. "She probably has a small income from the estate."

"That doesn't matter. But she's Leland Post's niece—his only niece. He takes an interest in her; put her on the cure last year."

"On the cure?"

The Professor grinned. "She's a rummy—you must have found that out. And it helps. Leland Post is a State Senator, with ambitions. He'd do a lot, out of love for her and self-interest, to keep her from getting mixed up in any scandal."

I scowled.

"Now, wait a minute!"

"Please. Restrain yourself and hear me out. Leland Post is owned by one of the oil syndicates from Long Beach. He's going to try for Congress next year. Right now he's very much in the public eye."

"Hold it, Professor. I've got a—a personal interest in this kid. No funny business."

Those eyes, those unblinking eyes, burned up at me. They burned a hole through the upholstery behind my head. But I met the gaze.

"Very well," he said softly. "It was only a tentative thought—nothing important. We'll abandon that gambit, as long as you have a personal interest."

We talked of other things: the radio program, which was to be temporarily shelved due to time-shortage: the current cases, and the problem of Rogers, who was getting out of line. There was much to discuss.

But it was Judson Roberts who talked with the Professor. Eddie Haines just sat there, wondering if Ellen Post would call, when she'd call, when he'd see her again.

There were definitely two of us to consider, now—Eddie Haines and Judson Roberts, just a couple of the boys. Eddie Haines hadn't been around very much lately. He was stuck on Ellen Post, but he never came around any more.

Judson Roberts was always available, though. He was everywhere—seen in the best places these days. A fast, smart operator, Roberts. He knew how to handle himself—and everybody else too.

Telling the old ladies at the lectures, "Remember the first principles of Y-O-U: Your Opportunities, Unlimited. Cultivate yourself. Allow the seeds of your personality to flower. If your soul is thirsty, drink deeply." Straight out of the old seed-catalogue, that's the way Judson Roberts worked.

But why worry? Everything was sailing along smoothly now. Sailing along on the S.S. Schizophrenia—passengers Judson Roberts, First Class, and Eddie Haines, Steerage: sometimes known as Messrs. Jekyll and Hyde.

That's the way it was, and that's the way I thought about it, until Ellen Post finally did call me up.

She was at her beach-house, at Malibu, and would Mr. Judson Roberts care to run down for the afternoon?

"I'll be seeing you," said Eddie Haines.

Chapter Thirteen

THE SUN WAS WARM at Malibu, so Ellen and I sat in the shade of the little beach-house. Only three days had passed since our meeting in the tavern, but here we sat, and I had my arm around her waist.

Just a whirlwind romance. Only there was no whirlwind about it, no romance. We merely sat and talked. We had a lot to talk about, Ellen Post and Judson Roberts and—

She called me "Judd" because she thought I was Judson Roberts and if I were Judson Roberts I'd tell her something. It wouldn't be the truth but she'd believe it, and then she'd put her arms around me, those soft sun-ripened arms and I'd taste apricots and I'd have what I wanted. Only I wouldn't have it really because I wasn't Judson Roberts. Eddie Haines would rather tell her the truth and take his chances. Right now, I wanted to be Eddie Haines again.

I took a deep breath and exhaled. Then everything came out. . . .

Half an hour elapsed between the time I said, "My name is Eddie Haines." and my last sentence. "Here I am."

In between there were two cigarettes—the second left in the ashtray to burn unheeded—and a grateful deepening of dusk that hid my face in shadows.

I didn't want her to see my face. There was enough nakedness as it was, because I held nothing back: The suicide attempt, the meeting with the Professor, the Y-O-U setup, and what we did to people like Caldwell, everything.

Everything except the facts about the death of Mike Drayton, that is. I couldn't tell her that. I wanted to, but I knew what her reaction would be. What I did spill was bad enough, and I expected the awkward silence when I finished, the stiff, impersonal phrases, the cold "We'd better go" with which she'd conclude our relationship.

What I didn't expect was the scent of apricots, the slim arms around me, the leaping fire of her lips.

"You poor guy," she whispered. "And I thought I had troubles."

“Then you don’t—”

Her lips answered me first, then her voice. “Of course not. Oh, I’m so glad you told me, Eddie! I knew I’d never get used to the idea of marrying a man named Judd.”

It got dark fast, after that. . . .

It was midnight when I came home. There were no lights shining inside the house, not even from Rogers’ upstairs room. I let myself in and clicked the living-room switch.

Immediately, the phone jingled. I answered.

The Professor’s voice snapped across the wire: “Where have you been? I’ve called many times.”

“Sorry. Just got in.”

“He’s gone, isn’t he?”

“Who?”

“Rogers. Jake told me he’d walked out on us. He was to meet me this evening—very important matter—and he never showed up. I checked and found out that he hadn’t been at the office in two days. Did you see him?”

“No. He comes and goes. He has his own key, uses the back entrance.

But you know that. What’s the matter—did you have an argument?”

“Certainly not. I can’t understand it. Unless he got frightened. He’s been drinking a lot more lately, hasn’t he?”

“Hard to tell. You know how he can hold his liquor. But what’s all this about being frightened? What’s there to be afraid of?”

“Nothing. Nothing at all.” The Professor spoke too quickly. Judson Roberts was alert: he caught things like that. But he made no comment as the Professor continued:

“You know what to expect from a chronic alcoholic. Delusions, sudden erratic deviations in conduct-pattern. Anyway, he’s gone. I thought I’d check with you.”

“I’ll see what I can find out at the office tomorrow,” I promised. “Call you then—unless you care to come over now.”

“No. I’m busy. Good night.”

He hung up; I hung up.

The Professor was busy at midnight. And Rogers was running away because he had been frightened—

I went upstairs slowly, very slowly. I turned on the hall light and walked down to Rogers' bedroom.

IT was empty: Rogers was gone. I felt no emotion except vague curiosity. He was a strange little man. I'd never really known him. He was furtive, a solitary drinker and uncommunicative with me, but he probably mumbled to himself. Sitting up in this room, night after night, cradling a pint bottle in his arms and whispering to it.

Yet he had talent. A curious genius, almost. He wrote for the Professor, he did my lectures, he wrote Y-O-U.

Why? Where did the ability spring from? And what did he want? He was well-paid, but he had no interests, no hobbies, and his only apparent vice was drinking. He liked to stay in the background: neither fame nor power seemed to matter. He had worked with Jake, I knew, but he had no friends.

It might have been interesting to cultivate him, find out about him. But there was no use in thinking about it now. Rogers had gone. And he was frightened.

What would frighten him, outside of the loss of his liquor supply?

I walked over to the typing-table, stooped, and pulled the wastebasket out from under it. The wastebasket was newspaper-lined, and there was a thin film of cigarette ash at the bottom, filling the newspaper creases with grit. I turned the basket upside down on the floor. The ashes powdered the rug. The newspaper dropped. A piece of paper wedged against it, fluttered loose.

I picked it up.

I read a few typewritten lines, just cryptic notes. But they told me what I wanted to know—why Rogers was frightened. I read:

Thirteen in Coven.

Sig. in blood.

Ointment or unguent for flying dreams—compound contains aconite, belladonna and—? Check.

The Black Man—

That was all. But Rogers was frightened. And now so was I.

Chapter Fourteen

THE USUAL TREMOR was felt the next morning around 10:30. It rattled the mirrors in my office, and my reflection shook momentarily. But it wasn't a temblor, and besides I had no time for earthquakes; Professor Hermann was shaking my firmament.

The mere fact of his unexpected presence was enough to upset me. I had to work hard keeping that Judson Roberts mask from slipping when I heard his pitch.

"About Rogers," he said: "I've located him, at last."

"Good."

"Not good. He's gone completely berserk. Jake found him holing up in a Skid-row joint down on Main. Sick drunk. He won't pull out of this for months. At least, Sylvestro doesn't think so."

"Where is he?"

"Sylvestro recommended a sanatorium, run by a friend of his. It's up near Santa Barbara. They're taking him there today. Naturally, I'll handle the expenses." He took off his hat. I saw eight skulls in the mirrors.

"He never said anything to you about what was troubling him?" the Professor asked.

"Not a word."

"Did he take his belongings with him when he left?"

"The room is empty."

"Mmmm. There was nothing with him when Jake picked him up. I wonder—well, no matter. Poor Rogers! He looked very bad. I hate to say this, but from what I saw and what Sylvestro said, he may never come out of the sanatorium."

The Professor sighed, and I held tight to the Judson Roberts mask. I could picture the kind of a rest-home run by Sylvestro's "friend." It was probably quite small—about six feet long, three feet wide and three feet deep. It would fit into a shallow hole quite easily, and its occupant would be assured of plenty of rest—eternal rest.

"And that reminds me," Hermann said. "What are you doing about Ellen Post?"

"Why, nothing. We talked it over, remember?"

"Oh, yes. But you see, there has been a change in plans. Due to this unfortunate business with Rogers, I find it necessary to go East for a while. Private affairs. In the meantime, I am in need of funds. I'm drawing what I can out of your Y-O-U setup here, but we could use more. And this Ellen Post connection with the Senator is too good to overlook. I am afraid I shall be forced to ask you to withdraw your objections and proceed during my absence."

"Just what does that mean?"

"It calls for no drastic action on your part. Just go along, cultivate her as you have been. But see to it that she drinks. When I return, I'll handle matters from that point on."

"What's the setup?"

"That's my affair. I've told you what you need to know. Take her out and get her drunk—regularly. And take her to the best places. I want her seen, identified. I understand she hasn't been around much, lately. It's your duty to remedy that situation."

"Suppose I don't want to play?" Eight skulls grinned. Sixteen ivory hands crawled across my desk.

"You'll play. Because I'm playing with you. And I can play rough unless you let me set the rules."

I nodded. “All right. Anything else?”

“That’s all.”

“You say you’re leaving. When will you be back?”

“I don’t know. A week, ten days, perhaps. Don’t worry—Miss Bauer will communicate with me, should the necessity arise. And I’ve told Jake to keep an eye on you.”

“That was thoughtful.”

“You ought to know by this time that I think of everything.”

He rose and walked to the door. The man in black, who thought of everything. The Black Man—Roger’s notes.

As soon as he was out of the office, I buzzed May.

“Anybody out there?”

“No. Oh, yes, Jake’s here.”

“What’s he doing? Does he want to see me?”

“I’ll ask.”

There was a pause; the voice coming through to me deepened. Jake was talking. “I’m gonna stick around for a while, if you don’t mind. The Professor’s going away, and he sort of hinted you might need a little protection. If it’s all right with you.”

It wasn’t all right with me. But the Professor made the rules—

“Sure, Jake. But you needn’t bother. I can call you when I go anywhere.”

“Oh, I’m okay here. I like it. That May, she’s a dish all right.”

“Suit yourself.”

I switched off, picked up the phone, and dialed Ellen at the beach-house.

“Darling, when can I see you? About two be all right? No, I’ll come on out. Something I’d like to discuss with you. No, I’m not upset. Everything’s all right. Good-by.” No, I wasn’t upset. Everything was all right. Everything was swell.

Judson Roberts wouldn’t have minded. But I wasn’t Judson Roberts any more. After yesterday, with Ellen, I knew I’d never be Judson Roberts again. I was Eddie Haines.

I looked at Eddie Haines in the mirrors. He was there, for the first time in months. Not a particularly fetching sight; his hair was in his eyes, and his mouth was drawn.

But I could recognize him, recognize myself. That was something. I waved to the mirrors as I went out. Eddie Haines waved back. Whatever happened now, I knew I could count on him.

JAKE had a time keeping up with me in his battered Ford, but he managed.

"Why you dragging me off to Malibu?" he grumbled.

"I'm going to see a woman. And you're going to sit out in the hot sun and sweat. Professor's idea, remember?"

He called me a name, and I gave him a sweet smile. Then we were off.

The same sun shone over the beach today, shimmering in Ellen's hair. Jake stayed up on the road, but even if he'd seen us, it wouldn't have stopped me from taking her in my arms.

"Whew! You did want to see me. didn't you?"

"Let's go inside."

"Good idea."

"No—I must talk to you."

"You disappoint me greatly, sir," she said.

"Listen, Ellen. This is serious."

"All right. What's the matter, Eddie?"

Funny how the little things count. Even then, I wasn't sure if I'd have the nerve to go through with it. But she called me "Eddie." That was enough. That did it.

I told her everything; what the Professor planned, what he said, what I suspected.

"But that's utterly insane! People don't go around doing such things—imagine him thinking that you would go for such a scheme."

"I did go for it, Ellen. I'm taking you out tonight and getting you drunk."

"You're what?"

"It's the only way. Trust me. I've figured an angle. If we go to some place like the Gin Mill—"

I explained my angle to her. She nodded.

"Jake's up on the road now in his car. He'll follow us. He'll be watching. That's why I had to choose the Gin Mill. From now on he'll watch me night and day, particularly when I'm with you. We must be careful, and clever. Are you game?"

"Of course. You know I'll help. Only, Eddie—"

"Yes."

"There's one thing I don't understand—one thing you haven't told me." She hesitated.

"Go on."

"Why do you have to obey the Professor? Why don't you just quit the racket and go away?"

I didn't answer. I couldn't.

"He has something on you, hasn't he? Something you didn't tell me."

It was my turn to hesitate. "Well—"

"Eddie, darling, you said you'd trust me. Don't you know that you can tell me anything and it won't matter? Please, dear. Maybe I can help."

"Maybe you can. But not now. I'll tell you later, I promise. Meanwhile, I'm going to think of a way out of all this, but fast." I kissed her. "All right, young lady, change your clothes. You've got an important date to go out and get stinking drunk."

The Gin Mill was one of those fake "atmosphere" joints—with singing waiters, complete with false mustaches; steins of beer, a "free lunch" which you paid for, and sawdust on the floors. There were also cuspidors in the booths.

That's what I needed—the cuspidors. Jake shambled over to the bar and roosted there for three hours, while Ellen and I kept the waiter rushing to our booth with refills on Scotch.

We drank a lot; at least Jake thought we did. He'd glance in the mirror out of the corner of one bloodshot eye and catch a glimpse of us raising glasses. But he never noticed us emptying the shots into the cuspidor.

As the evening progressed, our voices rose, and we began to muss each other up. That part was fun—and there was no need to fake.

Around ten I suggested a little singing. Ellen had a nice voice, but when she cut loose on some old favorites it was murder. Even I couldn't stand it.

"Can that, you're overdoing the act," I whispered. But she kept right on singing. She was singing as I dragged her out of there. We staggered over to the car. Jake sauntered behind at a discreet distance.

I drove Ellen up Wilshire to the apartment hotel where she stayed when she planned to be in town. I watched Jake's Ford in the rear-view mirror, but Ellen pulled my head around.

"Don't try anything foolish, darling. That big gorilla would tear you to pieces."

I shook my head. "I'm not going to bother Jake at all. He'll see me home, watch me stagger up the steps, and call it a day."

My prediction proved correct. I dropped Ellen, helped her lurch into the lobby, returned to my car and started toward home.

Jake pulled up behind me.

"How'm I'm doin', huh?" I yelled. "Some number, isn't she? Some number, isn't she? Some—"

"Not so loud!" Jake said. "Look, you better turn in. You're loaded to the eyeballs."

"Good idea. See you tomorrow, same time, same stashun. 'by now."

He watched me locate the keyhole. I stepped inside, switched on the light, then went upstairs and turned on the bedroom light.

Then I went into the darkness of the bathroom and peered out of the window. Jake's car was pulling away from the curb.

Good. So far, everything checked. I looked at my watch: 11:05. Late, but not too late.

It would be a long drive to Vista Canyon. But that's where the Professor lived. At least, he was supposed to live there. I'd never been invited out; how I would locate his place in the dark, I didn't know. But he was out of town, Jake was gone, and now was the time. . . .

Now was the time to park the car on the shoulder, out of sight; to crunch through gravel and inspect the crooked signboard at the roadway's fork.

Names, meaningless names; names of the wealthy, names of the reclusive. No Hermann.

Little beads of conversation began to string themselves on a single thread of recollection.

"It's on the very top of the hill. The windlass and cable is convenient. We lower a little car down for groceries. You can even ride in it yourself if you like. Built back in the Prohibition days. Porch on three sides, wonderful view, completely private. Fox-pen just below the house. Bootleggers had to have a place to cache the liquor, and so they set themselves up as running a fox-farm."

IT hadn't seemed important, when I heard it. But now sentences came back to me. Hillside. Look for a cable down the hill. Three-sided porch. A fox-pen in back, just below the level of the house.

I began to climb, to crawl. Crickets stopped their chirping and listened. I hit a winding path that ended up before the door of a three-car garage. An owl hooted—derisively, I thought.

I went back down to the road and started up another path. Look for the cable.

I found it and I followed it through a tangle of scrub. I clung to the heavy wire as the going got tough. Then the house looked down at me over the edge of the hillside, and I stared back.

There were no lights on the porches, or inside. I walked around to the front door, using the gravel path as little as possible. The door was locked, of course. I contemplated the wire mesh of the screened-in porch. I felt for my pocket-knife. Once a Boy Scout, always a Boy Scout.

Supposing the Professor hadn't left? What if somebody else was here—Doc Sylvestro, for instance?

It takes about twelve seconds to break-and-enter a house, according to the movies. Working without director, lights, or camera, I managed it in a half hour, with the aid of scraped and bleeding fingers. My trouser legs ripped as I wriggled through and dropped to the porch floor with a dull thud.

I got up and waited for an echo, a response from within the darkened house. Silence, punctuated by crickets.

I opened the door and went inside, groping for a light-switch. I found it, hesitated. A Scout is brave . . .

The light went on.

I don't know what I expected to see. A bubbling cauldron, a heap of skulls, the heads of children floating in alcohol—

It was a perfectly conventional room in a perfectly conventional summer cottage.

I walked toward the hall; then abruptly altering my course, I went out to the rear porch. I switched the light off as I departed, and allowed the moon to guide me. I stared down at the leveled area in back of the hilltop house.

More wire netting, thin-meshed and held together by strutwork. A concrete flooring. This was the fox-pen, all right. I didn't see any foxes inside. I didn't see the Professor, either.

Going down the porch steps, I listened carefully to the frogs. Were they trying to tell me something? If they were, they gave it up. As I fumbled with a latch and entered the fox-pen, the croaking ceased.

Silence. Silver silence. I stood inside the pen, but I didn't feel very foxy. I didn't know anything—didn't even know what I was looking for.

"The bootleggers had to have a place to cache the liquor, so they set themselves up as running a fox-farm."

They stacked it right out here in the open, in the fox-pen. No, of course not. There'd be foxes in the pen, but—

I saw it over in the corner, shadowed by the house above. A black circle: the metal lid covering a cistern.

Of course! That's where they hid the liquor in the old days—down below, in the hollowed-out hillside! Lift the lid and climb down the stairs to the storage-rooms, the vaults.

That's where they hid the liquor, and that's where the Professor would hide whatever it was he wanted hidden.

The frogs croaked a triumphant chorus as I walked over to the iron cistern-cover, bent down, and reached for the ring in the center.

I tugged. It was heavy, and I had trouble. I couldn't seem to move my shoulder. I glanced around at my shoulder and saw a hand . . .

Chapter Fifteen

"MR. ROBERTS—what are you doing?" said a voice.

I looked up into the plump white face of Miss Bauer.

"Come away," she whispered. Her hand left my shoulder, traveled to her lips. "He will hear you."

"He?"

"Otto. He works down in the vaults tonight, making ready." She urged me to my feet. "Be not afraid. He will sleep below. Come to the house!"

I followed her out of the pen, up the porch steps. She kept whispering. She had been asleep in the bedroom, she said, and when she heard me prowling around it was natural to assume I was the Professor. Then she finally tiptoed out to investigate and found me.

All this I learned in the kitchen, over coffee. Gradually the story filtered through her thick accent, her idiom, her fear.

For Ottilie Bauer was afraid.

She did not know, at first, what crazy business Otto had in mind when he urged her to come and live with him here in the canyon. This Doctor Sylvestro, he was at the bottom of things, really. It was he who had planned, who got poor Mr. Rogers to work out the ceremony, who interested Otto in the idea.

"Black arts, isn't it?" I said.

"Worse. Much worse. It has to do with the Anti-Christ."

"Devil-worship?"

She nodded.

That was the new racket, then: Satanism. The Black Mass ritual. Gathering, orgy, sacrifice.

I listened to her story, filling in the gaps for myself.

At first it was just a new thrill to sell to "clients"—with emphasis on the orgy. I could see Lorna Lewis and some of the others going for that. There had been rumors of such esoteric erotica in the past. Sylvestro and the Professor had Rogers cook up a ritual, a ceremony, and then spread the word.

Miss Bauer had warned. She had coaxed. She had pleaded. But the project was carried out. They had gone on from there.

"Now I do not know what will come. Because, you know, he believes in this thing."

The Man in Black. The man who was above ordinary vices, ordinary sins. Everyone is a seeker. And every seeker is a sucker. The Professor, a sucker for Satanism. He even had the Devil's appearance.

Her fear-filled voice was going on: "I wanted so to see you, to warn you. This must be stopped."

He was down in the vault now, preparing for another meeting. He had "gone away," all right. Gone down to the Pit, down to Hell. . . .

"But you cannot stop him. Better to go away while you can. While he iss —"

We both heard a sound, both turned. But it was only the wind. I smiled at her, but my hands clenched. She smiled at me in return, but her lips quivered.

"I can't go away," I said softly. "You see, the Professor knows I killed Mike Drayton. You know it too." Her lower lip quivered again.

"No. You did not kill him. That was a lie."

"But—"

"He made you go away. You saw nothing after that: How I worked on the lungs, how he revived."

"He—revived?"

"He sat in the car, and Otto, he drove him away. For air, he told me, and I must go home to bed. It would be all right. Then I did, the next day, in the papers—"

I stood up. "So the Professor murdered him, and pinned the raj) on me! You're a witness, you can testify, you're sure that's what you saw?"

She nodded. "Yes. I can testify. I do not wish to tell this, but he must be stopped. You go away."

"You bet I'll go away! And fast!" I stepped around the table, then halted.

"But what about you—isn't it dangerous for you to stay? Something's happened to Rogers, and from what you tell me, the Professor is wacky enough to try anything. If he knew that you had tipped me off—"

"He will not harm me, Mr. Roberts." She smiled: it was an old smile, borrowed from the Sphinx. "You see, he iss my brother." . . .

I drove back at dawn, slept until noon, then called Ellen.

"Go home and start packing," I said. "We're getting out of here."

"When?"

"In a few days, soon as I can clear up a few odds and ends."

"You really mean it?"

"Cross my heart and hope not to die. Have you ever wanted to go to Niagara Falls for your honeymoon? Or do you prefer the Zambezi? That's in Africa, Southern Rhodesia, I think."

"You sound high."

"I'm right up there. And you'll be. too."

"Coming over?"

“Not now. Got to get started at the office. I’ll call you and we’ll get together—in every sense of the word.”

“Scout’s honor.”

“Since when did you become a Boy Scout?”

“Since last night. Tell you all about it when I see you. Meanwhile, in case you happen to be interested, I love you.”

“You say the nicest things.”

I hung up, still feeling high, still feeling clever. I got my hat, went out, locked the door, and met Jake sitting on the steps.

When you lose altitude in a plane, it does something to your ears. I didn’t feel anything, but I wasn’t high any more. I no longer felt clever, either.

“You sure must’ve hung on a beaut, the way you slept today,” Jake greeted me.

I nodded. “Been here long?”

“About two hours.”

“You needn’t have bothered.”

“Boss’ orders—wants to see you.”

“The Professor? I thought he was out of town.”

“Me too. But he called this morning, big as life. He’s going to be waiting for us at your office.”

He was sitting at the desk when I opened the office door.

“Come in,” he said.

Yes, come into my parlor, said the spider to the fly . . . the black spider with the white skull, the black spider who knew by the tiniest tremor just what had wandered into the web he spun.

Or did he know? The stolid face told me nothing.

“Flow does it happen that you’re here?” I asked.

“I had to change my plans. I’ll be leaving today, instead. Sit down.”

I sat down on the edge of the desk and swung a leg. It felt good, even though it looked too much like a pendulum, ticking off the minutes, the seconds before he came out with it—

"Jake tells me you did a good job last night."

"If you had my hangover, you'd know what kind of a job I did."

"That's fine. I want you to keep it up: tonight, again, and tomorrow night. I shall be back sooner than I expected. On Friday I'll take over."

"Take over?"

"Yes. I know how you feel about this, and I want to spare your feelings as much as possible. Friday you will take Miss Post out for the last time."

"I will?"

"You will pass out. A friend of hers will be present to take her home. That's all."

"Only she isn't going home; I get it."

"There's no need for you to worry. She won't be harmed, I promise; nor will she blame you for—what happens. But her uncle will prove to be very helpful after that episode, I can assure you."

He stood up. "So, that is all I have to tell you. Take her out tonight. tomorrow night. Then, on Friday, I'll get in touch with you and give final orders." He smiled. "Jake will keep an eye on you meamwhile."

I smiled right back at him. "You certainly think of everything," I said. "That's correct."

"Well, think of this for a minute. I'm not taking Ellen Post out—tonight, tomorrow, or Friday. And Jake isn't going to play Boy Detective with me any more, either. Because I am quitting this business, as of today."

"So?"

"Just so. And get this, while we're on the subject—if you try any funny stuff on Ellen Post I'll rip your head off and stuff it down your throat."

"Dear Doctor Roberts!" He grinned slowly. "Is this all you have learned of tact, the diplomatic approach, the psychology of personal relationships? You need a refresher course in Y-O-U."

"Never mind the funny stuff. I mean what I said."

"That is quite apparent. But may I remind you that you are acting under my orders? And for a very good reason?"

I watched him, now. I wanted to see his face.

"Mike Drayton's murder? But I didn't kill Mike Drayton. You did." I wanted to see his face, and I did. But it wasn't worth it—there was no reaction at all.

Then, and only then, did I realize the value of his advice. I should have been tactful, diplomatic—but no, it was too good to miss, telling him off. And in telling him, I had told all.

He knew where I got my information. And now—

There was a paperweight on the desk. I slid off the edge slowly, meeting his blank stare. Then I grabbed, grasped, swung.

He toppled forward in the chair, very slowly, like a big, baldheaded doll. The doll was bleeding from a cut behind the ear.

I stepped over to the door and peeked out. May was behind the glass, and beyond it I could see Jake, lounging on a sofa and reading a magazine.

"Jake," I called, "come in here a minute. The Professor would like to see you."

He came over, waddled through the door, waddled right into the paperweight. He didn't fall like a doll—he fell like a ton of bricks.

I left them decorating the inner office and walked over to May. It was a big risk, hanging around here now, but I had to get my call through. I owed it to Miss Bauer.

"Get me the Professor's house," I said. "Hurry it up."

She dialed and handed the phone to me.

"Hello?"

It was Ottilie Bauer's voice.

"This is Doctor Roberts," I said. "Don't ask any questions. Just come down to Ellen Post's apartment at once. Yes, right away. Don't stop for anything." I gave her the address and hung up.

"What's the matter?" May asked. "Where are the others?"

I patted her shoulder. "In conference. I'm going out now, but you might call the sign-painter for me, the one who does the lettering on the office doors."

She looked puzzled.

"You have a job for him?"

"Right, sister. Tell him to scrape my name off. I'm quitting."

Chapter Sixteen

I DROVE UP WILSHIRE about twice as fast as the law alllow's, parked in front of Ellen's apartment-hotel, buzzed her from the desk, and went up to the third floor.

There wasn't much time for planning, but I'd managed to work a few things out. First, I must get a written, witnessed statement about the Drayton murder from Miss Bauer. Second, I must warn her and help her decide what she could do. Third, I must grab Ellen and get the hell out of town with her.

Ellen was playing the phonograph when I arrived, singing arias in accompaniment to some operatic recordings. She opened the door on a high C, slightly flat.

"Hello," I said. "Where's Ottilie?"

"Who?"

"Miss Bauer. I told her to meet us here. She should have made it before I did."

"Well, she hasn't come."

"Damn!"

"What's the matter?"

I told her what the matter was, fast.

THERE was no reason to hold back anything. I gave the murder to her cold, then my interview with Ottilie Bauer, and my recent caper with the Professor and Jake. She heard me out, making appropriate sounds and gestures—not the least of which was her final comment, "All right, Eddie. I'm with you on this, whatever you want."

“I want Miss Bauer here to sign a statement, just in case. Then I want to figure things out with her to prevent—something—from happening. Then you and I are leaving. When the Professor and Jake wake up, they’re going to want to see me.”

I glanced at my watch. I’d been here twenty minutes. Ottilie Bauer should have been here long ago. Unless the Professor had come to in a hurry—

“Where’s the phone?” I asked.

She indicated it, and I used it. I got through the switchboard and dialed the Professor’s house. If there was no answer, I could assume Miss Bauer had left. If there was an answer—

“Hello.”

A voice—not Miss Bauer’s, but a man’s. There was something familiar about it. I hesitated until I placed the speaker: Doctor Sylvestro!

“Hello,” he repeated.

I hung up without answering. Sylvestro was out there. And if the Professor had revived, and called Sylvestro before Miss Bauer could leave, then everything was haywire. “Did you get her?” Ellen asked. “No, but I’m going to.”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean I’ve got to get out to the Professor’s house, right away. She may be coming, delayed en route. There are such things as flat tires, you know. But I can’t take any chances. Sylvestro answered the phone just now. That can mean anything. So I’m on my way.”

“I thought you weren’t taking any chances. What do you call this? If they find you there, you’ll never get away!”

“I’ve no choice. Miss Bauer is my alibi. Besides, I can’t leave her in the soup.”

Ellen put her arms around my neck. They seemed to belong there.

“All right, Eddie. But I’m coming with you.”

“No, you’re not. You can’t. If I’m wrong, then Miss Bauer may still show up here. You’ll have to be on hand when she arrives. Tell her what’s happened, get a written statement, and wait for me to call. I'll call you, as soon as I can."

"If you can."

I kissed her. "Yes, darling—if I can."

It wasn't very heroic, and there was nothing heroic about the way I kissed her. I didn't want to go, didn't want to stick my neck out, or in.

But I had to, and I went.

I went, fast. The walls of Vista Canyon flashed by, the roadside signs blurred before me. "Drive Slowly" meant nothing to me. And "Danger—Falling Rocks" was kid stuff.

I wasn't afraid of falling rocks. I was afraid of seeing the Professor's car, or Jake's, in the rear-view mirror. I was afraid of seeing Doc Sylvestro waiting for me in ambush with a sawed-off shotgun.

As I approached the heart of the canyon I slowed down. Just before the turn which brought me to the crossroads beneath the hillside, I pulled over to the shoulder and stopped the motor. I climbed out and walked cautiously around the bend.

A car was parked up against the trees—a strange car. I inspected it, noted the familiar AMA seal. Doctor Sylvestro's heap, all right: That meant he was still up there.

I returned to my car and started the motor. A U-turn was dangerous here, but it was more dangerous to leave the car standing where it could be seen.

So I drove back slowly down the road until I hit another sidepath in the canyon. I drove the car up the dirt roadbed until I found a spot under some trees, out of sight. I parked here and walked back on foot. I kept looking back over my shoulder, in case somebody came along. And I kept looking ahead, anticipating Doc Sylvestro. I came abreast of the crossing again, glanced up at the hillside house far above me, and then found a clump of bushes to screen me.

Then I sat down, lit a cigarette, and let the sand-fleas have dinner. The cigarette-smoke didn't rise above the bushes, nor did I. I sprawled out and watched the sunset. I leaned back and closed my eyes. I began to doze—

Muffled sound from far away: Door slam; crunching; footsteps. Doctor Sylvestro descended interminable stairs. I caught glimpses of him through the trees. He minced down, carrying the inevitable black bag, stopped at the bottom, mopped his forehead, and pulled out a cigarette. He lit it, and a little red eye moved through the dusk toward his car.

I crossed over to the wooden stairway and climbed. There was no hand-rail, and the canyon depths loomed below. The sky darkened. I sweated.

Up, and up, and up. I looked down at the gray ribbon of road. No cars. I went on.

Then I stood on a small patio, below the porch. The house ahead of me was dark. This time I knew what to do. I went around to the porch and looked for the place where I'd slashed the screen. I entered and walked into the parlor.

The house was more than dark—it was empty. There were no signs of struggle, nothing to indicate what Doctor Sylvestro might have been doing.

Perhaps I'd been mistaken. Perhaps Miss Bauer had left; she might be at Ellen's place right now'. Best thing to do was call and find out, right away.

I looked around for the phone. There were two, standing on the table in the corner. I started over to the table.

No—wait a minute. Miss Bauer had said something about the bedroom. I could just peek in, first. I peeked.

Nothing there. The bed was made, no signs of packing or confusion. I was relieved rather than disappointed.

Of course, I might just as well try the kitchen too before calling. . . .

I walked into the kitchen.

Even before I entered, I could smell it; the strangely familiar odor, the instinctively recognized reek.

An attempt had been made to mop up. But there were stains on the table, on the floor all around it. I thought of a butcher-shop, an operating-room—

Operating-room. . . . Doctor Sylvestro and his black bag! But then, where —

A humming sound from the corner. Something huge and white and gleaming was there—something that hummed and purred next to the refrigerator. I walked over to the deep-freeze, tugged the handle, raised the lid.

I saw the packages wrapped in butcher's paper; six of them. I lifted out the top one, the round one.

I unwrapped Miss Bauer's head. . . .

There was nothing else for me to do, then. I closed the deep freeze and left the kitchen, left the humming, the odor, the stains. I walked over to the table and picked up the nearest of the two phones. There was nothing else for me to do.

My finger, clicking the receiver. My voice, saying, "Give me the police department, please."

An answering voice, a hollow voice, Jake's voice: "What are you doing here?"

Here? I dropped the mouthpiece. Jake wasn't here. How did he get on the phone?

But I had dozed off for a little while when waiting out there in the bushes . . . he could have come . . . and the phone . . .

That phone was connected with the vaults under the fox-pen!

I knew it now, knew there wouldn't be time to take the other phone and call the cops for Jake was climbing out of the cistern. I heard a clang as I ran toward the porch door.

I stood on the patio, at the head of the stairs. I gazed down into darkness, and something moved—something blacker than darkness. A black suit? The Professor, coming up the stairs.

Jake's feet thudded through the house. Jake's voice bounced off the mountains.

"Hey, come back here!"

Jake didn’t reply. He made tor the porch. “Stop!”

I hesitated.

Then I saw the flash, heard the sound of the shot. It went spa Jig! And it was close, too close.

I ran forward in darkness. The windlass loomed. They were shouting now. Jake ran after me. I jumped into the cable-car, tripped the windlass.

There was another shot, another flash and a spang! But the car was grating down, I was crashing through a gantlet of branches that stabbed at my face. I crouched low, racing in darkness.

“Get him!” Spang! “The rope, you fool—cut that cable!”

Clattering, ripping, roaring . . . must be halfway down now . . . the flimsy wooden car like an orange-crate, swaying. . . .

It was black, no moon shone, and the trees clawed me. I fell into darkness. And then the car lurched; something snapped. For a moment I hung there, grabbing air. Behind me something rumbled and crashed. Somebody had started a boulder down. And somebody had cut the cable.

The rock came. The car tipped. And I hurtled down through the tree-tops. I could see them coming closer and closer, and I closed my eyes; then it didn’t matter it I closed them or not, because the blackness was everywhere.

Chapter Seventeen

I OPENED MY EYES. My neck ached, my head ached. For a moment I lay still while I sorted and catalogued the varieties of pain.

Opening my eyes hadn’t helped much. There was still darkness all around me, but gradually I could focus. I raised my head, bracing myself on my hands. I was on the ground, with needles lacerating my palms. Pine needles.

Yes, that would be right. I had crashed through the trees and now I was lying in the canyon. Above me—Muffled voices. Footsteps. Then a gleam, from far away, flashlight beam. Jake and the Professor were hunting for me, hunting in the night. And they'd find me here, in a matter of moments.

There seemed to be a tree-trunk, far away. I hunched forward. My fingers clawed bark, braced the broad surface.

I got to my knees, embracing the tree-trunk. It must have looked silly, and it hurt like hell. The big pain centered in my head and neck. . . . Voices came closer. I could hear something snap.

Then I was walking away from the voices. Walking very slowly, walking very softly. I bumped into bushes, and it hurt. I bumped into trees, and it hurt. But I kept right on walking, through the underbrush.

They would be watching the road. I'd better not try to climb out of the canyon. I couldn't make it, anyway. The main job was to keep walking, keep from falling down and letting the pain smother me in sleep.

Deep darkness and crickets all about me. No voices, now. I was walking along the dry bed of a little gully. It was dusty. I smelled the dust when I stumbled and fell. I coughed, got up and walked again. I wiped dust from my face, and something sticky came away in my hand.

The ground sloped. I clung to branches and crawled upward. Then I could see the road. It might be safe to cross here, if there were no lights. I didn't see a flash. I felt gravel under my feet, felt it grind against my knees as I pitched forward again.

I sprawled there, waiting for them to come and get me, waiting for a car to run over me, waiting for the next wave of pain. There was nothing else to do, so I tried to think. That hurt worse than anything else.

There was something I had to do, now. Something about a call, and a car. . . . Yes. My car. Up the side-road, if I could find it. If they hadn't found it.

I got up and walked. I found the side-road. I found the car. I even managed to open the door and climb inside. Then I blacked out again.

I opened my eyes and fumbled at the dashboard. Lights. There were keys in my pocket. The pain was mounting, but I could see. I had to see, in order to drive.

I drove. I drove very slowly, and then I drove fast. The road kept winding and winding and I wound with it.

The sky turned gray. Dawn. This was Saturday. . . . Saturday morning. Nobody would be at the office. I couldn't go to the house; they'd think of that. But the office—

Yes. That's where I was going. Because the files were there, the files and the records. I had to burn them before I called the police.

The police would know what to do about my head. First burn the records, let them burn in hell, and then sleep. They could all burn in hell, just as long as they let me sleep.

Driving burning hurting driving stopping burning walking falling lying sleeping sleeping sleeping. . . .

When I woke up I felt fine.

I was sitting in a chair behind a desk in a big room lined with mirrors, and I felt fine.

I looked at the mirrors, at the face in the mirrors, a face, covered with dirt and blood. At first I didn't recognize the face, and then I remembered.

Ottilie Bauer and the deep freeze. . . . Mike Drayton and the swimming-pool. . . . Edgar Clinton Caldwell and the rope. . . . Ellen Post and . . . what?

That was enough to make anyone blow his stack. I emptied the desks and file cabinets and set a match to the papers, using a chair as a poker to make sure that everything burned. I jabbed and heaved and ripped until I began to sweat and some of the anger drained out me, then I went outside.

Even then I kept seeing the round package in the freezer. By the time I got to the street I was blowing my stack again and the earthquake seemed entirely appropriate. The earth shook and trembled; fissures opened in the street, and buildings swayed and cracked hideously.

My car was half-smothered under a large sign that had fallen, and I was too impatient to be bothered, so I went to Ellen's apartment on foot. I had my finger on the bell when I hesitated. Then I searched my pockets and used the key she had given me.

I needn't have bothered being careful. The apartment was empty, just as it had been the last time I was there, except for a small table in the foyer that was overturned. I took off on a run back to the car and started tearing at the debris until I could get one door open. I squeezed in, started the motor, rocked the car back and forth until I was out from under the sign, then sped back to the Professor's fox-farm.

If he had done anything to Ellen—

I parked at the bottom of the stairs and started climbing. Jake would be on guard somewhere, and as soon as I could I left the steps and worked through the underbrush around to the fox-pen. I climbed dowm the iron steps into the cistern.

The Professor would be there, and Ellen—that much I knew, but nothing more. If Miss Bauer had been right, if the Professor actually had swallowed his own line and really did think that he was the Devil—I shuddered.

I moved along the passageway toward the sound of voices from beyond. Cadenced chanting rose at my approach.

I steeled myself for what I might see: Satan, with the silver bowl, the silver knife of sacrifice, crouching over the altar and the body of Ellen. Then a sound arrested me; a chink of light guided my footsteps to a side of the corridor. There was a small room beyond. I approached it, peered through the inch-open door.

Ellen!

She lay upon a couch and black velvet bore the naked jewel of her loveliness. Great lights blazed down upon her flesh, but her eyes were closed in sleep or in death.

And there was a hooded one who crouched behind a chromed tripod, making strange vague fumbling gestures—

I remembered. Once there had lived a man named Caldwell and he was photographed. The hood and tripod, the lights, the nakedness—

I opened the door, rushed into the room. The hood fell away from the gargoyle face of Sylvestro.

He turned, but I moved very quickly. I grabbed the tripod and struck him across the head, not once but many times. He fell as blood gushed forth from his twisted mouth.

I bent over Ellen, caressing her warm, living flesh. She didn't move. She slept as one drugged. I slapped her face. Finally eyelids fluttered, flickered, parted. She awoke.

"You're here," she whispered. "Eddie!"

"Your clothing—find it," I said.

She found the garments in a cubicle at the side of the room. She was dazed, submissive.

I stared at the interior of the cubicle; shelves lined the walls and upon them were jars and bottles and packets.

"It's their darkroom," she said. "Photographic supplies: chemicals, paper, film, old negatives. They have curtains in the other room, and they take pictures of the fools with dark light flashes. That's the racket. But how did you get here?"

I shook my head. This was not the time to explain. I was mad clean through.

"This other room," I said. "There is an altar?"

"Yes." She came close to me. "But let's get out of here. We can phone the police—"

"They are assembled now? And one can enter behind the curtains, with space to stand concealed?"

"What's that got to do with us? Eddie, I'm scared. That man Hermann—you were right about him, he really thinks he's the Devil. Come on, let's hurry."

I entered the cubicle. She followed me.

"What are you going to do?" she whispered.

I told her how to plant the negatives and film near the curtains and set them off when I gave the signal as I approached the altar.

"But you can't get away with it! It's so much easier to get out and let the police come."

"Trust me," I said.

"All right, Eddie, whatever you say."

Then I went back into the corridor, where the chanting rose, and into the room with the altar. The chamber was low and broad beneath a domed rock ceiling. Upon the red-draped walls the shadows danced by candlelight. Tapers blazed down upon the hordes of Hell.

I moved silently to the side, slipped behind the drapes and found a space between wall and hanging which was like a little corridor extending all around the room. I walked down and saw that Ellen followed at a distance, her arms laden. She deposited her burden and withdrew. She would return, I knew, to carry out my instructions. I hoped it would work. Even if it didn't, I would have the satisfaction of destroying the negatives he was using for blackmail.

There were slits at intervals in the drapery, and I peered through an opening and contemplated the scene.

All wore cloaks and some were cowled, but I knew many of them from the days of Judson Roberts. I saw Lorna Lewis. She faced the altar, swaying upon her haunches as she chanted and waved a goblet. All were chanting, all held goblets, all adored the altar and the Black Goat of the Sabbat.

The tethered kid bleated upon the dais, and goat-stench mingled with the reek of candle-wax and wine. The crucifix inverted—the bowl and the knife—these were symbols of the Devil's Mass. I had read of them and I recognized them, just as I now recognized the man in black who led the chanting from the altar-stone.

The Devil stood incarnate before me; the white skull bobbed and the white hands wove evil glamour over all. I got mad all over again.

Ellen came up behind me and nodded. I waved her back and moved along the wall, edging up to the hangings near the altar.

Walls vibrated with the litany, for the sacrifice was at hand. The Devil would slay the kid, they would partake of mingled blood and wine. Then came Saturnalia, the orgy of vice.

I stepped out from the hangings and stood before them. The chanting ceased.

The man who had been Professor Hermann gazed at me, and there was nothing of humanity in his eyes or face, for the mask had been stripped away. Now he was the Devil. I saw him come toward me, watched him raise the knife. Then I smiled. This was the moment.

Once this man had been Otto Hermann. Once he had been a man like anyone else. Now he was insane with delusions of Satan, with altars and sacrifices and silver knives. He blinked and came forward, still holding the knife. He must have seen it in my eyes.

"So that's it," he whispered. I signaled to Ellen with a gesture behind my back. "I'm Satan and you're the avenging angel. Strange that it should come to this! But what I have created I can destroy."

The knife swept up. I smiled and waited and hoped and waited. I watched the silver sweep of the blade as it started down—then saw it blotted out in a blanket of fire. The Devil jumped back, caught off-guard by the sudden burst of flame from the fastburning negatives. I started to lunge at him, then saw a drapery catch fire and fall forward, burning furiously, cloaking his body in a solid sheet of flame. It wrapped around him and he screamed; then he fell back and smoke rose and swirled to blot out his writhing body. Satan was returned to Hell.

My eyes hurt and it was hard to breathe. I groped for the door amidst the dense smoke. I choked, gasped, stumbled through the corridor in darkness. I found the iron stairs, climbed frantically and gulped fresh air at the top.

Now it was ended, I couldn't think, couldn't remember. I began to stagger to the bottom of the hillside, clinging to the trees. Lights flashed past me in the night. The others—the would-be Satans—were fleeing below.

I came to the car, waiting on the side of the road. I got the door open, somehow, and there she was! Ellen, with her face and hands oddly blackened. She gasped when she saw me.

"It worked, then? And Hermann—"

"The Devil is dead," I told her. Then I collapsed.

She put her arms around me.

"Go to sleep, Eddie," she said. "It's all right now. Go to sleep."

Chapter Eighteen

SHE DROVE ME to the beach-house and put me to bed. I stayed in bed for the next three days. I don't remember much of that at all. Gradually I managed to pull out of it.

As it was, I had been up two days before she'd even let me talk about what had happened.

"When you got away in the cable car, they must have figured you were dead," Ellen decided. "Anyway, they had to take a chance on it. The earthquake kept them from coming into town and finding out whether you were alive and had returned to the office.

"I was so startled when the temblor came that I dropped a phonograph record," she told me. "It must have been Sylvestro who imitated your voice over the phone to me. He said I was to come right out to the canyon. They had all been killed in the quake, and you wanted me to help you because your car had been hit by falling rocks. I went right out there—"

"And they grabbed you," I finished. "You see, that Black Mass deal had to go through, earthquake or no earthquake. They were determined to frame you immediately. They wanted photographs of you to show to your uncle at once. Unless they could make a deal with him within the coming week he'd be named a candidate and they couldn't apply the necessary pressure to him personally. Even the Professor could work on your uncle only as an individual, beforehand.

"So they got you out there and doped you and set things up for their photos. The Professor was smart. He held the ceremony too, as planned—and was ready to work with black-light photography on the others during the ritual. It must have taken him a long time to sell Satanism to the chosen few. He had the whole scheme worked out, and what a sweet blackmail it would have been if he could have carried it off! He was a smart one—smart as the devil."

It wasn't until the next day that Ellen let me see the newspapers, and I read about what they found in the house out at Vista Canyon.

They didn't know very much, even after all this time. The quake had kept the authorities busy enough, and naturally nobody who had been mixed up in the ceremony did any talking to the police.

There was no mention of poor Miss Bauer, and I could only assume her remains had been disposed of right after I had found the deep-freeze.

Apparently nobody had tumbled to that cistern in the abandoned fox-pit behind the house. Everything that it contained—all the burned and charred remnants of the past—remained hidden and would probably never come to light. But "police were investigating rumors of a mysterious cult" and they were "seeking the missing owner, Otto Hermann, well-known psychological consultant, who disappeared during the time of the quake."

My name wasn't mentioned. Judson Roberts wasn't tied in to this deal, and Eddie Haines never had been.

He never need be.

Even if they do get down into the hillside and find Sylvestro and the Professor—even if they finally start a full-dress investigation—I'm still in the clear. I burned the Judson Roberts record file at the office, and there is no connection between him and Eddie Haines at all.

Ellen and I can go away, today. Or I can stay here and face the music, risk taking a rap if they want to pin one on me for what happened.

Writing it all down here, the way I have these past weeks, I can turn it over to the authorities tomorrow. Or I can burn it, the way the Professor was burned, the way the past was burned.

I think I'm going to leave it up to Ellen to decide. She'll know what's best. Yes, I'll ask her, and whatever she says, I'll do.

As long as she remembers to call me "Eddie."

The Lighthouse

The editors of FANTASTIC are proud to present, for the first time in the pages of any magazine, the story on which Edgar Allan Poe was at work when he died. Now, over one hundred years later, it has been completed by a modern-day master of the horror story. His name is Robert Bloch, author of such classic tales of terror as Yours Truly—Jack the Ripper*,* The Cloak*, and many other spine tinglers.*

Here's your chance to be a literary detective! Tell us, if you can, where the old master put down his pen for the last time, and where the young man from Milwaukee took over for him a century later.

Jan. 1—1796. This day—my first on the lighthouse—I make this entry in my Diary, as agreed on with DeGrat. As regularly as I can keep the journal, I will—but there is no telling what may happen to a man all alone as I am—I may get sick or worse. . . .

So far well! The cutter had a narrow escape—but why dwell on that, since I am here, all safe? My spirits are beginning to revive already, at the mere thought of being—for once in my life at least—thoroughly alone; for, of course, Neptune, large as he is, is not to be taken into consideration as "society". Would to Heaven I had ever found in "society" one half as much faith as in this poor dog;—in such case I and "society" might never have parted—even for a year. . . .

What most surprises me, is the difficulty DeGrat had in getting me the appointment—and I a noble of the realm! It could not be that the Consistory had any doubt of my ability to manage the light. One man has attended it before now—and got on quite as well as the three that are usually put in. The duty is a mere nothing; and the printed instructions are as plain as possible. It would never have done to let Orndoff accompany me. I should never have made any way with my book as long as he was within reach of me, with his intolerable gossip—not to mention that everlasting meerschaum. Besides, I wish to be alone. . . .

It is strange that I never observed, until this moment, how dreary a sound that word has—"alone" ! I could half fancy there was some peculiarity in the echo of these cylindrical walls—but oh, no!—that is all nonsense. I do believe I am going to get nervous about my insulation. That will never do. I have not forgotten DeGrat's prophecy. Now for a scramble to the lantern and a good look around to "see what I can see". . . . To see what I can see indeed!—not very much. The swell is subsiding a little, I think—but the cutter will have a rough passage home, nevertheless. She will hardly get within sight of the Norland before noon tomorrow—and yet it can hardly be more than 190 or 200 miles.

Jan. 2. I have passed this day in a species of ecstasy that I find it impossible to describe. My passion for solitude could scarcely have been more thoroughly gratified.

I do not say satisfied; for I believe I should never be satiated with such delight as I have experienced today. . . .

The wind lulled after daybreak, and by the afternoon the sea had gone down materially. . . . Nothing to be seen with the telescope even, but ocean and sky, with an occasional gull.

Jan, 3. A dead calm all day. Towards evening, the sea looked very much like glass. A few seaweeds came in sight; but besides them absolutely nothing all day—not even the slightest speck of cloud. . . . Occupied myself in exploring the lighthouse. . . . It is a very lofty one—as I find to my cost when I have to ascend its interminable stairs—not quite 160 feet, I should say, from the low-water mark to the top of the lantern. From the bottom inside the shaft, however, the distance to the summit is 180 feet at least:—thus the floor is 20 feet below the surface of the sea, even at low-tide. . . .

It seems to me that the hollow interior at the bottom should have been filled in with solid masonry. Undoubtedly the whole would have been thus rendered more safe:—but what am I thinking about? A structure such as this is safe enough under any circumstances. I should feel myself secure in it during the fiercest hurricane that ever raged—and yet I have heard seamen say that, occasionally, with a wind at South-West, the sea has been known to run higher here than anywhere, with the single exception of the Western opening of the Straits of Magellan.

No mere sea, though, could accomplish anything with this solid iron-riveted wall—which, at 50 feet from high-water mark, is four feet thick, if one inch. The basis on which the structure rests seems to me to be chalk. . . .

Jan. 4. I am now prepared to resume work on my book, having spent this day in familiarizing myself with a regular routine.

My actual duties will be, I perceive, absurdly simple—the light requires little tending beyond a periodic replenishment of the oil for the six-wick burner. As to my own needs, they are easily satisfied, and the exertion of an occasional trip down the stairs is all I must anticipate.

At the base of the stairs is the entrance room; beneath that is twenty feet of empty shaft. Above the entrance room, at the next turn of the circular iron staircase, is my store-room which contains the casks of fresh water and the food supplies, plus linens and other daily needs. Above that—again another spiral of those interminable stairs!—is the oil room, completely filled with the tanks from which I must feed the wicks. Fortunately, I perceive that I can limit my descent to the store-room to once a week if I choose, for it is possible for me to carry sufficient provisions in one load to supply both myself and Neptune for such a period. As to the oil supply, I need only to bring up two drum every three days and thus insure a constant illumination. If I choose, I can place a dozen or more spare drums on the platform near the light and thus provide for several weeks to come.

So it is that in my daily existence I can limit my movements to the upper half of the lighthouse; that is to say, the three spirals opening on the topmost three levels. The lowest is my “living room”—and it is here, of course, that Neptune is confined the greater part of the day; here, too, that I plan to write at a desk near the wall-slit that affords a view of the sea without. The second highest level is my bedroom and kitchen combined. Here the weekly rations of food and water are contained in cupboards for that purpose; here, too, is the ingenious stove fed by the selfsame oil that lights the beacon above. The topmost level is the service room giving access to the light itself and to the platform surrounding it. Since the light is fixed, and its reflectors set, there is no need for me ever to ascend to the platform save when replenishing the oil supply or making a repair or adjustment as per the written instructions—a circumstance which may well never arise during my stay here.

Already I have carried enough oil, water and provender to the upper levels to last me for an entire month—I need stir from my two rooms only to replenish the wicks.

For the rest, I am free! utterly free—my time is my own, and in this lofty realm I rule as King. Although Neptune is my only living subject I can well imagine that I am sovereign o’er all I see—ocean below and stars above. I am master of the sun that rises in rubicund radiance from the sea at dawn, emperor of wind and monarch of the gale, sultan of the waves that sport or roar in roiling torrents about the base of my palace pinnacle. I command the moon in the heavens, and the very ebb and flow of the tide does homage to my reign.

But enough of fancies—DeGrat warned me to refrain from morbid or from grandiose speculation—now I shall take up in all earnestness the task that lies before me. Yet this night, as I sit before the window in the starlight, the tides sweeping against these lofty walls can only echo my exultation; I am free—and, at last, alone!

Jan. 11. A week has passed since my last entry in this diary, and as I read it over, I can scarce comprehend that it was I who penned those words.

Something has happened—the nature of which lies unfathomed. I have worked, eaten, slept, replenished the wicks twice. My outward existence has been placid. I can ascribe the alteration in my feelings to naught but some inner alchemy; enough to say that a disturbing change has taken place.

Alone! I, who breathed the word as if it were some mystic incantation bestowing peace, have come—I realize it now—to loathe the very sound of the syllables. And the ghastliness of meaning I know full well.

It is a dismaying, it is a dreadful thing, to be alone. Truly alone, as I am, with only Neptune to exist beside me and by his breathing presence remind me that I am not the sole inhabitant of a blind and senseless universe. The sun and stars that wheel overhead in their endless cycle seem to rush across the horizon unheeding—and, of late, unheeded, for I cannot fix my mind upon them with normal constancy. The sea that swirls or ripples below me is naught but a purposeless chaos of utter emptiness.

I thought myself to be a man of singular self-sufficiency, beyond the petty needs of a boring and banal society. How wrong I was!—for I find myself longing for the sight of another face, the sound of another voice, the touch of other hands whether they offer caresses or blows. Anything, anything for reassurement that my dreams are indeed false and that I am not, actually, alone.

And yet I am. I am, and I will be. The world is two hundred miles away; I will not know it again for an entire year. And it in turn—but no more! I cannot put down my thoughts while in the grip of this morbid mood.

Jan. 13. Two more days—two more centuries!—have passed. Can it be less than two weeks since I was immured in this prison tower? I mount the turret of my dungeon and gaze at the horizon; I am not hemmed in by bars of steel but by columns and pillars and webs of wild and raging water. The sea has changed; gray skies have wrought a wizardry so that I stand surrounded by a tumult that threatens to become a tempest.

I turn away, for I can bear no more, and descend to my room. I seek to write—the book is bravely begun, but of late I can bring myself to do nothing constructive or creative—and in a moment I fling aside my pen and rise to pace. To endlessly pace the narrow, circular confines of my tower of torment.

Wild words, these? And yet I am not alone in my affliction—Neptune, Neptune the loyal, the calm, the placid—feels it too.

Perhaps it is but the approach of the storm that agitates him so—for Nature bears closer kinship with the beast. He stays constantly at my side, whining now, and the muffled roaring of the waves without our prison causes him to tremble. There is a chill in the air that our stove cannot dissipate, but it is not cold that oppresses him. . . .

I have just mounted to the platform and gazed out at the spectacle of gathering storm. The waves are fantastically high; they sweep against the lighthouse in titanic tumult. These solid walls of stone shudder rhythmically with each onslaught. The churning sea is gray no longer—the water is black, black as basalt and as heavy. The sky’s hue has deepened so that at the moment no horizon is visible. I am surrounded by a billowing blackness thundering against me. . . .

Back below now, as lightning flickers. The storm will break soon, and Neptune howls piteously. I stroke his quivering flanks, but the poor animal shrinks away. It seems that he fears even my presence; can it be that my own features betray an equal agitation? I do not know—I only feel that I am helpless, trapped here and awaiting the mercy of the storm. I cannot write much longer.

And yet I will set down a further statement. I must, if only to prove to myself that reason again prevails. In writing of my venture up to the platform—my viewing of the sea and sky—I omitted to mention the meaning of a single moment. There came upon me, as I gazed down at the black and boiling madness of the waters below, a wild and willful craving to become one with it. But why should I disguise the naked truth?—I felt an insane impulse to hurl myself into the sea!

It has passed now; passed, I pray, forever. I did not yield to this perverse prompting and I am back here in my quarters, writing calmly once again. Yet the fact remains—the hideous urge to destroy myself came suddenly, and with the force of one of those monstrous waves.

And what—I force myself to realize—was the meaning of my demented desire? It was that I sought escape, escape from loneliness. It was as if by mingling with the sea and the storm I would no longer be alone.

But I defy the elements. I defy the powers of the earth and of the heavens. Alone I am, alone I must be—and come what may, I shall survive! My laughter rises above all your thunder!

So—ye spirits of the storm—blow, howl, rage, hurl your watery weight against my fortress—I am greater than you in all your powers. But wait! Neptune . . . something has happened to the creature—I must attend him.

Jan. 16. The storm is abated. I am back at my desk now, alone—truly alone. I have locked poor Neptune in the store-room below; the unfortunate beast seems driven out of his wits by the forces of the storm. When last I wrote he was worked into a frenzy, whining and pawing and wheeling in circles. He was incapable of responding to my commands and I had no choice but to literally drag him down the stairs by the scruff of his neck and incarcerate him in the store-room where he could not come to harm. I own that concern for my safety was involved—the possibility of being imprisoned in this lighthouse with a mad dog must be avoided.

His howls, throughout the storm, were pitiable indeed, but now he is silent. When last I ventured to gaze into the room I perceived him sleeping, and I trust that rest and calm will restore him to my full companionship as before.

Companionship!

How shall I describe the horrors of the storm I faced alone?

In this diary entry I have prefaced a date—January 16th—but that is merely a guess. The storm has swept away all track of Time. Did it last a day, two days, three—as I now surmise—a week, or a century? I do not know.

I know only an endless raging of waters that threatened, time and again, to engulf the very pinnacle of the lighthouse. I know only an eternity of ebony, an eon of billowing black composed of sea and sky commingled. I only know that there were times when my own voice outroared the storm—but how can I convey the cause of that? There was a time, perhaps a full day, perhaps much longer, when I could not bear to rise from my couch but lay with my face buried in the pillows, weeping like a child. But mine were not the pure tears of childhood innocence—call them, rather, the tears of Lucifer upon the realization of his eternal fall from grace. It seemed to me that I was truly the victim of an endless damnation; condemned forever to remain a prisoner in a world of thunderous chaos.

There is no need to write of the fancies and fantasies which assailed me through those unhallowed hours. At times I felt that the lighthouse was giving way and that I would be swept into the sea. At times I knew myself to be a victim of a colossal plot—I cursed DeGrat for sending me, knowingly, to my doom. At times (and these were the worst moments of all) I felt the full force of loneliness, crashing down upon me in waves higher than those wrought by water.

But all has passed, and the sea—and myself—are calm again. A peculiar calmness, this; as I gaze out upon the water there are certain phenomena I was not aware of until this very moment.

Before setting down my observations, let me reassure myself that I am, indeed, quite calm; no trace of my former tremors or agitation yet remains. The transient madness induced by the storm has departed and my brain is free of phantasms—indeed, my perceptive faculties seem to be sharpened to an unusual acuity.

It is almost as though I find myself in possession of an additional sense, an ability to analyze and penetrate beyond former limitations superimposed by Nature.

The water on which I gaze is placid once more. The sky is only lightly leaden in hue. But wait—low on the horizon creeps a sudden flame! It is the sun, the Arctic sun in sullen splendour, emerging momentarily from the pall to incarnadine the ocean. Sun and sky, sea and air about me, turn to blood.

Can it be I who but a moment ago wrote of returned, regained sanity? I, who have just shrieked aloud, "Alone!"—and half-rising from my chair, heard the muffled booming echo reverberate through the lonely lighthouse, its sepulchral accent intoning "Alone!" in answer? It may be that I am, despite all resolution, going mad; if so, I pray the end comes soon.

Jan. 18. There will be no end! I have conceived a notion, a theory which my heightened faculties soon will test. I shall embark upon an experiment. . . .

Jan. 26. A week has passed here in my solitary prison. Solitary?—perhaps, but not for long. The experiment is proceeding. I must set down what has occurred.

The sound of the echo set me to thinking. One sends out one's voice and it comes back. One sends out one's thoughts and—can it be that there is a response? Sound, as we know, travels in waves and patterns. The emanations of the brain, perhaps, travel similarly. And they are not confined by physical laws of time, space, or duration.

Can one’s thoughts produce a reply that materializes, just as one’s voice produces an echo? An echo is a product of a certain vacuum. A thought . . .

Concentration is the key. I have been concentrating. My supplies are replenished, and Neptune—visited during my venture below—seems rational enough, although he shrinks away when I approach him. I have left him below and spent the past week here. Concentration, I repeat, is the key to my experiment.

Concentration, by its very nature, is a difficult task: I addressed myself to it with no little trepidation. Strive but to remain seated quietly with a mind “empty” of all thought, and one finds in the space of a very few minutes that the errant body is engaged in all manner of distracting movement—foot tapping, finger twisting, facial grimacing.

This I managed to overcome after a matter of many hours—my first three days were virtually exhausted in an effort to rid myself of nervous agitation and assume the inner and outer tranquillity of the Indian fakir. Then came the task of “filling” the empty consciousness—filling it completely with one intense and concentrated effort of will.

What echo would I bring forth from nothingness? What companionship would I seek here in my loneliness? What was the sign or symbol I desired? What symbolized to me the whole absent world of life and light?

DeGrat would laugh me to scorn if he but knew the concept that I chose. Yet I, the cynical, the jaded, the decadent, searched my soul, plumbed my longing, and found that which I most desired—a simple sign, a token of all the earth removed: a fresh and growing flower, a rose l

Yes, a simple rose is what I have sought—a rose, torn from its living stem, perfumed with the sweet incarnation of life itself. Seated here before the window I have dreamed, I have mused, I have then concentrated with every fibre of my being upon a rose.

My mind was filled with redness—not the redness of the sun upon the sea, or the redness of blood, but the rich and radiant redness of the rose. My soul was suffused with the scent of a rose: as I brought my faculties to bear exclusively upon the image, these walls fell away, the walls of my very flesh fell away, and I seemed to merge in the texture, the odour, the color, the actual essence of a rose.

Shall I write of this, the seventh day, when seated at the window as the sun emerged from the sea, I felt the commanding of my consciousness? Shall I write of rising, descending the stairs, opening the iron door at the base of the lighthouse and peering out at the billows that swirled at my very feet? Shall I write of stooping, of grasping, of holding?

Shall I write that I have indeed descended those iron stairs and returned here with my wave-borne trophy—that this very day, from waters two hundred miles distant from any shore, I have reached down and plucked a fresh rose?

Jan. 28. It has not withered! I keep it before me constantly in a vase on this table, and it is a priceless ruby plucked from dreams. It is real—as real as the howls of poor Neptune, who senses that something odd is afoot. His frantic barking does not disturb me; nothing disturbs me, for I am master of a power greater than earth or space or time. And I shall use this power, now, to bring me the final boon. Here in my tower I have become quite the philosopher: I have learned my lesson well and realize that I do not desire wealth, or fame, or the trinkets of society. My need is simply this—Companionship. And now, with the power that is mine to control, I shall have it!

Soon, quite soon, I shall no longer be alone!

Jan. 30. The storm has returned, but I pay it no heed; nor do I mark the howlings of Neptune, although the beast is now literally dashing himself against the door of the store-room. One might fancy that his efforts are responsible for the shuddering of the very lighthouse itself, but no; it is the fury of the Northern gale. I pay it no heed, as I say, but I fully realize that this storm surpasses in extent and intensity anything I could imagine as witness to its predecessor.

Yet it is unimportant; even though the light above me flickers and threatens to be extinguished by the sheer velocity of wind that seeps through these stout walls; even though the ocean sweeps against the foundations with a force that makes solid stone seem flimsy as straw; even though the sky is a single black roaring mouth that yawns low upon the horizon to engulf me.

These things I sense but dimly, as I address myself to the appointed task. I pause now only for food and a brief respite—and scribble down these words to mark the progress of resolution towards an inevitable goal.

For the past several days I have bent my faculties to my will, concentrating utterly and to the uttermost upon the summoning of a Companion.

This Companion will be—I confess it!—a woman; a woman far surpassing the limitations of common mortality. For she is, and must be fashioned, of dreams and longing, of desire and delight beyond the bounds of flesh.

She is the woman of whom I have always dreamed, the One I have sought in vain through what I once presumed, in my ignorance, was the world of reality. It seems to me now that I have always known her, that my soul has contained her presence forever. I can visualize her perfectly—I know her hair, each strand more precious than a miser's gold; the riches of her ivory and alabaster brow, the perfection of her face and form are etched forever in my consciousness. DeGrat would scoff that she is but the figment of a dream—but DeGrat did not see the rose.

The rose—I hesitate to speak of it—has gone. It was the rose which I set before me when first I composed myself to this new effort of will. I gazed at it intently until vision faded, senses stilled, and I lost myself in the attempt of conjuring up my vision of a Companion.

Hours later, the sound of rising waters from without aroused me. I gazed about, my eyes sought the reassurance of the rose and rested only upon a foulness. Where the rose had risen proudly in its vase, red crest rampant upon a living stem, I now perceived only a noxious, utterly detestable strand of ichorous decay. No rose this, but only seaweed; rotted, noisome and putrescent. I flung it away, but for long moments I could not banish a wild presentiment—was it true that I had deceived myself? Was it a weed, and only a weed I plucked from the ocean's breast? Did the force of my thought momentarily invest it with the attributes of a rose? Would anything I called up from the depths—the depths of sea or the depths of consciousness—be truly real?

The blessed image of the Companion came to soothe these fevered speculations, and I knew myself saved. There was a rose; perhaps my thought had created it and nourished it—only when my entire concentration turned to other things did it depart, or resume another shape. And with my Companion, there will be no need for focussing my faculties elsewhere. She, and she alone, will be the recipient of everything my mind, my heart, my soul possesses. If will, if sentiment, if love are needed to preserve her, these things she shall have in entirety. So there is nothing to fear. Nothing to fear. . . .

Once again now I shall lay my pen aside and return to the great task—the task of "creation", if you will—and I shall not fail. The fear (I admit it!) of loneliness is enough to drive me forward to unimaginable brinks. She, and she alone, can save me, shall save me, must save me! I can see her now—the golden glitter of her—and my consciousness calls to her to rise, to appear before me in radiant reality. Somewhere upon these storm-tossed seas she exists, I know it—and wherever she may be, my call will come to her and she will respond.

Jan. 31. The command came at midnight. Roused from the depths of the most profound innermost communion by a thunderclap, I rose as though in the grip of somnambulistic compulsion and moved down the spiral stairs.

The lantern I bore trembled in my hand; its light wavered in the wind, and the very iron treads beneath my feet shook with the furious force of the storm. The booming of the waves as they struck the lighthouse walls seemed to place me within the center of a maelstrom of ear-shattering sound, yet over the demoniacal din I could detect the frenzied howls of poor Neptune as I passed the door behind which he was confined. The door shook with the combined force of the wind and of his still desperate efforts to free himself—but I hastened on my way, descending to the iron door at the base of the lighthouse.

To open it required the use of both hands, and I set the lantern down at one side. To open it, moreover, required the summoning of a resolution I scarcely possessed—for beyond that door was the force and fury of the wildest storm that ever shrieked across these seething seas. A sudden wave might dash me from the doorway, or, conversely, enter and inundate the lighthouse itself.

But consciousness prevailed; consciousness drove me forward.

I knew, I thrilled to the certainty that she was without the iron portal—I unbolted the door with the urgency of one who rushes into the arms of his beloved.

The door swung open—blew open—roared open—and the storm burst upon me; a ravening monster of black-mouthed waves capped with white fangs. The sea and sky surged forward as if to attack, and I stood enveloped in Chaos. A flash of lightning revealed the immensity of utter Nightmare.

I saw it not, for the same flash illumined the form, the lineaments of she whom I sought.

Lightning and lantern were unneeded—her golden glory outshone all as she stood there, pale and trembling, a goddess arisen from the depths of the sea!

Hallucination, vision, apparition? My trembling fingers sought, and found, their answer. Her flesh was real—cold as the icy waters from whence she came, but palpable and permanent. I thought of the storm, of doomed ships and drowning men, of a girl cast upon the waters and struggling towards the succor of the lighthouse beacon. I thought of a thousand explanations, a thousand miracles, a thousand riddles or reasons beyond rationality. Yet only one thing mattered—my Companion was here, and I had but to step forward and take her in my arms.

No word was spoken, nor could one be heard in all that Inferno. No word was needed, for she smiled. Pale lips parted as I held out my arms, and she moved closer. Pale lips parted—and I saw the pointed teeth, set in rows like those of a shark. Her eyes, fishlike and staring, swam closer. As I recoiled, her arms came up to cling, and they were cold as the waters beneath, cold as the storm, cold as death.

In one monstrous moment I knew, knew with uttermost certainty, that the power of my will had indeed summoned, the call of my consciousness had been answered. But the answer came not from the living, for nothing lived in this storm. I had sent my will out over the waters, but the will penetrates all dimensions, and my answer had come from below the waters. She was from below, where the drowned dead lie dreaming, and I had awakened her and clothed her with a horrid life. A life that thirsted, and must drink. . . .

I think I shrieked, then, but I heard no sound. Certainly, I did not hear the howls from Neptune as the beast, burst from his prison, bounded down the stairs and flung himself upon the creature.

His furry form bore her back and obscured my vision; in an instant she was falling backwards, away, into the sea that spawned her. Then, and only then, did I catch a glimpse of the final moment of animation in that which my consciousness had summoned. Lightning seared the sight inexorably upon my soul—the sight of the ultimate blasphemy I had created in my pride. The rose had wilted. . . .

The rose had wilted and become seaweed. And now, the golden one was gone and in its place was the bloated, swollen obscenity of a thing long-drowned and dead, risen from the slime and to that slime returning.

Only a moment, and then the waves overwhelmed it, bore it back into the blackness. Only a moment, and the door was slammed shut. Only a moment, and I raced up the iron stairs, Neptune yammering at my heels. Only a moment, and I reached the safety of this sanctuary.

Safety? There is no safety in the universe for me, no safety in a consciousness that could create such horror. And there is no safety here—the wrath of the waves increases with every moment, the anger of the sea and its creatures rises to an inevitable crescendo.

Mad or sane, it does not matter, for the end is the same in either case. I know now that the lighthouse will shatter and fall. I am already shattered, and must fall with it.

There is time only to gather these notes, strap them securely in a cylinder and attach it to Neptune's collar. It may be that he can swim, or cling to a fragment of debris. It may be that a ship, passing by this toppling beacon, may stay and search the waters for a sign—and thus find and rescue the gallant beast.

That ship shall not find me. I go with the lighthouse and go willingly, down to the dark depths. Perhaps—is it but perverted poetry?—I shall join my Companion there forever. Perhaps . . .

The lighthouse is trembling.

The beacon flickers above my head and I hear the rush of waters in their final onslaught. There is—yes—a wave, bearing down upon me. It is higher than the tower, it blots out the sky itself, everything. . . .

The Proxy Head

Every time there is a lull in the news, the newspapers begin highlighting the reports of strange objects and "flying saucers seen in the skies, and embellish their stories with wild conjectures as to the existence of these objects, their possible origin and their purpose. A most popular theory suggests that they are extraterrestrial observers. Actually, a really intelligent nonhuman race might have means of getting their information a lot closer to the source and with great authenticity. Consider Mr. Bloch's views on the possibility.

THE TALL YOUNG MAN stalked through the hotel lobby and headed for a door marked MEN.

Once inside the washroom he stood indecisively for a moment, then went over to a cubicle and deposited a nickel. The door swung open.

He entered, shut the door, listened to the click.

The click echoed a different click . . . click . . . click . . .

The tall young man reached up, removed his wig, and opened the top of his head.

He stood there, concealed in the cubicle, and his long slim fingers worked with the precision of delicate instruments. They made certain adjustments inside his skull, testing and setting and manipulating.

Sonic a little off, he registered. Visio good but sonic reception poor. The street-noises tended to knock out the adjustment, sometimes. Change blueprints on next model, he registered. Allow wider range of compensation.

Vibrationary reception worked perfectly, though. The orders from the control vessel came through constantly and with no interference. He knew what he had done, what he was doing, what he must do at all times.

His instrument-fingers completed their work inside his cranium. For the final check, he pressed the voice-box and uttered a few experimental sounds. A cough, a sigh. The noises echoed in the hollow washroom. Perfect.

Satisfied, he closed the slot in his head and carefully adjusted the wig once more. It was a handsome wig—real human hair, blond and wavy. He didn't know were the Hostiles had acquired it; probably from the raiding expedition last month when they came down to the desert and picked up those three men. What were they called?

Prospectors. The message came through vibrationary reception immediately. That reassured him. His guardians were with him every minute, watching him and guiding him. They knew men, studied men, and would supply him with whatever information and instructions he needed under any circumstances. They were exactly aware of what they were doing at all times.

Although the Alien roboteers were in the ship, a hundred miles no, they would always be with him through the medium of the vibrationary receptor built into his body.

The young man smiled. Rubberized, synthetic epidermal tissue, carefully coated with plastic, responded instantly. The pseudo-lips parted, disclosing the gleaming perfection of false teeth. A soundless mechanism simulated muscular action. The smile, like everything else about the young man, was perfect.

A great surge of confidence came to him through the receptor. The Hostiles were proud of him, proud of their work. And well they might be. Wasn't he entirely their creation? Hadn't they studied human anatomy, duplicated it perfectly and with utmost cunning? He could go anywhere, do anything, and never be suspected.

Never be suspected. That was the big thing. A spy must be careful.

That was part of the receptor's work, of course. To he careful for him. He was a mere machine. His consciousness was itself an illusion; actually he was only a highly evolved and complicated sending-receiving-registering mechanism. The combination gave him, in the aggregate, a sort of individuality, but it was neither necessary nor important.

Like the consciousness of men. That wasn't important, either. Stupid, imperfect men—how simple it was to deceive them! His creators, up there in the ship, knew just how to do that. Men are easy to fool. Yon can do anything you please on this planet if you know how.

Last night, when he was dropped, for example—dropped in an adaptation of mankind's own "parachute." He was given no conditioning or instructions; all he had to do was follow the orders and impulses coming through the receptor.

He'd landed in a condition described as—?

Naked, The word was supplied to him immediately (they knew everything, everything).

He landed naked. That is to say, without the customary body-covering. According to the rules of mankind, this was wrong. He'd be noticed. So the receptors sent him into the city under the cover of darkness. Told him how to skulk, to hide, to creep ever so cautiously up to the window of the clothing store on the dark, deserted street. And the receptors guided him so that he used his brand-new body to smash the window, smash the sign reading, money to loan—we buy and sell. And he found the clothing, put it on. Mechanical fingers mastered the new intricacies of dressing, of putting on shoes and tying a tie.

That would have looked odd to men, if there were one around to see. A life-size mechanical doll, dressing itself in a pawnshop . . . grotesque—frightening.

The receptor interrupted, now. You mustn't frighten them, it communicated. Not unless ordered. You are to be quiet. Do nothing to attract attention. Your job is to observe, react, record. That is all. And remember the dangers.

Remember the dangers?

It was hard for his mechanism to translate "remember" into a process and "dangers" into a realized phenomenon. He stood there in the dark cubicle and waited for awareness to come. It came.

Hastily, he backed away from the bowl. That was one of the dangers. Water. Water and oil and any liquid. His eyes, his nostrils, his mouth, the aperture under the wig must be protected from moisture. Even dampness would destroy the delicate balance that enabled him to function.

There would be no rain for forty-eight hours. That was known. No danger there. But he must avoid moisture.

He looked down at the water in the bowl. It looked so harmless, but it was dangerous. Dangerous to him. Not to the Hostiles. They had no such makeups to have to protect. For them, this planet was quite suitable. They had waited and watched and experimented and spied for a long, long time now, until certain that everything would be ideal here.

All that remained was to assess and analyze the present occupants—mankind. Mankind was many, and the Hostiles were few. The single ship possessed potential power and they could do almost anything, but the sheer weight of numbers promised victory to mankind, provided that mankind was ready to exist.

That was his job, now. To react and record. To move among men and assess them, analyze their—psychology, the word came from the receptor, together with a complete file of meaning.

He would spy on men. He would determine, or rather, the Hostiles would determine through him, whether mankind would resist a sudden surprise attack. Were men aggressive enough to put up determined resistance—or, as they presently surmised, would mankind flee from unknown terrors in blind panic?

It would not take long to find out, now. The ship was up there, ready. They were ready. And he was ready. Ready to go out, to react and record.

HE LEFT THE CUBICLE. There was water in the outer washroom, but he avoided it. He avoided strong lights, too, as directed; he had to avoid places and situations where he'd be expected to—what was it?—eat and sleep. Yes, and he must not touch anyone or he touched. He knew these things, and many more.

The receptor guided and directed him. It did not furnish explanations until necessary. Then explanations and proper reaction-patterns were instantly available.

Right now, for example, in the pocket of his suit-coat was a silver object. He had been directed to put it there last night when he broke into the pawnshop. He didn't comprehend why. He had been given no further instructions or orders. Those would come when needed.

He walked across the deserted washroom.

Then the door opened. Two men came in. A fat old man and a thin young man. (Old and young; he knew about that, how to recognize and distinguish all physical types.) They looked at him with the blank impersonality, almost as if they knew that he was a machine, and continued their conversation.

The communication came to him.

Walk over to them.

He walked, heels clicking hollowly on the washroom floor.

Put your right hand in your pocket.

The hand moved on its errand.

Pull out the object and display it.

The hand came out.

Speak as directed, soft voice.

He said, "Put up your hands!"

They looked at him, eyes goggling in sudden shock. The older man said, “Look, he’s got a gun!” They raised their hands.

Get their money.

The communicator told him what money was, its appearance and purpose as a medium of exchange; in a single instant, all of the data on currency was transmitted to him.

And at the same time, the communicator directed him to get the money; told him how to search their pockets, how to find wallets and loose change.

He got the money quickly, visio functioning and sonic on, in case of interruptions. But there were no interruptions. The two men stood there, breathing heavily, eyes fixed on the gun in his right hand as his left hand moved inside their pockets.

For one paradoxical moment, the two humans were standing like machines while he was animate, purposeful, alive. Their roles were reversed.

Something made a calculation, observed their reactions and estimated. The message came. They are afraid of you. This is fear. This is what to look for in men. Find fear. And when he came into their aura, when his pneumatic fingers touched them, instantly another mechanism located where a stomach would normally be, caught and recorded their respiration-rate, their pulse-rate, the delicate glandular reactions. This was fear. He would recognize it in the future.

Commands came to him and he carried out orders. He told the men to remove their trousers. He deposited another nickel, herded them into a cubicle and slammed it shut. He opened the washroom window and dropped the trousers into the outer, empty courtyard.

Then he left the washroom. The money jingled in his pocket, and the bills rustled against his chest. He walked quickly out of the hotel.

It was getting dark (a lengthy astronomical explanation was flashed to him so that he’d understand) and he had duties to perform.

He made a handsome figure as he strode down the street, tall, blond, youthfully erect, walking stiffly and confidently. Men stepped aside as he marched forward, and women turned their heads. A girl remarked to her friend—"I sure would like to know where they make guys like that."

But there was no room for humor, or irony, or any temperament whatsoever. He had duties to perform. They were to react and record.

Up above, in the ship, a complicated apparatus traced his progress through the streets. A disc recorded the sound which his sonic detected. A screen flashed the sight encompassed by his visio. What he heard, the Hostiles heard. What he saw, they also saw. They guided him now.

Something in his chest, where a heart would normally be, pulsed a warning of Danger.

They noted it, up in the ship, watching the street before him. He got orders. Off the street. Dampness. Humidity count rising. Hurry.

Yes. The legs moved slowly, and visio blurred a bit. And now he was nearing the place he was directed to find.

A large, brilliantly-lighted building. Signs out in front. He recorded, rather than read. FIGHTS TONIGHT.

Crowds, milling and pushing.

Don't touch anyone. Don't let them touch you.

He was to buy a ticket. Automatically, he knew what buying was, what tickets were, the entire procedure.

The voice came from inside, and he said, "One, please" and pushed the money forward.

The girl in the box-office (that was hard to comprehend, box-office: no data available on the term, but no matter) gave him a smile, a ticket and some change. It tinkled out of a slot and he stood there, waiting, until the communicator directed him to pick it up.

Then he went into the arena. Carefully, he avoided physical contact with the crowd. Somebody took his ticket, tore it in half, gave him a stub. Somebody else guided him to a seat.

Sit down. People were sitting down. That was a curious concept, although he understood. People had to eat and drink and eliminate and sleep and rest. Their bodies demanded constant care and accommodation. They sat down, they relaxed, they turned off part of their functions and turned on another.

That's what was wrong with people. They were imperfect. Not permanently functional. People became sick and had accidents, while he on the other hand operated perfectly. Eventually, all people died. But he wouldn't let anyone turn him off!

Yes, they were weak and imperfect and that is why people would be easy to overcome. The Hostiles knew. And his job was to corroborate by watching.

So he sat there and watched. The lights blazed in the ring, and the announcer bawled and the referee climbed through the ropes. And then two men, naked except for trunks, appeared in corners. (Corners in a ring—mathematical concept awry: no data. Just observe.)

He observed. He registered the howling of the humans around him. He registered shrieks and yells, and deep inside he registered the mass aura of the crowd.

The two men in the ring began to hit at one another with gloved hands. One of them started to bleed at the nose. Blood meant injury. And the crowd, with one great voice, yelled "Kill him!"

He knew what kill meant. It meant what the Hostiles would do when they took over. And here humanity paid money (which was valued) to watch two people attempt to kill each other.

He reacted and recorded as the fight went on. Up in the ship, they computed. And their computations reached him.

These were average specimens of mature humankind. Old, young, male, female, rich, poor. And they were animals, suddenly swayed by fear, hate. Mass impulses gripped them completely. Mass reactions were easily registered. It would not be difficult to instill mass panic into such as these. So far the findings were favorable.

The fight was only in the second round (round—no data, apparently an arbitrary time-interval for this activity) when the signal came for him to leave.

He stood up and made his way out. It was hard to avoid contact with human knees and feet. Eyes stared at him curiously for a moment, then returned to the spectacle in the ring. From over the arena came the registered intensity of mass excitement, of hysteria, of illogical emotional reaction. It pleased them in the ship. But they were careful. They were going to check further. He had other duties to perform.

IT WAS STILL EARLY in the evening when the tall, blond young man came out on the street once more. The humidity count was not dangerous to the mechanisms operating inside the slotted skull. The mouth was closed, the nostril-openings protected, the artificial irises contracted. And the synthetic body moved perfectly.

Meanwhile, in the ship, his creators were calculating quickly and constantly upon the basis of his observations. Mature adults, as they styled themselves, would not be a problem—if a fear-reaction could be properly provoked. There was one danger; an aggressive reaction might be aroused, and then there would be mass resistance. Plans were laid and co-ordinated accordingly. But mature adults constituted only a portion of humanity. There were many old people.

Old people—

He was being directed, now. Directed to the park. Here in the warmth of an early spring evening, people were strolling. And here was—Danger!

Just in time, the Hostiles caught it and he caught it. He stepped back from the sidewalk, flattened against the doorway of a building as the huge machine lumbered down the street, spraying water against the curbing.

Water-sprinkler. Avoid. Danger.

He was safe, again. He continued, turned into the park path. Old people were here.

Old people; lame, halt, blind. Aged and infirm. They huddled on benches, they stood and sat and shuffled around in the world of nothing-to-do-but-wait-for-the-end.

And many of them were clustered around the soap-box speaker near the deserted bandstand. He was pouring it on.

He stood close, but not too close. The phrases registered, although the meaning was not clear until the communicators sent along data. Something about “pension plan . . . can’t earn a living . . . work hard all your life and die in poverty . . . wrong system . . . legislation . . . I’m old and you’re old . . . what can we do?”

The speaker was old; old and ragged. He spoke with fervor, and the fervor was recorded. The crowd of elderly people reacted, and the reaction was recorded. The reaction was that of the two men in the washroom—it was fear.

That’s what he was looking for—fear. And he felt it here. The old people, all of them, were afraid. Afraid of their future. Afraid of death. Old people afraid was duly registered.

And one hundred miles away, one hundred miles straight up, a sort of bodiless glee hummed inside the odd ship.

The Hostiles sent him walking on, then, down the street, into the bright lights. Then they put the most delicate of all devices into operation—selective recording apparatus that could beam in on individual passers-by.

It was a mechanical-chemical synthesis, it was telepathy and psychoanalysis combined, and raised to the highest power.

All kinds of people, thinking: Wonder if I will get two weeks notice today for so much sick leave . . .

God, but I’m sick and tired of working. Work, work, work . . .

Let’s see, it’s almost the first of the month. Time for the bills . . .

What will Peter say when he sees my new hat. He’ll murder me . . .

Guess I’ll stop in for a drink on the way home. I sure need one . . .

All shades of feelings and emotions. Boredom, fatigue, complacency, hope, chagrin, despair, panic, hysteria. And keening through all of it, in wave after wave—fear. Partial awareness, partial functioning, and all because of fear. Everywhere spread fear.

Up in the ship, they had data on fear, data gathered over many months, many years of observation. He wasn't the first spy. They were careful, because there would be only one chance to. use weapons, only one chance to strike. It must come, could come, at only the exactly proper moment. And the moment was—probably, almost certainly—now.

The data was reviewed, re-evaluated. Surprising data, some of it. Orson Welles . . . atomic bomb . . . communism . . . flying saucers . . . inflation . . . depression . . . war . . . strikes . . . incidence of psychotic disorder . . . juvenile delinquency . . .

The Hostiles checked that source now. Youth. He had another errand to perform. Plans were almost ready to go into operation, but there was this final survey to make. It would be made right now, tonight.

He clattered down the street. The neon lights reflected from his waxy, too-handsome face. His too-perfect features, his window-dummy smile seemed oddly artificial. But nobody noticed him. Humans took everything for granted; they were completely wrapped up in their own thoughts, their own fears.

Something began to hum, audibly, inside his chest, up near the shoulder-blades in the back.

The Hostiles caught it. He marched into an alley, groped into a dark, deserted areaway. A cat saw him and suddenly arched its back, snarled and spat.

Animals were aware. They knew what he was. But that didn't matter. Animals would be destroyed, along with the human animals, when the Hostiles came.

He didn't wonder about what would happen when they came. He knew. They might assume bodies like his, for a while—because those bodies could easily function in the present mechanical pattern of this planet. But once the buildings came down, once the crude human-built machines were replaced by their products of science, old bodies would be discarded in favor of improved ones. He would be discarded, too, of course.

But it didn't matter. He felt no emotion concerning this, because they hadn't provided him with emotion. He could contemplate his own extinction with the same lack of reaction with which he contemplated, now, the extinction of two billion, four hundred and seventy-four million human beings and all their animals. Yes, animals, birds, reptiles and insects. (Balance of Nature: data, an anthropomorphic myth. New pattern of survival already set up. Human and animal life unnecessary.)

The cat howled and fled. He stood in the darkness and his hands opened the slot in his skull under the wig. A tiny wire had jarred loose. He adjusted it as directed. Everything was so delicate. The slightest jar, the slightest moisture might cause complete malfunction. Dangerous. But only one task more, now, and he could be safely discarded. The Hostiles would come. One task more.

The handsome young man walked out of the alley and headed for the Penny Arcade. It was out near the beach, on a pier.

It was noisy, very noisy. Inside the young man's head the machinery hummed, made minute, instantaneous adjustments in sonic reception.

The lights glared and dazzled. Visio accommodated to the glitter.

And he began to react and record.

This was the haunt of youth. The young people were all around; giggling, laughing, shouting, pushing, shoving. They draped across the counter of the soda-fountain. They put nickels into juke-boxes, dimes into automatic games, quarters into self-photographing booths. They riffled the pages of comic books and magazines.

He registered something on visio that caused the Hostiles to take heed. Some words about "science-fiction" and a colored picture of a vessel. It was crude, but there was a vague, recognizable similarity between the unknown artist's concept and the actual vessel that poised one hundred miles above.

React and record. There was no fear here. Receptor mechanisms searched for it, but could not find it. Even out here in the arcade on the end of the pier, near the water. The rear of the arcade had a rickety balcony, and the dark water of the lake swirled directly below it. But these young people were not afraid.

Of course not; they were human, and humans did not dread moisture. But what about the other fears? Illness, poverty, death? The receptors searched.

No. Youth was not afraid.

UP IN THE SHIP they calculated. So many millions and so many millions in this particular age-group. Physical characteristics thus and so. Enough of a menace to forestall attack? Perhaps, if they were not afraid. But they were human, and the human is susceptible to panic. Particularly when confronted with surprise elements, with the unknown. Fear of the unknown. That might he the key. Investigate.

They sent him closer to the group at the end of the pier, at the magazine-stand. He stood there quite silently and inconspicuously.

All around him was the noisy neon fantasy of humanity at play. Below the pier was an amusement park where roller-coasters swooped and soared and shuddered down; where papier-mâché monsters goggled in the glitter of torchlight; where fantastically-costumed clowns and freaks grimaced at the crowds. Weird architecture, crazy lighting, and exhortations of barkers blended into a complete illusion of unreality.

And here, too, in the Penny Arcade, where the machines clanged, the air of unreality persisted. Teenagers in their curious costumes, milled and thronged. Their speech-pattern was oddly filled with “cool” and “extremely George” and the later neologisms.

So that he, standing there in his conservative suit, appeared quite normal in contrast—he was, in appearance, utterly real. He was real and the softly sounding waters without were real. There was a definite dampness in the air, and his vision blurred momentarily. Then the Hostiles made some adjustments.

The tall young man walked over toward the group of youngsters near the magazine-stand. Their conversation flowed casually, loudly, erratically. Their statements were positive, eager, exaggerated.

No fear. But no menace here, either. They were only children in the bodies of near-adults. Bobby-socks and blue-jeans and leather jackets and beanies formed a pattern of immaturity, of over-emotional self-dramatization.

“Here’s a new one.” A skinny lad held up the magazine with the space-ship on its cover. “Lend me a quarter, Marty. I want to buy this.”

Marty wore glasses. He was trying to grow a mustache; a brave effort begun too soon. “Haven’t got it, Dave.”

Dave turned to the two girls. “Come on, you two—fork over! You owe me two bits from the ferris wheel. Make with the moola, Bea.”

The taller of the two girls giggled. “Cool your heels! Ask Pat.” The skinny youth went up to the shorter girl and pretended to talk out of the side of his mouth. “Come on, sister—let’s have it.” He grasped her arm, and she pulled away. His hand went to his jacket pocket, emerged.

For a moment the observer flinched. The youth had a gun. Like his gun. But no—the communicator estimated—it was only a toy.

Only a toy. They were children. They knew no fear, but in turn there was no need to fear them. Overgrown children.

Up above, they were satisfied.

The four young people scuffled good-naturedly before the magazine rack. The skinny boy still wanted his magazine. The taller girl protested. “You and your science-fiction! All you guys are gone on that kick. You have enough magazines!”

“But it’s a new book, I want to see who’s in it!”

“I’m weepin’ for ya!” The magazine went back on the rack.

“Come on, let’s see it.” Marty grabbed at Dave’s beanie and was threatened with the toy gun.

The spy watched, waited for the command to come; waited to turn away, his mission completed.

Instead, the communicator ordered him, “Pick up the magazine.”

He walked over, reached between the scufflers, took the magazine from its place. The Hostiles were curious. They wanted his visio to inspect the contents, see what puerile pseudo-science could possibly appeal to these immature minds.

“Hey, wait a minute, mister!” The taller girl, Bea, was protesting. “That’s our magazine!”

“Yeah, it’s ours. What’s the score?” This from bespectacled Marty.

He did not find words, for words were not supplied. He reached in his pocket. Pay for it. The cashier takes money, over there.

He turned away without answering. He was quiet, his face was calm, there was no indication of concern.

The boy called Dave grabbed his arm. “Now, listen, Mister—give us back our magazine.”

He was angry. All four of them were angry, and despite their previous scuffling, suddenly united. Something new was communicated to the receptors—determination.

A signal now came to the spy: Don’t answer. Go away. Quickly.

But now Marty took hold of his arm. He had to get away, he had to move back. He stepped hack cautiously, stopped as the four surrounded him. Dave was waving his little toy gun, and they were all yammering idiotically. Stupid human reactions, but he must be careful.

The message came. Give them the magazine and get out.

He raised his hand, extending the magazine. But Pat was excited, angry. She yelled, “Let him have it, Dave!”

And suddenly Dave leveled his ridiculous, childish weapon.

He pulled the trigger.

A stream of water shot out and hit the handsome young man in the face. It flooded his eyes, entered the opened mouth. He turned—everything was blurred—and as they laughed and shouted, another stream of water caught him squarely on the back of the neck. It saturated the wig, trickled through the slot.

Something flashed through the receptors but he lost contact. Moisture—dampness—wet—once you ceased to function it was forever! His damaged communicator sent out the same message he'd received from humans. He wasn't human, he was only a machine, but the message was plain.

Stark, utter fear.

A hundred miles away, the Hostiles saw and sensed. In a moment the computations were revised, conclusions drawn, a course of action chosen. They could attack, but youth would not fear them. And science or pseudo-science, somebody would discover the water weapon. No, this was not the time. Accept defeat and go. The curious vessel lifted suddenly, accelerated to incredible speed, was gone.

On the pier, the magazine slipped from a plastic-pneumatic grip. Instrument-hands rose to cover the dripping face.

The youngsters paid no attention. They bent and scrambled for the gaudy book, with no thought for the handsome young man. Their attention was easily diverted—humans were just like animals. Unconquerable animals.

He turned and staggered away. There was a peculiar lurch to his gait. He couldn't see. Drops of water were eating away inside his skull. Circuits disintegrated. Visio and sonic mingled in a roaring blur of vivid color and sound. Red noises and howling darkness.

If he could only wipe the droplets out of the slot, The Hostiles were gone. It was so hard to move! He tried. As he stumbled out of the Penny Arcade on to the railing walk of the pier's end, the youngsters caught one last glimpse of him; both hands raised and fumbling at the back of his head.

Then he was gone. They didn't see him hit the railing in his blindness, didn't hear the wood give way, didn't hear the splash as he—disordered, discarded machinery—tumbled into the obliterating waves below.

"What was the matter with him?" Dave asked. "I wouldn't of let him have it if I knew he'd take it so big."

"Aw, forget it!" Marty counseled. "So you made like Buck Rogers with a zap-gun and he got sore. Some people haven't got any sense of humor."

“Check,” said Bea. “And people without a sense of humor aren’t human!”

“Yeah,” Pat sighed as they turned to open the magazine. “He looked like he was ready to blow his top!”

Constant Reader

Dale liked to read, so he brought along books—nice, safe books.

ONCE upon a time they were called straitjackets. When you put one on, you were "in restraint" according to the polite psychiatric jargon of the day. I know, because I've read all about it in books. Yes, real books, the old-fashioned kind that were printed on paper and bound together between leather or board covers. They're still available in some libraries, Earthside, and I've read a lot of them. As a matter of fact, I own quite a collection myself. It's a peculiar hobby, but I enjoy it much more than telo-learning or going to the sensorals.

Consequently I admit I'm a little bit maladjusted, according to those same psychiatric texts I mentioned. That's the only possible explanation of why I enjoy reading, and why I pick up so many odd items of useless information.

This business about straitjackets and restraint, for example. All I ever got out of it was a peculiar feeling whenever we hit grav. on a Rec. Flight.

I got it again, now, as Penner yelled, "Act alert, Dale—put down that toy and strap up!"

I dropped my book and went over to the Sighter Post. Already I could feel the preliminary pull despite the neutralizer's efforts. I strapped up and hung there in my cocoon, hung there in my straitjacket.

There I was, nicely in restraint, in our own little private asylum—Scout #3890-R, two months out of Home Port 19/1, and now approaching 68/5 planet for Reconnaissance.

Before looking out of the Sighter, I took another glance at my fellow inmates. Penner, Acting Chief, Temp., was strapped in at Mechontrol; all I could see of him was the broad back, the bullet head bent in monomaniac concentration. Swanson, Astrog., 2nd Class, hung at his side, cakeknife nose in profile over the Obsetape. Little Morse, Tech., was stationed at my left and old Levy, Eng., hung to my right. All present and accounted for: Penner, Swanson, Morse, Levy—and myself, George Dale, Constant Reader and erstwhile Service Observer, hanging in his straitjacket after two months in a floating madhouse.

Two months of anything is a long time. Two months of Rec. Flight is an eternity. Being cooped up with four other men in a single compartment for that length of time is no picnic, and our strait-jackets seemed singularly appropriate.

Not that any of us were actually psycho; all of us had a long record of similar missions, and we had managed to survive. But the sheer monotony had worn us down.

I suppose that's why Service gave us the extra seven pounds per man—Lux. Allotment, it was called. But the so-called luxuries turn out to be necessities after all. Swanson usually put his poundage into solid food; candy, and the like. Chocolate capsules kept him sane. Morse and Levy went in for games—cards, dice, superchess and the necessary boards. Penner, amazingly enough, did sketching on pads of oldfashioned paper. And I had this habit of my own—I always managed to bring three or four books within the weight limit.

I still think my choice was the best; candy-munching, freehand sketching and the delights of dicing and superchessmanship palled quickly enough on my four companions. But the books kept me interested. I had a peculiar background—learned to read as a child rather than as an adult—and I guess that's why I derived such queer satisfaction from my hobby.

Naturally, the others laughed at me. Naturally, we got on each other's nerves, quarreled and fretted and flared up. But now, resting quietly in our straitjackets as we entered grav., a measure of sanity returned. With it came anticipation and expectation.

We were approaching 68/5 planet.

New worlds to conquer? Not exactly. It was a new world, and therein lay the expectation. But we weren't out to conquer; we on Rec. Flight merely observed and recorded. Or, rather, our instruments recorded.

At the moment we slid in on Mechontrol, about five hundred miles above the surface. 68/5 was small, cloud-wreathed; it had atmosphere apparently, as did its companions. Now we were moving closer and we peered through the Sighters at a dull, flat surface that seemed to be rushing toward us at accelerating speed.

"Pretty old," little Morse grunted. "No mountains, and no water, either—dried up, I guess."

"No life." This from old Levy. "That's a relief." Levy was what the books would have called a misanthrope. Although his mis wasn't confined to anthropes. He seemed to have a congenital aversion to everything that wasn't strictly mechanical—why he didn't stick to robotics, I'll never know.

We came down faster. Fifty miles, forty, thirty. I saw Swanson making arrangements to drop the roboship. Penner gave the signal as he righted us above the surface. The roboship glided away, guided by Swanson at the Obsetape. It drifted down, down, down. We followed slowly, dropping below the cloud barrier and following it closely.

"Hit!" snapped Swanson. "Right on the button." We waited while the roboship did its job. It was our star reporter, our roving photographer, our official meteorologist, our staff geologist, our expert in anthropology and mineralogy, our trusted guide and—most important, on many occasions—our stalking-horse.

If there was life present on a planet, the landing of the roboship generally brought it forth. If there was death on a planet, the roboship found it for us. And always, it recorded. It was, in a way, a complete expedition encapsulated, a non-human functional without the human capability of error or terror.

Now it went into action, cruising over the surface, directed by Swanson's delicate manipulation of the Obsetape unit controls. We waited patiently, then impatiently. An hour passed, two hours.

"Bring it in!" Penner ordered. Swanson moved his fingers and the roboship returned.

Penner snapped on the Temporary Balance. "Everybody unstrap," he said. "Let's take a look!"

We went down the ramp to the lower deck and Swanson opened the roboship. The photos were ready, the tapes were spooled. We were busy with findings for another hour. At the end of that time we had all the preliminary data necessary on 68/5 planet.

Oxygen content high. Gravity similar to Earthside—as seemed constant in this particular sector and system. No detectable life-forms. But life had existed here, once, and life of a high order. The photos proved that. City ruins galore.

And the planet was old. No doubt about that. Morse had been right; mountains were worn away to dust, and the dust did not support vegetable life. Strange that the oxygen content was still so high. I'd have supposed that carbonization—

"Let's snap out," Penner said. "We don't need Temporary Balance or straps according to the gravity reading. Might as well go in for a landing right away. The day-cycle here is 20.1 hours—computer gives us a good 5 hours to go, right now. So we can all take a look around."

We filed back upstairs and Swanson brought us in.

IT WAS only a dead planet, a desert of dust without trees or grass or water; a flat, slate-colored surface where everything was the same, same, same. But it was solid; you could put your feet down on it, you could walk across the sand for miles and feel the air flow against your face.

And there were ruins to explore. That might be interesting. At least, it was a change.

I could feel the tension and excitement mount; it was as palpable as the momentary shock and shudder of landing. We crowded around the lock, struggling out of our suits and putting on the light plastikoids, buckling on the gear and weapons as prescribed by regulation. Morse handed us our equipment and we zipped and strapped and adjusted in a frenzy of impatience. Even Penner was eager, but he remembered to grab his sketch-pad before the lock was opened.

Normally, I suppose he would have insisted on maintaining a watch on board, but in the absence of life it didn't really matter. And after two months, everybody wanted out.

The lock opened. The ladder went down. We inhaled, deeply, turned our faces to the warmth of the distant orange sun.

"Single file—keep together!" Penner cautioned.

It's the last day of school, and dismissal is sounded, and the boys rush out onto the playground. So the teacher warns, "Single file—keep together!" and what happens?

Just what happened now. In a moment we were racing across the soft sand, grinning and tossing handfuls of the fine grains high into the clean, dry air. We ran across the brand new world on our brand new legs.

We moved in the direction we couldn't help thinking of as west—because the orange sun hung there and we turned to the sun as naturally as flowers recently transplanted from a hothouse.

We moved buoyantly and joyfully and freely, for this was vacation and picnic and release from the asylum all in one. The smiles on the faces of my companions bespoke euphoria. It was all good: the gritty, sliding sand under our feet, the pumping of legs in long strides, the grinding ball-and-socket action of the hips, the swinging of arms, the rise and fall of the chest, the lungs greedily gasping in and squandering recklessly, the eye seeing far, far away. Yes, it was good to be here, good to be alive, good to be free.

Once again we measured minutes in terms of movements, rather than abstract units of time-passage we must endure. Once again we consciously heightened our awareness of existence, rather than dulled it to make life bearable.

It seemed to me that I'd never felt so completely alive, but I was wrong. I was wrong, because I didn't notice the blackout.

None of us were aware of it: even now, I can't begin to comprehend it. I don't know what happened. It was just that—blackout.

Before it happened, we marched toward the sun—Penner, Swanson and Morse a little in the lead, Levy and I a pace or two behind, all of us trudging up a slight incline in the sand.

And then, without any seeming transition at all, we were marching in darkness—Penner, Swanson, Morse, Levy and I in a solid group, trudging down into a valley.

"What happened?"

"Eclipse?"

"Where's the sun?"

"Where are we?"

"How long we been walking? I feel like I passed out!"

We halted and exchanged comments.

"Something wrong here. We're going back. Get out the beamers." Penner issued orders swiftly.

We broke out the beamers, adjusted the slow-strobes, put pathways of light before us. There was nothing to see but slaty sand. Only Swanson's bearings with the scope guided us in retracing our steps. We moved swiftly through the pall of a purple night. A mist shrouded the stars; a mist mantled our memories.

That's when we compared notes, realized for the first time that the phenomenon had occurred to all of us simultaneously. Gas, shock, temporary dislocation—we argued about the cause for hours, and all the while we marched on the alert, up hummocks and down into little valleys between the dunes.

And we were tired. Unused muscles strained, hearts pumped, feet blistered. And still we marched. I was hungry and thirsty; more than that, I was puzzled and a little bit afraid. I didn't understand just what had happened—how could we, all of us, go on walking that way while we were out on our feet? How could we lose almost four hours? And what did it mean?

At the moment we were in no danger of being lost, and it was more and more obvious that this planet contained no life, hostile or otherwise. But why the blackout? It puzzled me, puzzled all of us.

Swanson took the lead. His beadlike profile loomed on a rise in my beamer's path. He turned and yelled, "I can see the ship now!"

We toiled up the slope and joined him. Yes, the ship was there, snug and safe and secure, and the adventure was over.

Or—was it?

"Look down there!" Levy swivelled his beamer to the left. "We must have missed it on the way out."

Five rays played, pooled, pointed in a single beam. Five rays found, focused and flooded upon the objects rising from the sand. And then we were all running together toward the ruins.

Just before we reached them, Penner yelled, "Stop!"

"What's wrong?" I said.

"Nothing—maybe. Then again, you never know. That blackout bothers me." Penner put his hand on my shoulder. "Look, Dale, I want you and Morse to go back to the ship and wait. The three of us will take a trip through the ruins. But I want at least two men on ship at all times, in case there's any trouble. Go ahead, now—we won't move until we see you're on board. Flash us a signal to let us know everything's all right when you get there."

Morse and I trudged off.

"Just my luck." Little Morse grumbled under his breath and waved his beamer in disgust. "Run around for hours in the sand and then when we finally hit something it's back to the ship. Huh!"

"He's right, though," I answered. "Got to be careful. And besides, we can eat and take our shoes off."

"But I want to see those ruins. I promised my girl some souvenirs—"

"Tomorrow we'll probably get our turn," I reminded him. He shrugged and plodded on. We reached the ship, boarded, and took a quick look around. All clear.

Morse went over to the panel and pushed the blinker. Then we sat down next to the Sighter and stared out. All we could see at this distance was a purple blur, through which three beams moved and wavered.

I opened foodcaps and we swallowed, still straining to see. The lights moved separately at first, then coalesced into a single unit.

"Must have found something," Morse speculated. "Wonder what?"

"We'll find out soon enough," I predicted.

BUT they didn't come back, and they didn't come back—we sat for hours, waiting.

Finally the beams moved our way. We were waiting as Penner, Swanson and Levy boarded. An excited babble wavered into words and the words became sentences.

"Never saw anything like them—"

"Smaller than dwarfs; couldn't be, but I'd swear they were human."

"Gets me is the way they disappeared, just like somebody had scooped them all up at once."

"Wasn't their city, I'm sure of that. First of all, it was ages old, and secondly it wasn't built to their size-scale at all—"

"Think we just imagined the whole thing? That blackout was peculiar enough, and then, seeing them this way—

I raised my voice. "What's all this about? What did you find?" The answer was more babbling in unison, until Penner signalled for silence.

"See what you make of this, Dale," he said. He pulled out his sketch-pad and went to work, swiftly. As he worked, he talked.

Story and sketches emerged almost simultaneously.

He passed the first drawing to me.

“Ruins,” he said. “Ruins of a city. All we really saw were the rooftops, but they’re enough to give you some idea of the probable size of the place. You’ll note everything was solid stone. Plenty of broad, flat surfaces. Here’s a sketch of me standing between two rooftops. Probably a street in between, at one time. What do you make of it?”

I studied his sketch; it was crude, but graphically explicit. “They must have been humanoid,” I said. “If we accept functionalism in architectural representation—”

“Never mind the book words,” Penner interrupted. “Look at the width of that street. Would you say that the inhabitants were large or small?”

“Large, of course.” I looked at the sketch again. “Must have been much taller than we are, perhaps seven or eight feet if they worked according to our proportions. Of course, that’s just a rough guess.”

“Good enough. And we geigered the stones a bit. Levy, here, places them at fourteen thousand years.”

“The very least,” Levy broke in. “Possibly older than that.” Penner was sketching again. He passed the second drawing over to me. “Here’s what we found wandering around in the ruins,” he told me. “I’ve shown two of them standing next to me, but there must have been hundreds.”

I looked. There stood Penner, and—at his feet—two tiny manlike beings.

“You actually saw these things?”

“Of course. We all did, there’s no doubt about it. One minute we were climbing around among the stones, and then they appeared. Just like that, out of nowhere, you might say. And not one or two, but hundreds of them.” He turned. “Isn’t that right, Swanson?”

“Correct.”

I gazed at the sketch again. Penner had an eye for detail. I was particularly impressed with the way the creatures were dressed.

“These look like ancient earth-garments,” I said. “They’re wearing little armored breastplates, and helmets. And they carry spears.”

"That's exactly how they looked," Levy corroborated. "Some of them had those—what were they called?—bows and arrows."

Penner eyed me. "You've got a theory, Dale?"

"No, but I'm getting one. These little thing never built the city. They don't live in the ruins, now. They couldn't possibly wear earth-garments like these. They appeared suddenly, you say, and disappeared just as suddenly."

"Sounds silly, the way you sum it up," Penner admitted.

"Yes. Unless you accept one over-all theory."

"And that is—?"

"That they don't exist! They never existed at all, except in your imagination."

"But we all saw them. Saw them, and heard them!"

"We all went through a blackout together, a few hours ago," I reminded him. "And I'm beginning to think that ties in, somehow. Suppose 68/5 isn't uninhabited. Suppose it does contain life."

"That's out of the question!" Swanson interrupted. "The roboship tapes are infallible. Any sign of existence would have been detected and recorded. You know that."

"Yet suppose there were no signs," I answered. "Suppose we're dealing with an intangible intelligence—"

"Absurd!" This from Penner. "No more absurd than the story you've told me. Suppose the intelligence can control our minds. It blacked us out and planted hypnotic suggestion. A little while later you saw little men—"

"No. It doesn't add up," Levy insisted. "There's a flaw." He pointed at the second sketch. "How would your intelligence know about earth-garments such as these? I'm sure none of us were aware of such things. You're the bookworm around here—"

"Bookworm!" I paused. "Wait a minute. You say these creatures talked to you?"

"That's right," Penner answered.

"Do you remember any of the words?"

“I think so. They had little shrill voices and they were shouting to each other. Sounded something like Hekinah degul and Langro dehul san.”

“One of them pointed at you and said Hurgo over and over,” Swanson reminded him.

“Hurgo,” I repeated. “Wait a minute.” I walked over to my shelf and pulled down one of my books. “Look at this,” I said. “No pictures in this edition, of course, but read this page.”

Penner read slowly as the others crowded around. He raised his head, scowled. “Sounds like our creatures,” he said. “What is this?”

I turned to the frontispiece and read. “Gulliver’s Travels, by Jonathan Swift. Published, 1727.”

“No!” said Penner.

I shrugged. “It’s all in the book,” I told him. “Descriptions, words, phrases. Some intelligent force out there tried to read our minds and—I think—failed. So it read the book, instead, and reproduced a part of it.”

“But what possible force could exist? And how could it read the book? And why did it reproduce the—” Penner halted, groping for the word which I supplied.

“Lilliputians.”

“All right, why did it reproduce Lilliputians?”

I didn’t know the answers. I couldn’t even guess. All I had was a feeling, which I expressed in one short sentence. “Let’s get out of here.”

Penner shook his head. “We can’t. You know that. We’ve stumbled across something without precedent, and it’s our job to investigate it fully. Who knows what we might learn? I say we get some rest and go back tomorrow.”

There was a mumble of agreement. I had nothing more to say, so I kept quiet. Swanson and Morse and Levy sought their bunks. I started across to mine, when Penner tapped me on the shoulder.

“By the way, Dale, would you mind letting me have that book of yours? I want to read up on those creatures—might come in handy tomorrow.”

I gave him the book and he went forward. Then I lay down and prepared to sleep. Before closing my eyes I took a last look out of the nearest Sighter. The planet was dark and dead. There was nothing out there—nothing but sand and ruins and loneliness.

And something that made up Lilliputians, something that read in order to learn, and learned in order to plan, and planned in order to act—

I didn't get much sleep that night.

THE sun was lemon-colored the next morning when Swanson roused us.

"Come on," he said. "Penner says we're going out again. Two of us will stay on ship, but we'll take turns. Morse, you and Dale can get ready."

"Orders?" I asked.

"No. I don't think so. It's just that it's really your turn to see the ruins."

I faced him. "I don't want to see the ruins. And my advice is that we all stay on ship and blast off, right now."

"What's the trouble?" Penner loomed up behind Swanson.

"He doesn't want to go out," Swanson said. "Thinks we ought to leave." He smiled at Penner, and his smile said, "Coward".

Penner grinned at me and his grin said, "Psycho."

I didn't let my face talk for me. This was serious. "Look, now," I began. "I've been awake most of the night, thinking. And I've got a hunch."

"Let's hear it." Penner was courteous enough, but over his shoulder he said, "Meanwhile, you men get into your suits."

"This intelligence we talked about last night—we all agreed it must exist. But it can't be measured or located."

"That's what we're going to try to do this morning," Penner said.

"I advise against it."

"Go on."

"Let's think about intelligence for a moment. Ever try to define it? Pretty difficult thing to do. We all know there are hundreds of worlds that don't contain intelligence but do contain life. New worlds and old worlds alike have a complete existence and cycle independent of conscious intelligence."

"What's this, a book-lecture?" asked Morse.

"No, just my own ideas. And one of my ideas is that what we call intelligence is a random element, arising spontaneously under certain conditions just as life itself does. It isn't necessary for the existence of a world—it's extraneous, it's a parasite, an alien growth. Usually it uses brain-cells as a host. But suppose it could evolve to the point where it isn't limited to brain-cells?"

"All right, then what?" Penner snapped.

"Suppose, when life dies on a planet, intelligence finds a means of survival? Suppose it adapts itself to something other than the tissue of the cortex? Suppose the highest point of evolution is reached—in which the planet itself, as host, becomes the seat of intelligence?"

"Mean to say that 68/5 can think?"

"It's worth considering. Remember, when intelligence enters brain-calls it identifies itself with its host, and tries in every way to help its host survive. Suppose it enters, finally, into the planet—when life dies out—and tries to help the planet survive?"

"Thinking planets! Now I've heard everything!" This from Swanson. "Dale, you read too many books."

"Perhaps. But consider what's happened. We can't locate any life-form here. Nevertheless, we black out. And something creates, out of reading and imagination, a duplicate of Gulliver's Travels. Think in terms of a combined number of intelligences, fused into a single unit housed in the body of this world itself. Think of its potential power, and then think of its motives. We're outsiders, we may be hostile, we must be controlled or destroyed. And that's what the planet is trying to do. It can't read our minds, but it can read my books. And its combined force is enough to materialize imaginative concepts in an effort to destroy us. First came Lilliputians with bows and arrows and tiny spears. The intelligence realized these would not be effective, so it may try something else. Something like—"

Penner cut me off with a gesture. “All right, Dale. You don’t have to come with us if you don’t want to.” It was like a slap in the face. I stared around the circle. The men had their suits on. Nobody looked at me.

Then, surprisingly enough, Levy spoke up. “Maybe he’s right,” he said. “Somebody else has to stay behind, too. Think I’ll keep Dale company here.”

I smiled at him. He came over, unfastening his suit. The others didn’t say anything. They filed over to the stairs.

“We’ll watch you through the Sighters,” Levy said. Penner nodded, disappeared with the others.

MINUTES later we caught sight of them toiling up the sunbaked slope of the ridge leading toward the ruins. In the clear light now the ruins were partially visible. Even though only rooftops were clear of sand, they looked gigantic and imposing. An ancient race had dwelt here. And now a new race had come. That was the way life went. Or death—

“What are you worrying about?” Levy asked. “Stop squirming.”

“I don’t like it,” I said. “Something’s going to happen. You believed me too or you wouldn’t have stayed.”

“Penner’s a fool,” Levy said. “You know, I used to read a few books myself, once upon a time.”

“Once upon a time!” I stood up. “I forgot!”

“Where are you going?”

“I’m looking for my other two books,” I said. “I should have thought of that.”

“Thought of what?” Levy talked to me, but he was watching the others, outside, through the Sighter.

“If it read one book, it can read the others,” I told him. “Better get rid of them right away, play it safe.”

“What are the other two books?” Levy asked the question, but I never answered him. Because his voice changed, cracked, and he said, “Dale, come here, hurry!" I stared through the Sighter.

I adjusted the control and it was like a closeup; I could see Penner and Swanson and Morse as if they were standing beside me. They had just reached the top of the ridge, and the ruined stones of the cyclopean city rose before them. Cyclopean.

The word came, the concept came, and then the reality. The first giant towered up from behind the rocks. He was thirty feet tall and his single eye was a burning beacon.

They saw him and turned to flee. Penner tugged at his waist, trying to draw his tube and fire. But there wasn't time now, for the giants were all around them—the one-eyed monsters out of myth.

The giants laughed, and their laughter shook the earth, and they scooped great rocks up from the ruins and hurled them at the men, crushing them. And then they lumbered over to the crushed forms and began to feast, their talons rending and tearing the bodies as I now tore the pages from the book I was holding.

"Cyclops," Levy whispered. "The Odyssey, isn't it?" The torn fragments of the second book fell from my fingers as I turned away.

Levy was already working at the panels. "Only two of us," he said. "But we can make it. Takeoff's automatic once we blast. I'm pretty sure we can make it, aren't you, Dale?"

"Yes," I said, but I didn't really care.

The floor was beginning to vibrate. In just a minute, now, we'd blast.

"Come on, Dale, strap up! I'll handle the board. You know what to do."

I knew what to do.

Levy's face twitched. "What's the matter now? Is it the third book? Are you going to get rid of the third book?"

"No need to. The third one's harmless," I said. "Here, I'll show you."

"What is it?" he asked.

I stepped over to the Sighter for the last time and he followed me. I adjusted for closeup very carefully.

"Look," I said.

We stared out across the barren plain, the plain which no longer held life because it had become life for this planet.

The Cyclops had disappeared, and what was left of Penner and Swanson and Morse lay undisturbed in the dreaming ruins under an orange sun.

Somewhere, somehow, the reader turned a page—

“The third book,” I whispered. “Watch.”

It scampered out from behind one of the stones, moving swiftly on tiny legs. The Sighter brought it so close that I could see the very hairs of its whiskers, note the design of its checkered waistcoat, read the numerals on the watch it took out of the waistcoat pocket. Before I turned away, I almost fancied I could read its lips.

That wasn’t necessary, of course, because I knew what it was saying.

“Oh dear! Oh dear! I shall be too late!” it murmured.

Mincing daintily on thin legs, the White Rabbit scampered among the bodies as we blasted off.

The Thinking Cap

As a writer, Barnaby was a has-been until the redhead gave him the Thinking Cap and the advice "Never look a gift-horse in the mouth." But there are other old sayings about paying the piper and Greeks bearing gifts.

HE opened the cupboard door.

An empty gin-bottle tilted forward and crashed to the floor. He ignored it, and groped inside the cupboard, his fingers scrabbling air. As die did so, he began to talk to himself. A nasty habit, but one he seemed to have acquired.

"But when she got there, the cupboard was bare, and so the poor dog had none. Poor dog. That's me, all right. Poor, poor dog." He paused. "Eureka!"

At the very end of the cupboard his hand encountered and closed around a can. He pulled it out and inspected the label. "Not Eureka after all. Beans. That's better. And so the poor dog had beans."

He put the can of beans on the table and switched on the little electric grill that rested on the wash-stand. He bent down, found a small pan—it wasn't really too dirty—and set it on the glowing grid.

"Can-opener," he muttered. "Can't open her without a can-opener. Canopius. Canopy. Canopy soup." He stood there for a moment and all the words rushed through his head, rushed in riot uncontrolled. "Soup. Super. Superman has found a can. Can he open? Open sesame. Sesame seed.

Sesame seed something. Sesame seed a can of beans. Baked beans. Human beans. Norman Bean—that's the name Edgar Rice Burroughs used at first. When he was still poor, and trying to get a break, and eating beans. Like me. Nobody likes me. Nobody loves me. I don't even have a can-opener."

Suddenly he stopped, and his voice sank to a whisper. He didn't know who he'd been talking to before, but now he was really talking to himself. And he whispered, very softly, "Look now, you've got to stop this. You've got to get hold of yourself. You don't want to go crazy, do you? Or do you?"

He abandoned the search for the can-opener and stepped over to the mirror. It didn't take him long. The whole room was only ten by fourteen, plus the closet. Grill, cupboard, washbowl, bed, two chairs, end-table with the cheap portable radio, and of course the card-table with the portable typewriter resting on it. That was the inventory; the inventory of the room's contents.

Now he stood in front of the mirror above the washbowl and took inventory of himself.

The long, thin face was even longer and thinner today. The cheeks seemed to be slightly sunken—where had he seen that particular conformation before?

The eyes were bright blue, but slightly glazed, and this phenomenon, too, was familiar.

His brown hair was plastered back on his forehead, and it lay dully and without lustre. Somehow, he recognized a similarity here, also.

His skin was pale. Waxy pale. He knew that pallor. It was somehow tied in with the sunken cheeks and the glazed eyes and the duly plastered hair, because it was associated with the look of a—

"Corpse!" he whispered. "You look like a corpse. You're dead. Dead, or dying. Got to do something. Got to."

Yes, he had to do something, but what? Drinking hadn't helped. And he couldn't drink any more, anyway, because the last of the money was gone.

He couldn’t get out of this dingy little furnished room, either—not until the end of the month. Then he’d be thrown out.

And worst of all, he couldn’t write.

That was the crux of the problem. He couldn’t write. The portable typewriter rested on the card-table. It rested. But he didn’t rest. He couldn’t rest. He couldn’t rest because he couldn’t write, and then he drank because he couldn’t rest, and when he drank he couldn’t write, either. Not writing led to drinking which led to not writing which led to—looking like a corpse. Becoming a corpse. If he didn’t go mad first.

“Save me,” he whispered to himself in the mirror. “Save me!” But the face staring back was impassive. The face knew all there was to know about him.

Barnaby Codd, aged 30. Occupation, writer. Status, single. Future, dubious. Or all too certain.

And the face knew the facts behind the facts. Knew about the seven years of work, the stories rejected, the stories sold, the brave beginnings and the bitter end. It knew about Peggy and the broken engagement—about the furnished apartment with its five rooms when the writing came easily. It knew about the cases of bonded whiskey when the stuff was selling to the better markets, and it knew about the empty bottle of the cheapest gin (going crazy, how can there be an empty bottle of cheapest anything?) when he hit the slump. When the slump hit him, which was now, now, now. When he couldn’t rest, couldn’t keep from drinking, couldn’t start the writing. When he got into this horrible habit of talking to himself and his brain ran away with the words and the thoughts and left nothing but a morass of maudlin self-pity.

Barnaby Codd stared at himself in the mirror and himself stared back with the impassivity of death. He was calm, now. Calm as if in a coma. Coma, comma, Lake Como, Lake Perry Como, comme ci, comme sa, come wind, come rain, come hell or high-water, come Dunder and Blitzen and Prancer and Rudolph the Rednosed Can-Opener. Damn it to hell, where was the can-opener, where was the magic key that opened the silver portals that led to the regal banquet of beans for His Majesty's pleasure?

It was very funny. No reason for him to cry. And yet he was crying, suddenly. The mirror was blurring, the room was beginning to spin, and there was a ringing in his ears.

"Telephone!" Mrs. Bixby, calling him. "Telephone, Mister Codd!"

Barnaby Codd rubbed his eyes, groped his way down the hall, answered the phone. "Hello . . . yes . . . yes . . . why, sure . . . yes, that would be fine . . . glad to . . . thanks."

He hung up. This was it, this was the reprieve, this was the last-minute call from the Governor as they strapped him into the chair.

He was going to a party. A cocktail party, with a buffet supper. There'd be food, food, food—lots of food. And there'd be drink, drink, drink—lots of drink. And people. People like Hank Olcott, who'd invited him.

People who still thought of him as a creative talent, who would introduce him, with a certain flourish of pride; "This is my friend Barnaby Codd, the writer."

Yes, he still had a clean suit. And he could shave the hollow cheeks. He would go, and he would glow, and he could talk to others instead of to himself, and he could eat something better than beans and drink something better than cheap gin.

So Barnaby Codd washed and shaved and dressed and combed his hair. He turned off the electric grill. He picked up his hat and started for the door. Then he paused, turned back.

He went over to the wash-stand, grabbed up the can of baked beans, and hurled it into the waste-basket.

HANK OLCOTT led him across the room and introduced him with a certain flourish. "This is my friend, Barnaby Codd, the writer." He did it once, he did it twice, he did it half a dozen times.

Codd kept feeling better and better. All that food, all that liquor, all these people milling around. A chance to talk, to notice and be noticed. Everything was becoming quite real once more, and Codd felt very much alive.

There must be at least forty people in the apartment, he estimated—they kept arriving and departing; the elegant, the effete, the eccentric and the egocentric. Where Olcott picked them up he didn't know. He had some odd friends, Codd mused. He himself was a good example.

As time passed, the character of the crowd changed. Some strangers had appeared; apparently the word was going around. It was the old story. Olcott told his friends he was holding a party, and they told their friends, and they told their friends, acquaintances, even their enemies.

Hank Olcott wasn't introducing him to very many people now. He didn't know very many people in this crowd. Codd speculated about making his departure. He felt very good, quite self-assured. Better quit now while he was ahead. Another drink might be one too many. Another introduction might be boring. But—

Then he saw the crimson poppy.

It swayed on its long green stem, its scarlet petals unfurled. It stood in slender splendor near the far windows, and Codd felt irresistibly drawn to its aura. He bent his head as if to inhale the perfume of its presence.

"My name is Barnaby Codd." he whispered.

"I'm Cleo Fane," said the crimson poppy.

Codd stared at the sheathing green gown, at the flowing red hair. This was no poppy, but a far more exotic flower. Face of Grecian marble, eyes cut from Chinese jade—Codd checked himself abruptly. He was letting go again, he realized; all this business of flowers, sculpture, purple prose. She was the most beautiful woman he'd ever seen—wasn't that enough?

And she was staring up at him with something very much like admiration in her slanted oval eyes.

"Do you belong here?" she was asking.

"Belong here?"

"Do you know these people?"

"Why—yes. That is, I know Olcott, our host. Great patron of the arts, dilettante, really. That's how I got in. I'm a writer."

She nodded. "I know."

A warm glow came over Codd. He smiled. "What do you do?" he asked. "I don't belong here."

"Then let's leave, shall we?"

She put her arm on his. "Very well."

And that's all there was to it. In one minute he'd met the most beautiful woman he'd ever seen and walked away with her.

Olcott was standing at the portable bar, surrounded by an assortment of longhairs and crewcuts, and Codd made no effort to bid him goodbye.

Instead he walked out, floated out, flew out into the night with the ravishing redhead. Ravishing—

"Won't you be my guest for a few moments?" she was asking. "I have a place. It isn't far."

Codd had difficulty in comprehending her invitation. It was just too good to be true. This was the way it happened in stories; the way it happened in some of the stories he used to write.

Elation combined with alcohol within him to produce a strange alchemy. He knew he was drunk, he knew he couldn't walk very well, he knew that he had only a blurred awareness of the street, of movement, of entering a tall building and being ushered into a large room. A dim lamp glowed in the corner. Codd smelt a perfume that might have been incense, might have been the woman who stood close beside him, sat close beside him now on the long, low divan.

And then she turned to him, and it was like the surge of the sea, the warm tide flowing over him and bearing him up on its crest, and all at once he could talk and the formless phrases and wild words made a certain sense.

". . . don't know how long I've been looking for someone like you . . . not someone like you, but you, though I never knew it . . . never thought anyone like you existed . . . never believed in Fate . . . or that Fate was a woman with red hair and green eyes and lips shaped as strange gateways to dreams . . .”

“What do you write?” She sat up suddenly, and her voice was almost crisp.

“Why—I—I—” Codd fumbled for reality. “What do I write? That’s an odd question. I write many things. Poetry, and short stories, and there are two novels, half of a third—but that was over a year ago, when I stopped.” He gulped, then took the plunge. “I’ll be honest. I was a writer. But I can hardly claim to be one now. For a year I’ve been in a slump. Something happened to me, I don’t know how to explain it. I can’t write any more.”

Cleo nodded, in private affirmation. “That’s why I wanted to meet you. I knew you needed help.”

“What do you mean?”

For answer, Cleo rose. She disappeared somewhere in the dimness of the room. Codd sat there, wondering and waiting. He felt quite drunk, now. Things were happening too quickly, and he had no way of evaluating the reality of events. On one level, it seemed like years since he’d been crying in front of the wash-stand mirror. On another, no time had elapsed at all.

Then Cleo was back. She was holding something in her hand, but the hand was below the level of the divan and Codd couldn’t see anything from where he sat.

“This writing problem,” she said. “Would you say you had established some sort of mental bloc?”

Codd sat up stiffly. “Say, what is this—are you a lady psychiatrist?” Cleo laughed, a soft laugh of darkness and musk. “No. But I understand something about creation and its problems.” Her voice became a persuasive purr. “I want to help you, you know.”

“I know. And I’m trying to answer honestly. I just can’t seem to function, as a writer any more. I can’t seem to grasp ideas properly, coherently. Everything flies apart into words, phrases, sentences. There’s nothing consistent or coherent—I can’t seem to concentrate.” Codd’s voice sunk to a whisper. “Sometimes, lately, I wonder if I’m losing my mind.”

“Losing your mind.” Cleo smiled a smile of her own. “Odd that yo should use that particular phrase.”

“Why is it odd?”

“Have you ever stopped to think of what it means, what image it conveys? If you lose your mind, that indicates it has been mislaid—that it’s somewhere else. Where is your mind now, Mr. Barnaby Codd?”

“Lost in flames,” Codd whispered, as intoxication flooded over him again. “Lost in the flames of your hair and your eyes and your lips and ——”

“Not now.” She pushed him away. “This is important. To you. To me. And to someone else.”

“Someone else?”

“Of course. I’m only what you might call an emissary. An agent. I couldn’t invent something like this.” The hand came up from below the divan’s level, now. It came up in all its shining silver slimness, holding the odd-looking object.

“What in the world—or out of the world—is that?—” Codd breathed. “What does it look like?”

“Well, I’d say it was some kind of headdress, or helmet.”

“You’re correct. It is meant to be worn on the head.”

“And those antennae, with the coiled tubing between them—make me think of television, and space-pilots, and all that kid stuff.”

“Let me assure you there is nothing childish about this invention. As you will soon learn, to your profit.”

“I still don’t understand.”

“You will. I was directed to go out and find a subject for the experiment. A creative artist—painter, sculptor, musician, writer. Someone possessing a sensitive imagination, but unchanneled, undisciplined. To be blunt, an unsuccessful creative artist. A successful artist, in any field, wouldn’t want or need to wear the helmet. You will.”

“You mean, somebody invented this and wants me to put it on my head?”

“Exactly.”

“Now, wait a minute.” Codd was Suddenly quite sober. “This doesn’t make sense. I may be going crazy, but I’m not that crazy. A beautiful woman comes to me and asks me to wear a Buck Rogers helmet invented by some mysterious screwball, and I’m supposed to go along with the gag.”

“This is serious. You cannot begin to imagine just how serious. However, I am beginning to see I made a mistake. Yours is not the temperament I had judged it to be. I think you had better leave, now.”

Cleo stood up, moved away. And every inch of retreat was agony to Codd, every movement of withdrawal was poignant with pain. He couldn’t lose her, he’d do anything, anything—“Wait! Perhaps if you’d explain to me what this is all about, what the helmet is supposed to do, I’d understand.”

“No. You are not the man I want.”

“Please!” He was frankly begging her now. “I’ll do anything you ask, anything.”

She smiled and came closer. “That’s better. Much, much better.” She held out the helmet. “Here, put it on.”

“Now?”

“Exactly.”

He held it in his hand. The metal was cool, but oddly light and malleable. In the dim light he could not discern the nature of the coiled tubing or the antennae to which it was attached.

“What—what am I supposed to do when I wear it?”

“You’ll understand everything. Just put it on.” Her smile was mocking, now. “What’s the matter? Afraid I’m going to harm you?”

It was the proper challenge for the moment. Barnaby Codd lifted the helmet. He placed it on his head firmly—Napoleon grasping the coronet from the Pope and crowning himself emperor. The helmet fitted snugly over his skull. At the point where the two antennae were based, something began to bore into his brain.

He stared ahead for a moment, looking at Cleo. Her face was rapt, her eyes closed. He had the oddest sensation that her eyes were in the antennae, that the antennae were in his brain, that his brain was in another world. He stared at her hair, and the flames leapt up, and Barnaby Codd drowned in their fire.

Then he didn't feel the helmet, didn't see her any more. He was in another world . . .

THE sky was green.

The moons were green, too—and there were three of them. The trees and grass and rocks were green. In the distance the green lake rippled, and Codd could see the curious emerald reflection coursing across it.

He gazed up at the source of the reflection and perceived the green girl riding the green dog. The dog was something like a poodle, with enormously exaggerated ears. But then, everything about the dog was enormously exaggerated—it must have been five feet high and fifteen feet long. The dog wore one of the curious helmets, too, and it bounded in twenty-foot leaps across the greensward.

Riding on the dog's back was a green girl. A helmet rested on her green curls, and her green eyes glittered lividly. Yes, she had green curls—but she was Cleo!

Codd stared. That was all he could do; simply stare. He wanted to move towards her, wanted to cry out, but he couldn't He willed his feet to move. Nothing happened.

Then he glanced down and saw the answer. He had no feet. He had no feet, no legs, no torso, no arms, nothing. He was wearing the helmet but he had no head. He could see, but he had no eyes.

There was nothing to do but watch and wait—watch and wait as the green girl bounded past on the green dog. Then the rocket roared across the green sky, and Codd blinked. Codd blinked; his eyes didn't, for he had none.

The rocket was not green. It was silver, and an orange jet blasted behind it. If the rocket was not green, that meant it was not of this world. It came from somewhere else. It swooped across the horizon, disappeared. Then, abruptly, it reappeared over the lake. It was lower, now, ready to make a landing.

Codd wanted to be close to it when it landed.

Abruptly, he was closer. He watched the landing, watched the men emerge.

Cleo and the dog had disappeared. There were only the men, now: the earthmen of the future on a strange green planet. He found that he could will himself to move closer or away at will; they could not see him although he could see them. He found that he could hear them, too, faintly or plainly as he desired. The sensation was similar to that of watching a motion picture and photographing it simultaneously; choosing the camera angles he wished.

And during the next hour, he saw the picture unreel. The planet was explored by the rocket ship's crew. The captain and the three leading crew-members enacted a private drama of their own. The crew was going mad. It was the color that did it—the effort of adjusting to a world where everything was green. They mutinied. They tried to steal the ship. The captain alone did not crack. He fought them off. They succumbed, one by one, to the green lure of the lake, to the call of the green jungle, to the green death of the swamp. It was, in a way, an absorbing psychological study—the unpredictable effect of subjecting a normal mind and a normal pair of eyes to a single, unvarying constant color.

The last crew member died in a crazy attempt to paint the rocket ship green. He succeeded—and failed, for the captain shot him.

And now the captain was alone. Alone, and sane, for he wouldn't yield to his environment. He was stronger than the planet, stronger than the mysterious force of chlorophyll or radiation or combination of both that made everything on its surface conform to its greenness.

His will did not break, his mind did not give way. He prepared to return to earth alone. It was only when he reached the end of his ordeal and found the safety of his cabin that he stared in the mirror—and saw that he had turned green.

The film ended there. Or rather, the green came up. Codd felt himself falling away from it, falling into greenness, falling into blackness, falling into redness . . .

Her hair, covering his face. And her voice whispering, “Wake up, now. Wake up. I’ve taken it off.”

He was awake, and she had taken off the helmet. He sat there, dazed, and she handed him a drink. Outside the windows a false dawn paled, then was blotted out in final darkness.

“What happened?” he whispered.

“You tell me,” she suggested. “You wore the helmet.”

Barnaby Codd told her. She nodded from time to time, nodded thoughtfully.

“But I don’t understand it at all,” he concluded. “You were in the dream, and there was a dog, and a space ship, and everything was green, yet it made a story.”

“That’s the whole point,” said Cleo. “The experiment was successful, because it made a story. Do you think you could write that story, now, and sell it?”

Codd stood up. “Why—yes, I guess so. I’ve never tried anything in science-fiction or fantasy before, but the market is there. And this psychological angle, about the effects of color, would work in.”

“Then why don’t you do it?” the woman suggested.

“Because I’ve got to know what happened, first. I’ve got to understand this thing. Where did the story come from?”

“From your own mind, of course,” Cleo told him. “The helmet merely organized the various subconscious images in a coherent form. I don’t pretend to know the mechanism—but the helmet integrates thought patterns. Some of the elements you observed are simple enough to figure out.”

“Such as?”

"Well, myself, for example. I belonged in the prelude to the story because I was 'on your mind,' you might say. And the dog—" she hesitated.

"Go on," he prompted.

"The dog was probably a symbol of yourself. You have felt like a dog lately, even told yourself that you were a 'dog,' haven't you?"

Codd smiled. "Tell me more."

"The rocket-ship? Well, you spoke of the helmet as if it was a science-fiction gadget. Pure association there."

Codd nodded. "And the color green?"

Cleo sighed. ".I must admit to a little cheating, there. I had to do something that would help me check. So while you wore the helmet and stared off into nothingness—"

"Is that what I did all that time?" Codd interrupted.

"Yes. You just sat in a trance, eyes open, until it was over. And while you stared, I held this in front of your eyes."

The girl extended her hand and Codd stared at the jewel blazing up at him. An emerald, of course.

"Then it's all a matter of suggestion, of self-hypnosis?"

"Perhaps. But the helmet is the agent. You wear it and your thoughts weave a pattern. It will help you to create. You speak of losing your mind. The helmet permits you to find it again."

"But how does it work?"

"I cannot answer that. And you must not question me too closely. This much, and this much only need you know. I am empowered to offer you the loan of the helmet for an indefinite period, for experimental purposes.

"You can wear it whenever you want, write whatever you want as a result of your experiences while wearing it. I believe you are going to find this a most profitable Undertaking."

"And what do you—and your mysterious inventor friend—get for this privilege?"

"Merely the opportunity to test the helmet and observe its effects.

The record of effects will be found in the stories you write."

"But where's the catch?"

"There is no catch. Perhaps, some day, we will want you to go on record as to the way in which the helmet performs. We may patent and market it on a wide scale. We may find other uses for it. I cannot say at present." Codd paced the floor. "I don't know. It sounds crazy."

"Can you sell the story?"

"Certainly."

"Then remember this—you'll write other stories. Tonight your mind was at singularly low ebb; you were confused, half-drunk. What do you suppose you'll be capable of once you're clearly confident, once you begin to organize your talent and utilize all your creativity with the helmet's aid? Why, you'll be able to turn out bestsellers! You'll be rich, famous, perhaps immortal. Wouldn't you like that?"

Wouldn't he? An abrupt vision of the frowsy furnished room came unbidden to his brain. Codd nodded. Of course he wanted to be rich and famous. And what had he to lose, what had he to fear?

"Suppose I accept," he said. "Are there any restrictions?"

"None. Of course, you will keep this secret. You'll have to, at first—you know as well as I do what people would say if you came to them with such a fantastic explanation."

"Agreed," said Codd.

"And you are further instructed not to tamper with the helmet in any way. If you have any notion of running off to some scientific testing laboratory and discovering the 'secret' of its mechanism, I can assure you that the attempt will end in disaster. You'll end up with a damaged, useless instrument—and know nothing. Because today's science does not operate in a frame of reference sufficient to make this phenomenon intelligible to mankind." She smiled. "But I become ponderous. All I mean to do is to use that old phrase—what is it again?—'Never look a gift-horse in the mouth.' "

She extended the helmet. Codd grasped it, moved towards the door.

"And when do I see you again?" he asked.

“Soon. Quite soon.” Cleo Fane smiled. “I’ll see you in my dreams.”

BARNABY CODD wrote The Green Planet as a novelette, in three sittings. He sold it, first trip out, for three hundred dollars. It was printed, and successfully received, four months later, and the editor asked for more. The editor had illustrated it with a cover showing four or five colors instead of just green, but nobody seemed upset about that. Codd wasn’t upset either, because by the time the story appeared he was already out of the science-fiction field.

He was out of the furnished room, too, and established in a pleasant apartment once more. The actual mechanics of locating a new place and furnishing it proved tiresome—but then, for several weeks after writing the story, everything was tiring to Codd. He felt oddly drained and depleted of energy.

Yet he had energy enough to make an effort to locate Cleo Fane. He tried the phone-book, of course, and to no avail. Then he consulted the city directory and drew a blank. So he went to Hank Olcott.

“Cleo Fane?” Hank considered for a moment. “No, can’t say that I recognize the name.” He tapped a cigarette and leaned back. “Should I?”

“Well, she was at your party,” Codd persisted. “Surely you remember her—tall redhead in a green dress.”

Hank shook his head slowly. “Sorry. I don’t recall seeing her. Of course, there were so many strangers barging in and out all night long. I can ask some of the gang.”

“I wish you would,” Codd urged. “I must find her.”

Hank Olcott chuckled. “I thought you told me you went out together. Don’t you know where she lives?” Codd tried to, explain. He didn’t know, he’d had too much to drink, he’d tried to retrace his steps and couldn’t find the building on the side street. Olcott listened patiently, promised to make inquiries, and did so. But he learned nothing.

Nor did Codd, in the days that followed. He sat at home, waiting for a call that never came. He might have had a few drinks to pass the time, but he found he no longer wanted to drink. He might have turned to the typewriter and done some work, but he found that he couldn't work. In that respect his status was unchanged—he was still in a writer's slump. The novelette had been an accident, after all.

But it wasn't an accident. It was merely the result of wearing the helmet. The helmet gave him the story. Why not use it now? Besides, what had she told him at the last?

"I'll see you in my dreams."

Codd took the helmet out of its place of concealment, at the bottom of his suitcase. He cradled it, examining it curiously. The light, malleable metal was silver, and its surface held the tarnish of age. The peculiar antennae and tubular filament between defied his analysis. This apparatus had not been sewed or rivetted or soldered on—it seemed to be an inherent part of the whole. How the helmet was made or what process had been used in its contrivance it was beyond his power to determine. It was all a mystery.

And so was its power, and so was the woman, and so was her power over him—mystery.

Codd sighed. He switched off the lamp, sat in darkness. The helmet gave off a faint phosphorescent glow. He raised it to his face, then placed it on his head. The phosphorescent glow flooded the room, flooded his brain and being.

Codd was back on the green planet, now. He stood against the hillside and stared down. Cleo came bounding past, on the back of a gigantic wolf. The wolf looked up at him and howled. Cleo waved, once—at least, he thought she waved. Then she disappeared.

And now. oddly, the planet disappeared. Codd was somewhere else; in a modern city. He was watching another story unfold.

This was the story of David Harris, a man on the ragged edge of sanity. Codd knew the man, knew his thoughts, because he found he could get inside the man and read his mind. Not that alone; to a certain extent he could be the man if he so desired.

He watched Harris, discharged from the asylum, roaming through the city and seeking companionship, seeking a friend to save him from loneliness. For loneliness was the source of his aberration, being alone would drive him mad once more. He followed Harris through the drabness of his days, the empty impersonality of his contacts in a strange city. He suffered all the defeats which Harris met in his efforts to establish even a small acquaintanceship with his fellow men. He fought, as Harris fought, the terrifying hatreds that welled up in him; hatreds directed against all living things. He tried to conquer the delusion that all men were his enemies.

And he followed Harris to the tavern the night he met the girl. The girl was Cleo, of course—but this time she was a blonde, and he discovered she was a waitress out of a job and down on her luck. She was lonely, too. Then Harris took her to his room, and they spent the night, and Harris made the discovery of communication; of freedom from loneliness and fear. It seemed to Harris that this was too much to bear, that his mind would burst with the realization of his love, that his love was a torment worse than loneliness, that by losing himself in love he lost his identity which was that of a man to whom all men were enemies.

As Harris, he slept, and awoke in the morning to find the girl gone. Then he followed Harris through the streets, followed him in his search for the girl who had become to him the symbol of salvation. He must find her now or go mad forever. And he searched and he searched, and his panic grew, and he knew that he was on the borderline, on the ragged edge, and he couldn't endure it without her. And he tried to think back to last night and couldn't, and the hatred came welling up in him again, and he went back to his room and then he sensed her presence there.

The mere thought of her presence was enough to save him; he realized now, for the first time, how close he had come to the brink last night when he'd met her. It had only been a matter of hours, or perhaps even minutes, before he would have cracked, if he hadn’t found her. No wonder he’d blacked out there at the last as they made love.

But now her presence was strong, she was with him, somehow, and he knew she would be with him always. He’d done something—he couldn’t remember what it was, just now—to insure that. He’d done something to save himself by keeping her with him forever.

Harris couldn’t remember. Not until he decided to go out, and went to the closet and opened the door, and found her propped stiffly in the corner with his knife in her throat . . .

Then Harris went mad, phosphorescently mad; and Codd got out of him quickly, got out of the phosphorescence and ripped off the helmet.

He sat there panting in the dark for a long moment before he was able to stand up, switch on the light, and walk over to the typewriter.

That night he wrote The Ragged Edge in one sitting.

DURING the next three months, Barnaby Codd wrote nine short stories and two novelettes. Both of the novelettes and the last six stories sold to the slicks, and Codd acquired a bright, brisk agent named Freeman who negotiated a motion picture sale for one of the novelettes and sold TV rights to three of the stories. He kept urging Codd to tackle a novel now, and talked about “deals” and “percentages” and “building up a name while things are hot.”

Things were hot, all right. Too hot. Codd had new furniture and a new car. He had a bank balance of over seven thousand dollars. He was in a position to satisfy his gregarious instincts and aggrandize his ego. There was no need to wait for a phone-call from the Hank Olcotts of this world—he could give his own parties whenever he chose.

He tried it, once. The party was not a success. Oh, Hank came and the rest of the crowd came, and they seemed to have a good time. They complimented him, and joined with Freeman in marveling over his sudden, unprecedented success. But Codd didn't enjoy himself. He kept waiting for a scarlet poppy to blossom in the corner—and of course, it didn't.

Then he tried to drink, and found he hadn't the taste for it any longer. Nor the energy. The party tired him. He was glad when they all went away, finally, and he could turn out the lights and put on the helmet.

Because when he put on the helmet, she came. She always came, and always in the same way. He'd find himself back on the green planet under the three green moons. An instant of waiting, and then she'd bound across the landscape on an animal. Each time the animal was different—a lion, tiger, stallion, boar. Each time the action was the same—the creature bounded, she waved, then disappeared. And he'd be off in a dream-plot. The plots inevitably were a product of some previous reality; twisted, inverted, expanded and projected. The Ragged Edge had been the result of his own search for Cleo. Other plots had been remotely based on subsequent daily incidents in his life.

Tonight, his dream concerned a party—a charity ball. Cleo was there (odd, she seemed to turn up in disguise as a character, regularly) and this time she was a brunette. A reigning movie queen, internationally famous, a symbol of scandal and sophistication.

There was a raffle, and she danced with the holders of the winning tickets. Codd knew the winners—he became the winners, each in turn. And he followed their lives.

He was Homer Johnson; meek little bespectacled Homer Johnson, the bookkeeper with the nagging wife. And as a result of his moment of glory, his dance with a dream, he found the courage to leave his wife, tell off his boss, and go on to his romantically-cherished ambition of life in the merchant marine. The dance made him a hero.

He was young Derek; Derek, the fortunate. Blond, handsome rich man's son, with an assured future and a girl who worshipped him. But he danced with a dream and thereafter the girl meant nothing to him, and no woman was good enough. He went down, down, to an inevitable end. The dance destroyed him.

He was Geoffrey Farr, a once great name on the legitimate stage and now an extra voice, a bit character actor in soap-operas. He'd wangled his invitation, taken his last five dollars to buy a raffle ticket because he couldn't afford to be shamed in front of the "public." And he'd won a dance, too; won it in his rented tuxedo, danced with splitting seams, danced with a tearing pain in his chest—because he was old, too old for the constant strain of "keeping up appearances" and too old for the excitement.

The star had been nice to him when they danced, and some LIFE photographer had remembered his name and taken a shot on the off-chance that this was a good "human interest angle" to play up. And the ballroom buzzed.

Before the night was over, Geoffrey Farr had been "re-discovered" by two agents, a producer casting a Broadway show, and the star's personal director. There would be contracts in the morning and Geoffrey Farr would be back on top again.

Before the night was over, Geoffrey Farr died of a heart attack, brought on by the strain and the excitement. He had danced with a dream and the dream was death.

Codd died, took off the helmet, and began to set down the complete outline of The Dancers. It was going to be quite a novel—some of the touches were pure corn, he realized, but the kind of corn that sells. The kind that logically lends itself to rental library circulation, to mass motion picture audience appeal. "A" corn. Fie had the angle, now. A sort of combination of Grand Hotel and Letter to Three Wives.

He could write it in a month, he knew that.

And he did.

Freeman was enthusiastic when he saw the finished manuscript. "This is it!" he kept crowing "I knew you'd do it, Barnaby. You've been getting further and further away from all that morbid fantasy stuff. Now you've got the commercial angle. I'm going to get busy on this tomorrow. Don't worry about a thing. I'd suggest you go home and take a good long rest. You look tired, man. This job must have knocked you out."

Codd drove home. The new car handled perfectly, but driving was an effort. Everything had been an effort during the past month. He hadn't worn the helmet while writing, but the effects were there. Aside from work, he moved in a daze. Action and reaction were oddly altered. Of course, that often happened when he was working on a story—the story became more real than the external world. But even the story hadn't seemed real.

The dreams were real.

That was the way he'd felt. The dreams were real. The rest was ephemeral, unimportant. Only the dream-world existed. Cleo had been the bait to get him to wear the helmet. The stories and the success were the bait that kept him wearing the helmet. Somebody or something wanted him to do that, and it was real.

Codd went up to the apartment. He realized that he was in a bad state, and realized—sensibly enough—that he was letting his mind run away. Freeman was right; he was just tired from overwork.

Well, he didn't have to work that hard any more. Somehow he knew he had a winner; Freeman confirmed it. He'd sell the novel, get a decent motion picture sale, and take things easy. After all, he was a writer in his own right—he didn't have to depend on the helmet. The whole thing was beginning to prey on his mind; guilty secrets, and all that sort of rot. From now on it might be a good idea to forget about everything that had gone before.

Cleo, whoever she was, had disappeared. Nobody knew about the helmet. Nobody had come to blackmail him or accuse him or threaten him. Why not call the whole thing off and start all over, start fresh, as his own man?

His own man . . .

Barnaby Codd stood in front of the mirror and took inventory of himself. The Brooks Brothers suit was immaculate. The Sulka tie had a certain subdued resplendence. But the long, lean face was thin, the cheeks were sunken, the brown hair was lustreless, the skin was waxy pale, and the glazed eyes held the glitter of horrified recognition.

Nothing had changed. He was still a walking corpse.

And if he could still walk, it was time for the head-shrinker.

IT was very comfortable on the leather couch.

Sometimes it's nice to be a corpse, to be laid out in state with hands folded peacefully over the chest, eyes open and unseeing, ready for eternal rest.

When you accept death, nothing else matters any more, and it's easier to talk. So much, much easier.

Barnaby Codd told Doctor Fine all about this feeling. It was not difficult to talk to the quiet little psychologist. Olcott had recommended him; seemed to think it was a good idea. And it was a good idea, so far.

Fine was willing to dispense with all the preliminaries, to take Codd's word for it that he understood his problem. And with that encouragement, Codd talked.

He'd been talking now for almost an hour. He told the whole story—about the writing, and meeting Cleo Fane, and the curious aftermath to that evening. He told about the helmet and the dreams. He held nothing back.

Doctor Fine listened attentively, patiently. Codd felt a growing conviction that he could be helped here, that Doctor Fine knew the answers.

He concluded on a hopeful note. "What do you think? What does it all mean to you, Doctor?"

Codd sat up and fished for a cigarette. Little Doctor Fine sat back and smiled. "It doesn't matter, really, what it means to me. The important question is—what does it mean to you? How would you explain it?"

"I—I can't explain it."

"Then, make a guess."

"Are you serious?"

"Naturally. Are you? Then make a guess."

"Well." Codd lit the cigarette and sought significant symbolism in a spiral of smoke. "One theory would be that when I want to the party, I was already cracking up. Alcohol worked upon me auto-suggestively.” He paused.

“Go on. This is interesting.”

“I remember that Olcott never saw this woman. His friends don’t seem to know her. So perhaps there was no woman—perhaps I imagined the whole thing; manufactured a stimulus, an excuse to continue writing. You might say that I hypnotized myself.”

The Doctor nodded. “It’s theoretically possible,” he conceded.

“Except for one thing.” Codd stood up, walked over to the coat-rack, fished in the pocket of his overcoat. “She gave me the helmet. Here it is.”

He extended the curious metallic headpiece and Doctor Fine inspected it carefully.

“You couldn’t make it yourself,” he mused. “I don’t suppose—”

“I don’t suppose, either,” Codd answered. “Supposition won’t help me. And I suspect that no laboratory on earth could accurately analyze the component structure of a magic helmet. She warned me against trying to find out—I’m wondering now whether or not it might be a good idea to at least make the attempt. At least it could help convince me of my own sanity.”

Doctor Fine gazed at the antennae, at the coils, at the odd patina of the silver. “If you’ll permit me, I’d be glad to have it examined for you,” he said. “But before you resign yourself to believing, in the power of the helmet, why not ‘think this thing through a little further?”

Codd finished his cigarette, crushed it out. “All right. Let’s take the other tack. Cleo Fane exists. I did see her. She did give me this helmet, for her own mysterious purposes. And the helmet—”

“Ignore the helmet,” Doctor Fine suggested. “Suppose the helmet was, and is, just a costume-piece. What then?”

“But I had the dreams,” Codd objected. “I had the first dream there in her apartment. And when I woke up, she was still there, with the emerald. She seemed to be in the dream and to know all about it—”

“Think!” insisted Doctor Fine. “What could that mean?”

“It could mean—it could mean that I didn’t hypnotize myself—that I did dream—but that she hypnotized me. Darkness and quiet and fatigue and alcohol and suggestion. She made me believe that I’d dream when I put the helmet on. And then she used the emerald as a focal point. No wonder she knew my dream—she was planting it in my mind, telling me what I was dreaming all the time!” Doctor Fine purred like a plump little cat. The canary had gone down nicely, it seemed. But—

“Wait!” exclaimed Codd. “That wouldn’t work, either. Because I dreamed again. And again. Whenever I wore the helmet, I had a dream. She wasn’t present to suggest anything, not once. And so—”

“Did you ever hear of post-hypnotic suggestion?” asked the Doctor.

“I get it! She did it all at the one sitting—told me that from that time on, whenever I wore the helmet, I’d dream. Perhaps planted the whole series in my subconscious. From that time on the helmet itself was the focal agent for hypnosis. And it’s still working!”

From the sound of the deep purr, the Doctor had found another canary.

“Two more questions, Doctor. It’s clearer to me now, and I feel better once I realize there are other explanations than crazy, supernatural ones. But two questions have to be answered. The first is—”

“Why should anyone attempt such a thing?” Doctor Fine was creeping up on his third canary, and he couldn’t wait. “Because, unfortunately, you are not alone in the need for analytical therapy, my friend. The world is full of disorganized personalities. Your Cleo Fane, with her calculated air of mystery, her fabricated helmet and fabricated story, may well be acting compulsively and dramatizing her own private fantasies of power. She was ‘looking for a creative artist, she told you. An instrument of masculinity, perhaps, a surrogate for—”

Then followed five minutes of abstruse terminology, all of which added up, reassuringly, to the fact that Cleo Fane was nuttier than a fruitcake. It was good therapy for Barnaby Codd—to be told that she was the crazy one, not he.

But there was still a second question. He asked it, now.

“How can I get rid of the dreams?” he pleaded. “How do I escape from this posthypnotic suggestion business?”

Doctor Fine smiled. “You’re already more than half-free now,” he said. “Just analyzing matters this way is a great step forward. You’ll see. The final step is simple. It merely lies in re-evaluating the helmet.”

“Yes?”

“Realizing, objectively and subjectively, completely, that it’s all a trick. That the helmet in itself has no magical power over your mind. The next time you wear it, you’ll not wait for the dream to end. You’ll take it off, of your own volition, right in the middle of the so-called dream sequence. And that will be that. Simple.” He smiled. “Then, if you still want to, we’ll have the gadget examined and come up with answers. Chances are, it was manufactured somewhere in New Jersey. We can attend to all that later this week.”

“But, wait a minute—I can’t take the helmet off in the middle of a dream! She warned me, she wouldn’t let me, I’m not able to command my actions when I wear it—”

Doctor Fine listened to him, and from the expression on his face it was plain he was hearing the chirps of the fourth canary. He smiled cheerfully.

“Of course you can take the helmet off,” he said. “It’s all a matter of suggestion. Of counter-hypnosis, if you wish. Now if you’ll just stretch out on the couch once more, I think I can promise you that next time you’ll be able to remove the helmet.” He hummed. “It’s all a matter of suggestion.”

It was.

CODD didn’t feel like a corpse any more. Corpses don’t have six months of solid booking with psychoanalysts. They don’t have the hopeful feeling that their problems are all on their way to being solved, that they are about to be helped, to get rid of their delusions, and can walk unaided on their own feet, on a path of their own choosing.

Codd had these feelings strongly, now. It was all so simple. The Doctor would cure him of his bloc against writing, would enable him to summon new strength and resolution instead of depending on suggestion and a weird belief in "magic."

Back at the apartment he looked at himself in the mirror once again, and that was the clincher. He was smiling, self-possessed, and there was some color in his cheeks. He was Barnaby Codd—not the old Codd, but the new Codd. The successful Codd. The Codd who had just written a novel which might well be a best-seller. The Codd who was going to have all the things he'd ever dreamed of having. The Codd who could—and it wasn't at all unthinkable now—write masterpieces.

The phone rang. He groped for it in the gathering dusk.

"Codd? This is Freeman. Got news for you. It looks like we've hit the jackpot." Codd listened, nodded at the mouthpiece. The book had sold. Freeman named the publisher, named the advance. One of the big book clubs was reading the carbon of the manuscript. The second carbon had been requested by the New York office of a major movie studio. Codd must appear at Freeman's office tomorrow morning and go through the pleasant motions of signing contracts.

Codd made the usual elated answers and hung up. He floated over to a chair in the dusk of the parlor.

This was it. This was real living. And only the beginning. From now on he'd enjoy it as a whole man, as his own master. He would break this foolish fixation, this morbid dependency on a crazy girl and her crazy story. His conscious mind was already free. And once he removed the helmet during a dream, his subconscious resolution would be made, thanks to Doctor Fine and the powers of suggestion. The powers of suggestion—fight fire with fire—science was wonderful—what a romantic, melodramatic fool he had been—now was the time to end it.

Yes, now was the time to end it. Get it over with. He couldn't wait, shouldn't wait. Perhaps that was Doctor Fine's hypnotic command, too.

That he should don the helmet at once and go through with the traumatic incident.

At any rate, the urge was strong. The urge was overpowering, irresistible. Codd got the helmet from his coat. He felt the coolness against his palms. He felt the coolness against his skull as he sat back on the sofa and adjusted the helmet It fitted snugly.

And that was all.

It just rested on his head. Nothing happened. Doctor Fine was right—perhaps he'd done a better job than he'd dared hope to do. Already the power of the helmet was gone. Codd didn't believe in it. He was his own man. He wasn't in the power of the helmet, in the power of Cleo Fane. He wasn't her man. He wasn't her man. He wasn't—

Codd fell asleep naturally. His head slipped down and he dozed. The phosphorescence was coming, now, and the familiar sense of seeing without being, of moving without body.

He waited for the three moons to appear. Strange, now that he had visited Doctor Fine, how he could analyze what was happening. That green planet had become not only familiar to him but natural, accepted. It had truly seemed more real to him than actual surroundings in his waking state. And the inevitable prelude to his visions—Cleo riding across the green landscape on a strange beast—that was accepted and expected too. He expected it now, but he wouldn't accept it this time. Only a dream.

Oddly enough, this time there was no green planet and no glimpse of Cleo riding an animal. He was somewhere else. He was many places else, at many times. He was in her mind, or she was in his.

A glimpse of her face, looming out of the sky, blotting out the horizon with the blinding redness of her hair. And her voice whispering.

"You tried to disobey. You weren't content with my gifts, so you tried to disobey. Didn't I give you enough? You wanted the ability to create, you wanted the rewards of creation. I gave them to you freely. Was that, then, not enough?"

It was a question, but he did not answer. She knew the answer. She knew everything. Her voice held an ageless grief. “It was not enough. It’s never been enough for any of them. They want to know, also. They want to pry, and meddle. It is their nature, because they are only men. You are only a man. You do not understand the gods.

“And like a man, you believe yourself greater than the gods, stronger than their spells. So you tried to disobey. You wanted to know.”

Her face faded away, and now was the time to take off the helmet. Or could he wait another minute?

He waited, tense even in sleep, and the voice came again. “Very well. You shall know. Not because you desire it, but because I permit it. For the first thing you must know is that this is my dream—not yours. I make the dream, the dreams of men who have the helmets. Did you think you were the only one I have sought through the centuries? Did you believe yourself the sole favorite of the gods, the sole creator whose creations come through the dreams I grant?

“That is the secret—and some there are who have been content with it and have not sought to disobey. They have learned their lesson, guarded their helmets as a sacred secret. They created masterpieces.”

Codd’s mind was a kaleidoscope now, a montage of fugitive, fleeting fragments. He saw—and to his startled horror—recognized the faces and features of a dozen Titans. Great composers, famous artists, renowned writers, immortal sculptors. In an instant they embraced the redhaired essence of womankind, wore their helmets, created, lived, died. He comprehended everything, and the melange melted, merged, went back into Time for thousands of years.

How long had it been going on, and why, and who was Cleo Fane or that which called itself Cleo Fane?

“I grant you all answers,” came the thought-voice. “Behold, if you dare.”

Then he was on the island and he knew it for Aeae, and knew her for what she was—the eternal sorceress of all legend, the immortal, the undying, the symbol of creation and destruction known to blind Homer.

Redhaired Circe, whose delight it was to ensnare the souls of men. And men were unworthy of that embrace, they sinned against the gods, and became beasts. Swine and stallions, lions and wolves; she took from them the creative power they despised and left them only the animal. They became animals.

So had Homer sung the story—and ceased. But the story did not end. It could never end, for the gods are immortal. And when Aeae sunk into the sea, Circe sought refuge. Not on earth—for what is Time or Space to an immortal?—but far, far beyond.

Now Codd was back on the green planet once more, the far green planet with the three moons. This was Circe's new island; her island in space. Here men did not visit her, so she went among men from time to time.

"Always I seek ecstasy," the voice echoed. "Always I seek the thrill which comes only in participating in the act of creation. And it is my eternal curse that I cannot create of myself. I can only transform. I must go to men, to half-beasts who possess but do not appreciate this power, in order to awaken them. And when they reject their power, deny me a share of their soul's surrender, I avenge myself. I transform them into the animals they deserve to be. For they reject the gift of the gods, the helmet—"

Codd comprehended, and with a thrill of recognition, comprehended that he comprehended. This dream was different; a part of him was aloof, analytical. He wasn't in her power, wasn't in the helmet's power. He had the armour of Science, the weapons of Doctor Fine. He was invulnerable. He could listen, accept or reject at will. This was a new plot, perhaps. If he liked if he'd use it when he awoke; if not, he'd throw it away. Just as now, at any time he chose, he'd rip off the helmet and leave the crazy woman with her garbled dreams.

She was a woman, all right, and insane. And she'd given him hours of free fantasy while he was under hypnosis—all her mad delusions had been impressed on his brain. That's where the plots had come from, and no wonder he'd felt depressed while he was writing them! And now, ultimately, came the final product of her suggestions; the central core of her fixation. She was a sorceress, Circe, no less. And a streamlined, modern Circe who lived on a planet of her own, far out in space. Three moons, indeed! And all men were beasts, and she was greater than men, and she lured artists to their doom—

He saw her with the animals around her, now, and they wore helmets too. And they fawned on her and licked her naked feet, and she chose a mount and bounded off across the weird landscape that was no landscape but merely a reflection of the twisted convolutions of her own disordered brain.

She was pleading with him now, and shouting at him, and threatening him. He must not try to find out about the helmet, he must not resist the dreams, he must not see Doctor Fine. If he would keep on wearing the helmet and writing, she would never seek any vengeance.

"I'll give you dreams to weave wonders," she whispered. "You shall be famous, your name will live for all time. And all I ask is that I share. That I share the ecstatic moments of creation with your soul."

Codd pitied her, then; pitied her as she must have been when she sat beside him in the darkness and poured out her madness to his sleeping mind.

"But if you disobey, you know your punishment," the voice threatened. "And you cannot escape. You cannot escape, ever. It will go on, forever and ever, as long as the three moons wheel. So choose, choose! Would you be one with the gods, or a base and craven dog, a howling cur in the wilderness of a faraway world? Yours is the power of choice—mine the power to punish or reward. So choose, choose!"

There was pity in Codd's mind, but there was also a growing revulsion. He couldn't stand the morbidity much longer. He must remove himself from this source of aberration, return to sanity as a whole man. And he could do it. He heard her voice, saw the green world—and at the same time realized that he sat in his own apartment, wearing the absurd helmet. Doctor Fine had told him what to do. The Doctor was Fine, everything was fine, everything would be all right once he removed the helmet, removed the crazy notion from his head. Beast, was he? Dog, eh? He was a man, his own man.

And he could prove it. He could feel and he could act. Act as he acted now. Barnaby Codd lifted his hands to his head. He felt the helmet—it was real. And he could take it off.

She was screaming, now; screaming and laughing. Probably she had done so at the last, when she broke down completely in her delirium and cast her final "spell." In her way, the poor woman had actually been "possessed"—she thought of herself as a sorceress and so she had been.

But spells must be broken. Dreams must end.

He reached up and took off the helmet.

The screaming stopped. It stopped inside his head, stopped outside his head.

The helmet was off. He was free.

This was reality.

He was crouching now, panting, but he knew he had broken the spell. This was real. It was over, irrevocably over.

Barnaby Codd opened his eyes. Then she came over and patted his head, mounted his back. He lifted up his shaggy head and howled to the three moons. . . .

The Dream Makers

They were living memories—walking, living, breathing memories—and that's just what they intended to remain!

I'VE got the right lead for it. That's easy. I can start out with all the usual blah—Hollywood is a crazy town, filled with crazy people, and the craziest things happen there. I can rehash some of the weird and whacky and wonderful stories that have appeared in the news, and add a few which didn't appear, for obvious reasons. I can give this yarn the old buildup.

But there's only one trouble—it isn't a yarn and it happened to me.

So let's just start it slow and easy, with me climbing into my car that afternoon and heading out Wilshire Boulevard toward Restlawn. It was just another job and if Filmdom wanted me to do a series on "Grand Old-timers of the Movies," I was their man. Their hungry man, let's add.

I headed out past the Miracle Mile and into Beverly Hills, taking it slow. I didn't particularly like this assignment.

Grand Old-Timers. That's what started me off. I knew what I was getting into—nosing around the Actor's Home and Central Casting, following leads that ended up in cheap flophouses and the gutters of Main Street.

That's where the grand old-timers were, most of them. The men and women who "grew up with the Industry" until the Industry outgrew them. Oh, Pickford, Goldwyn, Chaplin, deMille, Ford and a few others didn't have to worry. They'd survived or retired gracefully on their savings.

Valentino and Chaney and Fairbanks didn't have to worry, either, because they died at the height of their success.

But what about the ones who weren't lucky enough to die while they were famous—Griffith, and Langdon, and Barrymore, struggling along until the all-too-bitter end? And what about those who hadn't died yet—Sennett and Keaton and Gish and a dozen others? They'd be considered Grand Old-timers, too.

WITH a sigh, I turned off Wilshire past Westwood Village, seeking the smaller side-streets. I knew all about the Grand Old-timers. The "special awards" trotted out for them at Academy banquets, and the doors slammed in their faces the next day. The humiliating "bit roles" played in occasional way-back-when films; the overpublicized "comebacks" that puffed them up for one picture, then deflated them again to extra status.

It would be painful for them to be interviewed by me—and equally painful for me to do the job.

But a man must eat. And a man must dream . . .

They'd never be Grand Old-timers to me, because of the dreams: the dreams they'd manufactured for my wonder thirty years ago. My dreams are still very much alive and so are their creators.

Right now, riding down into Santa Monica, I found myself back in one of the great dreams—the great nightmare.

It's a warm fall Wednesday night in Maywood, Illinois. The year is 1925 and tonight is its climactic moment, because you're eight years old and you're going to the Lido, all by yourself at night, just like a grownup. Sure, there's school tomorrow, but, gee, Ma, just this once, you promised, I won't be home too late, and I want to see it so bad.

You have eight blocks to walk, eight exciting blocks through autumn darkness, with the dime for the show in the right hand and the nickel for the candy bar in the left hand, and with every step, your heart pounds harder.

The Lido is a Palace. Its doors are guarded by marble columns a hundred feet high, but you don't just go right in. First you must look at all the pictures outside—the big ones in color and the little ones that are like photographs. There's this beautiful woman with the long hair and the man with the mask. And here the woman is standing on top of a tall building with another man in a soldier's uniform. Since he's got a trim little mustache, he must be the hero. Villains often wave mustaches, too, but they're bigger and blacker and nastier ones.

There's the man with the mask, spying on them. You can't see his face. He's up on some big statue and he looks mad, even with the mask on. That must be him, all right. It must be.

But it's almost seven and the show is going to start, so you go up to that glittering cage and give your dime to the pretty girl with the lovely costume on. She smiles, and punches some machine, and out comes your ticket. Then you walk in and give your ticket to the man at the door. He smiles, too. You've already bought your candy bar at the store next to the show, so you're all set.

It's wonderful in the Lido. Even the lobby is wonderful. All red carpets and fancy chairs and a big bubbler with the water running all the time—not like at home where you have to turn the water off on account of the water bill being so high.

And it's even better inside, in the dark, because there must be a thousand seats to choose from, all plush and soft. When you sit down right spang in the center of the show and count the rows ahead and the rows behind, and look to see if any of the kids from school are there to see you sitting all alone like a grownup—why, then, you just naturally look up at the sky.

SURE, they've got a sky at the Lido, just as blue as outside at night, and it has stars in it! Honest, it has regular stars that twinkle! And all along the walls are statues, lighted up kind of dim, and the stars are shining, and it's more beautiful than any real place you've ever seen.

Then the light goes on up at the left side of the stage and it's the organ. A real pretty lady plays the organ. She has gold hair that sparkles or shines when the light hits it. But you don't look now; you listen.

You sort of skooch down in your seat, all soft and snug, and look at the blue sky and the stars, and let the music ooze over you. That organ must be just about the most wonderful kind of thing to play, and it plays everything. "Valencia" and "Blue Skies" and "Avalon" and that song, "Collegiate," that they played when Harold Lloyd was in The Freshman.

But now the light is going out, except for the little one right over the keys, and the music is changing to a sort of loud exciting noise, and the curtain is going back, just like magic, and the side lights blink off, and there is the movie.

First off, it's Topics of the Day, which is just a lot of grownup jokes one after the other, in too-small printing on the screen. The organ makes fiddle-around noises, but it isn't very interesting, not like pictures. But then comes Felix the Cat and that little mouse is in it and the old farmer guy with the bald head and the beard. Funniest part is where Felix chases him through the haystack with the pitchfork and he falls in the well and comes up and spits out the water and a fish comes right out of his mouth.

But the real comedy is even better. It's got Billy Dooley in his sailor suit. Billy Dooley is one of the best, better than Bobby Vernon or Al St. John, but not quite as good as Lloyd Hamilton or Larry Semon or Lupina Lane. This one is real funny and everybody laughs. Billy Dooley, he jumps up in the air and sort of wigwags his feet three times before coming down again.

How do they do that?

Then the music pounds away and the comedy is over and they turn the lights blue for a minute. The big picture is coming the one you've been waiting to see. You can tell by the lights and the kind of music that it's a real spooky picture.

There's this man in the mask and he wants to get the girl and he hangs this one guy in the cellar. Then he does get her and takes her down to his secret hiding place where he sleeps in a coffin and plays the organ. He's sitting there playing with his mask on, and the girl sneaks up behind him, and you know what she's going to do now and you're tense and afraid.

All at once she does it—she pulls off the mask! And the face comes up to fill the screen, rushes out of the screen and blots out everything until there's nothing else in the world but that grinning flesh-covered skull with the rotting fangs and the glaring eyes that you're going to dream about tonight and every night.

And that's a dream you got from Lon Chaney.

OH, they made real dreams in those days. There's never been a monster since to equal Chaney, never a villain as arrogant as Stroheim, never a heroine as lovely as Barbara La Marr or a hero as rugged and determined as William S. Hart, who would go out alone in the hills to make his plans.

All of it came back from a million years ago, and then it was gone and I was riding down Caprice Drive and the sun was shining.

The sun shone on the Restlawn sign. I parked, walked up the drive, poked the buzzer. Chimes sounded.

The woman who opened the door wore a starched uniform. Her hair was starched and her eyes were starched, too. Stiff sanatorium face, stiff sanatorium voice. "I beg your pardon. I'm from Filmdom magazine. To see Mr. Franklin."

"Have you an appointment?"

"I called this morning."

"Room 216. That's on the second floor, front."

I took the stairs. I walked slowly, not relishing this, dreading what I might expect to find. A white-haired old man, sitting at the window of a private hospital room; sitting and staring out at the living in the streets and then staring back at the pictures of the dead lining his walls. To Jeffrey Franklin, the world's greatest director. Signed—Mickey Neilan, Mabel Normand, Lowell Sherman, John Gilbert.

Well, supposing they were dead, and supposing he was sick and old? He was still the world's greatest director. For my money and a lot of other people's money. Hadn't made a picture since that last floppola in '29, when sound really came in. But before that, he'd been one of the true dream makers.

Let's see, that was twenty-four, almost twenty-five years ago. Hard to imagine him still alive. Must be older than God. This was going to be sad, very sad. But a man must eat . . .

I knocked discreetly on the door of 216. The voice called "Come in." I opened the door and entered.

And the new dream began.

II

IN the publicity shots I'd seen of him a quarter-century ago, Jeffrey Franklin had appeared as a tall, black-haired man, smoking a curved-stem pipe. He was always pictured standing, legs apart, feet firmly planted, chin jutting forth aggressively.

Seeing Jeffrey Franklin in the doorway now was quite a shock.

He was a tall, black-haired man, smoking a curved-stem pipe. He stood with his legs apart, feet firmly planted, chin jutting forth aggressively.

I guess I stared.

"Come in and make yourself comfortable," he said in a deep, commanding voice.

It wasn't difficult to make myself comfortable, because 216 turned out to be a suite. There were at least two other rooms leading off the big parlor, and the parlor itself was more than spacious.

No hospital bed, no tattered clippings or faded photos on the walls, no institutionally uncomfortable furniture. Instead, I found myself in a modern, masculine decor that deserved to be called luxurious. The whole atmosphere was very definitely present-time. And so was Jeffrey Franklin.

"Get you a drink?" he asked. "Here?" I said, surprised.

He smiled.

"I'm a paying guest, not a patient. A little alcohol tones the system, I find. Keeps a man from getting old."

"It certainly seems to work." I blurted it out tactlessly, but he smiled again.

"Type-casting would put you down for scotch and water. Right?"

"Right."

"Speaking of type-casting, what did you think of Frisbie?"

"Who?"

"Miss Frisbie. The dragon who guards the portals. Isn't she perfect for the role?"

I nodded. Even before he placed the drink in my hand, I felt at ease.

I chose a lounge chair and Jeffrey Franklin made a gracefully self-conscious picture on the sofa across from me. He looked a bit like those man-of-distinction ads they used to run a few years back, and (as my thoughts grew still more remote) like one of the old-time Shakespearean hams. Come to think of it, hadn't he started out a rep player in legit?

THE question reminded me of my errand, and abruptly I felt embarrassed once again. He sensed it immediately; his perception was remarkable for a man his age. (Good Lord, how old was he? He had to be close to seventy.)

"It isn't easy, is it?" His voice, like his smile, had grown soft. "What isn't easy?"

"Being a ghoul." He raised his hand. "I don't mean it unkindly, son. I know you're just doing a job, getting your story. But I wish I had a nickel for every inquiring reporter who has come out here, spade in hand, to dig up the remains during the past twenty-odd years."

"You've been here that long?" He nodded. "Right here. Ever since Revolution."

"Your last picture."

"My last picture. The flop." There was no discernible emotion in his voice.

"But why—"

"I like it here."

"But you're not sick, and if you'll permit me to say so, it doesn't look as if you're broke, either. And you could have had other pictures. There were contracts waiting for you and—"

"I like it here." He leaned forward. "I'm afraid I can't give you much of a sob-story. And neither can Walter Harland, or Peggy Dorr, or Danny Keene, or any of the other regulars in my old company. None of us were forced out; none of us are on relief. You'll have a hard time squeezing the tears for this scene."

It was my turn to lean forward. "Mr. Franklin, I'd like to set you straight on one thing. I'm not looking for a sob-story. I wouldn't write it if I found it. Believe me, nothing pleases me more than to know you're here by choice. I don't like anything to happen to my dreams."

"Your dreams?" He dropped the man-of-distinction pose. The long hands joined across his knees, and I noted with vague satisfaction that the backs were free of the mottled markings of age. "What do you mean by dreams?" he asked.

So I told him, or tried to tell him. About Chaney in The Phantom of the Opera. The dream about Keaton in The General. Doug sliding down the drape in Robin Hood, Charlie eating the shoe, Renee Adoree stumbling after the truck in The Big Parade—a hundred memorable moments that somehow stick in my mind with a greater sense of reality than most contemporary events of my childhood.

I guess I talked a long while. About the films, and the actors, and the directors of the silent days. About the effect of the organ music, the autohypnosis which was rudely shattered by the theatrical phoniness of sound. I wondered out loud whether or not I was alone in my experience or viewpoint; how many hundreds or thousands or millions of others (trending along toward middle age, now, and it’s hard to realize that) might share the illusions of the great days when the “silver screen” was really silver and shimmered with a strange enchantment.

I tried to figure why it had changed. Was it that I was no longer a child, had grown up? No, because I’ve seen some of the films again, since then, at special showings—Caligari, of course, Zorro, Intolerance, a dozen others. And the last reels of The Strong Man are just as funny, the scene in The Thief where Doug conjures up the army from the dust is still pure enchantment.

Well, was it radio, or television, or the smart-aleck “inside stuff” attitude adopted generally in a world where everybody was busy dispensing the “lowdown” on celebrities?

Was it the war, the postwar era, the new age of fear? Had the Bomb done more than split the atom? Had it also shattered the dreams?

“Such stuff as dreams are made of.” Yes, Franklin was an old repertory ham, all right. He rolled out the quotation with sonorous relish, but I sensed the sincerity behind it.

“Odd that you’ve speculated along those lines,” he mused. “I didn’t think anyone else but ourselves had noticed the change.” He noted my look. “Walter Harland and Tom Humphrey and some of the others still get together and reminisce. You’ll probably be talking to them, if you’re planning a series of articles. They’ve aged pretty gracefully, you’ll find.”

I took the opening. “I hope you won’t be offended if I report the same thing about you,” I said. “Frankly, I can’t get over seeing you like this. I admit I expected—”

“This?” Jeffrey Franklin rose and abruptly seemed to shrink. In his place was a bent, hobbling oldster with withered, clawlike fingers scrabbling at a wobbly chin. Once again I remembered that he’d been an actor—remembered, too, that one of his tricks as a director was to play every role for the benefit of his actors before doing a take.

He straightened up, resumed his seat. “The years have been kind. Everything has gone well since Revolution. That was my only mistake, thinking I could go against their wishes. I haven’t tried to change the plot since, and neither has Walter or Tom or Peggy, or any of the others.”

My ears stood up, my forepaw raised, my tail straightened out, or would have if I had one. I smelled story here.

“Plot?” I said. “Then there is something to all those rumors—they did try to force you out when sound came and the studio reorganized. I suppose they threatened the company with the blacklist and pushed you out with a stock reshuffle?”

Jeffrey Franklin looked up at the ceiling for a moment before he answered. Once a ham, always a ham.

But his answer, when he gave it, was casual. “Sorry to disappoint you once again. I told you we weren’t forced out, and that’s the truth. Check with the others. They all had offers, plenty of offers. Most of them had legitimate stage experience and they could have switched to the talkies without any trouble. But we decided it was time to quit while we were ahead of the game. As I say, Revolution flopped. And there were other examples: people who didn’t have sense to quit when they should.”

“Perhaps. But I was thinking specifically of Roland Blade, Fay Terris, Matty Ryan.”

FUNNY how the names took on long-forgotten meanings to me. Roland Blade, whose name belonged up there with Novarro and LaRoque and Ricardo Cortez—yes, he’d done a talkie or two, and then he went over the cliff in his fancy car. Fay Terris was vintage stuff, a sort of American Pola Negri. Come to think of it, she’d made a few sound films before the fire in her beach-house, Ryan I didn’t recall very well. He’d been an independent producer and a rather big one; something like Thomas Ince. Let’s see, whatever happened to him? Suddenly I remembered the headlines. He’d been one of the early aviation enthusiasts, like Mary Astor’s first husband. He crashed, and they found his body cut almost in two—

Odd. Very odd. They all met violent deaths. And now I could recall a half-dozen more, all around that time. Some were mysterious suicides. One had been the victim of a still unsolved murder. Others perished in freak fires, drowned, disappeared.

“Do you mean you were superstitious about going along with the new era and making talking pictures?” I asked.

Franklin smiled. “Once a reporter, always a reporter,” he said. “Putting words in peoples’ mouths. Please don’t quote me to that effect, because I don’t mean any such thing at all.”

He paused, and once again his eyes sought the ceiling before he continued.

“If anything, I mean that we were all at the same point when the change came to Hollywood. We’d all started around the turn of the ’twenties, made our names together, did our best work and reaped the rewards at the same time. The best times were past, for most of the silent stars, directors, producers. All that remained was the struggle to stay on top, the resultant strain, the recklessness which would inevitably invade our personal life-patterns and which resulted in tragedy for those who chose to stay on. They used to call it ‘going Hollywood.’ You remember the stories of Lloyd Hamilton’s fancy parties, and Tom Mix with his sixteen-thousand-dollar car, and the things that happened to people like poor Wally Reid, Arbuckle, and the rest of the crowd.

“No, we just decided to quit, that’s all. I’m afraid it’s not a very sensational lead for you.”

I made one last try. “Didn’t you say something about ‘going against their wishes’ and something about a ‘plot’ ?”

Jeffrey Franklin rose. “You misunderstood me,” he said. “I was speaking of our wishes, as a group, to leave films. And I’ve already told you there was no conspiracy. Now, if you’ll excuse me, I’m rather tired. But I’ve enjoyed this interview very much.”

He was lying and I knew it.

But there was nothing else to do except shake hands and head for the door.

III

I WALKED into the little book-store, still wondering if I had the right address. Nobody was out front, and only a single bulb burned over the table at the rear of the shop. A stocky, middle-aged, bespectacled man dropped his book on the table and looked up at me.

“Yes?”

“I’m looking for Walter Harland.”

The man stood up. He was taller than I’d thought and not nearly as old as he seemed at first glance. He took off his glasses and smiled. And there, of course, stood Walter Harland.

There was something quite dramatic in the very simplicity of the revelation. And something else, something vaguely frightening. He was too young. Franklin was also too young. They looked the way they had back in ’29 or ’30.

I wrestled the thought, two falls out of three, while I introduced myself, explained my errand, and alluded to my visit with Jeffrey Franklin.

Walter Harland nodded. “I expected you,” he said. “Mr. Franklin w—told me that you might visit me.”

“It was kind of Mr. Franklin to w—tell you,” I answered.

He got it, and lowered his eyes.

“Don’t say anything,” I went on. “I can understand. This sort of thing isn’t exactly my idea of good taste, either.”

That got a smile out of him and an invitation to sit down. I went through the same routine with him as I had with Franklin and got virtually the same answers. I began to wonder if Franklin hadn’t given them all mimeographed copies of a script to memorize.

Yes, he'd had other offers when Franklin's production unit disbanded. No, he hadn't wanted to continue. Yes, he had plenty of money to live on; he'd bought this bookstore and was quite content. He had discovered it was much more pleasant to read other people's plots than to act them out.

I had to make the effort, then. "What's all this about plots?" I asked. "There's a rumor going around that you're the victim of some kind of plot to force you into obscurity."

It would be appropriately dramatic, at this moment, to report that Walter Harland gasped and turned pale. But actually he merely choked on his cigarette smoke—and if he had any dermatological reaction at all, the light was much too dim to disclose it.

"Don't believe everything you hear," he said, when his brief choking spell was over. "This isn't a B-movie, you know. I assure you, we talked it over sensibly and we agreed it was time to quit."

"Because you were all at the height of your fame, and you had reaped the rewards and didn't want to go downhill," I finished for him. "Is that it?"

"Precisely." He was happy now. We were back on the script again. I wished I could leave him there, but a man has to eat. So I gave him my friendliest smile and let him have it right between the eyes.

"I've heard that song before," I said, "and I don't buy it. Not a note rings true. You were good and everybody knows it. But you were a ham, like all the rest. You always played it big because you loved it that way. Signing autographs. Posing in those satin dressing gowns, with the initials on the lapels yet. Attending premieres in your Rolls, with the flappers kissing the tires. Dragging those wolfhounds into the Montmarte. That was your meat, wasn't it?"

HARLAND chuckled; a good, hearty actor's chuckle. "I suppose so. But a man gets older. He grows up."

"Actors never grow up in that sense of the word, and you know it! Nothing could make a matinee idol like you give up the glamor routine.

Nothing except, perhaps, an awful scare of some kind. Come on now, what was it?”

I felt pretty proud of my D.A. routine, because it seemed to work. He sat there, breathing heavily for a long while.

“All right,” he said softly then. “There was a scare. An awful scare. Remember the films I played in? The fencing sequences, the fights, the acrobatics—Fairbanks stuff? That’s what I was identified with. One day I went to the doctor for a routine check-up. He got excited, took cardiagrams. You know the answer. My ticker was going bad. He warned me to take things easy if I wanted to be around for encores.”

For a moment, I was a little ashamed of myself. Then that word “warned” cropped up again. And I remembered that if I could play the D.A., Walter Harland could play the part of a man with a bad heart. And I realized that before he’d spoken, he’d looked up at the ceiling.

Maybe there was a fly up there, buzzing around. But something else kept buzzing in my brain.

I didn’t say a word. I just shook my head.

He was already on his feet, ready to finish the script that Jeffrey Franklin had so carefully prepared. He held out his hand, then hesitated.

“You really want to know, don’t you?” he said. “Not just to get an article, but because it means something to you.”

I nodded.

“I’m afraid there’s no way of explaining.” He led me to the door, paused, put his hand on my shoulder. “Do you enjoy reading?” he asked.

“Yes.”

“So do I. I’ve had a lot of time for it these past twenty years and more. I was particularly impressed with the writings of a man named Charles Fort. You know his work? Good. Well, Fort had an idea about cycles and events. Almost Spenglerian. He once said that when it’s steam-engine time, people suddenly begin to steam-engine. Nothing much can be done to hasten that time. But, on the other hand, nothing much can be done to retard it. Maybe we all did the right thing because we recognized it was the right time.”

I was back out on the street, looking up at the sky. And Walter Harland was back in his shop, looking at the ceiling. Or was it the ceiling?

IV

LET'S save the rest for the kindergarten class. I found Peggy Dorr in Pasadena. Danny Keene had a boat at Balboa. Tom Humphrey—of all people!—operated a TV service repair shop not far from Farmer's Market.

And you know what else I found when I located them. Too-young faces, too-evasive answers, too-uniform a story. And that faraway look in their eyes.

It all added up to one big puzzle. Unfortunately, detective stories aren't my line. I was Out after stories I couldn't get. The whole assignment was turning out to be one grand and glorious fiasco.

Where was the drama in it, the old heart-throb, the pathos, the violin-music in the background? Everything had stopped for them in 1930, and the whole story belonged in the era before then when they made—literally made—the movies.

And nobody cared about that any more.

Or did they?

Riding back from the visit with Tom Humphrey, the notion hit me.

By Louis B. Mayer and all the saints, here was a story!

Not a lousy article, or a series of articles. This was a movie!

Look at how they flocked to the Jolson pictures, the life of Will Rogers, and all these phony stage-biography films. What about using the same gimmick on the life of Jeffrey Franklin? The whole silent-picture story, in glorious Technicolor, Warner color, Cinecolor, who cares?

Sure, Twentieth did Hollywood Cavalcade, but that was more than a dozen years ago. Besides, I had the kicker. Call it coincidence, fate, or just a happy accident for the benefit of yours truly, I had something that would really sell such a film. No more working with imitators and fakes—with the aid of a little modern lighting and makeup, the film could actually be done with the original cast playing real-life roles!

Natural. Socko. Boffo. The whole Variety lexicon flashed through my mind, and then the plot started to take shape, and before I knew it, I was sitting at the typewriter banging out a movie treatment.

It was a good one. I didn't have to take my word for it. I had Cy Charney's word. I sat in his office and braved the blasts fired by two complete cigars as he read through it, then had the satisfaction of seeing one of the biggest agents on the Strip going crazy over my idea.

"I can sell this tomorrow," he said. "It's completely copasetic. Of course you're not a name, but the idea is big enough. I think I can start the bidding at—lemme see now—thirty-forty Gs. And maybe a writing assist for you on the real script. You free to take an assignment, boy?"

I damn near broke my neck nodding.

"Keep in touch," said Charney. "Now get outta here and let me use my fine Eyetalian hand on this deal."

I got out of there, but things were happening so fast, I couldn't quite believe my ears. Then again, I wasn't depending on my ears in this deal. I had Mr. Charney's fine Eyetalian hand.

AND what a fine hand it was, too! He called me exactly twenty-six hours later.

"All sewed," he said. "Freeman is crazy about it and Jack wants it, too. And I can get fifty from one of them if the other knows he's got competition. I'll have a contract in my office before the week is out. Can you line them up by that time?"

"Line who up?"

"The cast, boy! Old Franklin and Harland and the rest. I'm taking your say-so on this that they're still what you say they are instead of strictly for the glue-factory. Of course, they'll have to be tested and all, but I'm selling the story that they're still full of p. and v. Right? Now I'm asting you to line 'em up. 'Course, if you want me to come with you and put on the old pressure—"

"No, that won't be necessary. Let me handle it."

"Tell 'em not to worry about figures." Charney said. "I'll represent 'em. They oughta know what that means in this town. And, say, be sure you wangle a release out of old Franklin. It isn't exackly his life-story, but it's close enough so maybe you gotta cut him in on the story price. You work it out with him, hah?"

"Yes," I said. "I'll work it out with him."

But as I hung up, I wondered. I sat back and glanced up at the ceiling. There was no answer up there—not for me.

But, then, I wasn't superstitious. Maybe that was the answer: actors were superstitious, actors were always "on," actors were always hams.

Hams! I had it.

First thing I did, I sent a copy of the treatment, marked PERSONAL, to everybody I'd interviewed. Sent it special delivery, with an accompanying confidential letter. Gave it the complete buildup, including what a wonderful opportunity this would be to recreate the real art of the motion picture as it existed in the old days. I also hinted (and hoped I could actually make good on it, too) that a portion of the film's profits might be donated to the welfare funds for the benefit of less fortunate old-timers. And in each letter I stressed what a tremendous part was waiting for the recipient.

I gave the deal just twenty-four hours to get rolling. Then I went around to Walter Harland's bookshop.

The first thing I noticed as I came in was that he didn't wear his glasses any more. And he had on a suit that had nothing in it to attract or impress the bibliophile. He'd sharpened up, which was fine.

"Well?" I said.

"Congratulations. It's tremendous. I had no idea what was in back of all this. Your cagy interview approach fooled me completely."

He not only offered, he ushered me, to a chair. And he pushed a package of Players my way.

"Did me good to read it," he said. "I feel twenty years younger."

"You look it," I told him, truthfully. "And that's what a new generation of movie fans are going to say when they see you on the screen."

HE beamed. "Danny and Tom called me last night. And Lucas—remember him? Used to do the heavies, with the long cigarette holder, the sideburns and all? They're so excited—"

Something small stumbled into the bookshop; something old and withered and trembling like autumn's last leaf. It had a piping whiskey tenor, and it bleated, "Wait, I dowanna in'errupt you, but I just gotta talk t'you a minute."

"Sure, Tiny." Harland got up, walked over to the counter. The little man bleated in his ear for a moment. Harland went to the cash-register, rang up a NO SALE, and palmed something in the rummy's hand. "Now, if you'll excuse me—"

"Yeah, Walt. Yeah. God bless you." And autumn's last leaf blew away.

"Sorry." Harland came up to me, smiling.

"You don't have to be sorry," I said.

"Yes, I do."

"Meaning?"

"I can't do it. We can't do it. Your picture."

"But—"

"Spare me the sales talk. You know I'm dying to do it. So are the others. I wouldn't fool you. Why, it would be like starting life all over again. What I wouldn't give to see my name up there, show all these young punks how a real actor can project!"

"Then why—"

He was onstage and it was his scene all the way. "Because I told you we agreed to quit, all of us. And we did. There were one or two exceptions, but they aren't around any more. You didn't know it, but you just caught a glimpse of somebody who tried the other way. He only did one job for Franklin, and it was a minor comedy role, so I guess he got off easy in consequence. But it's no go. We couldn't take the risk."

"What risk?" I argued. "It's bound to be a smash. You can't lose a thing, and look what you stand to gain."

He shook his head. "Remember what I said about steam-engine time? We're horse-and-buggy people and we've got to stay where we belong." He smiled, because he was doing Pagliacci now. "Besides, here's one thing you can bet on—there's no picture without the old man and he'll never go for it. Never."

I shrugged myself out of the store, fast. I had a reason. I was looking for the last leaf. I knew him now—Tiny Collins. Never a big-name comic, but an old reliable, on a par with Heinie Mann, Billy Bevan, Jack Duffy.

One look at him, and at the little act he'd put on with Harland in the store, and I could figure out where to find him.

It was just four doors down the street.

COLLINS was up there at the end of the bar, all alone with a small shot and a large beer for company. He'd stopped trembling, now that he was back home again.

I uttered the magic formula. "Aren't you Tiny Collins? I'll buy."

It just so happens that I was able to dredge up the names of several of his pictures. Just so happens that I was able to dredge up several more shots and beers. Just so happens that got him into the back booth and steered the conversational boat into my particular idea of a snug harbor.

Tiny was funny: Drinking sobered him up. He stopped slurring his sentences and became thoughtful. I didn't mention the picture at all, but I did set the scene for him. I hinted that I might do an article on him, and that was enough. We were pals. And you can ask a pal anything, can't you?

"Level with me, now," I said. "What's got into all your old friends? Why are they so publicity-shy and why did they quit?"

"You're asking me? Question I been asking myself for twenny years—why they quit. Different with me. I got the old axe. But they didn't have to quit. Seems like they all got together at once and decided."

"I know, Tiny. And I was wondering why. It just doesn't make sense."

"Nothin' makes sense," he agreed. "They wanna quit, so they get offers. I dowanna quit and right—like that—l can't get a job. Me, Tiny Collins, that's played with Turpin and Fields and whatzisname and—"

"I know, Tiny. I know. Here, let's have another." We did, and I waited for the gulping to subside before I continued. "But surely you have a theory."

" 'Course I have a theory. Lotsa theories. First one is, they're all dead."

"Dead?"

"Sure. They got together and formed one of those—whatcha call 'em—suicide pacts. When they heard about Blade and Terris and Ryan and Todd and all the others bumping at the same time, they figured they hadda go, too. So they made a agreement and killed themself."

He meant to laugh, but midway it turned into a cough. I rode that one out, too.

"Only they're not dead, Tiny," I said.

"What? Oh, sure. They're not dead. Only they look like they're dead. Didn't you notice? Now take me, frinstance. I'm same age as Tom Humphrey. But look at the diffrence. I'm all beat up and him—he looks just like he did in The Black Tiger. That was his last one, for First National 'r somebody. And all of them are alike.

They look like they stopped when they stopped making pictures. Like they died and somebody stuffed 'em and wound 'em up."

I considered the theory a moment. I also considered that Tiny's shot-and-a-beer routine might have something to do with the difference in appearances.

"You have any other theories?" I asked.

Tiny looked at me. That is, he made a good effort. But he was weaving again.

"Yes. Yes, I got a theory. You won't tell anybody?"

"Honor bright."

"Good enough. Because—well, I know it sounds screwy, but I think they got scared." He groped for the beer-glass.

"Scared," I prompted.

"Good and scared. The old man, Franklin, he done it. He filled 'em full of the old juice. I heard stories. I ain't the one to confirm or deny. Confirm or deny." He-liked the phrase.

"What stories?"

"The old man. He went off his trolley. After Revolution. The talkies comin' in and everybody croakin'. He got scared bad it might happen to him. And he was like God to the others. What he said—says—goes. He says quit, they quit. Also, you know how screwy they can get out here. Way I personly dope it out, maybe the old man he got roped into one of those phony cults. You heard about phony cults?"

I assured him I had heard about phony cults.

"Suppose they got to him and sold him a billa goods on one of them religions-like? And the high potentate or whoever said it's not in the cards for you to make pictures no more. It's just not in the stars—"

Something clicked. Stars. The ceiling.

"Thanks, Tiny." I rose.

"Hey, where you goin' ?"

"I've got a date."

"But I was just gettin' ready to buy a round—"

"Some other time. Thanks. Thanks very much." And I meant it.

After I got out of there, I headed for home. I drove slowly, because I had a lot to think about. Tiny made sense to me; the others didn't.

Pieces began to form and fit together. I remembered a lot I'd forgotten about Jeffrey Franklin. His acknowledged superstitions. The way he'd hold up a scene for days until he got exactly the right actor for a walk-through bit. The way he'd junk whole sequences, just like Stroheim, because something didn't look right. The way he handled his actors; never cursing them, but praying for them instead. Praying for them. And (I remembered now) he had this trick of looking up in the air as if seeking divine guidance.

Now just suppose he had been sneaking off to astrologers—Lord knows, plenty of them did in the old days and were still doing it today—and one of them gave him the word that Gemini was in Uranus or wherever. And he stopped, just like that.

Could be. And could be, I might find out who his personal stargazer was and make a little deal. Or switch him onto another astrological or half-astrological quack. It was a cinch I had to do something.

I got home, let myself in, and prepared to go to work. The astrologers had listings in the phone book. I'd call every single one if necessary and—

It wasn't necessary. My phone rang, instead. And the voice said:

"This is Jeffrey Franklin. I received your communication and I was wondering when I could see you."

"Why, tonight if you like, Mr. Franklin."

"Good. We have a lot to talk about. I'm going to do your picture."

V

WE sat in the suite, drinking scotch. The sun went down in the Pacific, courtesy M-G-M, and then Universal put the moon up in Technicolor.

Franklin did the talking. "So you see, it wasn't your story idea that convinced me, although I admit I was tempted. But when he called me up—the head of the studio, mind you!—and said his own car was on the way . . ."

I nodded, suddenly realizing that I'd underestimated Mr. Charney's fine Eyetalian hand.

". . . and you can't imagine how it felt, just being back on a lot once more! Of course, many things are different, but I'm quite sure I have a grasp of technique. I've kept up on all the technical data would you believe it, I still read every issue of The American Cinematographer—and I see everything that's released. And he has faith in me. He knows what it means to have me back in the Industry, actually directing—"

"Directing?"

"Certainly!" Franklin's smile outshone the moon. "That's the biggest surprise of all. I'm to direct as well as act in my own story." What a fine Eyetalian hand! There was no mistaking what this meant to Franklin. He was drunk on his own adrenalin.

"I never realized they still remembered me," he said. "Of course, there was this Academy dinner thing, a few years ago, but I thought that was merely a gesture. And then, today, sitting there in the Executive Office, with everybody on the lot—I mean just that, everybody of any importance—literally begging to get in and meet me! You can't begin to realize what it means, son. You get used to the idea that it's all over, you even think of yourself as a has-been."

He sighed. "But I'm ready now. For the first time in years, I'm being honest with myself when I say that I've always been ready. And I think, working together, all of us, that we can come up with a few tricks that will surprise the Industry."

Intoxication is contagious. I began to get a little high myself now. Fifty thousand less ten per cent is forty-five thousand, knock off half for taxes and it's still over twenty thousand clear, plus an assist on the screenplay—Franklin would go to bat for me on that, I knew—and I'd be working on an A-budget special, and who knows where it might lead to?

Three cheers for the Grand Old-timers! Yes, and three cheers for—

The phone rang. Jeffrey Franklin walked over and picked it up in that very special way the graceful actor's way. And his inflection, his modulation, was impeccable.

"Yes, this is Jeffrey Franklin speaking."

I watched him do the scene, noted the sudden faltering, the sag.

"No! Not really . . . terrible!

“. . . When? . . . Of course, certainly, anything you think he needs . . . Friday afternoon? Yes . . . Where will it be? . . . Yes. Tomorrow . . . Thanks.”

THE phone clicked. Franklin sat down. For a moment, he almost looked his age.

“Bad news,” he said. “An old friend of mine was killed early this evening. He was run over by a truck. The funeral will be Friday afternoon, and naturally I’ll attend. Our studio conference must be delayed until Monday.” He shook his head. “It’s hard to see them go, one by one. You’ll understand that, son, when you’re my age.”

“I’m sorry,” I said. “Was it anyone I know?”

“I don’t think so. Just somebody from the old days. He once did a bit in one of my productions. Tiny Collins.”

This was my cue. I took it and kept my mouth shut. I kept it shut after I left Franklin, kept it shut all the next day. Of course there was a meeting with the gleeful Mr. Charney, during which he paced the floor and waved both of his fine Eyetalian hands in ecstasy over our good fortune. But I kept away from Harland and the others. They mustn’t know that I’d talked to Tiny Collins.

They mustn’t know what I was beginning to suspect—because I didn’t want to admit it, even to myself.

But Friday afternoon was the time set for the funeral, and I was there. And so was Danny Keene and Peggy Dorr and Tom Humphrey and Walter Harland and four other people whose names I never did learn. The local press and the Reporter had inserted routine squibs; but Tiny Collins, alive or dead, wasn’t news. He wasn’t even a Grand Old-timer, or the studios would have sent flowers, charged off to the public relations fund.

I sat with Jeffrey Franklin as the hired reverend went through the stock routine with the assistance of the hired undertaker and the hired pallbearers. It was a poor performance. Two of the four strangers present were fat old ladies and they cried the way fat old ladies always cry—loudly and unconvincingly. The cheap chapel set looked as though it might be struck right in the middle of the scene, and the lighting was inferior—the kind rented by a quickie unit on a per diem basis.

And that was the funeral given Tiny Collins, who had played with Turpin and with Fields and with whatzisname, who had literally sunk to the gutter and was now making his final comeback, playing his one big scene as the star of the show. Too bad it was such a turkey. He wouldn't have approved.

The organist did routine things—why did that remind me so strongly of the old silents?—as we filed out. We had to finish the production at the cemetery.

IT didn't take long. The sky was overcast, and the approaching storm was so visible that even the Chamber of Commerce would have scuttled for cover. The reverend mumbled his lines, performed his inevitable gestures, and then they lowered the body.

It was a single take and they muffed it—let it down too fast. But nobody seemed to mind. Everyone started walking back to the path. The little group broke up, seeking their cars and eying the clouds whirling in from the west.

I stuck close to Jeffrey Franklin. Both of us had been pretty quiet throughout. He strode along the path, puffing on his pipe. As I followed, I realized he wasn't joining the group at the cars.

We walked over a little knoll into another part of the cemetery. There were more trees here and plenty of monuments. A turn in the path took us into the exclusive residential district—for every cemetery out here has its own miniature Beverly Hills.

He climbed another knoll. There was a stone bench on top: a stone bench facing an imposing monument which featured a D'Artagnan figure heroically poised atop a marble globe.

I looked twice at the figure, and recognition came to me before I read the name.

“Roland Blade!” I said.

“Yes.” Jeffrey Franklin sat down on the stone bench facing the monument. He refilled his pipe as I joined him. The wind whistled through the treetops and I didn’t like the tune.

This was the time to use the old psychology. I felt the need of a fine Eyetalian hand of my own—to grab Franklin by the scruff of his neck and raise his spirits. Not knowing exactly how to do it, or what to say, I blurted out what was on my mind.

“The funeral certainly wasn’t much of a production, was it?”

He shrugged. “Why should it be? Tiny wasn’t important enough to be worthy of a script. The whole scene was done off the cuff.”

That was odd. He must have been thinking the same way I was—comparing the funeral to a motion picture. I remembered his comment on the Restlawn nurse and his references to “type-casting.” Peculiar.

“Look, son,” said Franklin, “I’d better talk to you.”

“Depends on the script.”

“What script?”

Franklin emptied his pipe. “That’s what I’m going to tell you. It isn’t easy, but now that we’re going ahead with the movie, chances are that you won’t like it. I don’t.”

I steadied myself. Here it comes, boy. Here’s your astrology or whatever it is, and you’d better not argue or laugh in his face.

“Omar Khayyam must have known when he wrote those lines about a chess game. In Omar’s time it might have been chess. Shakespeare put it down when he said, ‘All the world’s a stage.’ And perhaps it was a stage when he lived. For us, it’s motion picture production. Steam-engine time. Movie time. And it amuses them to write a script, cast it, produce and direct.”

E paused just long enough for me to say, “Them?”

H “Them. They. It. One or many. Call the forces what you will—gods, demons, Fates, or cosmic intelligences. All I know is that they exist, have always existed, will always exist. And it amuses them to select certain mortals to enact roles in the little dramas they devise.” I forgot my good resolutions and burst out, “Are you trying to tell me that the whole world is being run as a movie plot, with some superhuman forces directing everyone’s actions?”

He shook his head. “Not everyone’s. Just a few, a select few. The superior ones, and those brought into contact with them by the necessity of the plot. Omar must have known, Shakespeare must have known, for they were superior. The majority of mankind goes along, shooting off the cuff and conducting affairs in the usual shoddy, shabby manner. Even their crimes, their love affairs, their deaths are undramatic and unconvincing. Their lines are pedestrian and uninspired, and they never create.

“Don’t you see it now? That’s the whole criterion—if you’re creative, you have some affinity with them. They notice you and write you into the script. You spoke of me and some of the others as being dream makers. We are. We were, rather, in the old days, because it was a part of the plot.” The wind was roaring in from the ocean, but it didn’t bother me any longer. I had other things to worry about, now. Franklin was batty and—

“I wish I could get you to understand,” he said. “Because it’s really quite important, you know. Once you accept the fact, you’ll learn how to adjust. You won’t make the mistake of going against the Producer or the Director or the Writer. You won’t run the risk of being edited out of the film. Because you’re an actor now, like it or not, and you can’t fight the script. If you do, the Director will catch you. And he’ll have the Cutter slice your scenes. That’s what happened to Blade and a lot of the others.”

You can’t reason with a loony, but I tried. “Mr. Franklin, you just aren’t getting through to me. You sound more like Tiny Collins the other night, when he—”

It slipped out, just like that. Was it supposed to? Was it in the script?

“You knew Tiny Collins?”

“Well, I talked to him.” And I told him what had happened. He listened, shaking his head. He glanced up at the sky, at the scudding clouds. Was he waiting for another cue before he spoke?

“Then perhaps Tiny’s accident wasn’t an—accident. He got back in the script again.”

“I wish you wouldn’t talk that way. This idea that all the important people in the world are part of some cosmic movie just doesn’t make sense.”

“What does make sense?” he shot back. “World wars, atom bombs, plagues, famines? Perhaps it isn’t a movie for everyone, just for movie makers. Maybe they play War up there for generals and statesmen. And others might run a Business for executives. If you ever get to know any military leaders or high politicians or industrial tycoons, you might ask them. If it’s true, they’ll know. They’ll find out when they try to drop the script and run their own show.”

A PUNCTUATION of distant thunder stopped Franklin for a little while.

“Omar knew. He wrote what he was supposed to write—perhaps that’s why they do it; they might feed on creative energy in some way we’ll never comprehend—and then he stopped. Never wrote another line, but retired to obscurity. Because they tired of the scene and set a new one. Rubaiyat time was over. And Shakespeare stopped writing, too. Think about it for a while; think of the names, the big names, who flourished for a given period and then dropped out of the picture forever. They were still at the height of their powers, too.” I tried to use logic. “But think of all the others who have kept going,” I said. “The thousands who didn’t quit.”

“Some of them weren’t big enough to be directed,” Franklin answered. “Some of them undoubtedly knew, but were defiant. Napoleon’s script ended at Elba, but he fought the Producer and came back. Well, you don’t make comebacks in this world. They end in disaster. Napoleon time was over. He knew it before he died on St. Helena.”

The sky was dark. Franklin lit his pipe and a thousand tiny red eyes winked out in the wind.

"But I'm not talking theory, son. I'm talking reality. I'm talking myself, and my company, and a dozen others who must have learned the secret in the days when we made the silent dreams. The script was right for us to succeed then and our success was sudden and spectacular. That was silent time. But talkie time came, and there was a new script, calling for new players. We had our choice—get out or be cut out. The wise ones retired. The Cutter got the rest. Now do you see?"

I saw. "Maybe. But why are you telling me this?"

Franklin smiled. It was a ghost-smile in ghost-light, but I sensed it. "Because in the last few days, I've found out that I'm more than an actor. I'm a man. And a man must lead his own life. I thought, at one time, that I could take my bow and sit in the audience for the rest of the show. And for more than twenty years, I did. Then you came along, with your script. Your script, not theirs. And I want to do it. I want to direct it. I'm a director, too."

"Good." And it was good, I thought. "We'll do the picture."

He patted my shoulder. "Of course we will, son. But it wouldn't be fair to go ahead without warning you. There are the Cutters to consider. If the Director spots us ad-libbing and raises his finger—"

So help me, the old ham lifted his own finger and pointed dramatically at the statue of Roland Blade. And the thunder came booming in, right on cue!

FOR a moment, he almost had me sold. I thought of Blade, of Fay Terris, Matty Ryan and all the others who defied the coming of sound, who died before their time, died in sudden and inexplicable violence. Died before their time? Cut off after their time.

I wondered if they were watching us now, listening in on the scene, appreciating the gestures. I wondered if they had just sent out a signal to turn on the rain-making machine.

The downpour came. I rose hastily from the bench and started off down the path. I looked back, expecting Jeffrey Franklin to join me.

“In a minute,” he said. “I’m just thinking.”

“Now, look,” I called. “You promised.”

Jeffrey Franklin straightened up. He stood there in the rain, legs apart, feet firmly planted, chin jutting forth aggressively.

“You have my word. I promised you, I promised myself, and I promise them. From now on, I direct and act my own life. I’ll make the picture.”

I was a hundred feet away, the night was dark, and the rain a deluge; but even so, I caught his face. The chin was tilting up now.

Jeffrey Franklin was staring at the sky again.

It was lightning, of course—a single sharp bolt that chopped down Jeffrey Franklin and the picture, my hopes, everything. As the papers said later, and as I desperately told myself over and over again, even as I ran toward the dismembered corpse, it was only a freak accident.

But I couldn’t hide from myself, as I ran, the final revelation or realization. Oh, it was a lightning bolt, all right—but to me, in the single instant that I saw it, it was more like the blade of a gigantic scissors.

The Dynamics of an Asteroid

Honestly, some of the patients you get are a scream. Positively a scream!

Not that I’d want any other kind of work - where else can you make up to twenty dollars a day, and all you do, really, is sort of play nursemaid for a couple of hours? Compared to a hospital or working in some G.P.‘s office, it’s nothing at all. But the types you run into!

Take this last one I had - I didn’t tell you about him, did I? He was a hundred years old.

One hundred years old! Can you imagine? No, I’m pretty sure of it, the way he talked and all. And to hear him tell it, up to three months ago he was dressing and feeding himself and handling everything in the house out of his wheelchair. Of course, he ordered what he needed over the phone and the hotel sent it right up, meals and everything. But think of that - one hundred years old and all alone ‘in a wheelchair, and he did everything himself!

Of course, you might, guess it just to look at him. He’d been some kind of professor of arithmetic or mathematics, whatever they call it, but that was when he was young. Imagine, sixty years ago or so! And then he was in this accident and his left side was paralyzed and he went into a wheelchair. Sixty years, that’s a long time to live in a wheelchair. Doctor Cooper, he was handling the case, just stopping in once a week, he said it was amazing.

But the old boy was tough, I got to say that for him. Just one look at him was enough to let you know. Of course when I was put on the case he was in bed already, but sitting up. And when he sat up you couldn’t tell he was paralyzed at first. He had a big bald head and a bulgy forehead and his eyes were sunk way hack, like they sometimes get. But he wasn't shriveled or even very wrinkled.

He'd stick that head out and his face would move from side to side but all the while those little eyes would stare at you to make sure you were listening.

He talked a lot. Talked and wrote. He was forever having me mail stuff for him. A lot of it went abroad to foreigners in colleges over there - professors, I guess. And people in the government over here, and fellas like this Einstein.

That's what I wanted to tell you about - he wrote to Einstein! Did you ever hear of such a thing in all your life?

At first he didn't talk about what he was doing, at least not very muck. But he kept getting weaker and weaker and along about the last month he couldn't write. And of course it was hard for him to sleep. Doctor Cooper was all for giving him hypos but he wouldn't take them. Hot him! He was tough.

But some nights he'd call me in - I slept in the other room on the couch - and he liked for me to read to him. He got all kinds of crazy-sounding magazines; scientific ones, I guess. And some of them were in German and French and I don't-know-what-all. Of course I couldn't read those, and when I tried to read the regular English ones he got mad because of course I didn't know all those two-dollar words.

So mostly he had me read the papers. And that's where the crazy part started.

Take like the crime news. You know, there's been a lot of killings lately, all these G.I. murderers and that. And I'd get to reading about them and all of a sudden he'd be laughing.

At first it bothered, me. I thought he was just plain se-nile. The way they get sometimes, you know.

But once, about two weeks before he died, he was listening to me read about one of those crime syndicates; I mean where they all gang up and plot like blackmail extortions and things.

And he gave this chuckle of his and he said, “Strange, isn’t it, Miss Hawes?”

So I said, “What’s strange?”

And he said, “To think that it’s still going on. It takes one back, Miss Hawes. It takes one back.”

I said, “You mean they used to have gangs like this when you were –” I stopped real quick, because I’d almost said, “alive.”

And the funny thing happened, because he finished the sentence for me and he said, “alive?” Then he laughed again. “Yes, they had gangs when I was alive, and master criminals and workers behind the scenes. I was one myself, although you may find that hard to believe. Just as it may be hard for you to believe that I died over sixty years ago.”

Then I knew for sure he was getting se-nile. And it must have showed on my face.

“Perhaps you might be interested in my story,” he said. And of course I said, “Yes,” even though I wasn’t. To tell you the truth I kept right on reading the paper all the while he was talking, but I wish now I’d listened a little more because some of it was real wild.

So he kept on rambling about how it was when he was a young man in college or university or wherever, and he was studying all this fancy mathematics stuff, and then he got out and he couldn’t get a job. I guess he finally got to teaching for a sort of a small private school and then he was a tutor, like, for rich kids over in England.

And he wrote some books but nobody paid any attention because he was ahead of his time, whatever that means.

Well, to make a long story short, I gather he wanted to get married and his girl turned him down for a richer fella, and he just went all to pieces. That’s how he became a criminal, to hear him tell it.

And, to hear him tell it, he was a real big-shot.

He was like one of those super-criminals you hear about; never did anything himself but just gave advice. He would plan things for the rest to do and get a commission.

He said he had a logical mind and because of all that studying he did, he knew just how to organize things. Pretty soon he was working for gangs all over Europe, too, and he made a fortune. That part of it I can believe, because even now he was living in this big hotel suite and he hadn’t worked for over sixty years, being in a wheelchair and all.

But all the while he told me this he kept working in names and dates and places that didn’t make any sense to me, and I just couldn’t be expected to pay too much attention.

Finally he saw I wasn’t listening and he shut up. That suited me, except that I wondered what he’d meant about him dying, like he said.

A couple of nights later that came up again. I was reading about some doctors out west, keeping somebody alive massaging the heart during an operation - you know. They did it over at Sinai a few months ago, didn’t they?

Anyhow, he said, “Doctors! Call themselves medical authorities and they don’t know the first thing about life. If I’d listened to them, I’d be dead and buried these sixty-odd years past.”

Well, it just happened that I was pretty tired, and I guess I must have dozed off right in the middle of what he was saying. But 1 remember him starting out with this story about how he got tangled up with the police and some detective was out to get him, only he got him first. After they had a big fight somewhere, I forget the name, he was left for dead. Only he wasn’t dead, he was just paralyzed.

This was over in Europe someplace, and he decided to stay there when he got patched up. He had plenty of money put away in a dozen different banks, and nobody was looking for him; being crippled up, he was glad to get out.

Besides, this detective was supposed to be dead and he was wanted for killing him if he ever showed up.

So it was a good idea to retire. After that he just moved around from place to place all over Europe.

Once hie thought he'd go back home, but the funniest thing happened, to hear him tell it - the man he was supposed to have killed wasn't dead after all, but still alive.- And if he went back it would start all over again.

So he stayed dead, as far as anyone knew. I guess he came over to this country from where he lived in Germany, when the Nazis got started there.

"It's a strange experience, being dead for so many years," he said. "But I see I'm boring you, Miss Hawes . . ."

That's when I knew I must have dozed off. I apologized all over the place, but he just chuckled. Didn't bother him a bit.

No, that's not all. Wait a minute, there's one thing more I want to tell you about. That's this crazy business about the asteroid. You know what an asteroid is? Neither do I. Some kind of a planet, I guess - only he wasn't even talking about a real one, but just a fake one. Galled it a man-made sat-some- thing. Oh yes, a satellite, that was it. A manmade satellite.

It was the newspaper that started him off. Remember, last week, when they ran this story about how at last the government is going to build a space-platform for launching rockets to the moon? Did you ever hear anything so crazy in all your life? But I guess they- re going to do it.

Well, I was reading him this story - he was pretty weak, you know, and Doctor Cooper said it wouldn't be long - and I was just reading along, when all at once I noticed he was sitting up. He hadn't sat up for nearly a week, and he wasn't eating very much or anything any more, but here he was, sitting up straight. And he said, "Would you mind reading that over again, Miss Hawes? Slowly, please?" He was always very polite like that, I will say that for him.

So I read it over, and-he began to chuckle again, and he got the funniest look on his face. It wasn't exactly a smile, but you know, like that. His cheeks were all sunk in the way they get before the end, but for a minute I'd swear he looked positively young again.

"I knew it!" he said. "I knew they'd do it! That's the news I've been waiting for."

Then he began to talk a blue streak. I said, “Please, you know Doctor Cooper said you mustn’t exert yourself. You must rest.”

And he said, “I’ll have a long time for resting now. And in peace, I trust.” And he kept right on talking.

How I don’t know how much of this he was making up, because it sounds so utterly ridiculous, but of course he did send those letters out and he’d get answers, too. They all knew him, all these scientists.

But the way he told it, after the time he fell and nearly died, he decided to reform. He wanted to do something for the world, I guess, and he got to studying his mathematics again. He said he’d written this book with the crazy title - I remember that part all right - it was called The Dynamics of an Asteroid.

And it was about these space-platforms.

“Yes, that’s right, Miss Hawes,” he told me. “Over sixty years ago. No wonder nobody took it seriously; I was ahead of my time. And I spent years of pioneering work, simply trying to get a hearing from the proper authorities in the field. Bit by bit, I managed.”

The point is, 1 guess he kept working out these theories of his and writing to scientists and feeding them ideas, like this Einstein and a whole lot of others.

He didn’t want any credit, just so long as they would work on his notions. And after a long time, they did. He said he had this idea for building a space-platform or an artificial whatchamacallit all these years, and he pounded away and pounded away and even sent diagrams.

In Germany he made experimental models or whatever they do and donated them to universities and the government - but he never let them use his name. All he wanted was to do some good for humanity.

“It was the least I could do to atone, Miss Hawes,” he said. “I wanted, in my small way, to help man reach the stars. And now, I see, the work has borne fruit. What more reward could I ask?”

Of course I knew enough to humor him, it was the least I could do for the. poor old fella, the way he was. So I told him how wonderful I thought it was and how he ought to be getting his name in the newspapers, too, along with these other big-shot scientists.

"That can never be," he said. "And it no longer matters. My name will live only as a symbol of infamy." Whatever that is.

Well, I don't know how we ended up, but it was the same night, quite late, that the crisis came. I'd been sleeping on the sofa in the- other room when I heard him sort of gasping and I went into the bedroom quick and took one look and then called Doctor Cooper.

By the time he got there, though, it was all over. It wasn't what you call a painful death. He just got delirious and then went right off with just a short coma. Heart gave out, Doctor Cooper said.

But for a few minutes, there, while he was delirious, he came out with some of the most awful stuff.

It was as if he was another person - probably the way he'd been when he was a criminal back in the 'nineties or whenever, if he'd told me the truth.

He kept cursing away at somebody or other; this detective fella, I guess. He wasn't so much mad at the fella as he was jealous because the detective was famous and he wasn't. You see, like I told you before, he was supposed to have killed him only he revived and got away. And now the poor old guy acted as though he was right there in the room - and did he swear!

Then he started to wrestle with him; you know how it is when they go out of their head. Only I figured it out that he thought he was back fighting with him at the time when he was left for dead.

They were fighting on some cliff, and there was a waterfall or something - this was in Germany or the Alps or around there, I guess - and this detective was using jiu-jitsu and he threw the old guy off into the water and he hit his head and bounced and swam away. But the detective didn't notice because he was climbing up the cliff himself in order not to leave any footprints, so people would think he was dead. Oh, it doesn't make any sense, but that's the way it came out.

Then, just before the coma, he was sitting up in bed after all this wrestling around, and I was trying to hold him down. But he didn't even know I was in the room, you see - he just saw the detective.

And he said, “Keep your glory! Keep your cheap notoriety, and your fame! I’ll die unhonoured, unmourned and unsung, but in the end I triumph. My deeds will bring men to the stars! One thing you must admit - there’s nothing elementary about my deductions!”

Real crazy stuff, I tell you!

And then he went off into the coma and died. Just like that. But can you imagine, such a mixed-up business?

I wonder how much of it was really true? I mean, about him being a master-criminal and reforming and then helping scientists invent these space-platforms.

I never heard of that book, The Dynamics of an Asteroid, or whatever.

Maybe I’ll look it up sometime. I wish I knew the name of that detective he hated so much; that would help.

But I’ve got his name, anyway. Irish. Moriarity, I think it was - Professor Moriarity.

Let's Do It For Love

Joe Stevens, an inquisitive chemist, was not satisfied with partial success, His spot-remover took soup off your vest and also, the spots off a leopard. His hair-restorer sent billiard balls to the barber shop. But it seemed that no one wanted hairy billiard balls or spotless leopards. So, one day Joe said to himself: How nice it would be if everybody loved everybody else! No more war. No more hate. Joe went to work, bent upon spreading love throughout the world. And did the world appreciate it? Oh, brother!

SOMETIMES they come crawling out of the woodwork. Sometimes they wear Napolean hats and ride in on invisible white horses. Sometimes they're equipped complete with little green men who keep pulling your socks down when they're not looking.

But this one was different. He looked completely normal. I guessed his age at thirty, his weight at about 160, stripped. Only he wasn't stripped. He was wearing the kind of blue suit that this kind of guy always wears whenever he takes his wife along with him to pick out a gray one.

He had brown hair, rimless glasses, and one of those sincere faces you usually see painted on expensive Mamma dolls. Oh yes, he had a name, too—Joe Stevens. Nothing alarming about any of these things, nothing to make me think that he was a fugitive from the laughing academy.

But it was what he said that set me off higher than a rocket to the moon.

"Mr. Mortimer, you're a public relations man," he yacked.

“What kind of a job can you do to promote love?”

I opened my mouth, but for a minute nothing came out. And when nothing comes out of my mouth for a whole minute, I get worried. Finally I reached inside and dragged out a few words.

“Love?” I said. “You mean, boy-meets-girl kind of love?”

“Not exactly. Perhaps I’d better explain.”

“Sit down,” I suggested. He picked out a chair, which wasn’t too difficult, seeing as how I only have one chair in my office. And then it started.

When it finished, about fifteen minutes later, I was in full possession of the following facts, any or all of which I would gladly have traded for a two-cent stamp.

Joseph Stevens, my visitor, was a chemist employed by the Wagtail Dog Biscuit Company, Inc., of this city. Married, and the father of two children, he was wont to slip down into the basement of his modest little mortgage-covered cottage during the evening and perform experiments.

At a time when all decent, respectable Godfrey-fearing citizens are usually huddled around their TV sets, Joe Stevens would be found somewhere behind the furnace, either working out or testing a chemical formula he had invented.

“I thought if I sort of puttered around long enough,” he explained, in his erudite, scientific way, “I might hit on something that would make me some money. I’d be just as happy to do it for the fun of experimenting but Dorothy—that’s my wife—seems to prefer money.”

I nodded.

“You do understand,” said Stevens. “I take it you’re married, too?”

“Yes. I understand perfectly,” I told him. “And that is one of the reasons I very definitely am not married.”

“Oh. Well, anyway, I perfected quite a few compounds during the last few years of work. I rigged up a very complete little laboratory in the cellar, and managed to perfect a number of products. But none of them, so far, have appealed to any manufacturer.”

"Just what did you come up with?"

"Well, for example, there was my spot remover. It looked to me like a sure-fire proposition."

"But there are plenty of spot removers on the market right now, aren't there?"

"Not like mine. This was no ordinary naphtha compound. My Spot Remover would actually remove any spot. I thought it might be kind of dramatic to hold a demonstration for some possible buyers, so I took a bottle of the stuff out to the Zoo and tossed some on a leopard. Sure enough, it worked."

"You took the spots right off a leopard?"

"Absolutely. But all that happened was the zoo officials wanted to sue me for damaging their property—because without spots their leopard looked like a common mountain lion. My buyers got scared, and Dorothy made me give up the idea. I haven't even tried to use that Spot Remover again, except the time I put some on my youngest child when she had the measles."

"Is that all you perfected?"

"No. The next thing was a headache powder. That really worked, too. But the trouble was, most people would rather have a headache than sprinkle this powder on their heads."

Right at this point I could have used a little of the stuff myself. But I determined to carry on to the bitter end. "What else did you invent?"

"Oh, plenty of things. Like my hair restorer. It actually would grow hair on a billiard ball. But then I found out that nobody wants to buy billard balls with hair growing on them."

"Life is cruel," I told him. "But when do we get to the love part?":

"Only after about two years more of compounding and mixing and stirring and blending. But the important thing is, once I got the basic concept, I worked night and day, every weekend and holiday, to concoct this formula. And finally, I got it. This isn't a fluke—I tell you, it's going to revolutionize the world!"

“But what is it, exactly? What does it do?”

“It’s simply a glandular stimulant which produces an endocrinological readjustment of the metabolic factors affecting personality mutation, thus increasing normal empathy.”

“Namely?”

“What does it mean?”

“It means I have produced a chemical compound that makes people love one another. Simple, isn’t it?”

“You are—I mean, it is,” I gulped. “But aren’t there already such chemicals in use? Regular aphrodisiacs?”

“That’s just the point. My concoction is not an aphrodisiac. It does not stimulate sexual activity or arouse the senses.”

“Too bad,” I sighed. “I was kind of thinking of a big advertising and promotion campaign, maybe with a picture of some guy holding a violin and smooching some broad who’s playing the piano—like a perfume, see?” And then we—”

“This is not a perfume, Mr. Mortimer. It can be taken orally, by injection, or direct cutaneous application.”

“Watch your language, son.”

“I mean, it can be applied to the surface of the skin and the pores will absorb it.”

“Like a beauty cream?”

“No. It doesn’t change the appearance. But it does alter behavior patterns. It eliminates hatred, prejudice, dislike, antipathy. People exposed to this potion feel nothing but pure affection for others—all others.”

“Now, wait a minute! You mean to tell me you’ve invented something that will actually win friends and influence people? What about hangovers?”

“There is no hangover, as you call it, Mr. Mortimer. Depending on the amount administered and the method of absorption, the effects of this formula vary from a few hours’ duration to lifetime permanency.”

“You take enough, the right way, and you love everybody the rest of your life?”

“Exactly!”

“Even neighbors with loud radios, and guys who try to pass your car on the right, and income tax collectors?”

“Certainly.”

“This I’ve got to be convinced of.”

For a moment I stared at the floor, trying to find the two pieces of the infinitive I’d just split. Also, to be perfectly frank, I was also looking for a way to get rid of Mr. Stevens. A good, fast way, because I had done business with screwballs before and found it wise to get rid of them before they started to bounce.

“I’m willing to convince you,” Mr. Stevens was saying, “if you agree to take me on as your client.”

This was all the opening I needed. “Well, as a matter of fact, I’ve got a pretty tight schedule—loaded with assignments, you might say. Besides, I expect I’ll have to be going down to Washington next week for one of the big oil companies, and—”

Joe Stevens rose and stuck out his hand. “I guess I shouldn’t have bothered you, Mr. Mortimer. A big man like you, I know how it is—you wouldn’t be interested in someone like me with only a measly three hundred dollar retainer—”

I grabbed his hand and held on, tight. Very, very tight. “Now, wait a minute! I was just about to say, money isn’t everything, you know. Even though I’m running a business, I still have time for sentiment. And your notion of spreading love appeals to my idealistic side. Definitely! Er—do you happen to have the three hundred bucks with you?”

“Here it is.”

With his free hand he drew a roll of small bills out of his pocket. With my free hand I managed to count and tuck the money away in my vest. And all the while I was giving him the old fraternity grip and the old college try.

"I see great possibilities in your love serum, Stevens," I told him. "Should have no trouble at all selling it to the right parties. This isn't a matter of shoving propaganda at the public—what you want is to interest a few people with money and get this thing rolling. But first, I'd still feel better if I had a little demonstration."

"Whenever you like," he agreed. "Just come out to the house. If you weren't so busy and all, I'd have invited you to come home right now, for supper."

I grinned. "Like I say, Stevens, I'm a man of sentiment. Let's go."

Half an hour later I was standing on the doorstep of the Stevens bungalow and Stevens was doing the honors.

"Dorothy," he said, "I have a guest for dinner."

"So I see. Why didn't you call and let me know ahead of time?"

"Well, it was all so sudden. I mean, Mr. Mortimer here just got together with me and—"

"Together where? In some bar?"

"Now you know I don't drink, honey. This is business."

Dorothy Stevens sniffed. She wasn't a bad-looking tomato for a housewife-type, but that sniff told me all I wanted to know about Joe Stevens and his home-life. "What kind of business?" she asked, as the two kids ran out and grabbed Joe by the legs.

"You know, darling. The love potion. Mr. Mortimer is in public relations and he's going to promote it for me. He thinks there's a lot of possibility in it."

"Huh!" Tomatoes can be awfully sour.

"Now, sweetheart—we can tell you all about it at dinner."

"I suppose." She stood back and let us get past her into the living room. Joe Stevens dragged his kids along—they had their hands in his pockets and I kind of got the idea they had learned this particular tricks from watching Mama at work.

Dorothy Stevens went out into the kitchen as we sat down at the table and began to rattle pots and pans—which is a woman's way of swearing.

"Say," she called, "what did you do about the car?"

"What?" A look came over Stevens' face and I glanced around to see if I was on a rocking boat—because he certainly seemed to be seasick all of a sudden.

"You know perfectly well what," Dorothy called out. "I gave you three hundred dollars just before you left the house for the down-payment—all the money we got from Aunt Imogene's will. What did the man say? Will he take it on a trade-in?"

"I didn't get to the car-dealer."

"You didn't?" The rattling of pots turned into a banging and crashing. "Then hand back the money—it isn't safe to carry so much around with you in cash."

"I—uh—haven't got the money."

The banging stopped. "You haven't? Then who has?"

"Well, Mr. Mortimer here needed a retainer if he's going to work on the formula, and so—" There was a loud crash.

Joe Stevens rushed out into the kitchen and closed the door. I sat there and tried not to listen. The two kids were watching a cowboy kill fifty Indians on television, and the noise almost but not quite drowned out the sounds of murder from the kitchen.

Finally it was all over and Stevens tottered back into the room. He didn't look seasick any more. He looked drowned.

"Dorothy has a headache," he said. "We'll be eating alone, I guess. If you don't mind."

So we went into the kitchen and ate alone. The kids did all the talking during the meal, and most of the eating. But after we finished, I managed to drag Stevens back to business.

"Don't be discouraged," I told him. "Women just don't understand these things. But once we get rolling, and the money starts coming in, she'll be all right."

He cheered up, a little. "Thanks for being so patient with me," he said. "You know, Dorothy is really a fine wife—I couldn't ask for better. It's just that she hasn't got the faith I have in my inventions. Now, this compound —"

"Yes, let's see it," I told him. "You say you work in the cellar?" He took me down there, and I got to admit he'd rigged up the best little laboratory I ever saw outside of a Universal Pictures horror movie. He had electric gadgets and test-tubes and coils and retorts; everything except Boris Karloff in a white robe and an old pair of rubber gloves. And he had a nice, pint-sized vial of bubbling yellow stuff that sparkled when he held it up to the light. "Here it is—the compound." I squinted at it. "Very pretty. Haven't seen anything like it since I served a hitch in the Army Medical Corps. But I got only one question—does it work?"

"Does it work? Of course it works. Take my word for it. I've tried it out. Here, you drink some and see for yourself."

"Not me, brother. I'm in public relations, how can I love people? But I insist on a demonstration."

There was a squawk from outside the cellar door.

"What's that?" yelled Stevens, jumping about a foot and almost spilling the liquid out of the vial.

"Oh, just some alley cat, I suppose."

"Alley cat?" A gleam came into his eye; one of those genuine 18-karat Mad Scientist gleams. "Wait here."

He tiptoed to the door. There was a shriek and a scuffle and a snarl, and he came back with the cat in his arms. "Help me hold it now while I fill this hypodermic syringe," he panted. "There. Just a drop will do. Don't let it claw you! My, it's a fierce beast, isn't it? Now—let me make the injection here in the shoulder."

The cat jumped about a foot and landed on the table, back hunched and claws ready for action. It spit and snarled and—smiled. And then its tail began to wave. It purred. It came over and rubbed against my shoulders.

"See? Just one drop."

I shrugged.

"Want more proof? Wait a minute." He raced up the stairs and in a minute he was back with a cage in one hand. Something tiny and yellow fluttered and squeaked inside the cage, and when it saw the cat, it beat against the bars. He reached in with the hypodermic needle, and the canary quieted. It began to sing.

Then he set the cage down on the laboratory table and opened the door. The cat went over to the cage. The canary came out. The cat opened its mouth. It raised its paws. Then it purred and stroked the canary. The canary jumped up and perched on its head, chirping. The mewing and the chirping blended until they were doing a duet that sounded very much like half of a barbershop quartet singing I Love You Truly.

I stared, but there it was, right in front of my own eyes. One drop for each and they made beautiful mew-sic together.

"You win," I said. "I'm sold. And you mean to say this will work on anything? Animal or human?"

"Of course. It's all a glandular reaction, as I told you. The basic components—"

"Yeah. I know. And it's permanent, doesn't wear off?"

He frowned. "I can't answer that one fully, yet. I haven't had enough opportunity to experiment. Injections are all I've tried, and they seem permanent enough. It seems to me that spraying the entire skin surface would be even more of a guarantee of a permanent reaction. The oral method is another way of absorbing the compound. This I haven't been able to work with."

"Well, I hope you won't get me wrong," I said. "But it might be a good idea to test that idea right here at home. I mean, slipping a drink of this stuff to your wife—" His frown got frownier. "I know what you mean," he sighed. "And I'd thought of it, even suggested it. But Dorothy won't cooperate. And she won't let me use it on the kids."

"You could sort of sneak it into her coffee or something, couldn't you?" I suggested. "No worse than a bad Mickey Finn."

"No, Mr. Mortimer, that's out. It isn't ethical. It violates the true spirit of Science."

I shrugged. "Okay, just a thought. And speaking of thoughts, now that I've seen it in action, what you want me to do with this stuff? I can promote it, but what's the gimmick? You must have some idea in mind."

"I have a purpose. A very serious purpose," he assured me.

"Making money is always serious," I agreed. "And I'm here to help. Is your idea to get this made up like some kind of a perfume and use it in an atomizer? So that a tomato can get the old love-light working in her boy friends' eyes? Or do you want it for salesmen only—slip it into customers' drinks so they'll love that product, huh? Or is it for political campaigns? Blow it out through the air-conditioning system in a meeting hall and have all the voters fall in a swoon for the candidate?"

"You can stop right there, Mr. Mortimer."

"Okay. But I got a million more ideas. When I go into action for a client, I really go into action."

"You have the wrong slant entirely. This discovery of mine will never be used commercially.

While there may be money in it for me eventually, I do not intend to prostitute it commercially. This is a serious and important finding. I told you it could revolutionize the world, and that is what I plan it to do."

"Like how, for instance?"

“Mr. Mortimer, I need your help in only one thing; to enlist the attention of important people all over the nation. We must tell them about this discovery and promote its use. It is my hope that the government itself will take over the manufacture of my preparation and prepare bombs.”

“Bombs?”

“Yes. Love-bombs, you might call them. A complete stockpile of bombs which can be dropped on foreign soil, exploded in quantities large enough to cover the face of the earth, and spread love throughout the entire world.

“Do you understand now what this means? It can be the end of wars, the end of hatred, the end of suspicion and enmity and fear. Men will love one another and my work will be done.”

I blinked. “But won’t it cost a fortune? What about the machinery to produce them? How about time?”

“It won’t cost a fraction of what it costs us currently to maintain armaments,” Stevens declared. “Regular detonating mechanisms can be used, filled with this concoction in fluid or gas form, and they could be turned out in quantity within a period of two or three weeks. No, the whole thing is simple. All I need now is your advice and help in bringing this whole miraculous discovery to the attention of those in authority. And I hope you’ll agree with me that it’s a job worth doing.”

He didn’t look like a Mad Scientist any more. He looked like the starry-eyed idealist.

I thought about it for a minute. The whole notion was screwy, but it might work. Anyhow, the chemical did work. And it had great possibilities. Suppose the government would go for it? An exclusive contract to supply them with this elixir of love might run into a pretty penny or a beautiful buck. Stranger things have happened. Great nuts from little acorns grow, and when some dumb old Greek name of Archimedes or something invented the lever, little did he reck that some day from this simple discovery would spring the entire mighty slot-machine industry.

“I’ll do it!” I said. “Meet me tomorrow morning, nine o’clock, in Bert Bugle’s office.”

"Bert Bugle?"

"The attorney," I explained. "First thing we gotta do is get this mixture patented. Protect it against anyone else stealing the formula. He knows his way around in Washington and he can steer us to the right guys to see. Cut through all this red tape, take us through to the President, maybe."

"Fine. I knew I could rely on you, Mr. Mortimer."

"See you at nine, then? Goodnight."

"Goodnight," said Stevens. The cat and the canary gave me a farewell serenade, and as I went out the door I could see the canary pecking at the cat's claws. The canary wasn't hurting the animal; just giving it a manicure.

Come nine o'clock. Came Stevens and I to Bert Bugle's office in the Banker's Building.

I went in ahead of Stevens and paved the way.

"Hi, Bert. How's life from the back of an ambulance? Have you habeased any good corpuses lately?"

"Mortimer! I've been looking for you! What are you doing about Mountain Dew? Six months ago I gave you a thousand-dollar retainer to promote it for me, and where are we? Halfway to bankruptcy, that's where!"

"But Bert—"

"I've got a lot of money tied up in that company. Everybody in Blue View is laughing at me because we can't sell the lousy stuff. I'll admit it's a vile-tasting bottled water, but you assured me you could put it on every table in the suburb for your fee. I've got a good mind to slap a lawsuit on you!"

"Bert! Listen a minute, will you? Never mind about the Mountain Dew. I've got something big for you in the outer office. Something really big!"

"Animal, vegetable, elephant?"

"This is real, this is really real. Come on out and meet a million dollars!"

At the mention of a million dollars, Bert Bugle calmed down. I led him out to meet Joe Stevens and commenced talking.

The whole pitch went just the way I'd planned. I told him what I had, what we wanted. Then I pulled the trump card. I sent Joe out for an alley-cat and told him to buy a canary in the pet shop downstairs. In five minutes he was back with a mangy, spitting tomcat and an anemic-looking canary. Out came the vial and the hypodermic syringe. In went the compound. And thus did Love come to Bert Bugle's office.

"There," I said. "Now do you understand?"

Bugle's eyes goggled. "Do I? Indeed I do! Mortimer, I want to talk to you for a moment, privately. If you'll excuse us, Mr. Stevens."

Bugle dragged me into his private office and slammed the door. Then he grabbed my collar. "Man," he panted. "Do you know what this means?"

"It means you're tearing my collar," I informed him.

"Never mind that. This love philtre, or whatever it is, works!"

"Of course it works, and it's going to be worth millions."

"Millions to Stevens, perhaps. But for me, it's plain bankruptcy."

"How do you figure that?"

"Well, suppose his scheme goes through—and it might, very easily. They start dropping love-bombs all over the place and what happens? People begin loving each other, that's what!"

"Is that bad?"

"It's awful!" Bugle groaned. "Eight years I went to school, ten years I spent building up a law practise. And now people are going to love each other. No more lawsuits! No more divorces! No more thefts, no more murders, and that means no more need for lawyers! Yes, and no need for judges, or sheriffs, or police. What kind of a deal is this, that I should cut my own throat?"

"But you'll be assured of a good fee for handling our work."

"Maybe so." Bugle stuck out his chin. "But after all, I owe something to the legal profession. I have ethics to maintain, and because I'm ethical, I can't stand by and see a man deliberately and coldbloodedly set out to ex-exterminate rape, arson, fraud, and all the things we attorneys hold so dear. No, I'm afraid I not only refuse—I must also go ahead and fight your scheme with every force at my command."

He turned to go back into the other room where Joe waited.

"Just a minute, Bert. This guy Stevens is sincere, he's sacrificing everything for an ideal. Maybe you won't help us, but you can't fight us. It isn't fair!"

"Sorry. But I have no choice. And as for you, if you'd spent your time promoting Mountain Dew instead of running around with crackpots, I might have listened to you."

"All right," I sighed. "You win. But please, don't tell Stevens you're going to fight him. Just say you have too much other work or something."

"You talk like a crackpot yourself," Bugle sneered, "but that's your affair. Go on out and tell him I'm too busy to handle the deal. But I warn you, I'm going to get up a legal committee to pull strings in Washington against this. And as for you, I'm suing you for that thousand dollar retainer on Mountain Dew. Now, good day to you."

If that was Bert Bugle's contribution to a good day, I'd hate to see what he'd come up with for a bad one. I shuffled out, collected Stevens, the cat and the canary. In the car I told him a sob story about Bugle's health breaking down.

"But don't worry, we'll get somebody else. The world is full of lawyers."

"We'd better hurry. I haven't much time, and my money is running out. Lawyers cost a lot."

"But you've got a steady job."

"Oh, didn't I tell you? I quit yesterday. Figured this would be taking all our time from now on. Dorothy is plenty burned up about it, so it's up to you."

"Great!" I managed to keep the car on the road, but I was beginning to sweat a little. So far, in one day on the assignment I'd accomplished a lot. I'd made a man quit his job, set things up for his wife to leave him, and lined myself up for a lawsuit.

"You know, I have a lot of confidence in you, Mr. Mortimer. You sure know how to get things done." Stevens gave. me that trusting look and I winced. "Now where are we going?"

"Where—? Why, to the newspaper, of course."

“Newspaper?”

“We need publicity, don’t we? What’s a better way of getting Washington to notice an important discovery? Why, this is front page news here—world-wide news.” As I talked, I began to see the sense of that. Why hadn’t I thought of it in the first place? Once we got our headlines, lawyers would come running to represent us. It was that simple.

“Here,” I said. “You wait in the car. I’m going up and see the editor. Not the city editor—the managing editor, the big boy himself. Give me that vial, and the cat, and the canary.”

I marched in. I knew my way around, and within five minutes I was sitting in Tom Mason’s office. The vial was in my hand, the cat was on my lap, and the canary was sitting on my left ear.

“Now listen, Mortimer, if this is another one of your crazy stunts.” Mason began to make noises like an executive. I cut him short and launched into my story. Thirty seconds of it was enough to quiet him down, and a minute had him gasping.

The cat meowed, the canary chirped, I talked, and Mason gurgled. Finally his gurglings turned into words.

“And it really works?” he choked. “You can drop love-bombs on the whole world, even Russia?”

“I personally guarantee it.”

“Then you’ll give it a frontpage spread? I’ve got the guy downstairs in my car right now, ready for pictures. You can play up the local boy angle, get it on the wire services!”

“I’d sooner run my own obituary!”

“What?”

“Get out of here before I throw you out!”

“You mean you don’t believe me?”

"Of course I believe you. And that's just why I won't touch the story with a ten-foot pole. Can't you see what would happen if they did drop love-bombs? War would stop, wouldn't it? And crime, too. There wouldn't be any stories for newspapers to run any more, and I'd be out of business in a year."

"But couldn't you run stories about nice things? About the good, constructive actions people would be engaged in? Isn't that news, too?"

"My boy, always remember one thing. Good news is no news. No, I'll have no part of it. And don't try any of your publicity stunts because they won't work. I'll give orders to kill any story mentioning love-bombs. And that's final."

His secretary stuck her beak through the door, thus completing her resemblance to Woody Woodpecker, and sniffed. "Mr. Mason, there's a Mr. Bugle on the phone for you."

"Bert Bugle?" I asked.

"Neighbor of mine out in Blue View. Wonder what he wants." Mason moved towards the phone and waved me out. "Get out of here, Mortimer, but remember what I said. No story. Not now, or ever!"

I got out. Down and out. No story, and already Bugle and Mason would be getting together. They had to be neighbors, yet! How could I lick this thing? Every step took me closer to the edge of ruin. Nobody wanted love, so go fight City Hall. Tell it to your Congressman.

"Knocklewort!" I shouted.

Joe Stevens blinked at me as I opened the car door.

"Knocklewort! That's our answer! We're going to see Congressman Knocklewort!"

"But what about the papers?"

"Oh, that." I gulped. "The editor was afraid to break the yarn without an official OK. Security measures, you know; talk about dropping bombs and stuff might upset people. Have to clear it with the government.

Knocklewort's our man. He's Congressman for this district, he's in town this week, and besides, I once handled his campaign for him. We'll tell him the story and let him take it right to Washington."

We were off to the Hotel Tippmore, vial, cat and canary. And when I got through to Gifford Knocklewort's suite, I took the whole menagerie upstairs with me, including Joe Stevens.

Once again I went into the now familiar pitch. I told old Knocklewort the whole story, watching his face through a cloud of cigar smoke. One thing about Knocklewort—even though he is a Congressman, he very seldom blows out anything but smoke. He kept his mouth shut until I'd finished, and I waited very anxiously for a reaction. Finally, it came.

"Sorry, I'd like to help you, but it's out."

"Think of the publicity, Congressman! You, as sponsor of this idea, taking it to the President. Why, you'll be hailed as the saviour of the world! This thing is big! I'll bet you could be the next President yourself, with this deal."

"President of what?" asked Knocklewort. "A bankrupt nation?"

"But it wouldn't cost much to make these bombs," Joe Stevens explained. "I have the formula all worked out, ready to go."

"Isn't that just lovely?" Knocklewort spread his palms upward. "Now work out another formula showing how people can get along in this country after you drop your bombs. Your cat here, and your canary can get along—they've got others to feed them. But people can live only by working. Working means business. Business means competition. Competition means progress. Progress won't exist once folks start to love each other. They won't want to step on each other's toes, take advantage of one another.

"Why, in six months business would be at a standstill and this nation would be ruined. For that matter, if folks start to live in harmony, they won't need any government—and I'll be out of a job!"

I couldn't stand to look at Stevens' face, so I sat down. The young chemist was getting a new formula into his head—a formula of what makes the world go around.

"Sorry, young man." Knocklewort put his arm around Joe Stevens' shoulders. "I'm as much in favor of love as the next man—kiss a lot of babies when I campaign—but there just isn't any place for it in business, or politics either. Now, if you'll excuse me, I have a dinner engagement to keep. Old friend of yours, Mortimer. Tom Mason. Know him well, don't you?"

"Yes," I sighed. "I know him. Well, come on, Joe. Let's go."

We went. Stevens was scowling, and even the cat and the canary seemed to have lost their sex appeal for each other. But in the car, Stevens turned to me with every tooth gritted.

"I'm not licked yet," he said. "Can you leave for Washington with me next week?"

"Why, you don't want to do that, my boy. First of all, it costs too much money."

"Never mind. Dorothy's going to leave me. Oh, don't think I haven't realized that! She'll leave the minute she hears we aren't getting anywhere. So I might as well sell the house. And I'll take the money to finance us. We'll go to Washington and see the President himself!"

"Now look, son." I faced Joe Stevens and for a moment it was as if I actually were facing a son of mine. "You might as well know the truth. Bert Bugle isn't sick. He just won't touch your problem because he thinks love will ruin the legal profession. And Tom Mason isn't afraid of censorship. He believes love will kill newspaper circulation. You heard what the Congressman told you. And you're going to get the same story everywhere. It will be the same in Washington.

"So you had better realize one thing right now. This world doesn't want love. It isn't ready for love yet on a large scale. Oh, it might work for individuals. It always has, you know. And it might even work for a small community. But not for the masses."

"I can't believe it," Stevens sighed.

"You'd better believe it. Because you're going to be fought tooth and nail. As I left Mason's office, Bert Bugle was already calling him on the phone to warn him about your love-bomb menace. And now, the Congressman is dining with Mason. They're probably all going to get together and run you out of town. I advise you to forget this scheme, go back to Dorothy, take your old job. And—much as it hurts me to do this—here's your three hundred bucks back."

Stevens managed to find a smile and spread it over his face. It didn't quite reach. "Never mind the money," he said. "You stuck by me, and you tried your best to help."

"Please take it. I don't want your dough."

He shook his head and I was surprised that nothing rattled. "No, it's yours. I'm going home now and see what Dorothy is going to do." Stevens made a gesture that included the cat, the canary, and the vial of love potion. "You might as well keep these as souvenirs. I won't be needing them."

I nodded, then plodded up the street. The cat followed me, purring, with the canary hitching a free ride on his back. I held the vial in my hand and looked for a sewer. No sense keeping this stuff. It was just bad medicine. Nobody wanted love. Bert Bugle was right. I should have stuck to Mountain Dew Water.

Then the thought sneaked up and kicked me in the pants. I stopped plodding and started running.

I didn't stop running until around ten o'clock that night, when I ended up panting on Joe Stevens' doorstep.

He opened the door and I breezed in.

"Mortimer. What brings you here?"

"A taxi. But never mind that. I came to tell you that we're saved."

"Saved?"

"Just came from Mason's house. He and Congressman Knocklewort and Bert Bugle have agreed to call off their feud. Bert Bugle isn't going to sue me either. We can have all the publicity we want, Bugle will get us our patent protection, and Knocklewort himself will go to Washington for us to see the President!"

"Wait a minute. How did all this happen?"

"You did it! Or, rather, your love potion did it. Remember the vial you left with me?"

Stevens nodded.

"Well, I got to thinking. All three of these birds were having dinner together. If a delivery man showed up at the back door with some Mountain Dew Table Water. And if they drank it at dinner—and if this water happened to contain the love potion."

"You did it!"

It was my turn to nod. "Then, when I figured the stuff had plenty of time to get in its licks, I showed up at the front door. The rest was easy as pie. They loved me. They loved you. They loved the idea. They loved everybody. So we're all set. Now we can begin our campaign." I paused, waiting for the applause. "What's the matter, Joe? Doesn't it get you excited?"

Stevens stared out of the window. "You forget what I told you," he said. "If my potion is injected, the effect is permanent. If it's sprayed on to the skin surface it's also sure to last forever. But if you just drink a small amount, it wears off, perhaps in a matter of a few hours. Tomorrow those men will be free of its influence and they'll go back to opposing us."

"But we can keep them hopped up with the water forever if needs be," I argued. "I can manage to slip them drinks all day long."

"It's no use. They're not the only ones who have to be sold. No, Mortimer, you've shown me today that you can't sell love to the world. Everybody in Washington will be the same way and you can't change human nature."

"Guess I never thought of that angle." I glanced at him closely. "But that isn't all you have on your mind, is it?"

Stevens pointed towards the door. "See those suitcases? Dorothy packed up when she heard the news. She's ready to leave now. Don't know what's keeping her.”

“That’s tough,” I said. “If there’s anything I can do to help—” I stopped and sniffed. “You smell anything burning?”

“You’re right, there is something burning!” Stevens wheeled around. “It’s the cellar! The house is on fire. Come on!”

We clattered down the basement steps and into the smoky cellar. But the house wasn’t on fire. I saw only two things burning down there. Stevens’ wife, Dorothy, and a little pile of papers on the laboratory table.

Since Dorothy seemed to be burning only with rage, I turned my attention to the pile of papers. “Get some water!” I yelled. Stevens ran to the laundry tub, filled a pail, and splashed the contents over the charred fragments on the table.

“What’s the big idea?” he asked. Dorothy made a little sound that might have been a laugh and might also have been a sob.

“Did what—?” Stevens stopped and stared.

“I burned the formula. The formula for the love potion.”

“But—”

“Love potion!” She was sobbing, now. “All it ever caused was trouble. And even though I’m leaving,—yes, I am leaving and for good, so don’t try to talk me out of it—I wanted to get rid of that horrible elixir forever!”

Stevens sat down and covered his face. “Two years of work shot to pieces!” he groaned. “Nothing to show for it but the little flask on the table.”

Dorothy was over to the table and back again before I’d noticed it. She thrust the flask into my hands. “Here, Mr. Mortimer!

A little farewell gift for you. A token of my personal appreciation for busting up my family, busting up my husband’s life. Now, get out of here! Get out of here and take this damned love with you!” I held the flask and stared at the yellowish liquid. I held love in my hands and it was cold and pale. I didn't like it, because nobody loves love. It doesn't work for the masses, only for individuals.

"Here," I said to Dorothy. "A little farewell gift for you, too!" Lifting the flask, I broke it over the top of her head. She went down in a heap, with the love potion splashing all over her.

"You $#%&@(i!*!!!," yelled Stevens—only, he yelled it much more plainly than that. "Trying to kill my wife, huh? Just let me get my hands on you—"

The proposition didn't appeal to me. I turned and ran. The last I ever saw of Joe Stevens, he was sitting on the cellar floor holding his wife in his arms, trying to revive her.

Yes, that was the last I ever saw of Stevens. But I heard from him once, since then.

About a week afterwards, he called me on the phone.

"I'm the happiest man in the world," he told me. "And I can never thank you enough for all you did for me."

"It was nothing, really."

"First of all, you showed me that this business of reforming the world is a lot of foolishness. No one man or one idea is big enough to do the trick. So I went around and got my old job back again. From now on, I'm sticking to Dog Biscuits."

"And your wife?" I asked. "Ever since you hit Dorothy on the head she's been a new woman. She adores me. And you deserve the thanks for it."

I smiled to myself. "Sort of thought that would do the trick," I said. "Couldn't figure out a better use for the last of the love potion than to spray her with it. You said it would be permanent."

"I guess it is." Stevens hesitated. "Just one thing you should know, though—only don't ever let my wife hear about it."

"What's that?"

"She made a mistake. There really was none of the love potion left at all."

"But the stuff I splashed on her from the flask—"

The happiest man in the world chuckled. “That was some cleaning fluid I had lying around.”

He hung up, and I suppose that’s the way the story ends. But there really was a love potion, and I can prove it. Come around to my office anytime and take a look at my cat and my canary.

Or, if you’d prefer to wait about a month or so, I think I’ll be able to show you the only kittens in the world with wings.

The Pin

Do we live and die by some great Cosmic law? Or do we survive or perish by vague and casual chance involving things no more awesome than a pin and a telephone book?

SOMEHOW, somewhere, someone would find out. It was inevitable. In this case, the someone was named Barton Stone. The somewhere was an old loft over a condemned office building on Bleeker Street.

And the somehow—

Barton Stone came there early one Monday morning as the sun shone yellow and cold over the huddled rooftops. He noted the mass of the surrounding buildings, rearranged them into a more pleasing series of linear units, gauged his perspective, evaluated the tones and shadings of sunlight and shadow with his artist's eye. There was a picture here, he told himself, if only he could find it.

Unfortunately, he wasn't looking for a picture. He had plenty of subjects in mind; right now, he was looking for a place in which to paint. He wanted a studio, wanted it quickly. And it must be cheap. Running water and north light were luxuries beyond his present consideration. As for other aesthetic elements, such as cleanliness—Stone shrugged as he mounted the stairs, his long fingers trailing dust from the rickety railing.

There was dust everywhere, for this was the domain of dust, of darkness and desertion. He stumbled upwards into the silence.

The first two floors of the building were entirely empty, just as Freed had told him. And the stairs to the loft were at the end of the hall on the second floor.

"You'll have it all to yourself," the rental agent had promised. "But remember to stay in the loft. Nobody'd ever bother looking up there. Damned inspectors come around, they keep telling us to raze the building. But the floor's safe enough. All you got to do is keep out of sight—why, you could hide out there for years without being caught. It's no palace, but take a look and see what you think. For twenty bucks a month, you can't go wrong."

Stone nodded now as he walked down the debris-littered hall towards the loft stairs. He couldn't go wrong. He sensed, suddenly and with utter certainty, that this was the place he'd been searching for during all of these frustratingly futile weeks. He moved up the stairs with inevitable—

Then he heard the sound.

Call it a thud, call it a thump, call it a muffled crash. The important thing was that it sounded from above, from the deserted loft.

Stone paused on the second step from the top. There was someone in the loft. For twenty bucks a month you can't go wrong—but you could hide out there for years without being caught.

Barton Stone was not a brave man. He was only a poor artist, looking for a cheap loft or attic to use as a studio. But his need was great; great enough to impel him upwards, carry him to the top of the loft stairs and down the short corridor leading to the entry.

He moved quietly, now, although there was thunder in his chest. He tiptoed delicately towards the final door, noted the overhead transom; noted, too, the small crate in the corner against the wall.

There was silence beyond the door, and silence in the hall now as he carefully lifted the crate and placed it so that he could mount the flat top and peer over the open transom.

No sense being melodramatic, he told himself. On the other hand, there was no sense rushing in—Barton Stone was not a fool and he didn't want to become an angel.

He looked over the transom.

The loft was huge. A dusty skylight dominated the ceiling, and enough light filtered through to bathe the room in sickly luminance. Stone could see everything, everything.

He saw the books, stacked man-high; row after row of thick books. He saw the sheafs bulked between the books; pile after pile of sheafs. He saw the papers rising in solid walls from the floor. He saw the table in the center of the loft—the table, bulwarked on three sides by books and sheafs and papers all tossed together in toppling-towers.

And he saw the man.

The man sat behind the table, back to the wall, surrounded on three sides by the incredible array of printed matter. He sat there, head down, and peered at the pages of an opened book. He never looked up, never made a sound, just sat there and stared.

Stone stared back. He understood the source of the noise, now; one of the books had fallen from its stack. But nothing else made sense to him. His eyes sought clues, his mind sought meaning.

The man was short, fat, middle-aged. His hair was graying into white, his face lining into wrinkles. He wore a dirty khaki shirt and trousers and he might have been an ex-GI, a tramp, a fugitive from justice, an indigent book-dealer, an eccentric millionaire.

Stone moved from the realm of might-have-been to a consideration of what he actually saw. The little fat man was riffling through the pages of a fat, paper-bound book which could easily be mistaken for a telephone directory. He turned the pages, apparently at random, with his left hand. Very well, then; he was left-handed.

Or was he? His right hand moved across the table, raised and poised so that the sunlight glittered in a thin line of silver against the object he held.

It was a pin; a long, silver pin. Stone stared at it. The man was staring at it too. Stone's gaze held curiosity. The little fat man's gaze held utter loathing and, more than that, a sort of horrified fascination.

Another sound broke the stillness. The little man sighed. It was a deep sigh that became, with abrupt and hideous clarity, a groan.

Eyes still intent on the pin, the little man brought it down suddenly upon the opened pages of his book. He stabbed at random, driving the point home. Then he hurled the book to the floor, sat back, buried his face in his hands, and his shoulders shook with a silent sobbing.

A second sped. Stone blinked. And beyond the door, in the loft, the little man straightened up, reached for a long sheet of paper that might have been a polling-list, and scanned its surface. The pin poised itself over the center of the sheet. Again the sigh, the stab, the sob.

Now the little man rose, and for a frantic moment, Stone wondered if he'd been detected. But no, the pin-wielder merely wandered down the row of books and pulled out another thick volume. He carried it back to the table and sat down, picking up the pin with his right hand as his left turned page after page. He scanned, scrutinized, then sighed, stabbed, sobbed.

Barton Stone descended from the top of the crate, replaced it carefully in the corner, and tiptoed down the stairs. He moved carefully and silently, and it was an effort to do so, because he wanted all the while to run.

His feeling was irrational, and he knew it, but he could not control himself. He had always experienced that sudden surge of fear in the presence of the demented. When he saw a drunk in a bar, he was afraid—because you never know what a drunk will do next, what will enter his mind and how he will act. He shied away from arguments, because of what happens to a man's reaction-pattern when he sees red. He avoided the mumblers, the people who talk to themselves or to the empty air as they shuffle down the street.

Right now he was afraid of a little fat man, a little fat man with a long, sharp, silver needle.

The needle was crooked at one end, Stone remembered—and he could see that needle sinking into his own throat, right up to the crooked angle. The fat man was crazy and Stone wanted no part of him. He'd go back to the rental agency, see Mr. Freed, tell him. Freed could evict him, get him out of there in a hurry. That would be the sensible way.

Before he knew it, Stone was back in his own walkup flat, resting on the bed and staring at the wall. Although it wasn't the wall he was seeing. He was seeing the little fat man and studying him as he sat at his big table. He was seeing the books and the sheafs and the long rolls and scrolls of paper.

He could group them in the background, so. Just sketch them in lightly, in order to place the figure. The khaki shirt hung thusly—and the open collar draped in this fashion. Now the outlines of the head and shoulders; be sure to catch the shrewd intensity, the concentrated concentration of the pose.

Stone had his sketch-pad out now, and his hands moved furiously. The sunlight would serve as a highlight over the shoulder. It would strike the silver pin and the reflection would fleck the features of the face.

The features—the face—most important. He began to rough it in. If he could only capture the instant before the sob, if he could only fathom the secret of the eyes as the pin stabbed down, he'd have a painting.

What was that look? Stone had unconsciously catalogued and categorized the features. The proportions of nose to forehead, ears to head, chin to jaw; the relationship of brow and cheekbone to the eyes; he knew them and reproduced them. But the expression itself—particularly that look around the eyes—that was the key to it all.

And he couldn't get it down. He drew, erased, drew again. He made a marginal sketch and rubbed it out. The charcoal smeared his palm.

No, it was wrong, all wrong. He'd have to see him again. He was afraid to go, but he wanted that painting. He wanted to do it, he had to do it. There was a mystery here, and if he could only pin it down on canvas, he'd be satisfied.

Pin it down. The pin was what frightened him, he knew it now. It wasn't the man, so much. Granted, he was probably insane—without the pin he'd be harmless, deprived of weapons.

Stone stood up. He went out, down the stairs, walked. He should have gone to the rental agency first, he told himself, but the other need was greater. He wanted to see his subject once more. He wanted to stare into the face of the little fat man and read the secret behind it.

And he did. He climbed the stairs silently, mounted the crate quietly, directed his soundless gaze over the transom.

The fat man was still at work. New books, new papers bulked high on the big table. But the left hand turned the pages, the right hand poised the pin. And the endless, enigmatic pantomime played on. Sigh, stab, sob. Stop and shudder, shuffle through fresh pages, scan and scrutinize again, and then—sigh, stab, sob.

The silver pin glared and glistened. It glowed and glittered and grew. Barton Stone tried to study the face of the fat man, tried to impress the image of his eyes.

Instead, he saw the pin. The pin and only the pin. The pin that poised, the pin that pointed, the pin that pricked the page.

He forced himself to concentrate on the little man's face, forced himself to focus on form and features. He saw sorrow, read resignation, recognized revulsion, found fear there. But there was neither sorrow nor resignation, revulsion or fear in the hand that drove the pin down again and again. There was only a mechanical gesture, without pattern or meaning that Barton Stone could decipher. It was the action of a lunatic, the antic gesture of aberration.

Stone stepped down from the crate, replaced it in the corner, then paused before the loft door. For a moment he hesitated. It would be so simple merely to walk into the loft, confront the little man, ask him his business. The little man would look up, and Stone could stare into his eyes, single out and scrutinize the secrets there.

But the little man had his pin, and Stone was afraid. He was afraid of the pin that didn't sob or sigh, but merely stabbed down. And made its point.

The point—what was it?

Well, there was another way of finding out; the sensible way. Stone sidled softly down the stairs, padded purposefully up the street.

Here it was, Acme Rentals. But the door was locked. Barton Stone glanced at his watch. Only four o'clock. Funny he'd be gone so early, unless he'd left with a client to show some property or office-space.

Stone sighed. Tomorrow, then. Time enough. He turned and strode back down the street. He intended to go to his flat and rest before supper, but as he rounded the corner he saw something that stopped him in his tracks.

It was only a brownish blur, moving very fast. His eye caught a glimpse of khaki, a suggestion of a bowed back, a white-thatched head disappearing into the doorway of a local restaurant. That was enough; he was sure, now. His little fat man had taken time out to eat.

And that meant—

Stone ran the remaining blocks, clattered up the rickety stairs. He burst into the loft, raced over to the table. Then, and then only, he stopped. What was he doing here? What did he hope to find out? What was he looking for?

That was it. He was looking for something. Some clue, some intimation of the little fat man's perverted purpose.

The books and papers billowed balefully all about him. There were at least half-a-hundred presently on the table. Stone picked up the first one. It was a telephone directory, current edition, for Bangor, Maine. Beneath it was another—Yuma, Arizona. And below that, in a gaudy cover, the city directory of Montevideo. At one side a long list of names, sheet after sheet of them, in French. The Town Roll of Dijon. And over at one side, the electoral rolls of Manila, P. I. Another city directory—Stone guessed it must be in Russian. And here was the phone-book from Leeds, and the census sheets from Calgary, and a little photostat of the unofficial census of Mombasa.

Stone paged through them, then directed his attention to another stack on the right-hand side of the table. Here were opened books aplenty, piled one upon the other in a baffling miscellany. Stone glanced at the bottom of the collection. Another phone-book, from Seattle. City directory of Belfast. Voting list from Bloomington, Illinois. Precinct polling list, Melbourne, Australia. Page after page of Chinese ideographs. Military personnel, USAAF, Tokyo base. A book in Swedish or Norwegian—Stone wasn't sure which, but he recognized that it contained nothing but names; and like all the others it was recent, or currently published and in use.

And here, right on top, was a Manhattan directory. It was open, like the others, and apparently the choice of page had been made upon random impulse. Barton Stone glanced at the heading. FRE. Was there a pin-mark? He stared, found it.

Freed, George A. And the address.

Wait a minute! Wasn't that his rental agency man? Something began to form and fashion, and then Stone pushed the book away and ran out of the room and down the stairs and he rounded the corner and found the newsstand and bought his paper and clawed it open to the death-notices and then he read the name again.

Freed, George A. And the address. And on another page—Stone's hands were trembling and it took him a while to find it—was the story. It had happened this morning. Accident. Hit by a truck crossing the street. Survived by, blah, blah, blah.

Yes, blah, blah, blah, and this morning (perhaps while Stone had been watching him the first time) the pin had pointed and stabbed and a name in the directory was marked for destruction. For death.

For Death!

Nobody'd ever bother looking up there. You could hide out there for years without being caught. Yes, you could gather together all the lists, all the sources, all the names in the world and put them into that deserted loft. You could sit there, day after day and night after night, and stick pins into them the way the legends said witches stuck pins into effigies of their victims. You'd sit there and choose book after book at random, and the pin would point. And wherever it struck, somebody died. You could do that, and you would do that. If you were the little fat man. The little fat man whose name was Death.

Stone almost laughed, although the sound didn't come out that way. He'd wondered why he couldn't get the little man's eyes right, wondered why he couldn't search out their secret. Now he knew. He'd encountered the final mystery—that of Death itself. Death, himself.

And where was Death now? Sitting in a cheap restaurant, a local hash house, taking a breather. Death was dining out. Simple enough, wasn't it? All Stone need do now was find a policeman and take him into the joint.

"See that little fat guy over there? I want you to arrest him for murder. He's Death, you know. And I can prove it. I'll show you the pinpoint."

Simple. Insanely simple.

Maybe he was wrong. He had to be wrong. Stone riffled back to the death-notices again. Kooley, Leventhaler, Mautz. He had to make sure.

Kooley, Leventhaler, Mautz.

Question: how long does it take for Death to dine?

Question: does Death care to linger over a second cup of coffee?

Question: does one dare go back and search that directory to find the pinpoints opposite the names Kooley, Leventhaler and Mautz?

The first two questions couldn't be answered. They constituted a calculated risk. The third question could be solved only by action.

Barton Stone acted. His legs didn't want to move, his feet rebelled every step of the way, and his hands shook as he climbed the stairs once more.

Stone almost fell as he peered over the transom. The loft was still empty. And it was shrouded.

now, in twilight. The dusk filtering through the skylight provided just enough illumination for him to read the directory. To find the names of Kooley, Leventhaler and Mautz. And the pinpoints penetrating each, puncturing the o, the v, the u. Puncturing their names, puncturing their lives, providing punctuation. The final punctuation—period.

How many others had died today, in how many cities, towns, hamlets, crossroads, culverts, prisons, hospitals, huts, kraals, trenches, tents, igloos? How many times had the silver pin descended, forced by fatal fancy?

Yes, and how many times would it descend tonight? And tomorrow', and the next day, and forever and ever time without end, amen?

They always pictured Death wielding a scythe, didn't they? And to think that it was really just a pin—a pin with a curve or a hook in it. A long, sharp silver pin, like that one there.

The last rays of the dying sunset found it, set its length ablaze in a rainbow glow'. Stone gasped, sharply. It was here, right here on the table, where the little fat man had left it when he went out to eat—the silver pin!

Stone eyed the sparkling instrument, noted the hooked end, and gasped again. It was a scythe, after all! A little miniature scythe of silver. The weapon of Death which cut down all mankind. Cut down mankind without rhyme or reason, stabbed senselessly to deprive men forever of sensation. Stone could picture it moving in frantic rhythm over the names of military personnel, pick, pick, picking away at lives; point, point, pointing at people; stick, stick, sticking into human hearts. The fatal instrument, the lethal weapon, smaller than any sword and bigger than any bomb.

It was here, on the table.

He had only to reach out and take it—

For a moment the sun stood still and his heart stopped beating and there was nothing but Silence in the whole wide world.

Stone picked up the pin.

He put it in his shirt-pocket and stumbled out of the room, stumbled through darkness and tumbled down the flights of the night.

Then he was out on the street again, and safe. He was safe, and the pin was safe in his pocket, and the world was safe forever.

Or was it? He couldn't be sure.

He couldn't be sure, and he couldn't be sure, and he sat there in his room all night long, wondering if he'd gone completely mad.

For the pin was only a pin. True, it was shaped like a miniature scythe. True, it was cold and did not warm to the touch, and its point was sharper than any tool could ever grind.

But he couldn't be sure. Even the next morning, there was nothing to show. He wondered if Death read the papers. He couldn't read all the papers. He couldn't attend all the funerals. He was too busy. Or, rather, he had been too busy. Now he could only wait, as Stone was waiting.

The afternoon editions would begin to provide proof. The home editions. Stone waited, because he couldn't be sure. And then he went down to the corner and bought four papers and he knew.

There were death-notices, still; of course there would be. Death-notices from yesterday. Only from yesterday.

And the front-pages carried further confirmation. The subject-matter of the stories was serious enough, but the treatment was still humorous, quizzical, or at best, speculative and aloof. Lots of smart boys on the wire-services and the city desks; too hard boiled to be taken in or commit themselves until they were certain. So there was no editorial comment, yet; just story after story, each with its own "slant".

The prisoner up at Sing-Sing who went to the chair last night—and was still alive. They'd given him plenty of juice, and the power worked, all right. The man had fried in the hot seat. Fried, literally, but lived. Authorities were investigating—

Freak accident up in Buffalo—cables snapped and a two-ton safe landed squarely on the head and shoulders of Frank Nelson, 42. Broken back, neck, arms, legs, pelvis; skull completely crushed. But in Emergency Hospital, Frank Nelson was still breathing and doctors could not account for—

Plane crash in Chile. Eighteen passengers, all severely injured and many badly burned when engines caught fire, but no fatalities were reported and further reports—

City hospitals could not explain the sudden cessation of deaths throughout Greater New York and environs—

Gas main explosions, automobile accidents, fires and natural disasters; each item isolated and treated as a freak, a separate phenomenon.

That's the way it would be until, perhaps, tomorrow, when the hardboiled editors and the hardheaded medical men and the hardshelled Baptists and the hard-nosed military leaders and the hard pressed scientists all woke up, pooled their information, and realized that Death had died.

Meanwhile, the torn and the twisted, the burned and the maimed, the tortured and the broken ones writhed in their beds—but breathed and lived, in a fashion.

Stone breathed and lived, in a fashion, too. He was beginning to see the seared body of the convict, the mangled torso of the mover, the agonized forms that prayed for the mercy of oblivion all over the world.

Conscience doth make cowards of us all and no man is an island. But on the other hand, Stone breathed and lived, after a fashion. And as long as he had the pin, he'd breathe and live forever. Forever!

So would they all. And more would be born, and the earth would teem with their multitude—what then? Very well, let the editors and the doctors and the preachers and the soldiers and the scientists figure out solutions. Stone had done his part. He'd destroyed Death. Or at the least, disarmed him.

Barton Stone wondered what Death was doing right now. Death, in the afternoon. Was he sitting in the loft, pondering over his piles of useless papers, lingering over his lethal ledgers? Or was he out, looking for another job? Couldn't very well expect to get unemployment compensation, and he had no social security.

That was his problem. Stone didn't care. He had other worries.

The tingling, for example. It had started late that morning, around noon. At first Stone ascribed it to the fact that he hadn't eaten or slept for over twenty-four hours. It was fatigue. But fatigue gnaws. Fatigue does not bite. It doesn't sink its sharp little tooth into your chest.

Sharp. Chest. Stone reached up, grabbed the silver pin from his pocket. The little scythe was cold. Its sharp, icy point had cut through his shirt, pricked against his heart.

Stone laid the pin down very carefully on the table, and he even turned the point away from himself. Then he sat back and sighed as the pain went away.

But it came back again, stronger. And Stone looked down and saw that the pin pointed at him again. He hadn't moved it. He hadn't touched it. He hadn't even looked at it. But it swung around like the needle of a compass. And he was its magnetic pole. He was due North. North, cold and icy like the pains that shot through his chest.

Death's weapon had power—the power to stab him, stab his chest and heart. It couldn't kill him, for there was no longer any dying in the world. It would just stab him now, forever and ever, night and day for all eternity. He was a magnet, attracting pain. Unendurable, endless pain.

The realization transfixed him, just as the point of the pin itself transfixed him.

Had his own hand reached out and picked up the pin, driven it into its chest? Or had the pin itself risen from the table and sought its magnetic target? Did the pin have its own powers? He wondered.

Yes. That was the answer, and he knew it now. Knew that the little fat man was just a man and nothing more. A poor devil who had to go out and eat, who slept and dozed as best he could while he still stabbed ceaselessly away. He was only a tool. The pin itself was Death.

Had the little man once looked over a transom or peered through a window in New York or Bagdad or Durban or Rangoon? Had he stolen the silver pin from yet another poor devil and then been driven by it; driven out into the street by the pin that pricked and pricked at his heart? Had he returned to the place where all the names in the world awaited their final sentencing?

Barton Stone didn't know. All he knew was that the pin was colder than arctic ice and hotter than volcanic fire, and it was tearing at his chest. Every time he tore it free, the point inexorably returned and his hand descended with it, forcing the pin into his chest. Sigh, stab, sob—the power of Death was in the pin.

And the power of Death animated Barton Stone as he ran through the nighted streets, panted up the midnight stairs, staggered into the loft.

A dim light burned over the table, casting its glow over the waiting shadows. The little fat man sat there, surrounded by his books, and when he saw Barton Stone he looked up and nodded.

His stare was impersonal and blank. Stone's stare was agonized and intent. There was something Stone had to find out, once and for all; a question which must be answered. He recognized its nature and the need, sought and found his solution in the little fat man's face.

The little fat man was a man, and nothing more. He was merely the instrument, and the pin held all the power. That was enough for Barton Stone to know. It was all he could know, for the rest was only endless pain. He had to be relieved of the pain, had to be released from it, just as the poor devils all over the world had to be relieved and released. It was logic, cold logic; cold as the pin, cold as Death.

Stone gasped, and the little fat man stood up and moved around from behind the table.

"I've been waiting for you," he said. "I knew you'd come back."

Stone forced the words out. “I stole the pin,” he panted. “I’ve come to give it back—back where I got it.”

The little fat man looked at him, and for the first time, Stone could read his eyes. In them he saw infinite compassion, limitless understanding, and an endless relief.

“What is taken cannot be returned,” murmured the little man.

“I think you know that. When you took the pin, you took it forever. Or until—”

The little man shrugged and indicated the seat behind the table.

Silently, Stone sat down. The books bulked before him; the books, the directories, the papers and scrolls and lists that contained all the names in the world.

“The most urgent are on top,” whispered the little man. “I sorted them while I waited.”

“Then you knew I’d be back?” The little fat man nodded. “I came back, once, too. And I found—as you will find—that the pain goes away. You can remove the pin now, and get to work. There’s so much work to do.”

He was right. There was no longer any stabbing sensation in Stone’s chest. The little scytheshaped pin came away quite easily and balanced in Stone’s right hand. His left hand reached for the topmost book. A small piece of paper, bearing a single scribbled name, rested on the opened volume.

“If you don’t mind,” breathed the little fat man. “This name first, please.”

Stone looked at the little fat man. He didn’t look down at the scribbled name—he didn’t have to, for he knew. And his right hand stabbed down, and the little man sighed and then he fell over and there was only a wisp of dust.

Old dust, gossamer-light dust, soon blows away. And there was no time to look at the dancing, dissipating motes. For Barton Stone was sighing, stabbing, shuddering, sobbing.

And the pin pointed and pricked. Pricked the convict up in Sing-Sing and Frank Nelson in Buffalo Emergency, and the crash victims in Chile. Pricked Chundra Lai of Bombay, Ramona Neilson of Minneapolis, Barney Yates in Glasgow, Igor Vorpetchzki in Minsk, Mrs. Minnie Haines and Doctor Fisher and Urbonga and Li Chan and a man named John Smith in Upper Sandusky.

It was day and it was night and it was summer and it was autumn and it was winter and it was spring and it was summer again but you could hide out there for years without being caught.

All you did was keep shuffling the books, picking at random. That was the best you could do, the only fair way. Sometimes you got mad and took a lot from one place; sometimes you just kept going, plodding along and leaving it up to the pin.

You sighed, you stabbed, you shuddered and you sobbed. But you never stopped. Because the pin never stopped, the scythe was always swinging.

Thus it was, and thus it would be, forever. Until the day came, inevitably, when somehow, somewhere, someone would find out . . .

Mr. Steinway

Dorothy loved a genius and wanted only to be loved in return. This certainly seemed the natural thing for a girl to ask. The Steinway thought differently.

THE first time I saw Leo, I thought he was dead. His hair was so black and his skin was so white—I'd never seen hands so pale and thin. They lay crossed on his chest and, I suppose, concealed the rhythm of his breathing. There was something almost repulsive about him; he was so thin, so still, and there was such a nothingness on his face. It was like a death-mask that had been made a little too late, after the last bit of the living personality has fled. I stared down at Leo, shuddered a little, and started to move away.

Then he opened his eyes, and I fell in love with him.

He sat up, swung his legs over the side of the enormous sofa, grinned, rose. At least, I suppose he did. All I really noticed was the deep brown of his pupils and the warm, rich hunger that poured from them into me, the hunger that poured and found a feeding-place somewhere in my heart.

I know what it sounds like. But I'm not a schoolgirl, and I don't keep a dairy any longer, and it's been years since I've had a mad, mad crush. I'd been going around for years, assured that I was emotionally mature. Until he opened his eyes and I fell in love with him.

Harry was making the introductions, now.

Dorothy Endicott. She heard you play in Detroit last week and she wanted to meet you. Dorothy, this is Leo Winston." He was quite tall, and he managed a little bow, or rather an inclination of his head, without once moving his gaze. I don't know what he said. "Charmed" or "delighted" or "pleased to meet you"—it didn't matter. He was looking at me.

I did all the wrong things. I blushed. I giggled. I said something about how much I admired his playing, and then I repeated myself and tripped over the words.

But I did one right thing. I looked back. All the while Harry was explaining how we'd just happened to stop up and we didn't mean to disturb him but the door was open so we walked right in. And he wanted to remind Leo about placing the piano for tomorrow night's concert, and the ticket-sales were going good according to the latest report this noon. And now he had to run along and arrange for the puffs for tomorrow's papers, so —

"There's no reason for you to hurry off, is there, Miss Endicott?"

There was, I agreed, no reason at all. So Harry left, like the good little Samaritan he was, and I stayed and talked to Leo Winston.

I don't know what we talked about. It's only in stories that people seem able to remember long conversations verbatim. (Or is it long verbatim conversations? It's only in stories that people have perfect control of grammar, too.)

But I learned that his name was once Leo Weinstein . . . that he was thirty-one years old . . . unmarried . . . he liked Siamese kittens . . . he broke his leg once, skiing up at Saranac . . . couldn't stand Chopin or Poulenc . . . he liked Manhattans made with dry vermouth, too.

It was over the second of these, after I told him all about myself (and nothing, unless he could read my eyes) that he asked me if I wanted to meet Mr. Steinway.

Of course I said yes, and we went into the other room, the one behind the sliding doors. There sat Mr. Steinway, all black and polished to perfection grinning a welcome with his eighty-eight teeth.

“Would you like to hear Mr. Steinway play something for you?” asked Leo.

I nodded, feeling a warmth far beyond the power of two Manhattans to inspire—a warmth born of the way he said it. I hadn’t felt that way since I was thirteen and in love with Bill Prentice and he asked if I’d like to see him do a Full Gaynor off the high board.

So Leo sat down on the bench and he patted Mr. Steinway on the leg the way I sometimes pat Angkor, my Siamese kitten. And they played for me. They played the Appasionata and the berceuse from The Firebird and something very odd by Prokofieff and then several things by the two Scotts—Cyril, and Raymond. I suppose Leo wanted to show his versatility, or perhaps that was Mr. Steinway’s idea. Anyway, I liked it all, and I said so, emphatically.

“I’m glad you appreciate Mr. Steinway,” Leo said. “He’s very sensitive, I’ll have you know, like everyone in my family. And he’s been with me a long time—almost eleven years. He was a surprise from my mother, when I made my debut at Carnegie.”

Leo stood up. He was very close to me, because I’d been sitting on the piano bench beside him ever since the berceuse, and that made it easier for me to see his eyes as he closed the black lip over Mr. Steinway’s teeth and said, “Time for a little rest, before they come and get you.”

“What’s the matter?” I asked. “Is Mr. Steinway ill?”

“Not at all—I thought he sounded in the best of spirits.” Leo grinned (how could I ever have imagined him dead, with his incandescent vitality?) and faced me. “He’s going over to the concert hall this evening—he has a date to play with me tomorrow night. Which reminds me, will you be there?”

The only answer for that one was, “Silly boy!” but I restrained it. Restraint did not come easy with me when I was with Leo. Not when he looked at me like that. With his eyes holding such hunger, and the long slim fingers caressing the panelling as they had caressed the keys, as they could so easily caress—

I trust I’m making myself clear?

Certainly I was transparent enough the following evening. After the concert we went out, just the four of us; Harry and his wife, Leo, and I. And then just Leo and I, in the candlelight of the apartment, in the big room that looked so bare and empty without Mr. Steinway squatting there where he belonged. We watched the stars over Central Park and then we watched the reflections in each other’s pupils, and what we said and what we did are not meant for sharing.

The next day, after we read the notices, we went for a walk in the Park. Leo had to wait until they’d moved Mr. Steinway back into the apartment, and it was lovely in the Park, as always. As it must have been for millions who, somewhere in their memories, hold an instant when they walked in Central Park in May and owned it all—the trees, the sunshine, the distant laughter rising and falling as transiently as the heartbeat quickened by a moment of ecstasy.

But—“I think they’re on the way over,” Leo said, glancing at his watch and rising from the bench. “I really ought to be there when they move him in. Mr. Steinway’s big, but he’s quite delicate, actually.”

I took his hand. “Come on, then,” I said.

He frowned. I’d never seen him frown before, and it seemed out of character to me. “Maybe you’d better not, Dorothy. I mean, it’s a slow job up those stairs, and then I’ll have to practise. Don’t forget, I’m booked for Boston next Friday, and that means four hours a day for the next week—Mr. Steinway and I must get our program in shape. We’re doing the Ravel Concerto, the Left-Hand one, with the Symphony, and Mr. Steinway isn’t fond of Ravel. Besides, he’ll be leaving on Wednesday morning, so there really isn’t too much time.”

"But you aren't taking the piano with you on tour, are you?"

"Certainly. Where I go, Mr. Steinway goes. I've never used another instrument since Mother gave him to me. I wouldn't feel right about it, and I'm sure it would break Mr. Steinway's heart."

Mr. Steinway's heart.

I had a rival, it seems. And I laughed about it, we both laughed about it, and he went away to his work and I went back to my apartment to sleep, perchance to dream . . .

I tried phoning him about five. No answer. I waited a half-hour, and then I grabbed the nearest rosy pink cloud and floated over to his apartment.

As usual—as was customary with Leo, whose mother had literally kept "open house" out on the Cape—the door was unlocked. And I naturally took advantage of the situation to tiptoe in and surprise Leo. I pictured him playing, practising, absorbed in his work. But Mr. Steinway was silent, and the sliding doors to the other room were closed. I got my surprise in the anteroom.

Leo was dead again.

He lay there on the huge couch, his pallor almost phosphorescent in the gathering twilight. And his eyes were closed and his ears were closed and his very heart seemed closed until I bent down and blended the warmth of my lips with his own.

"Dorothy!"

"Sleeping Beauty, in reverse!" I exclaimed, triumphantly, rumpling his hair. "What's the matter, darling? Tired after your rehearsal? I don't blame you, considering—"

It was still light enough for me to recognize his frown.

"Did I—startle you?" It was a B-movie line, but this was, to me, a B-movie situation. The brilliant young concert pianist, torn between love and a career, interrupted in his pursuit of art by the sweet young thing. He frowns, rises, takes her by the shoulders as the camera pans in close and says—

“Dorothy, there’s something you and I must talk about.”

I was right. Here it comes, I told myself. The lecture about how art comes first, love and work don’t mix—and after last night, too! I suppose I pouted. I make a very pretty pout, on occasion. But I waited, prepared to hear him out.

And he said, “Dorothy, what do you know about Solar Science?”

“I’ve ever heard of it.”

“That’s not surprising. It’s not a popular system; nothing in parapsychology has gained general acceptance. But it works, you know. It works. Perhaps I’d better explain from the beginning, so you’ll understand.”

So he explained from the beginning, and I did my best to understand. He must have talked for over an hour, but what I got out of it boils down to just a little.

It was his mother, really, who got interested in Solar Science. Apparently the basis of the concept was similar to Yoga or some of these new mental health systems. She’d been experimenting for about a year before her death—and during the past four years, since her passing, Leo had worked on it alone. The trance was part of the system. Briefly, as near as I could make out, it consisted of concentration—“but effortless effort of concentration, that’s important”—on one’s inner self, in order to establish “complete self-awareness.” According to Solar Science one can become perfectly and utterly aware of one’s entire being, and “communicate” with the organs of the body, the cells, the very atomic and molecular structure. Because everything, down to the very molecules, possesses a vibration-frequency and is therefore alive. And the personality, as an integrated unit, achieves full harmony only when complete communication is established.

Leo practised four hours a day with Mr. Steinway. And he devoted at least two hours a day to Solar Science and “self-awareness.” It had done wonders for him, done wonders for his playing. For relaxation, for renewal, for serenity, it was the ultimate answer. And it led to an extension of awareness. But he'd talk about that some other time. What did I think?

What did I think?

I honestly didn't know. Like everyone else, I'd heard a lot, and listened to very little, about telepathy and extra-sensory perception and teleportation and such things. And I'd always associated these matters with the comic-strip idea of scientists and psychologists and outright charlatans and gullible old women given to wearing long ropes of wooden beads which they twisted nervously during seances.

It was something different to hear Leo talk about it, to feel the intensity of his conviction, to hear him say—with a belief that burned—that this meditation was all that had preserved his sanity in the years after his mother died.

So I told him I understood, and I'd never interfere with his scheme of living, and all I wanted was to be with him and be for him whenever and wherever there was a place for me in his life. And, at the time, I believed it.

I believed it even though I could only see him for an hour or so, each evening, before his Boston concert. I got a few TV leads during the week—Harry arranged some auditions, but the client postponed his decision until the first of the month—and that helped to pass the time.

Then I flew up to Boston for the concert, and Leo was magnificent, and we came back together with nary a thought or a word about Solar Science or anything except the two of us.

But on Sunday morning, we were three again. Mr. Steinway arrived.

I dashed over to my own apartment and came running back after lunch. Central Park shimmered in the sunlight, and I admit I shared something of its radiance.

Until I was in the apartment, and heard Mr. Steinway rumbling and growling and purring and screeching and cachinnating, and I hurried in to Leo and the piano stopped.

He frowned. It seemed I was developing quite a talent for making an unexpected entrance.

"I didn't expect you so soon," he said. "I was just practising something new."

"So I heard. What's the rest of it?"

"Never mind, now. Did you want to go out this afternoon?" He said it just as if he didn't see the new shoes, the suit, the hat I'd bought from Mr. John just to surprise him.

"No. Honestly, darling, I didn't mean to interrupt. Go on with your playing."

Leo shook his head. He stared down at Mr. Steinway.

"Does it bother you to have me around when you practise?"

Leo didn't look up.

"I'll go away."

"Please," he said. "It isn't me. But I'm afraid that Mr. Steinway doesn't—respond to you properly."

That tore it. That ripped it to shreds. "Now wait a minute," I said, coolly (if white-hot rage is cool). "Are we doing a scene from Harvey, now? Is this some more of your Solar Science, and am I to infer that Mr. Steinway is alive? I admit I'm not very bright, not overly perceptive, and I couldn't be expected to share your sensitive reactions. So I've never noticed that Mr. Steinway had an existence of his own. As a matter-of-fact, to me, it's just another piano. And its legs don't begin to compare with my own."

"Dorothy, please—"

"Dorothy doesn't please! Dorothy isn't going to say one more word in the presence of your—your—incubus, or whatever it is! So Mr. Steinway doesn't respond to me properly, is that it? Well, you tell Mr. Steinway for me that he can go plumb to—"

Somehow he got me out of the apartment, into the sunlight, into the park, into his arms. And it was peaceful there, and his voice was soft, and far away the birds made a song that hurt me in my throat.

“. . . so you weren’t far wrong at that, darling,” Leo told me. “I know it’s hard to believe for anyone who hasn’t studied Solar Science or ultra-kinetic phenomena. But Mr. Steinway is alive in a way. I can communicate with him, and he can communicate with me.”

“You talk to it? It talks to you?”

His laughter was reassuring, and I desperately wanted to be reassured, now. “Of course not. I’m talking about vibrationary communication. Look at it this way, darling. I don’t want to sound like a lecturer—but this is science, not imagination.

“Did you ever stop to think what makes a piano? It’s a highly complicated arrangement of substances and materials—thousands of tiny, carefully calculated operations go into the construction of a truly fine instrument. In a way, the result is comparable to the creation of an artificial being; a musical robot. To begin with, there’s a dozen different kinds of wood, of various ages and condition. There’s special finishes, and felt, gut, animal matter, varnish, metal, ivory—a combination of elements infinitely complex. And each has its own vibrationary rate, which in turn forms part of the greater vibrationary rate of the whole. These vibrations can be sensed, contacted and understood.”

I listened, because I wanted to find sense and sanity and serenity somewhere in it all. I wanted to believe, because this was Leo talking.

“Now, one thing more, and that’s the crux of the matter. When vibration occurs, as it does in all being, electronic structure is disturbed. There’s an action sequence—and a record of that action is made on the cellular structure.

“Now if you record many messages on a single piece of tape at different speeds, you’d have to play them back at these speeds in order to understand the message as a whole. Inability to do so would keep you from knowing or comprehending these messages. That’s what ordinarily bars our communication with non-human life forms and gives us the impression that they have neither thought nor sentience.

"Since we humans use the development of the human brain as criterion, we aren't aware of the intelligence of other life-forms. We don't know how intelligent they are because we, most of us, don't realize that rocks and trees and everything in the material universe can 'think' or 'record' or 'communicate' at its own level.

"That's what Solar Science has taught me—and it has given me the method of entering into communication with such forms. Naturally, it isn't simple. But from self-awareness I have slowly proceeded into a more general awareness of vibrationary rates. It's only logical that Mr. Steinway, so much a part of my life and a part of me, would be a logical subject for an experiment in communication. I've made that experiment and succeeded, at least partially. I can share communication with Mr. Steinway; and it's not all one-way, I assure you. You remember what the Bible said about 'sermons in stones'—it's literally true."

Of course he said more than that, and less, and in different words. But I got the idea. I got the idea only too well. Leo wasn't altogether rational.

"It's really a functional entity, too, darling," he was saying. "Mr. Steinway has a personality all his own. And it's a growing one, thanks to my ability to communicate with him in turn. When I practise, Mr. Steinway practises. When I play, Mr. Steinway plays. In a sense, Mr. Steinway does the actual playing and I'm really only the mechanism that starts the operation. It may sound incredible to you, Dorothy, but I'm not fooling when I say there are things Mr. Steinway refuses to play. There are concert halls he doesn't like, certain tuning practises he refuses to respond to or adjust to. He's a temperamental artist, believe me, but he's a great one! And I respect his individuality and his talent.

"Give me a chance, darling—a chance to communicate with him until he understands you and your place in our lives. I can override his jealousy after all, isn't it natural that he'd be jealous? Let me attune our vibrations, until he senses the reality of your presence as I sense it. Please, try not to think of me as crazy. It's not hallucination. Believe me."

I stood up. "All right, Leo. I believe you. But the rest is up to you. I shan't be seeing you again until—until you've made some arrangements."

My high heels clip-clip-clipped up the path. He didn't try to follow me. A cloud covered the sun, wrapped it in a ragged cloth, torn and dirty. Torn and dirty—

I went to Harry, of course. After all, he was Leo's agent and he'd know. But he didn't know. I found that out at once, and I cut myself off before I said too much. As far as Harry was concerned, Leo was perfectly normal.

"Except, of course, you may be thinking of that business with his mother. The old lady's death hit him pretty hard you know what show business moms are like. She ran the whole shooting-match for years, and when she kicked off like that, he kind of went haywire for a while. But he's all right now. A good man, Leo. A comer. Thinking of a European flier next season—they think Solomon is such hot stuff. Wait until they hear Leo."

That's what I got out of Harry, and it wasn't much. Or was it?

It was enough to set me thinking, as I walked home—thinking about little Leo Weinstein, the boy prodigy, and his adoring mother. She watched over him, shielded him, saw to it that he practised and rehearsed, regulated the details of his life so he came to depend upon her utterly. And then, when he made his debut like a good boy, she gave him Mr. Steinway.

Leo had cracked up, a bit, when she died. I could imagine that very easily. He had cracked up until he turned to his mother's gift for support. Mr. Steinway had taken over. Mr. Steinway was more than a piano, but not in the way Leo said. In reality, Mr. Steinway had become a surrogate for the mother. An extension of the Oedipus-situation, wasn't that what they called it?

Everything was falling into a pattern, now. Leo, lying on the couch and looking as though he were dead—returning, in fantasy, to the womb. Leo “communicating” with the vibrations of inanimate objects—trying to maintain contact with his mother beyond the grave.

That was it, that must be it, and I knew no way of fighting the situation. Silver cord from the mother or silver chord from the piano—it formed a Gordian knot either way, and I was weaponless.

I arrived at my apartment and my decision simultaneously. Leo was out of my life. Except—

Lie was waiting for me in the hall.

Oh, it’s easy to be logical, and reason matters out coldly, and decide on a sensible course of action. Until somebody holds you in his arms, and you have the feeling that you belong there and he promises you that things will be different from now on, he understands, he can’t live without you. He said all the tried and true things, the trite and true things, the right and true things. And all that had gone before faded away with the daylight, and the stars came out and spread their splendour . . .

I must be very exact now. It’s important that I be exact. I want to tell just how it was the next afternoon when I walked around to his apartment.

The door was open and I came in, and it was like coming home. Until I saw that the sliding doors to the other room were closed, until I started towards them, until I heard the music. Leo—and Mr. Steinway—were playing again.

I called it “music,” but it wasn’t that, any more than the sudden anguished scream thrust from a human throat is normal communication. All I can say is that the piano was playing and the sound came to me as vibrations, and for the first time I understood something of what Leo had meant.

For I heard, and understood that I heard, the shrill trumpeting of elephants, the slow groaning of boughs in the nightwind, the crash of toppling timber, the raw rumble of ore filling a furnace, the hideous hissing of molten metal, the screech of steel, the agonized whine of sandpaper, the tormented thrum of twisted strings. The voices that were not voices spoke, the inanimate was animate, and Mr. Steinway was alive.

Until I slid the doors open, and the sound suddenly ceased, and I saw Mr. Steinway sitting there alone.

Yes, he was alone, and I saw it as surely as I saw Leo slumped in the chair on the far side of the room, with the look of death on his face.

He couldn't have stopped in time and run across the room to that chair—any more than he could have composed that atonal allegro Mr. Steinway played.

Then I shook Leo, and he came alive again, and I was crying in his arms and telling him what I'd heard, and hearing him say, "It's happened, you can see that now, can't you? Mr. Steinway exists—he communicates directly—he's an integrated personality. Communication is a two-way affair, after all. And he can tap my energy, take what he needs from me to function. When I let go, he takes over. Don't you see?"

I saw. And I tried to keep the fear from my eyes, tried to banish it from my voice, when I spoke to him. "Come into the other room, Leo. Now. Hurry, and don't ask questions."

I didn't want questions, because I didn't want to tell him that I was afraid to talk in Mr. Steinway's presence. Because Mr. Steinway could hear, and he was jealous.

I didn't want Mr. Steinway to hear when I told Leo, "You've got to get rid of it. I don't care if it's alive or if we're both crazy. The important thing is to get rid of it, now. Get away from it. Together."

He nodded, but I didn't want nods.

"Listen to me, Leo! This is the only time I'll ask it, and your only chance to answer. Will you come away with me now, today? I mean it—pack a suitcase. Meet me at my apartment in half an hour. I'll phone Harry, tell him something, anything. We haven't time for anything more. I know we haven't time."

Leo looked at me, and his face started to go dead, and I took a deep breath, waiting for the sound to start again from the room beyond—but his eyes met mine, and then the color came back to his face and he smiled at me, with me, and he said, “I’ll see you in twenty minutes. With suitcase.”

I went down the stairs swiftly, and I know I had perfect control. I had perfect control out on the street, too, until I heard the vibrations of my own high heels. And the sound of tires on the pavement, and the singing of the telephone wires in the wind, and the snick of traffic-lights, and the creaking of an awning, and then came the sense of the sounds under the sounds and I heard the voice of the city. There’s agony in asphalt and a slow melancholy in concrete, and wood is tortured when it splinters, and the vibrations of a piece of cloth twisted into clothing weaves terror from a threnody of thread. And all around me I felt the waves, the endless waves, beating in and pulsing over, pouring out their life.

Nothing looked different, and everything was changed. For the world was alive. For the first time, everything in the world came alive, and I sensed the struggle to survive. And the steps in my hallway were alive, and the banister was a long brown serpent, and it hurt the key to be twisted in the lock, and the bed sagged and the springs complained when I put down the suitcase and crushed my protesting clothes into its confines. And the mirror was a silver shimmer of torment, and the lipstick was being bruised by my lips, and I could never, never eat food again.

But I did what I had to do, and I glanced at my watch and tried to hear only the ticking, not the cries of coils and the moan of metal; tried to see only the time and not the hands.

Twenty minutes.

Only, now, forty minutes had passed. And I hadn’t even phoned Harry yet (the black mouthpiece, the bakelite corroding, the wires nailed to the crosses of telephone poles) and I couldn’t phone because Leo wasn’t here.

To go down again into the street was more than flesh could bear, but the need was stronger than the needs of flesh. And I went out into the seething symphony where all sound was vibration and all vibration was life, and I came to Leo’s apartment and everything was dark.

Everything was dark except Mr. Steinway’s teeth, gleaming like the tusks of elephants in forests of ebony and teak. Leo couldn’t have moved Mr. Steinway from the inner room to the outer room. And he hated Chopin. He wouldn’t sit there in the dark playing the Funeral March . . .

Mr. Steinway’s teeth were spotted with little drops and they gleamed, too. And Mr. Steinway’s heavy legs were wet. They brushed against me, because Mr. Steinway was rolling and rumbling towards me across the room, and he was playing and playing and telling me to look, look, look at the floor where I could see Leo dead, really dead, and all the power was Mr. Steinway’s now, the power to play, the power to live, the power to kill . . .

Yes, it’s true. I scraped the box and liberated the sulphur and released the flame and started the fire and let its roaring drown out the vibrations, drown out the voice of Mr. Steinway as he screamed and gnashed his eighty-eight teeth. I set the fire. I admit it. I killed Mr. Steinway. I admit it.

But I didn’t kill Leo.

Why don’t you ask them? They’re burned, but they know! Ask the sofa. Ask the rug. Ask the pictures on the wall. They saw it happen. They know I’m not guilty.

You can do it. All you need is the ability to communicate with the vibrations. Just as I’m doing it now. See? I can hear everything they’re saying, right in this room. I can understand the cot, and the walls, and the doors, and the bars and the ceiling.

I don’t have anything more to say. If you don’t believe me, if you won’t help me, then go away. Let me just sit here and listen. Listen to the bars . . .

The Goddess of WIsdom

After six months on Galactic Service a five-day leave seemed hardly time to solve the mystery of a lovely stranger from far Outside.

Only the irrepressible Robert Bloch could write this story. An uncautiously candid Dr. Kinsey report on Love of the Future Female. And wrapped around the legend of Minerva about whom the always-romantic graphic Greeks had the right word. Myth or maid—was she something desirable?

LET'S NOT pull any punches. The first thing I wanted after I landed at Skyport was a female. Yes, that's right. I didn't say woman. I said female. There aren't any women at Skyport, except for one or two of the Officials, and there's no sense in wishful thinking.

But I'm not making any excuses for the way I felt. If you're one of the narrow-minded kind that's never left Earth nothing I'd say would convince you. But if you've ever been Outside you can understand. Particularly if you've been far Outside.

That's where I'd been—far outside the Galaxy—for six long months. Simple little phrase, isn't it? Six long months. But it doesn't mean to you what it means to me. It couldn't unless you've spent that length of time in prison or an asylum on Earth, or in a space ship Outside.

Maybe you swallow all that stuff about the glamor of the Galactic Service; maybe you think of a stretch of patrol or exploratory duty in terms of a luxury cruise in a 60-passenger Moon-liner. Well, you're wrong. If you'd just gone through six months such as I'd been through you'd want female company and want it bad.

So here I was at Skyport, back after my six long months of imprisonment in an artificial cell, eating artificial food, breathing artificial air, living under artificial gravity. Six long months of monotony, of loneliness, of boring routine and enforced discipline. Six long months with nothing to see but the six long faces of my equally bored companions. You get so you know every thought in their heads, anticipate every word they can utter. Anticipate? You get so you dread the next thought, the next word!

Of course there's some relief when you land—if you can call risking your neck on some science-forsaken asteroid a relief. If you enjoy wearing a protectelope against blazing heat or bitter cold or deadly gas, you can actually get out and stretch your legs sometimes. All too often you have to stretch them pretty fast, before some new, unclassified denizen decides you'd make a good entree for dinner.

But I've got nothing to sell. So that's all I'll say about those six long months. Now I was back. I'd landed, taken the Decontamination routine, got my shots, my tests, my orders for the next trip out, and now I was ready for my five-day leave.

Five-day leave on Skyport! What a break that was! I'd been looking forward to it for so long.

I've already mentioned the absence of women. Now I can throw in a remark or two about the presence of Service Officials, Service Technicians, Service Observers and Service Police. Add a smattering of gouging, chiselling merchants and a good number of criminal riffraff, squeeze them all together into three square miles of tin-topped magnificence, and you have Skyport.

Think I'm griping? Well, let me tell you right now that it looked mighty good to me. Mighty good. I stepped out of Barrack No. 5 and headed past the gates, down toward the center of town. Dark-hour was due, and the incs began to blaze in the streets. It was a sight for space-sore eyes, and no mistake. Just to see lights, any kind of lights, was momentarily enough. Just to breathe air, fresh air, all the air I wanted, was wonderful! Just to feel marsh under my feet, to feel marsh and imagine it was earth—paradise!

New uniform on my back, a full exchange-clip in my pocket, and five full days of freedom; that was the setup. Five Mars-days, not Earth-days, but why quibble? This was no time for quibbling. I had a lot of things on my agenda.

I was going to hole up in one of the three Stopovers, just like a private citizen, and sleep in a real bed. A real bed, with soft silk sheets brought all the way from Earth . . .

I was going to hit the best tavs and drink the best Earth beer; beer in cans, beer fresh from the pressurized reefer-units, beer from a place called Milwoky, umpteen million miles away . . .

I was going to look up Harley and some of the others, if they were around, and yarn about the good old days, and gripe about the Service . . .

But first of all, I wanted a female.

I walked down the street into town, gawking and marvelling the the way the old cowboys did in early times on Earth, five hundred years ago when they were just settling the west and entered some frontier outpost after a stretch on the range.

Come to think of it, this was frontier. This was the jumping-off place for Earthmen these days—the Last Frontier. Full of soldiers, Service people, crooks, gamblers, chisellers, brinkers and drifters. It was noise and bustle and cheating and drinking and it was tough as plutonium and crude as gerk—and I loved the sight and the sound of it at Dark-hour.

And more important still, I loved the thought of the contrast to come—the soft serenity, the palpable presence of an actual female. A man can relax, a man can lose his tensions, a man can find himself again, if there’s a female around who can talk, who can listen, who can give him back those old illusions of grace and beauty. I wasn’t seeking flesh, I was seeking spirit.

You get those ideas Outside. And when you come back, and you're in Skyport, you go to Ottar. You go to fat Ottar at his bar in the House of All Planets. You get yourself a room in his hotel, and you ask Ottar if he has any female guests. Females, transients waiting to take the space liners out again; females you can eat with, drink with, talk with.

You go to Ottar with hunger in your eyes. You find him sitting at the downstairs desk next to the bar and you say, "Long time." And fat Ottar grins and holds out his hand. It isn't a nice hand—particularly if you believe that rumor about his having Marty blood—but you grasp it like a drowning man grasps a rope. And what fat Ottar could give me was much better than a rope.

I said, "I've got the shakes. I was wondering—"

He cut me off with a nod. "Too bad you weren't here about three months ago. A woman came here—"

"A real woman?"

"I wouldn't brink you. Young, too. With that yellow hair—what you call it?"

"Blonde."

"Yes. Like yours. Only longer. And she looked so." His fat hands made fat gestures.

"What happened?"

"Run off with a Chief."

I said something under my breath. Just my luck. Ottar shuffled to the reefer, got out a can of beer, pulled a posturchair up to the bar. He opened the can for me.

The beer was cold. Cold and real. I could actually taste it going down. That sense of reality was what I craved now more than anything else.

"Where's everybody?" I asked. "How's business?"

Ottar shrugged. "They're all like you," he said. "When the liners bring females they come in to see them, to talk. Otherwise, no." Then he leaned forward. “But there is a female here for you to see. You, only.”

“Just arrived, off Harley’s unit.”

I gaped. “Harley? You mean the old so-and-so is in town?”

“Yes and no.”

“Don’t brink me, Ottar. Where is he?”

“Death-side.”

“No!” I stood up. “Of all the rotten, lousy news—”

“He was your friend. I am sorry.” Ottar shuffled away and came back with more beer. He opened the cans with his nails. “Poor, poor Harley.” He lifted the cans, extending one to me, and we drank to Harley. It wasn’t much of a gesture, a grotesque way of showing sorrow and saying goodbye. But it was genuine. The beer, as I drank it, tasted sour. Poor old Harley gone death-side! Not good.

“What happened?” I asked. Ottar said, “I can trust you?”

“I’m not in uniform now, Ottar. This is between friends—about a friend.”

“All right. I’ll level. Harley and I, we were partners. I put up the money for his unit. Prospecting, off-bounds. No permits.”

“I thought he was freighting.”

“That was the front. He wanted to wildcat for metals on unstaked asteroids. I got him clearance through the Chiefs.”

“Don’t tell me how you did it,” I cut in. “It’s all right. There must be dozens in the same game.”

“Whatever he brought back, we split. I sold it for him, split the take fifty-fifty. And he was paying off on the unit. You know the job? Brand new, Foss model, auto-control.” Ottar sighed. “You should see what it looks like now.”

“Where it is?”

“Edge of the Private Strip. Right where it crash-landed two days ago. I got the signal on my tape, of course, when the unit hit grav. And I knew what that meant—something had gone very much wrong. I was out to the Strip in five likhs. Got there just as it came down. Luckily there was no explosion. Sometime or other he's set auto-control, and a Foss unit is tough. But the nose caved in, and everything buckled.

The Emergency was on the way, and I had to do some fixing in order to get on board first. But as part-owner I made out all right."

"What did you find?"

Ottar gulped beer. "Harley must have hit something. Maybe he had a heart attack or a stroke. He must have just had time to set auto-control before he dropped. Dropped and hit something at grav. It was bad. Worst I've ever seen."

"You sure?"

"What other answer is there?" Ottar didn't look at me. "There was blood all over the cabin. And he was wide open, ripped apart, wedged there in the corner with his head blown off, nothing above the neck—"

"Damned fool would go out in a solo unit," I grumbled. I could see poor old Harley lying there mangled and I felt like crying.

"Here." Ottar pushed beer my way. "You wanted me to tell you about the female."

"She was on the unit?"

"Sitting there, strapped, staring at him. She must have strapped herself when they hit grav. She was all spattered with his blood."

"Did she kill him?" I snapped it out.

"Impossible. No weapons. And nobody could have done a job like that on a man. He was torn apart, I tell you, with his head exploded into nothing. Maybe he picked up something on the trip, something Emergency has never heard about; they're investigating, of course. Something to burst a man's head and insides wide open . . . Oh, forget, it!"

"What did the female say about it?"

Ottar shrugged. "Nothing. She doesn't talk."

"You mean she doesn't understand? Or is it shock?"

"No shock. She just doesn't talk. Can't. No sound at all."

"Where'd Harley pick her up?"

"How would I know? The Service is decoding his tape-records. But they're faked. Harley always faked them so he could sneak off to unstaked asteroids. He told me where he'd been when he came in each time. But now, of course, I'll never find out where he was this last trip. . . . It must have been way off the course, wherever he was. No specimens or metal in the unit—which is lucky for me, of course, with the Service investigating."

"What about the female?"

"Don't ask too many questions. I got her off the unit without anyone seeing her."

"But that's impossible!"

"They looked the other way." Ottar grinned. "Understand?" I understood. And it wasn't any of my business. If some of the officials took graft, that was their department. I was sick of the Service, sick of hearing about Harley's death. I had five days' leave, and time was wasting.

I stood up. "This female—tell me, Ottar, what's she like?"

"I'll show you." Ottar rose, led the way. We went to the stairs and a little man came out of the back and took Ottar's place at the desk in case any customers came in while he was away.

Then we climbed the stairs.

I don't know how many rooms Ottar has in his establishment—more than anyone would suspect, from the looks of the place. All I know is that they're on both sides of a long hall, and each one has a glass panel set in the top of the door. There's a blind which drops from inside, for privacy. But unless the need for privacy exists the blinds stay up and you can look into the rooms as you pass.

"I knew you were scheduled back," Ottar was saying. "That's why I took her off the unit. Also, because I figured she might talk some day and then the Service would find out what Harley and I had been doing. But mostly I was hoping you could see her and try to find out something about what had happened."

I nodded. We went down the corridor, rounded a corner, reached the room at the further end of the hallway.

Ottar said, “She cannot—or will not—talk to me. She will not smile. She will not eat. She merely sits and looks at me as if she didn’t like what she saw. And it hurts me because she is so lovely.”

This was strange talk, coming from old Ottar. He wasn’t usually susceptible to females, any females. Nor, for that matter, was Harley. There was something very odd here, and Ottar was right—I did want to find out what had happened to Harley.

“But what do you expect me to do?” I asked.

Ottar shook his head. “I do not know. All I ask is that you try.” He led me to the door, halted before the glass panel. I looked inside. Ottar was right. Wherever she was from, whoever and whatever she was, she was lovely.

The female sat on the couch in the small room, sat to one side almost directly below my line of vision so that I stared down at her from above. She was wearing some kind of sheer smock that Ottar must have provided, but I paid no attention to that. I looked at her—at the smooth sweep of her limbs, at the white slope of her shoulders, at the classic contours of a face I’d seen many times before in dreams.

Her hair was woven darkness and her eyes had never known anything but light. Her mouth was a moulded magnet, and—well, Ottar was right. She was lovely.

“She looks like a woman,” I whispered. “What’s the catch here, Ottar? Is she dangerous? Does she bite? A carnivore?”

Ottar shrugged. “I don’t think so. She made no attempt to resist when I found her, brought her here. It is just that she will not communicate. Perhaps you cannot even make her understand. But you can try.”

“I’ll try,” I said.

“You are not afraid, then? Good. I see you are armed, in case she proves unexpectedly hostile. But I do not think she will trouble you in that way.”

I didn’t think she would trouble me in that way, either.

“Go ahead,” Ottar said. “I’ll be downstairs at the bar. Somebody may come in. Call if you need me. And try to find out about Harley. It is important that I know.”

He shuffled down the hall. I opened the door, stepped into the room, closed the door behind me. Locked myself in and locked reality out.

That was the feeling. Standing on the other side of the door, looking at her, everything had been real. But once I was inside the room with her reality faded. We faced each other, total strangers. And I was suddenly a stranger to myself!

A stranger and afraid! Who said that? I used to read the classic tapes when I was earth-side. I used to go out for six months at a time on Service assignments. I used to dream about females. I used to talk to Ottar about Harley's death. I used to look through a glass door at living dreams. . . .

That was reality, the Past. Now I stood in the Present. In the room with her. I looked down and she looked up. A moment, a minute, an hour, a century slipped by. The Present was infinity.

A faint, foolish, far-off part of me was wondering, "Now what do you do? She doesn't talk. She doesn't even understand what you're here for. And what are you here for, anyway?"

Yes, what was I here for? My original purpose, my past purpose, was gone. She wasn't just a female. She was somehow less than that and somehow much, much more.

I can say that her hair was black and her skin was white and her lips were red, but that doesn't begin to describe the intensity, the pure depths of the color that clashed and flamed and blended, the colors that offered the beauty of her body to my eyes.

I can say that she was proud, that her every attitude and gesture made a measure of that pride. But I cannot describe how that pride seemed to be a part of her very being.

And I can say that, sitting there, she lifted her head and looked into my eyes. Gazed into my eyes. Stared into my eyes. Flowed into my eyes.

Her eyes were like warm suns, far away. Her eyes were like blazing suns, close at hand. Her eyes burned inside me. . . .

She was inside me, a part of me. And her mind was inside my mind communicating with me. . . .

“I am here. What do you wish of me?” her mind said to me.

Telepath? Perhaps. Whatever it was, it worked. She didn’t talk, she communicated. And what did I wish of her?

“What’ll I call you?” I thought.

“Minerva. That would be closest.” Her mind grasped thought, replied.

“Minerva?”

The goddess of wisdom.” Where did you learn that?” From your mind, now. You decided that I was the—equivalent—to Minerva.”

It wasn’t a voice inside my head. It was a sort of flowing. She did it with her eyes, I knew. They stared at me, hypnotized me. Yes,” she assented.

Yes, what?”

“You may sit down beside me.” I sat down very close to Minerva on the sofa. Close to midnight, ice and fire. “Where are you from?

The communication I got in return was not formed in words but came to me in a familiar picture. Grass, trees, clouds, flowers it was Earth!

Earth?” I spoke aloud.

“No. Not Earth. I cannot tell you. There is nothing in your mind that would be a counterpart of the place I came from.”

At least she was honest. I framed my next question. “Where did you meet Harley?”

“Harley?” She waited for me to form the concept of Harley.

Then she shook her head. The flow came. “I do not know this Harley.”

“But you do! You came here with him on his unit!” I thought of Harley, lying dead with his smashed head, of her sitting strapped in a seat beside him . . . I pushed the thought away quickly, but she caught it.

“Yes. There was such a man on the unit. Was that Harley?”

I nodded. “How did you get on the unit?”

For a moment, blankness. Then, “I do not know. It happened to him before I was there.” “Before you were there? That doesn’t make sense.”

“It happened before I was there. I do not lie.”

I believed her. But I did not understand.

“I am sorry,” the flow came. “But there is no way of explaining.”

“Then you can’t tell me about Harley, and about the trip? About where he was going, where he’d been, how he died?”

Her eyes answered. “I am truly sorry. It all happened before I was there.”

Suddenly I realized what I was doing—sitting here with the most beautiful female I’d ever known, asking questions with my mouth and getting answers from her eyes! It was crazy. It was interesting and it would have made somebody from Research Control very happy. But it was also a waste of my time. A complete waste of the five days leave I wanted to make the most of.

So she didn’t know about Harley, and I believed her. So Harley was dead. Harley was dead and he’d stay death-side. And I was alive. Alive, after six months Outside. I’d come here in the first place wanting the company of a female. Wanting more than that, but not daring to hope—wanting love.

“Love?” She’d read my thoughts again. And she understood all of them, except the last. “What is this love?”

All right. I thought about love. About all kinds of love. And I thought about her. . . .

“No! It is not possible!”

She was honest. This wasn’t a brink-job; there must be a reason. I asked for it. “Why?”

“There can be nothing of what you think between you and me. It is impossible. You are a man. But I am not a—you call it—woman. You understand?”

I didn’t. All I could understand was that I was in the presence of perfection; that woman or no, she was more completely and utterly female than anything or anyone I had ever known or imagined. She was the essence of everything I wanted and needed. And we were alone together yet eternities apart. . . .

There must be some way of bridging eternity! There had to be! I asked the only question I could ask. “Are there other ways of expressing love for your kind?

“Yes.”

“And what are those ways?”

She hesitated a moment before communication came. It was as though she were learning, too. “With the eyes, I know. Or through the eyes. Mind to mind. Or my being to your mind.

“I do not understand.” And a part of my mind said, “You’re lying.”

Her eyes answered. “I do not lie. It is an ancient way of love the first way—which your kind have forgotten.”

Mind to mind. Her being to my mind. “Then how do you reproduce?”

The concept formed, the answer came swiftly. “Being to mind. Thought is the seed, but not as you know it. The male is the host.”

“Host? You mean the male carries the child?”

“Not the way you understand. The male carries the seed within him for—your time—a week, perhaps. And we are born as you see me now.”

“Full-grown? But how?”

“I cannot tell you. We are of a different order than mankind. More. I am today as I arrived here, as I will be forever. I can communicate, learn if I desire, but it is not necessary. I am complete in myself without adding anything further.”

It didn’t make sense, but it was self-evident. Whatever she was trying to tell me I already knew. She was complete. I couldn’t imagine her as she might be before, and I couldn’t imagine her changing. She was past, present, future—all incarnate. A beautiful statue, but alive. But this gibberish about gestation, parturition. . . .

“I cannot explain. You have no parallel concept to give me the words. There is my thought which is seed to that part of you which accepts it. And the—cells, you’d call them, although they are not cells—multiply swiftly. They grow in the warm, soft darkness. They feed and grow, feed and grow. And then—I am born. Always new, always the same. Forever and ever. This I know, although I was not told. There was no one to tell me.”

She sounded like a class in metaphysics, or whatever they used to call it. But she looked like the most desirable woman ever created. And that’s what she was to me. I moved closer to her; it was almost agony to be so close and not touch her.

"No," came the message. "It is not for you. You do not understand what it means. . . ."

I didn't. All I understood was that I wanted her, wanted her in any way possible; wanted love with the eyes, the mind, anything. I was once told that there are times when the merest touch is worth ten nights in a harem, and I'd laughed. I wasn't laughing now. Looking at her, I knew it could be true. It would be true, must be true for me.

"There's more to love than lips and loins may learn."

Was that her thought or mine? I did not know. All I knew was the need. And was it her need or mine?

She was staring at me now, and suddenly I sensed that she shared my sensation. She understood what I wanted, what I desired, because she desired it too. She'd warned me because she loved me. And because she loved me, she'd give herself in her own way.

"Yes." Her eyes said that. And her hands sought mine, the hands of marble, the hands of fire. We sat there in silence and our eyes met.

She gave me her eyes and all that lay behind them. And the first gift was loneliness. All the loneliness of endless space, all the loneliness of endless time. It surged into me, surged through me until I was filled with all that is empty. Now I understood why she held my hands—that was all she could do to keep my being from losing itself in the frozen void. As it was, I remained retained my identity, and took the loneliness from her. It was her gift, and it became part of me.

Her second gift was memory. Not her memory but the memory of all who had gone before her. It was not words, it was not images, it was not thoughts; it was a whirling, incredibly flashing blend and blur of sense-impressions in which I found earth and marble columns, moons and craters, shattered stars and blazing suns set in a continuity which had nothing to do with time. It came to me swiftly, and incorporated without identifying. Again it was only the touch of her hands that saved me.

The third gift was warmth. Heat. Fire. Her warmth, her heat, her fire. It was love as I knew it, love as I had never known it, loved as I'd never dared dream it. Worlds were split apart to make mountains. Mountains ripped asunder to spew lava. And the molten mass of it flowed to fuse us into pure flame. This was the love of the gods, which is fire. And out of fire comes life.

Her hands fell away. I sat back, gasping, trying to focus my eyes and my thoughts. I felt exhausted, but there was no feeling of emptiness. The incredible conviction came to me that perhaps she had spoken the literal truth—that I might now be carrying the seed. . . .

"Yes. Oh, yes! It is done now, as it was ever done, as it must always be done."

I closed my eyes. There was a churning inside me. I had to sleep, sleep, sleep without dreams or desire. . . .

When I opened my eyes again she was gone. The key was missing from the table and the door was open. I peered into the emptiness of the dawn-gray hall. Then, slowly I found my way through the corridor and down the stairs.

Ottar slept at his desk, his big head cradled in his arms. He jumped when I poked him.

He did more than jump when I told him that she was gone.

"But how could she go? I was here. I didn't see anyone. I didn't hear a sound. All at once I was asleep and that's all I remember."

I tried to smile. "That makes sense. She's a telepath, among other things. Which means she can probably use her mind as a hypnotic weapon, too. She put you to sleep and went on her way."

Ottar grabbed my shoulder. "What happened? What did you find out about Harley? Tell me."

"There's nothing to tell. She didn't know Harley. That's what she claims, and I believe her."

"How could that be? It doesn't make sense."

"Not our kind of sense." I sighed. "But there are other kinds of sense and other kinds of life in the universe."

Ottar said, "Will you find her?"

I nodded. There was no sense saying any more. No sense tell him that I'd never find her, never bring her back. Some man would see her soon, walking in the dawn, gaze into her eyes, then take her for himself whatever the risk. Before the day was out, I knew, she'd be in a unit bound for another world. She, or those before her, had known many worlds and would know many more as long as there are men who dare to desire a dream come true.

I thought about it all through the day, after I'd taken a room here at the Unit-el. It's Dark-hour again and I'm writing it down.

Gradually, I've figured it out. About poor old Harley and what happened to him, and about what happened to me. Harley hit some spot and landed, over a week ago. And he met Minerva's mother, if you can call her that. And they loved, if you can call it that. "It happened before I was there," she had said to me.

Then he took off again in the unit. Alone. But he wasn't really alone. Because "the cells multiply swiftly. They grow in the soft, warm darkness. They feed and grow, feed and grow."

She told the truth when she said she didn't know Harley. Of course she didn't. And she didn't know her mother because she never saw her mother.

When she was born she was already on the unit—and Harley was already dead. Harley died when his head ripped open—and she was born.

I understand how, in searching my mind for concepts, she found the name Minerva. The seeds travel from world to world, from universe to universe, and man is the carrier and the host. In ancient times a man who could make such a journey was called a god. His offspring were gods or goddesses. It must have happened on Olympus, when Minerva was born. Yes, that was it.

I remember the legend of the goddess of wisdom now, of Minerva who sprang fullbloom from the head of Jupiter.

So it wasn’t a legend. “My being meets your mind. The cells feed and grow, feed and grow. . . . One week. . . . Full grown.”

And the seed grew in Harley’s brain, where it has been planted. And in one week his head burst out there in space, and Minerva was born. My Minerva.

In a week, now, she’ll reproduce again. But this time it’s feeding and growing in my brain. It absorbs the bony parts of the skull and the skin expands incredibly. It drinks the blood and eats the soft gray nourishment and waxes fat in godliness as it sups on the wisdom of men. And then it springs, fullblown . . . In just one week. . . .

I can’t write any more. My head is beginning to ache. . . .

The Communist

SHOWS US THE MAN IN THE CELLAR. WHO IS HE? HE COULD BE YOU, OR ME - - - OR ANY OF US, WHEN WE ARE ALL CALLED. . . . .

I took a good look around before I went in, to be sure nobody was following me. Apparently the coast was clear, but you've got to be careful.

Snow was coming down and the streets were utterly deserted. I went into the bar and closed the door behind me, letting the grateful warmth come up as I waited for the steam to clear from my glasses.

Apparently I was the only customer tonight. Nobody came here when there was a District Meeting, and that's what I'd counted on. The bartender gave me a funny look -- he must have been wondering why I wasn't over at the Armory with the rest of them.

I walked up to the bar and stood there.

"What's yours?" he asked.

"Make it straight," I said.

"Wash?"

"Blood."

He stared and leaned over. "What type?"

"702," I told him.

Now it was his turn to look around. He put his mouth close to my ear. "In back here," he murmured. "Thought you was never coming."

"How is he?" I asked.

The bartender shrugged. "I dunno. I haven't been down for a while. Last time I looked, not so good."

"Drinking?"

The bartender nodded. "Whaddya expect?"

"Think he can make it if I bring the car around?"

"Dunno. See for yourself. Coma on, now, hurry before somebody comas in. Damn Security was around about six."

I stiffened. He put his hand on my shoulder. "It's all right. They didn't notice nothing." He stopped, raising the trapdoor in the floor under the back-bar. "Here you go -- take the flashlight. I'll give you the office three times with my foot, like this, if anybody comes in."

He stamped in demonstration as he handed me the flashlight. I clicked it on and clambered down the steps as he closed the trapdoor over me.

I went down the short passageway and opened the cellar door. It wasn't the regular cellar -- just a room hollowed out behind the coalbin, I guess. Hardly the place to spend the weekend, with its single naked light bulb dim and dangling down over the table, the chair, the cot and the toilet.

The big man stood up when I came in. That is, he tried to stand up, but he couldn't quite make it. He trembled a little -- but that might have been the whiskey, too. I could see the empty fifth-bottle on the floor and the half-filled one resting next to his right hand. If that wasn't evidence enough, I had only to look at his eyes. They were rolling around in the sockets like a couple of bloodshot marbles.

"Hello," I said. "All ready to go?"

He gulped. "Jesus, you frightened me when you came in. I thought it was ---"

I nodded. "Nothing to worry about. Everything's set."

"But they said this afternoon some time ---"

"I got held up. Or rather, we couldn't find our pilot. This isn't exactly the night for a trip to Canada, you know." I smiled at him. "But we're all straightened out now. Got a car down the street, take you right to the field.

He thinks he can make it if he gets above the storm ---- he's taken off without lights before."

"Field?" He gulped again. "That's dangerous, isn't it?"

"Everything's dangerous. But you can't expect him to risk the airport. You packed?"

He glanced down at a battered briefcase. "Sure. All I've got."

"Don't worry. There's some money waiting for you in Winnepeg. And a job."

"Organization?"

I hesitated. "Well, not exactly. I mean, we know what you've been through -- we figured you ought to rest up for a while before trying any more writing. A couple of months at some routine job in a store ought to put you back in shape."

"Sure. That's what I need. Little rest." He reached for the bottle.

"Better hurry," I told him. "You're expected."

"Just one more." He tilted the bottle, passed it to me. "How about you?"

I shook my head. He looked at the bottle, started to set it down, then raised it again. "Cold outside," he said. "Better have another for the road."

"For the road." I noticed the scars on his neck when he put his head back to drink. I guess they beat him up pretty bad.

He caught me staring at him and said, "How's Tuck?"

I didn't answer.

"What's the matter?"

I sighed. "You know we can't talk. The minute we start exchanging information ---"

"Yeah, I know. But I been out of touch for so long. Did you ever hear what they did to Campbell?"

"Please, you know I can't tell you."

"But dammit, I want to know! I got a right to know!"

"Nobody has rights any more," I said. "Just duties."

"Quit stalling," he wheezed. "I'm no kid, I can take it. I know what happened to Hank and Kat and to Fritz and some of the others in town here.

Hell, I was there when they got Bea ---"

"Forget it," I said. "Let's go."

He reached for the bottle again. "You!" he said. "You act like you were in Security yourself. Won't talk, won't tell a guy anything ---"

I leaned over and took the bottle out of his hand. "Look," I murmured. "You've had enough."

"Sure. I've had enough." He grinned, and I could see the black crevice of his mouth, and the place where they'd knocked his lower teeth out. "I've had enough sitting in cellars, waiting and watching and wondering. I've had enough of this 'forget it' stuff, too. You think a man can forget? God knows, I tried. But liquor's no good, and when I sleep the dreams come, and then I'm back there at the Hearing and they're working me over, asking me about the magazine ---"

"Come on," I said. "You can sleep on the plane. Tomorrow morning you'll be in Winnipeg, ready to—

He shook his head. "Ready to what? I'm not ready for anything any more. I ought to be locked up, with the rest of them, or down under with George 0. and Mel and Ted and Judy."

"Don't talk like that," I said. "We're still fighting."

"Fighting? How ---- and what for? Sending out those damn mailings from Canada. You know the Post Office confiscates half that stuff——the Censor Division has it all spotted. And what if it gets through? Half the people on our lists are dead. The other half won't be around long either if they're ever caught reading what you send. Who the hell does Phil think he is, anyway -- Tom Paine? You can't start a revolution by mail. And who wants one around here? People like Security."

"You're just tired. You'll talk differently after a rest."

"No." His hand went to the bottle again. "Don't try and stop me. It's no use. I made up my mind," "Please, we must go now ---"

"I made up my mind, I told you. I'm not going."

"But ---"

“Sorry. I know you went to a lot of trouble, you and the whole Movement. But I’m not worth saving anyway.”

“Of course you are. Why, you’re one of the Big Names, look at what you’ve done.”

“You look at it. If you can find anything to look at.” He laughed, burbling into the bottle. “Sure, I wrote a lot. Edited, too. Used to go to all the Conventions. You remember those Conventions, Bob?”

“Sure,” I said. “I remember.”

“Thousand people. We had a thousand people at Chicago. And Philly and Frisco -- remember how Jerry used to play the piano? And this guy Ed Wood, we used to sit there and argue about ---” He slammed the bottle down. “Ah, to hell with it! What’s the use of thinking about the past?”

“Now you’re talking,” I said, “We’ve got to think about the future.”

“No you don’t!” He leered drunkenly. “ ’Gainst Security to remember? When their damn Committies figured out it was subversive -- all this stuff about space-travel and rockets. Said we were prying around in Top Secret information. Then they stopped the magazines and the books and they got after the fan organizations. Said they were all Communist Front. Said we were all Communists, too. Big laugh, isn’t it? But they proved Orwell was, and they said Huxley and H. G. Wells and Russell and all the others had Commie ideas -- so that made us Commies too. And with this war scare and everything ---”

I glanced at my watch. “We haven’t much time,” I said.

“We haven’t _any_ time. Our time ran out long ago,” He sloshed the last inch in the bottom of the bottle, then drained it. “Time ran out for Lucky and Doc and Cliff and all the boys. I saw a picture of Marty after they got through with him ---”

He began to shake now, and I saw that he was crying, “We never hurt anybody,” he said. “We did our best, and if Bradbury wrote about burning books he never figured it would make trouble. Ray wasn’t any Communist, nor Horace and Evelyn, nor Sam. It was all right until after election and then they got tough.”

"But you can't take it lying down," I told him, "We've got to fight as best we can."

"There's no fight left in m," he whispered. "Not after the Hearing, not after they confiscated everything and tossed me out, and they did what Ray said -- they burned the hooks, they burned the house, they burned all my manuscripts, that novel I was writing, they burned it and they might as well burn me too ---"

I looked at my watch again.

"Qo ahead," he murmured. "Shove off. I'll be all right."

"Tell them to save some other poor sucker. Matheson, maybe, or Sturgeon -- oh, I forgot what happened to Ted. Tell them not to worry about me. I'll be leaving here tomorrow."

"You're sure that's the way you want it?"

"I'm sure," He waved his hand. "Goodbye. And good luck!"

"Goodbye," I said.

I went out, closed the door, and climbed the steps. Then I tapped on the trap-door. The bartender let me out. The place was still deserted, "Where is he?" asked the bartender. "What happened?"

I told him.

"But what'll I do with him?" he sighed. "If he's in the shape you say he is, he's liable to go wandering around shooting off his mouth and ---"

It was my turn to sigh. Sigh, and think of the past; of who he had been and what he had bean to me, of the times we had together in the old days. And then it was my turn to forget it. Forget it and tell the bartender, "We'll be sending somebody around. Earl, or maybe Frank Robinson. Got to do it -- it's the only way."

"Guess so."

"There won't be any trouble," I said.

"Right."

I went to the door. "Have another customer for you one of these days. But in case I don't see you beforehand. Happy New Year." "Yeah," said the bartender, "Happy 1965!"

Grandma Goes to Mars

Grandma knew nothing of space ships, but she could run pump back on the farm and the pilot was darn glad she could!

I'M NOT saying it's true and I'm not saying it's false.

All I know is that Joe Saunders is the man who told me. And you wouldn't think he'd lie about a thing like that. Not Captain Joseph Saunders, the first man to ever set foot on the planet Mars—and the only man who has ever piloted three successful round trips.

After the last one, General Electronics threw a big homecoming banquet for him at the Waldorf-Astoria. It was a tremendous affair, but of course the whole idea was General Electronics' baby. I guess everybody knows that, though.

Joe Saunders and three men made the first trip. Then he and the high brass made the second trip, a year later. Finally came this third expedition, testing an improved rocket with accommodations for twenty—a trip designed to prove that fullscale interplanetary flight was possible.

It couldn't have been more successful. The whole thing was over and done with in just under three weeks—no hitches, no problems, and everybody back safe and sound in time for the big banquet and gala celebration.

Speaking for myself, I thought it was terrific. I got a big charge out of being toastmaster—introducing everybody from Joe Saunders himself way on down to the Vice President of the United States. The crowd had a good time. The TV cameras worked perfectly. The publicity was sensational.

And after it was all over, I went upstairs to the company suite and found Joe Saunders sitting on the bed, crying in his beer.

I mean exactly what I said. He sat there with his shoes off, cradling a case of beer on his lap, and he was crying. This obviously had been going on for quite some time now—he was on his sixth bottle.

“Hey,” I said. “What’s with the conquering hero?”

He just looked at me and sniffled. Captain Joseph Saunders, the greatest celebrity in the world, sniffled at me. “Lock the door,” he sobbed. “And find me an opener, quick.”

“Haven’t you been using that doohickey behind the door?” I asked.

Joe Saunders stopped sniffling and glared. “Cut out that kind of talk,” he said. “You sound like Grandma Perkins.”

“So what’s wrong with that?” I grinned at him. “Too bad she didn’t stick around for the big banquet. But she said she had to get back home before her hens started to set. Funny old gal.”

“Yeah.” Saunders took a swig of beer. “Very funny.”

“What’s the matter? You sound as if you didn’t much care for her?”

He sighed. “Oh, it’s not her, exactly. You’re the guy I really ought to kill. It was your idea that started everything.”

“Started what?” I asked him.

And that’s when he told me.

It all began with my contest. Yes, the contest was my idea, and a good one. Everybody thought so. “WIN A FREE TRIP TO MARS! JUST COMPLETE THIS STATEMENT IN 50 WORDS OR LESS. ‘I LIKE GENERAL ELECTRONICS PRODUCTS BECAUSE’—”

A natural, that’s what it was, a natural. We got over two million entries. Don’t ask me how they handled the job of selecting the winner. That was up to the judges. All I know is that the lucky party was a lady. Mrs. Hester Perkins, of Armadillo, Iowa.

General Electronics sent a private plane out to get her at their expense. We were all waiting at the airport when she came in. The press was there, too, of course, and when she hopped out of the plane with the pilot, the bulbs went off and blinded us all for a good minute.

Then we could see, and I guess Joe Saunders summed up the general reaction pretty accurately. All he said was, “Oh, no!” but that was enough.

Hester Perkins was a little old lady with white hair and rimless glasses. She wore a black silk dress and a black hat with red cherries all over the top. And so help me, she carried a bag of knitting.

President Benson swallowed twice, took a deep breath, and walked over to her. “Permit me to introduce myself,” he said. “I’m Thaddeus Benson, of General Electronics. And you, I presume, are Mrs. Hester Perkins?”

“That’s right, young man.” She beamed and held out her hand. “But you can call me Grandma. Everybody does. Where’s the General?”

“General?”

“General Electronics. I thought he’d be down to meet me—”

The press closed in, and not a moment too soon. I thought Mr. Benson was going to flip his very expensive toupee. He turned to Farley, the pilot. “What’s the meaning of this? Why didn’t you warn me?”

“But what could I do, Mr. Benson? My orders were to bring back the lady who won the contest. That’s her, all right. And I might say, she’s a good passenger. Never been up in a plane in her life but she took it calm, even when we ran into a storm over Cleveland. Just knitted away for dear life—she’s finishing some doilies for her daughter-in-law, you know, and —”

“I don’t want to know!” Benson groaned. “This is awful! Saunders, what are we going to do?”

Joe Saunders shrugged. “We’ll have to talk her out of it,” he said. “I’m not taking an old lady on any space-flight. Why, she’s over sixty! Can you imagine us sitting around in the cabin for ten days each way, watching her knit doilies?”

“We’ll talk her out of it,” I said. “Offer her a cash award, something like that. Give the trip to the runner-up.”

“That’s right,” Mr. Benson agreed. “Once she finds out what she’s in for, she’ll settle for cash.”

But Grandma Perkins had other ideas.

We told her about the hazards of the trip that night, and it didn’t faze her a bit. We even showed her through the rocket and pointed out the cramped quarters, the limited accommodations.

“Why, I think everything is perfectly scrumptious,” she told us. “You should see the farm, since Homer passed away! Not that I don’t keep things tied up, but we ain’t got furniture like this, nor all these doohickeys. What are them straps for?”

Joe Saunders told her about the straps. He explained about the takeoff and the 10-G pressure. He went on to describe how the ship was in free-fall for nine days each way, going and coming.

“Sounds real interesting,” Grandma Perkins said. “I never get dizzy or nothing. Once at the Fair I went up in one of them Ferris Wheels and I liked it so much I rode twice. Homer, he thought twenty cents was a heap to pay, but—”

“Fifty thousand dollars, cash!” Mr. Benson said. “I forgot to tell you about that, didn’t I? If you don’t take the trip, there’s an alternate prize of fifty thousand. Tax free.”

Grandma Perkins laughed. “Lands sakes,” she said. “I don’t need money. Body gets to be my age, what do they want with money? It’s the experience that counts, I always say. You just keep that money in the bank, young man. Never can tell when it might come in handy.”

“Dangerous,” Joe Saunders said. “Very dangerous. And a woman your age—”

“My age? I’m only sixty-three, and I’ve never been sick a day in my life. ’Centing when I had Martha and Homer Junior, of course. You just ask the doctor, he’ll tell you how spry I am.”

“That’s just what we intend to do,” Joe Saunders told her. “You’ll have to get a complete physical examination. We certainly can’t risk taking you without a medical okay.”

“I’m in better shape than you are, young man,” Grandma Perkins said. “You’ll see.” We did, too. The first specialist couldn’t find anything wrong, and neither could the second, nor the third. And by that time the publicity was out.

“Looks like we’re stuck!” Benson groaned, when he told me the findings.

“Stuck?” I crowed. “Look at these headlines! I tell you, we couldn’t have made a better choice if we planned it this way. The whole idea of a typical American grand-mother taking a space-flight is just perfect. Did you see the editorials? All that stuff about Youth and Age, and Grandma Moses, and the pioneer spirit? We’re not stuck!”

“No.” Joe Saunders sighed. “You’re not. But I am!”

And he was.

Of course all I know about the flight is what he told me there in the hotel room after the banquet. But that was enough. Nineteen men in the rocket, taking the 10-G pressure and then floating around or walking with weights, hanging on to straps from the sides and ceilings for nine days out. Nineteen men and Grandma Perkins.

Grandma Perkins didn’t walk and she didn’t hang. After she got used to the sensation, she spent most of her time floating. Joe said it was an awful thing to see her floating across the cabin, knitting away without missing a stitch.

“Got to get these doilies done before we get back,” she said. “I promised.” And then she’d look out of the port window. “Where are we now?”

I guess she drove the men crazy with her questions. Nineteen scientists and technologists, trapped in a cabin in space with one little old lady, and they couldn't escape.

"What's that doofunny over there?" and "How much gasoline you reckon it takes to keep this thing going?" and "What happened to all the blue in the sky?"

They answered her, of course, and that's what made them wild—because she didn't quite believe them. It was obvious she hadn't the faintest idea of how a rocket operates, or why. Saunders tried to give her a briefing on the elementary laws of physics and astronomy and the difficulties involved in going into space. He tried to impress her with the immensity of Space and the importance of the flight itself. But Grandma Perkins didn't impress very easily.

"Seems to me you could have figgered out a way to keep that engine quiet," she sniffed. "Sounds just like the electric motor Homer put on my pump. Whenever it gets out of whack, I mean. There's a sort of doobiddy on it and I have to give it a lick with my hand to make it quiet down or the water just overflows. Seems to me you could have put a muffler or whatever on that engine."

"It isn't an engine," Saunders told her. "It's a space-drive." And he explained again, until she nodded and floated away, smiling over her doily.

That's the way it went, for nine days. Nine days, with the men not daring to swear or even grumble. Not that they got much chance to get a word in edgewise. For Grandma Perkins was interested in conversation. She talked about her grandchildren, about the rations—"Call this cooking? Why, I turned out better meals on my old wood-stove back home!"—and about the best way to cure a cold. By the end of the first week the men were nervous. The thought of an approaching landing didn't lessen their tension. Finally, on the morning of the ninth day, Joe Saunders took over.

He issued instructions and told Grandma something about the landing problems. She didn't seem much impressed.

"All you mean is we strap ourselves down again, isn't that right, young man? So why tell me about those doo-jiggers of yours?"

"Just thought you'd be interested. After all, you must have some mechanical aptitude. You won the contest."

"Yes, that's right." Grandma Perkins sighed. "But what I really want to know is, will I have time to finish this here doily before we get strapped down again?"

She had time. And after they landed, she was all ready to start on a fresh one. Saunders said she didn't even bother to look out of the observation port as they came down.

But they got her into an extra suit and gave her an oxygen tank and took her out with them. There wasn't much to see around Lacus Solis, of course, yet you'd think she'd be somewhat impressed. She was hooked up with Saunders on an intercom outfit, and he kept waiting for her to say something.

Instead, Grandma Perkins glanced around at the horizon for a moment, shrugged, and then stooped down.

"What are you doing?" Saunders asked.

"Just picking up some of these stones," she explained. "I promised Martha I'd bring some back for the children. Ain't likely to find much else by way of souvenirs from the looks of the place."

"But aren't you—well, impressed?" Saunders inquired.

"Humphf! What's there to impress a body here? Can't breathe a bit of air, and there's no water. Just look at this soil! Why, you couldn't even sow alfalfa and hope to get a crop."

Just then one of the crew signalled Joe and he had to go back to the ship. He left Grandma in the care of Stigmeir, one of the engineers. They stayed out for another hour, and then came back. Stigmeir joined the others, forward, and Saunders came to the cabin where Grandma Perkins sat alone.

She had taken off her suit and helmet, and Joe says he thought she must have been impressed after all, because he noticed she'd been crying.

"Kind of gets to you, doesn't it?" he said. "The grandeur of it all, and the loneliness. Which reminds me—"

"Loneliness?" Grandma snapped. "Who's lonely? If you must know, young man, I'm crying because I'm ashamed."

"Ashamed?"

"Yes. I'm ashamed of myself." She dabbed at her eyes with the hem of an unfinished doily, then glanced carefully around the cabin. "You're sure we're alone?"

Saunders nodded. "They're all up front. I must tell you—"

"I must tell you." Grandma leaned forward. "Young man, I did an awful thing. You been so good to me, all you people, taking me on this trip and everything, and I can't help it. I got to tell somebody before I bust. I won this contest under false pretenses."

"False pretenses? You mean you didn't write—?"

"Oh, I wrote the hundred words myself, all right. But what I said just wasn't true. I mean, I really don't know anything about them newfangled General Electronics gadgets. I never owned a one of 'em, couldn't abide having them in my house! Outside of the old radio, and the motor on the pump, there isn't a doo-hunkus in the place. And me fibbing about how wonderful they all are, and how I enjoy having such things!"

For a moment she sat there, looking very little and very old. Joe Saunders reached out and put his hand on her shoulder. "That's all right," he said. "It doesn't matter, now."

"But it does! Me, fooling all you big scientists—" Saunders sighed. "Big scientists!" he said. "That's a laugh. You know what I came here to tell you?

It seems that we big scientists have run into some trouble. We planned on taking off tomorrow, but something's gone wrong."

"You mean, with the engine?"

"The space-drive. I had Watkins test, and it doesn't respond. We checked the fueling mechanism and there's nothing wrong—but it won't start."

"Can't you send out for—" Grandma hesitated, and Saunders could see that she understood. "You mean—?"

He nodded. "I mean we have food and oxygen here for the nine-day return trip, plus an extra three days. Say two weeks at most, if we ration everything. And after that—" Saunders turned and stared out at the bleak plains of Mars.

"So you've got to fix the whatchamacallit by tomorrow or the next day if we're going to get back, is that it?"

"That's it." He turned and gave her a wry smile. "Apparently you aren't the only one travelling under false pretenses. We thought we knew our way around. But now, it looks as though it doesn't matter. Unless we can figure out the trouble, fast."

Then he went forward. He was forward all that day, and the next. The men slept in shifts, and they didn't say much—to Grandma or to each other. They checked and rechecked, cursing the lack of tools, cursing the impregnable housing of the drive that prevented them from stripping it down or reaching the source of the powerhead. And they stared out of the port, too.

Finally they got the drive to turn over, but the instruments stayed dead. The transmission and feeder mechanism was shot. This was on the third day, the last.

They went back to the cabin, then, with their micrometers and their testing instruments and their delicate probes, and they sat down while Joe Saunders paced the narrow aisle between the bunks.

"Well, it looks like this is it," he said. "There's nothing more we can do."

Nobody said anything. Nobody, that is, but Grandma. "Lands sakes!" she murmured. "And me with the whole set of doilies almost finished." She cocked her head. “You fellers sure you tried everything?”

“Of course we’re sure.” Saunders clenched his fists. “Do you think we’re anxious to stay here and die?”

“But the engine’s running. I can hear it myself.”

“It runs, yes. But the transmission—the induction coils—oh, what’s the use?” Saunders turned on his heel, then halted.

“Hey,” he called. “Where do you think you’re going?”

“Up to take a look for myself,” Grandma Perkins said. “Want to come along?”

A half-hour later, they took off for earth.

“So that’s how it was,” Saunders told me, as he opened his eighth bottle of beer. “In half an hour we were on our way. And we didn’t have a bit of trouble during the whole nine days. Of course, most of the boys talked about resigning once they got back, and I’ve got a good notion to turn in my card myself. None of us could look Grandma Perkins in the face. But I’ve got to hand it to her. She just sat there, knitting away, strapped in most of the time because she’d started some new embroidery and claimed she couldn’t get it right while she floated.”

“Let me get this straight,” I said. “You mean she fixed the space-drive for you?”

“Of course she did. And that’s what’s so awful about the whole thing. If it ever gets out we’ll be the laughing-stock of the scientific world.”

“But she didn’t know anything about it,” I said. “You told me she didn’t. So what could she do?”

“What could she do?” Joe Saunders sighed, then grinned. “You remember how she kept comparing that space-drive to the electric motor on her pump back at the farm? Well, I took her in to see it and she listened for a minute, and then she did just what she did when that pump of hers gets out of order. And it worked.”

“You mean—?”

“That’s, right.” Joe Saunders raised his beer and uttered a great sob. “There happens to be a little doohickey on top of the dingus. And Grandma Perkins just lifted her skirts and kicked it.”

THE END

1955

Comfort Me, My Robot

Henson knew his wife was holding a guilty secret from him. This was intolerable and only one thing could quiet his anxiety—killing her!

WHEN Henson came in, the Adjustor was sitting inside his desk, telescreening a case. At the sound of the door-tone he flicked a switch. The posturchair rose from the center of the desk until the Adjustor's face peered at the visitor from an equal level.

"Oh, it's you," said the Adjustor. "Aren't you a bit early for dinner? Our engagement isn't until five."

"This isn't an engagement," Henson told him. "It's an appointment."

"Appointment?"

"Didn't the girl tell you? I'm here to see you professionally."

If the Adjustor was surprised, he didn't show it. He cocked a thumb at a posturchair. "Sit down and tell me all about it, Henson," he said.

"Nothing to tell." Henson stared out of the window at the plains of Upper Mongolia. "It's just a routine matter. I'm here to make a request and you're the Adjustor."

"And your request is—?"

"Simple," said Henson. I want to kill my wife."

The Adjustor nodded. "That can be arranged," he murmured. "Of course, it will take a few days."

"I can wait."

“Would Friday be convenient?”

“Good enough. That way it won’t cut into my week-end. Lita and I were planning a fishing trip, up New Zealand way. Care to join us?”

“Sorry, but I’m tied up until Monday.” The Adjustor stifled a yawn. “Why do you want to kill Lita?” he asked.

“She’s hiding something from me.”

“What do you suspect?”

“That’s just it—I don’t know what to suspect. And it keeps bothering me.”

“Why don’t you question her?”

“Violation of privacy. Surely you, as a certified public Adjustor, wouldn’t advocate that?”

“Not professionally.” The Adjustor grinned. “But since we’re personal friends, I don’t mind telling you that there are times when I think privacy should be violated. This notion of individual rights can become a fetish.”

“Fetish?”

“Just an archaicism.” The Adjustor waved a casual dismissal to the word. He leaned forward. “Then, as I understand it, your wife’s attitude troubles you. Rather than embarrass her with questions, you propose to solve the problem delicately, by killing her.”

“Right.”

“A very chivalrous attitude. I admire it.”

“I’m not sure whether I do or not,” Henson mused. “You see, it really wasn’t my idea. But the worry was beginning to affect my work, and my Administrator—Loring, you know him, I believe—took me aside for a talk. He suggested I see you and arrange for a murder.”

“Then it’s to be murder.” The Adjustor frowned. “You know, actually, we are supposed to be the arbiters when it comes to method. In some cases a suicide works just as well. Or an accident.”

“I want a murder,” Henson said. “Premeditated, and in the first degree.” Now it was his turn to grin. “You see, I know a few archaicisms myself.”

The Adjustor made a note. “As long as we’re dealing in archaic terminology, might I characterize your attitude towards your wife as one of —jealousy?”

Henson controlled his blush at the sound of the word. He nodded slowly. “I guess you’re right,” he admitted. “I can’t bear the idea of her having any secrets. I know it’s immature and absurd, and that’s why I’m seeking an immature solution.”

“Let me correct you,” said the Adjustor. “Your solution is far from immature. A good murder is probably the most adult approach to your problem. After all, man, this is the twenty-second century, not the twentieth. Although even way back then they were beginning to learn some of the answers.”

“Don’t tell me they had Adjustors,” Henson murmured.

“No, of course not. In those days this field was only a small, neglected part of physical medicine. Practitioners were called psychiatrists, psychologists, auditors, analysts—and a lot of other things. That was their chief stock in trade, by the way; name-calling and labelling.”

THE Adjustor gestured toward the slide-files. “I must have five hundred spools transcribed there,” he calculated. “All of it from books—nineteenth, twentieth, even early twenty-first century material. And it’s largely terminology, not technique. Psycotherapy was just like alchemy in those days. Everything was named and defined. Inability to cope with environment was minutely broken down into hundreds of categories, thousands of terms. There were ‘schools’ of therapy, with widely divergent theories and applications. And the crude attempts at technique they used—you wouldn’t believe it unless you studied what I have here! Everything from trying to ‘cure’ a disorder in one session by means of brain-surgery or electric shock to the other extreme of letting the ‘patient’ talk about his problems for thousands of hours over a period of years.”

He smiled. “I’m afraid I’m letting my personal enthusiasm run away with me. After all, Henson, you aren’t interested in the historical aspects. But I did have a point I wanted to make. About the maturity of murder as a solution-concept.”

Henson adjusted the posturchair as he listened.

“As I said, even back in the twentieth century, they were beginning to get a hint of the answer. It was painfully apparent that some of the techniques I mention weren’t working at all. ‘Sublimation’ and ‘catharsis’ helped but did not cure in a majority of cases. Physical therapy altered and warped the personality. And all the while, the answer lay right before their eyes.

“Let’s take your twentieth-century counterpart for an example. Man named Henson, who was jealous of his wife. He might go to an analyst for years without relief. Whereas if he did the sensible thing, he’d take an axe to her and kill her.

“Of course, in the twentieth century such a procedure was antisocial and illegal. Henson would be sent to prison for the rest of his life.

“But the chances are, he’d function perfectly thereafter. Having relieved his psychic tension by the common-sense method of direct action, he’d have no further difficulty in adjustment.

“Gradually the psychiatrists observed this phenomenon. They learned to distinguish between the psycopath and the perfectly normal human being who sought to relieve an intolerable situation. It was hard, because once a normal man was put in prison, he was subject to new tensions and stresses which caused fresh aberrations. But these aberrations stemmed from his confinement—not from the impulses which led him to kill.” Again the Adjustor paused. “I hope I’m not making this too abstruse for you,” he said. “Terms like ‘psycopath’ and ‘normal’ can’t have much meaning to a layman.”

“I understand what you’re driving at,” Henson told him. “Go. ahead. I’ve always wondered how Adjustment evolved, anyway.”

“I’ll make it brief from now on,” the Adjustor promised. “The next crude step was something called the ‘psychodrama.’ It was a simple technique in which an aberrated individual was encouraged to get up on a platform, before an audience, and act out his fantasies—including those involving aggression and violently antisocial impulses. This afforded great relief. Well, I won't trouble you with the historical details about the establishment of Master Control, right after North America went under in the Blast. We got it, and the world started afresh, and one of the groups set up was Adjustment. All of physical medicine, all of what was then called sociology and psychiatry, came under the scope of this group. And from that point on we started to make real progress.

"Adjustors quickly learned that oldfashioned therapies must be discarded. Naming or classifying a mental disturbance didn't necessarily overcome it. Talking about it, distracting attention from it, teaching the patient a theory about it, were not solutions. Nor was chopping out or shocking out part of his brain-structure.

"More and more we came to rely on direct action as a cure, just as we do in physical medicine.

"Then, of course, robotics came along and gave us the final answer. And it is the answer, Henson—that's the thought I've been trying to convey. Because we're friends, I know you well enough to eliminate all the preliminaries. I don't have to give you a battery of tests, check reactions, and go through the other formalities. But if I did, I'm sure I'd end up with the same answer—in your case, the mature solution is to murder your wife as quickly as possible. That will cure you."

"Thanks," said Henson. "I knew I could count on you."

"No trouble at all." The Adjustor stood up. He was a tall, handsome man with curly red hair, and he somewhat towered over Henson who was only six feet and a bit too thin.

"You'll have papers to sign, of course," the Adjustor reminded him. "I'll get everything ready by Friday morning. If you'll step in then, you can do it in ten minutes."

"Fine." Henson smiled. "Then I think I'll plan the murder for Friday evening, at home. I'll get Lita to visit her mother in Saigon overnight. Best if she doesn't know about this until afterwards."

"Thoughtful of you," the Adjustor agreed. "I'll have her robot requisitioned for you from Inventory. Any special requirements?"

"I don't believe so. It was made less than two years ago, and it's almost a perfect match. Paid almost seven thousand for the job."

"That's a lot of capital to destroy." The Adjustor sighed. "Still, it's necessary. Will you want anything else—weapons, perhaps?"

"No." Henson stood in the doorway. "I think I'll just strangle her."

"Very well, then. I'll have the robot here and operating for you on Friday morning. And you'll take your robot too."

"Mine? Why, might I ask?"

"Standard procedure. You see, we've learned something more about the mind—about what used to be called a 'guilt complex'. Sometimes a man isn't freed by direct action alone. There may be a peculiar desire for punishment involved. In the old days many men who committed actual murders had this need to be caught and punished. Those who avoided capture frequently punished themselves. They developed odd psychosomatic reactions—some even committed suicide.

"In case you have any such impulses, your robot will be available to you. Punish it any way you like—destroy it, if necessary. That's the sensible thing to do."

"Right. See you Friday morning, then. And many thanks." Henson started through the doorway. He looked back and grinned. "You know, just thinking about it makes me feel better already!"

HENSON whizzed back to the Adjustor's office on Friday morning. He was in rare good humor all the way. Anticipation was a wonderful thing. Everything was wonderful, for that matter.

Take robots, for example. The simple, uncomplicated mechanisms did all the work, all the drudgery. Their original development for military purposes during the twenty-first century was forgotten now, along with the concept of war which had inspired their creation. Now the automatons functioned as workers.

And for the well-to-do there were these personalized surrogates. What a convenience!

Henson remembered how he'd argued to convince Lita they should invest in a pair when they married. He'd used all of the sensible modern arguments. "You know as well as I do what having them will save us in terms of time and efficiency. We can send them to all the boring banquets and social functions. They can represent us at weddings and funerals, that sort of thing. After all, it's being done everywhere nowadays. Nobody attends such affairs in person any more if they can afford not to. Why, you see them on the street everywhere. Remember Kirk, at our reception? Stayed four hours, life of the party and everybody was fooled—you didn't know it was his robot until he told you."

And so forth on and on. "Aren't you sentimental at all darling? If I died wouldn't you like to have my surrogate around to comfort you? I certainly would want yours to share the rest of my life."

Yes he'd used all the practical arguments except the psychotherapeutic one—at that time it had never occurred to him. But perhaps it should have, when he heard her objections.

"I just don't like the idea," Lita had persisted. "Oh it isn't that I'm oldfashioned. But lying there in the forms having every detail of my body duplicated synthetically—ugh! And then they do that awful hypnotherapy or whatever it's called for days to make them think. Oh I know they have no brains it's only a lot of chemicals and electricity but they do duplicate your thought-patterns and they react the same and they sound so real. I don't want anyone or anything to know all my secrets—"

Yes that objection should have started him thinking. Lita had secrets even then.

But he'd been too busy to notice; he'd spent his efforts in battering down her objections. And finally she'd consented.

He remembered the days at the Institute—the tests they'd taken, the time spent in working with the anatomists, the cosmetic department, the sonic and visio adaptors, and then days of hypnotic transference.

Lita was right in a way; it hadn't been pleasant. Even a modern man was bound to feel a certain atavistic fear when confronted for the first time with his completed surrogate. But the finished product was worth it. And after Henson had mastered instructions, learned how to manipulate the robot by virtue of the control-command, he had been almost paternally proud of the creation.

He'd wanted to take his surrogate home with him, but Lita positively drew the line at that.

"We'll leave them both here in Inventory," she said. "If we need them we can always send for them. But I hope we never do."

Henson was finally forced to agree. He and Lita had both given their immobilization commands to the surrogates, and they were placed in their metal cabinets ready to be filed away—"Just like corpses!" Lita had shuddered. "We're looking at ourselves after we're dead."

And that had ended the episode. For a while, Henson made suggestions about using the surrogates—there were occasions he'd have liked to take advantage of a substitute for token public appearances—but Lita continued to object. And so, for two years now, the robots had been on file. Henson paid his taxes and fees on them annually and that was all.

That was all, until lately. Until Lita's unexplained silences and still more inexplicable absences had started Henson thinking. Thinking and worrying. Worrying and watching. Watching and waiting. Waiting to catch her, waiting to kill her—

SO he'd remembered psychotherapy, and gone to his Adjustor. Lucky the man was a friend of his; a friend of both of them, rather. Actually, Lita had known him longer than her husband. But they'd been very close, the three of them, and he knew the Adjustor would understand.

He could trust the Adjustor not to tell Lita. He could trust the Adjustor to have everything ready and waiting for him now.

Henson went up to the office. The papers were ready for him to sign. The two metal boxes containing the surrogates were already placed on the loaders ready for transport to wherever he designated. But the Adjustor wasn't on hand to greet him.

"Special assignment in Manila," the Second explained to him. "But he left instructions about your case, Mr. Henson. All you have to do is sign the responsibility slips. And of course, you'll be in Monday for the official report."

Henson nodded. Now that the moment was so near at hand he was impatient of details. He could scarcely wait until the micro-dupes were completed and the Register Board signalled clearance. Two common robots were requisitioned to carry the metal cases down to the gyro and load them in. Henson whizzed back home with them and they brought the cases up to his living-level. Then he dismissed them, and he was alone.

He was alone. He could open the cases now. First, his own. He slid back the cover, gazed down at the perfect duplicate of his own body, sleeping peacefully for two serene years since its creation. Henson stared curiously at his pseudo-countenance. He'd aged a bit in two years, but the surrogate was ageless. It could survive the ravages of centuries, and it was always at peace. Always at peace. He almost envied it. The surrogate didn't love, couldn't hate, wouldn't know the gnawing torture of suspicion that led to this shaking, quaking, aching lust to kill—

Henson shoved the lid back and lifted the metal case upright, then dragged it along the wall to a storage cabinet. A domestic-model could have done it for. him, but Lita didn't like domestic-models. She wouldn't permit even a common robot in her home.

Lita and her likes and dislikes! Damn her to Los Alamos and gone!

Henson ripped the lid down on the second file.

There she was.

There she was; the beautiful, harlot-eyed, blonde, lying, adorable, dirty, gorgeous, loathsome, heavenly, filthy little goddess of a slut!

He remembered the command word to awake her. It almost choked him now, but he said it.

“Beloved!”

Nothing happened. Then he realized why. He’d been almost snarling. He had to change the pitch of his voice. He tried again, softly. “Beloved!”

She moved. Her breasts rose and fell, rose and fell. She opened her eyes. She held out her arms and smiled. She stood up and came close to him, without a word.

Henson stared at her. She was newly-born and innocent, she had no secrets, she wouldn’t betray him. How could he harm her? How could he harm her when she lifted her face in expectation of a kiss?

But she was Lita. He had to remember that. She was Lita, and Lita was hiding something from him and she must be punished, would be punished.

Suddenly, Henson became conscious of his hands. There was a tingling in his wrists and it ran down through the strong muscles and sinews to the fingers, and the fingers flexed and unflexed with exultant vigour, and then they rose and curled around the surrogate’s throat, around Lita’s throat, and they were squeezing and squeezing and the surrogate—Lita tried to move away and the scream was almost real and the popping eyes were almost real and the purpling face was almost real, only nothing was real any more except the hands and the choking and the surging sensation of strength.

And then it was over. He dragged the limp, dangling mechanism (it was only a mechanism now, just as the hate was only a memory) to the waste-jet and fed the surrogate to the flame. He turned the aperture wide and thrust the metal case in, too.

Then Henson slept, and he did not dream. For the first time in months he did not dream, because it was over and he was himself again. The therapy was complete.

"SO that's how it was," Henson sat in the Adjustor's office, and the Monday morning sun was strong on his face.

"Good." The Adjustor smiled and ran a hand across the top of his curly head. "And how did you and Lita enjoy your weekend? Fish biting?"

"We didn't fish," said Henson. "We talked."

"Oh?"

"I figured I'd have to tell her what happened, sooner or later. So I did."

"How did she take it?"

"Very well, at first."

"And then—?"

"I asked her some questions."

"Yes."

"She answered them."

"You mean she told you what she'd been hiding?"

"Not willingly. But she told me. After I told her about my own little check-up."

"What was that?"

"I did some calling Friday night. She wasn't in Saigon with her mother."

"No?"

"And you weren't in Manila on a special case, either." Henson leaned forward. "The two of you were together, in New Singapore! I checked it and she admitted it." The Adjustor sighed. "So now you know," he said.

"Yes. Now I know. Now I know what she's been concealing from me. What you've both been concealing."

"Surely you're not jealous about that?" the Adjustor asked "Not in this modern day and age when—"

"She says she wants to have a child by you," Henson said. "She refused to bear one for me. But she wants yours. She told me so."

"What do you want to do about it?" the Adjustor asked.

"You tell me," Henson murmured. "That's why I've come to you. You're my Adjustor."

"What would you like to do?"

“I’d like to kill you,” Henson said. “I’d like to blow off the top of your head with a pocket-blast.”

“Not a bad idea.” The Adjustor nodded. “I’ll have my robot ready whenever you say.”

“At my place,” said Henson. “Tonight.”

“Good enough. I’ll send it there to you.”

“One thing more.” Henson gulped for a moment. “In order for it to do any good, Lita must watch.”

It was the Adjustor’s turn to gulp, now. “You mean you’re going to force her to see you go through with this—?”

“I told her and she agreed,” Henson said.

“But, think of the effect on her, man!”

“Think of the effect on me. Do you want me to go mad?”

“No,” said the Adjustor “You’re right. It’s therapy. I’ll send the robot around at eight. Do you need a pocket-blast requisition?”

“I have one,” said Henson.

“What instructions shall I give my surrogate?” the Adjustor asked.

Henson told him. He was brutally explicit, and midway in his statement the Adjustor looked away, coloring. “So the two of you will be together, just as if you were real, and then I’ll come in and—”

The Adjustor shuddered a little then managed a smile. “Sound therapy,” he said. “If that’s the way you want it, that’s the way it will be.”

THAT’S the way Henson wanted it, and that’s the way he had it—up to a point.

He burst into the room around quarter after eight and found the two of them waiting for him. There was Lita, and there was the Adjustor’s surrogate. The surrogate had been well-instructed; it looked surprised and startled. Lita needed no instruction; hers was an agony of shame.

Henson had the pocket-blast in his hand, cocked at the ready. He aimed.

Unfortunately, he was just a little late. The surrogate sat up gracefully and slid one hand under the pillow. The hand came up with another pocket-blast aimed and fired all in one motion.

Henson teetered, tottered, and fell. The whole left side of his face sheared away as he went down.

Lita screamed.

Then the surrogate put his arms around her and whispered, "It's all over, darling. All over. We did it! He really thought I was a robot, that I'd go through with his aberrated notion of dramatizing his revenge."

The Adjustor smiled and lifted her face to his. "From now on you and I will always be together. We'll have our child, lots of children if you wish. There's nothing to come between us now."

"But you killed him," Lita whispered. "What will they do to you?"

"Nothing. It was self-defense. Don't forget, I'm an Adjustor. From the moment he came into my office, everything he did or said was recorded during our interviews. The evidence will show that I tried to humor him, that I indicated his mental unbalance and allowed him to work out his own therapy.

"This last interview, today, will not be a part of the record. I've already destroyed it. So as far as the law is concerned, he had no grounds for jealousy or suspicion. I happened to stop in here to visit this evening and found him trying to kill you—the actual you. And when he turned on me, I blasted him in self-defense."

"Will you get away with it?"

"Of course I'll get away with it. The man was aberrated, and the record will show it."

The Adjustor stood up, "I'm going to call Authority now," he said.

Lita rose and put her hand on his shoulder. "Kiss me first," she whispered. "A real kiss. I like real things."

"Real things," said the Adjustor. She snuggled against him, but he made no move to take her in his arms. He was staring down at Henson.

Lita followed his gaze.

Both of them saw it at the same time, then—both of them saw the torn hole in the left side of Henson’s head, and the thin strands of wire protruding from the opening.

“He didn’t come,” the Adjustor murmured. “He must have suspected, and he sent his robot instead.” Lita began to shake. “You were to send your robot, but you didn’t. He was to come himself, but he sent his robot. Each of you double-crossed the other, and now—”

And now the door opened very quickly.

Henson came into the room.

He looked at his surrogate lying on the floor. He looked at Lita. He looked at the Adjustor. Then he grinned. There was no madness in his grin, only deliberation.

There was deliberation in the way he raised the pocket-blast. He aimed well and carefully, fired only once, but both the Adjustor and Lita crumpled in the burst.

Henson bent over the bodies, inspecting them carefully to make sure that they were real. He was beginning to appreciate Lita’s philosophy now. He liked real things.

For that matter, the Adjustor had some good ideas, too. This business of dramatizing aggressions really seemed to work. He didn’t feel at all angry or upset any more, just perfectly calm and at peace with the world.

Henson rose, smiled, and walked towards the door. For the first time in years he felt completely adjusted.

The Past Master

The tall man with the hypnotic stare came out of the sea carrying six million in cash. Only four people could furnish clues to his mysterious behavior. Here are their stories.

Statement of Dorothy Laritzky

Honestly, I could just die. The way George acts, you'd think it was my fault or something. You'd think lie never even saw the guy. You'd think I stole his car. And he keeps asking me to explain everything to him. If I told him once, I told him a hundred times—and the cops too. Besides, what's there to tell him? He was there.

Of course it doesn't make sense. I already know that. Honest to Pete, I wish I'd stayed home Sunday. I wish I'd told George I had another date when he called up. I wish I'd made him take me to the show instead of that old beach. Him and his convertible! Besides, your legs stick to those leather seats in hot weather.

But you should of seen me Sunday when he called. You'd think he was taking me to Florida or someplace, the way I acted. I had this new slack suit I bought at Sterns, with the plaid top, sort of a halter, like. And I quick put on some more of that Restora Rinse. You know, George is the one down at the office who started everybody calling me "Blondie."

So anyhow he came around and picked me up about four, and it was still hot and he had the top down. I guess he just finished washing the car. It looked real snazzy, and he said, “Boy, it just matches your hair, don’t it?”

First we drove along the Parkway and then out over the Drive. It was just parked, the cars, I mean. So he said how about it if we didn’t go to the beach until after dinner.

That was all right by me, so we went to this Luigi’s—it’s a seafood place way south on the highway. It’s real expensive and they got one of those big menus with all kinds of ozzy stuff like pompanos and terrapins. That’s a turtle, like.

I had a sirloin and French fries, and George had—f can’t remember, oh, yes I do—he had fried chicken. Before we ate we had a couple drinks, and after we just sat in the booth and had a couple more. We were sort of kidding back and forth, you know, about the beach and all, and waiting until after dark so we could go swimming on account of not bringing any suits.

Anyways, I was kidding. That George, he just as soon do anything. And don’t think I didn’t know why he was feeding me all those drinks. When we went out he stopped over at the bar and picked up a pint.

The moon was just coming up, almost full, and we started singing while we drove, and I felt like I was getting right with it. So when he said let’s not go to the regular beach—he knew this little place way off somewhere—I thought, why not?

It was like a bay, sort of, and you could park up on the bluff along this side road, and then walk down to the sand and see way out across the water.

Only that’s not why George picked it. He wasn’t interested in looking at water. First thing he did was to spread out this big beach blanket, and the second thing he did was open up his pint, and the third thing he did was to start monkeying around.

Nothing serious, you understand, just monkeying around, kind of. Well, he’s not so bad-looking, even with that busted nose of his, and we kept working on that pint, and it was kind of romantic I mean, the moon and all.

It wasn’t until he really began messing that I made him stop. And even then, I practically had to sock him one before he figured out I wasn’t kidding.

“Cut it out,” I said. “Now see what you’ve done! You tore my halter.”

“Hell, I’ll buy you a new one,” he said. “Come on, baby.” He tried to grab me again, and I gave him a good one, right on the side of his head. For a minute I thought he’d—you know—get tough about it. But be was pretty canned up, I guess. Anyhow, he just started blubbering. About how sorry he was, and that he knew I wasn’t that kind, but it was just that he was so crazy about me.

I almost had to laugh, they’re so funny when they get that way. But I figured it was smarter to put on an act, so I made out like I was real sore, like I’d never been so insulted in all my life.

Then he said we should have another drink and forget about it, only the pint was empty. So he said how about him taking a run tip to the road and getting some more? Or we could both go to a tavern if I liked.

“With all these marks on my neck?” I told him. “I certainly will not! If you want more, you get it.”

So he said he would, and he’d be bark in five minutes. And he went.

Anyhow, that’s how I was alone, when it happened. I was just sitting there on the blanket, looking out at the water, when I saw this thing sort of moving. At first it looked sort of like a log or something. But it kept coming closer, and then I could see it was somebody swimming, real fast.

So I kept on watching, and pretty soon I made out it was a man, and he was heading right for shore. Then he got close enough so’s I could see him stand up and start wading in. He was real tall, real tall, like one of those basketball players, only not skinny or anything. And so help me he didn’t have any trunks on or anything. Not a stitch!

Well, I mean, what could I do? I figured he didn’t see me, and besides, you can’t go running around screaming your head off. Not that there was anyone to hear me. I was all alone there. So I just sat and waited for him to come out of the water and go away up the beach or someplace.

Only he didn't go away. He came out and he walked right over to me. You can imagine—there I was, sitting, and there he was, all dripping wet and with no clothes. But he gave me a big hello, just like nothing was wrong. He looked real dreamy when he smiled.

"Good evening," he said. "Might I inquire my whereabouts, Miss?"

Dig that "whereabouts" talk!

So I told him where he was, and he nodded, and then he saw how I was staring and he said, "Might I trouble you for the loan of that blanket?"

Well, what else could I do? I got up and gave it to him and he wrapped it around his waist. That's the first I noticed he was carrying this bag in his hand. It was some kind of plastic, and you couldn't tell what was inside of it.

"What happened to your trunks?" I asked him.

"Trunks?" You'd of thought he never heard of such things the way he said it. Then he smiled again and said, "I'm sorry. They must have slipped off."

"Where'd you start from?" I asked. "You got a boat out there?" He was real tan, he looked like one of these guys that hang around the Yacht Basin all the time.

"Yes. How did you know?" he said.

"Well, where else would you come from?" I told him. "It just stands to reason."

"It does, at that," he said.

I looked at the bag. "What you got in there?" I asked.

HE opened his mouth to answer me, but he never got a chance. Because all of a sudden George came running down from the bluff. I never even seen his lights or heard the car stop. But there he was, just tearing down, with a bottle in his hand, all ready to swing. Character!

"What the hell's going on here?" he yelled. "Nothing," I told him.

"Who the hell is this guy? Where'd he come from?" George shouted.

"Permit me to introduce myself," the guy said. "My name is John Smith and—"

"John Smith my foot!" yelled George, only he didn't say "foot." He was real mad. "All right, let's have it. What's the big idea, you two?"

"There isn't any big idea," I said. "This man was swimming and he lost his trunks, so he borrowed the blanket. He's got a boat out there and—"

"Where? Where's the boat? I don't see any boat." Neither did I, come to think of it. George wasn't waiting for any answers, though. "You there, gimme back that blanket and get the hell out of here."

"He can't," I told him. "He hasn't got any trunks on."

George stood there with his mouth open. Then he waved the bottle. "All right, then, fella. You're coming with us." He gave me a wise look. "Know what I think? I think this guy's a phony. He could even be one of those spies the Russians are sending over in submarines."

That's George for you. Ever since the papers got full of this war scare, he's been seeing Communists all over the place.

"Start talking," he said. "What's in that bag?" The guy just looked at him and smiled.

"Okay, so you want to do it the hard way, it's okay by me. Get up that bluff, fella. We're gonna take a ride over to the police. Come on, before I let you have it." And he waved the bottle.

The guy sort of shrugged and then he looked at George. "You have an automobile?" he asked.

"Of course, what do I look like, Paul Revere or something?" George said.

"Paul Revere? Is he alive?" The guy was kidding, but George didn't know it.

"Shut up and get moving," he said. "The car's right up there."

THE guy looked up at the car. Then he nodded to himself and he looked at George.

That's all he did. So help me. He just looked at him.

He didn't make any of those funny passes with his hands, and he didn't say anything. He just looked, and he kept right on smiling. His face didn't change a bit.

But George—his face changed. It just sort of set, like it was frozen stiff. And so did everything. I mean, his hands got numb and the bottle fell and busted. George was like he couldn't move.

I opened my mouth but the guy kind of glanced over at me and I thought maybe I'd better not say anything. All of a sudden I felt cold all over, and I didn't know what would happen if he looked at me.

So I stood there, and then this guy went up to George and undressed him. Only it wasn't exactly undressing him, because George was just like one of those window dummies you see in the stores. Then the guy put all of George's clothes on himself, and he put the blanket around George. I could see he had this plastic bag in one hand and George's car keys in the other.

I was going to scream, only the guy looked at me again and I couldn't. I didn't feel stiff like George, or paralyzed, or anything like that. But I couldn't scream to save my neck. And what good would it of done anyhow?

Because this guy just walked right up the side of the bluff and climbed in George's car and drove away. He never said a word, he never looked back. He just went.

Then I could scream, but good. I was still screaming when George came out of it, and I thought he'd have a hemorrhage or something.

Well, we had to walk back all the way. It was over three miles to the highway patrol, and they made me tell the whole thing over and over again a dozen times. They got George's license number and they're still looking for the car. And this sergeant, he thinks George is maybe right about the Communists.

Only he didn't see the way the guy looked at George. Every time I think about it, I could just die!

Statement of Milo Fabian

I SCARCELY got the drapes pulled when he walked in. Of course, at first I thought he was delivering something. He wore a pair of those atrocious olive-drab slacks and a ready-made sports jacket, and he had on one of those caps that look a little like those worn by jockeys.

"Well, what is it?" I said. I'm afraid I was just a wee bit rude about it—truth to tell, I'd been in a perfectly filthy mood ever since Jerry told me he was running up to Cape Cod for the exhibit. You'd think he might at least have considered my feelings and invited me to go along. But no, I had to stay behind and keep the gallery open.

But I actually had no excuse for being spiteful to this stranger. I mean, he was rather an attractive sort of person when he took that idiotic cap off. He bad black, curly hair and he was quite tall, really immense: I was almost afraid of him until he smiled.

"Mr. Warlock?" he asked.

I shook my head.

"This is the Warlock Gallery, isn't it?"

"Yes. But Mr. Warlock is out of the city. I'm Mr. Fabian. Can I help you?"

"It's rather a delicate matter."

"If you have something to sell, you can show me. I do all the buying for the Gallery."

"I've nothing to sell. I want to purchase some paintings."

"Well, in that case, won't you come right back with me, Mr.—"

"Smith," he said.

We started down the aisle together. "Could you tell me just what you had in mind?" I asked. "As you probably know, we tend to specialize in moderns. We have a very good Kandinsky now, and an early Mondrian—"

"You don't have the pictures I want here," he said. "I'm sure of it."

We were already in the gallery. I stopped. "Then what was it you wished?"

He stood there, swinging this perfectly enormous plastic pouch. “You mean what kind of paintings? Well, I want one or two good Rembrandts, a Vermeer, a Raphael, something by Titian, a van Gogh, a Tintoretto. Also a Goya, an El Greco, a Breughel, a Hals, a Holbein, a Gaugin. I don’t suppose there’s a way of getting The Last Supper—that was done as a fresco, wasn’t it?”

It was positively weird to hear the man. I’m afraid I was definitely piqued, and I showed it. “Please!” I said. “I happen to be busy this morning. I have no time to—”

“You don’t understand,” he answered. “You buy pictures, don’t you? Well, I want you to buy me some. As my—my agent, that’s the word, isn’t it?”

“That’s the word,” I told him. “But surely you can’t be serious. Have you any idea of the cost involved in acquiring such a collection? It would be simply fabulous.”

“I’ve got money,” he said. We were standing next to the deal table at the entrance, and he walked over to it and put his pouch down. Then he zipped it open.

I have never, but simply never, seen such a fantastic sight in my life. That pouch was full of bills, stack after stack of bills, and every single one was either a five- or a 10-thousand dollar denomination. I mean it; he had this huge pouch filled with five- and 10-thousand dollar bills. Why, I’d never even seen one before!

If he’d been carrying twenties or hundreds, I might have suspected counterfeits, but nobody would have the audacity to dream of getting away with a stunt like this. They looked genuine, and they were. I know, because —but that’s for later.

So there I stood, looking at this utterly mad heap of money lying there, and this Mr. Smith, as he called himself, said, “Well, do you think I have enough?”

I COULD have just passed out, thinking about it.

Imagine, a perfect stranger, walking in off the street with 10 million dollars to buy paintings. And my share of the commission is five percent!

“I don’t know,” I said. “You’re really serious about all this?”

“Here’s the money. How soon ran you get me what I want?”

“Please,” I said. “This is all so unusual, I hardly know where to begin. Do you have a definite list of what you wish to acquire?”

“I can write the names down for you,” he told me. “I remember most of them.”

He knew what he wanted, I must say. Velasquez, Gorgione, Cezanne, Degas, Utrillo, Monet, Toulouse-Lautrec, Delacroix, Ryder, Pissarro.

Then he began writing titles. I’m afraid I gasped. “Really,” I said. “You can’t actually expect to buy the Mona Lisa!”

“Why not?” He looked perfectly serious.

“I didn’t know. Who owns it?”

“The Louvre. In Paris.”

“I didn’t know.” He was serious, I’d swear he was. “But what about the rest?”

“I’m afraid many of these paintings are in the same category. They’re not for sale. Most of them are in public galleries and museums here and abroad. And a number of the particular works you request are in the hands of private collectors who could never be persuaded to sell.”

He stood up and began scooping the money back into his pouch. I took his arm.

“But we can certainly do our best,” I said. “We have our sources, our connections. I’m sure we can at least procure some of the lesser, representative pieces by every one of the masters you list. It’s merely a matter of time.”

He shook his head. “Won’t do. This is Tuesday, isn’t it? I’ve got to have everything by Sunday night.”

Did you ever hear of anything so ridiculous in all your life? The man was stark staring.

"Look," he said. "I'm beginning to understand how things are, now. These paintings I want, they're scattered all over the world. Owned by public museums and private parties who won't sell. And I suppose the same thing is true of manuscripts. Things like the Gutenberg Bible. Shakespeare first folios. The Declaration of Independence—"

Stark staring. I didn't trust myself to do anything but nod at him.

"How many of the things I want are here?" he asked. "Here, in this country?"

"A fair percentage, well over half."

"All right. Here's what you do. Sit down over there and make me up a list. I want you to write me down the names of the paintings I've noted, and just where they are. I'll give you $10,000 for the list."

Ten thousand dollars for a list he could have acquired free of charge at the public library! Ten thousand dollars for less than an hour's work!

I gave him his list. And he gave me the money and walked out with the list.

By this time I was just about frantic. I mean, it was all so shattering. He came and he went, and there I stood—not knowing his real name, or anything. Talk-about your eccentric millionaires! He went, and there I stood with $10,000 in my hand.

Well, I'm not one to do anything rash. He hadn't been gone three minutes before I locked up and stepped over to the bank. I simply hopped all the way back to the gallery.

Then I said to myself, "What for?"

I didn't have to go back now, really. This was my money, not Jerry's. I'd earned it all by my little self. And as for him, he could stay up at the Cape and rot. I didn't need his precious job.

I went right down and bought a ticket to Paris. All this war-scare talk is simply a lot of fluff, if you ask me. Sheer fluff.

Of course Jerry is going to be utterly furious when he hears about it. Well, let him. All I have to say is, he can get himself another boy.

Statement of Nick Krauss

I WAS dead on my feet. I'd been on the job ever since Tuesday night and here it was Saturday. Talk about living on your nerves!

But I wasn't missing out on this deal, not me. Because this was the pay-off. The pay-off to the biggest caper that was ever rigged.

Sure, I heard of the Brink's job. I even got a pretty good idea who was in on it. But that was peanuts, and it took better'n a year to set up.

This deal topped 'em all. Figure it for yourself, once. Six million bucks, cash. In four days. Get that, now. I said six million bucks in four days. That's all, brother!

And who did it? Me, that's who.

Let me tell you one thing: I earned that dough. Every lousy cent of it. And don't think I didn't have to shell out plenty in splits. Right now I can't even remember just how many was in on it from beginning to end. But what with splits and expenses—like hiring all them planes to fly the stuff down—I guess it cost pretty near a million and a half, just to swing it.

That left four and a half million. Four and a half million—and me going down to the yacht to collect.

I had the whole damn haul right in the truck. A hundred and forty pieces, some of 'em plenty heavy, too. But I wasn't letting nobody else horse around with unloading. This was dynamite. Only two miles from the warehouse where I got everything assembled. Longest two miles I ever drove.

Sure, I had a warehouse. What the hell, I bought the thing! Bought the yacht for him, too. Paid cash. When you got six million in cash to play with, you don't take no chances on something you can just as well buy without no trouble.

Plenty of chances the way it was. Had to take chances, working that fast. Beat me how I managed to get through the deal without a dozen leaks.

But the dough helped. You take a guy, he'll rat on you for two-three grand. Give him 20 or 30, and he's yours. I'm not just talking syndicate, either. Because there was plenty guys in on it that weren't even in no mob—guys that never been mugged except maybe for these here college annual books where they show pictures of all the professors. I paid off guards and I paid off coppers and I paid off a bunch of curators, too. Not characters, curators. Guys that run museums.

I still don't know what this joker wanted with all that stuff. Only thing I can figure is maybe he was one of these here Indian rajahs or something. But he didn't look like no Hindu—he was a big, tall, youngish guy. Didn't talk like one, either. But who else wants to lay out all that lettuce for a bunch of dizzy paintings and stuff?

ANYWAYS, he showed up Tuesday night with this pouch of his. How he got to me, how he ever got by Lefty downstairs I never figured out.

But there he was. He asked me if it was true, what he heard about me, and he asked me if I wanted to do a job. Said his name was Smith. You know the kind of con you get when they want to stay dummied up on you.

I didn't care if he dummied up or not. Because, like the fella says, money talks. And it sure hollered Tuesday night. He opens this pouch of his and spills two million bucks on the table.

So help me, two million bucks! Cash!

"I've brought this along for expenses," he said. "There's four million more in it if you can cooperate."

Let's skip the rest of it. We made a deal, and I went to work. Wednesday I had him on that yacht, and he stayed there all the way through. Every night I went down and reported.

I went to Washington myself and handled the New York and Philadelphia end, too. Also Boston, on Friday. The rest was by phone, mostly. I kept flying guys out with orders and cash to Detroit, Chicago, St. Louis and the Coast. They had the lists and they knew what to look for. Every mob I contacted set up its own plans for the job. I paid whatever they asked, and that way nobody had any squawks coming. No good any of ’em holding out on me—where could they sell the stuff? Those things are too hot.

By the time Thursday come around, I was up to my damn neck in diagrams and room plans and getaway routes. There was six guys just checking on alarm systems and stuff in the joints I was suppose to cover. We had maybe 50 working in New York, not counting from the inside. You wouldn’t believe it if I told you some of the guys who helped. Rig professors and all, tipping us off on how to make a heist, or cutting wires and leaving doors unlocked. I hear a dozen up and lammed after it was over. That’s what real dough can buy you.

Of course I run into trouble. Lots of it. We never did get a haul out of L.A. The fix wasn’t in the way it was supposed to be, and they lost the whole load trying for a getaway at the airport. Lucky thing the cops shot up all four of the guys, the ones who made the haul. So they couldn’t trace anything.

All told, must of been seven or eight cashed in; the four in L.A., two in Philly, one guy in Detroit and one in Chicago. But no leaks. I kept the wires open, and I had my people out there, sort of supervising. Every bit of the stuff we did get came in by private plane, over in Jersey. Went right to the warehouse.

And I had the whole works, 143 pieces, on the truck when I went down for the pay-off.

It took me three hours to cart that stuff onto the yacht. This guy, this Mr. Smith, he just sat and watched the whole time.

When I was done I said, “That’s the works. You satisfied now or do you want a receipt?”

He didn’t smile or anything. Just shook his head. “You’ll have to open them up,” he said.

“Open ’em up? That’ll take another couple hours,” I told him.

"We've got time," he said.

"Hell we have! Mister, this stuff's hot and I'm hotter. There's maybe a hundred thousand honest johns looking for the loot—ain't you read the papers or heard the radio? Whole damn country's in an uproar. Worse than the war crisis or whatever you call it. I want out of here, fast."

BUT he wanted them crates and boxes open, so I opened 'em. What the hell, for four million bucks, a little flunkey work don't hurt. Not even when you're dead for sleep. It was a tough job, though, because everything was packed nice. So as not to have any damage, that is.

Nothing was in frames. He had these canvasses and stuff all over the floor, and he checked them off in a notebook, every one. And when I got the last damn picture out and hauled all the wood and junk up on deck and put it over the side in the dark, I come back to find him in the forward cabin.

"What's the pitch?" I asked. "Where you going?"

"To transfer these to my ship," he told me. "After all, you didn't expect I'd merely sail off in this vessel, did you? And I'll need your assistance to get them on board. Don't worry, it's only a short distance away."

He started the engines. I came right up behind him and stuck my Special in his ribs.

"Where's the bundle?" I asked.

"In the other cabin, on the table." He didn't even look around.

"You're not pulling anything, are you?"

"See for yourself."

I went to see. And he was leveling.

Four million bucks on the table. Five- and 10-thousand-dollar bills, and no phony geetus either. Wouldn't be too damn easy passing this stuff—the Feds would have the word out about big bills—but then, I didn't count on sticking around with the loot. There's plenty countries where they like them big bills and don't ask any questions. South America, such places. That part didn't worry me too much, as long as I knew I'd get there.

And I figured on getting there all right. I went back to the other cabin and showed him my Special again. “Keep going,” I said. “I’ll help you, but the first time you get cute I’m set to remove your appendix with a slug.”

He knew who I was. He knew I could just let him have it and skid out of there any time I wanted. But he never even blinked at me—just kept right on steering.

We must of gone about four-five miles. It was pitch dark and he didn’t carry any spot, but he knew where he was going. Because all at once we stopped and he said, “Here we are.”

I WENT up on deck with him and I couldn’t see nothing. Just the lights off on shore and the water all around. I sure as hell didn’t see no boat anywheres.

“Where is it?” I asked him.

“Where is what?”

“Your boat?”

“Down there.” He pointed over the side. “What the hell you got, a submarine or something?”

“Something.” He leaned over the side. His hands was empty, he didn’t do anything but lean. And so help me, all of a sudden up comes this damn thing. Like a big round silver ball, sort of, with a lid on top.

I didn’t even notice the lid until it opened up. And it floated alongside, so’s he could run the gangplank out to rest on the lid.

“Come on,” he said. “I’ll help you. It won’t take long this way.”

“You think I’m gonna carry stuff across that lousy plank?” I asked him. “In the dark?”

“Don’t worry, you can’t fall. It’s magno-meshed.”

“What the hell does that mean?”

“I’ll show you.”

He walked across that plank and climbed right down into the thing before I thought to try and stop him. The plank never moved an inch.

Then he was back out. “Come on, there’s nothing to be afraid of.”

“Who’s afraid?”

But I was scared, plenty. Because now I knew what he was. I’d been reading the papers a lot these days, and I didn’t miss none of the war talk. Them Commies with all their new weapons and stuff—well, this was one of them. It is no wonder lie was tossing around millions of bucks like that.

So I figured on doing my patriotic duty. Sure, I’d haul his lousy pictures on board for him. I wanted to get a look inside that sub of his. But when I finished, I made up my mind he wasn’t gonna streak out for Russia or someplace. I’d get him first.

That’s the way I played it. I helped him cart the whole mess down into the sub.

Then I changed my mind again. He wasn’t no Russian. He wasn’t anything I ever heard of except an inventor, maybe. Because that thing he had was crazy.

It was all hollow inside. All hollow, with just a thin wall around. I could tell there wasn’t space for an engine or anything. Just enough room to stack the stuff and leave space for maybe two or three guys to stand.

There wasn’t any electric light in the place either, but it was light. And daylight. I know what I’m talking about—I know about neon and fluorescent lights too. This was something else. Something new.

Instruments? Well, he had some kind of little slots on one part, but they was down on the floor. You had to lay down next to them to see how they’d work. And he kept watching me, so I didn’t want to take a chance on acting too nosy. I figured it wasn’t healthy.

I was scared because he wasn’t scared.

I was scared because he wasn’t no Russian.

I was scared because there ain’t any round balls that float in water, or come up from under water when you just look at ’em. And because he come from nowhere with his cash and he was going nowhere with the pictures. Nothing made any sense any more, except one thing. I wanted out. I wanted out bad.

Maybe you think I'm nuts, but that's because you never was inside a shiny ball floating in water, only not bobbing around or even moving when the waves hit it, and all daylight with nothing to light it with. You never saw this Mr. Smith who wasn't named Smith and maybe not even Mr.

But if you had, you would of understood why I was so glad to get back on that yacht and go down in the cabin and pick up the dough.

"All right," I said. "Let's go back."

"Leave whenever you like," he said. "I'm going myself now."

"Going yourself? Then how the hell do I get back?" I yelled.

"Take the yacht," he told me. "It's yours." Just like that he said it.

"But I can't run no yacht, I don't know how."

"It's very simple. Here, I'll explain—I picked it up myself in less than a minute. Come up to the cabin."

"Uh uh." I got the Special out. "You're taking me back to the dock right now."

"Sorry, there isn't time. I want to be on my way before—"

"You heard me," I said. "Get this boat moving."

"Please. You're making this difficult. I must leave now."

"First you take me back. Then you go off to Mars or wherever it is."

"Mars? Who said anything about—"

He sort of smiled and shook his head. And then he looked at me.

He looked—right—at—me. He looked—into—me. His eyes were like two of those big round silver balls, rolling down into slots behind my eyeballs and crashing right into my skull. They came towards me real slow and real heavy, and I couldn't duck. I felt them coming, and I knew if they ever hit I'd be a goner.

I was out on my feet. Everything was numb. He just smiled and stared and sent his eyes out to get me. They rolled and rolled and I could feel them hit. Then I was—gone.

The last thing I remember was pulling the trigger.

Statement of Elizabeth Rafferty, M.D.

At 9:30 Sunday morning, he rang the bell. I remember the time exactly, because I'd just finished breakfast and I was switching on the radio to get the war news. Apparently they'd found another Soviet boat, this one in Charleston Harbor, with an atomic device aboard. The Coast Guard and the Air Force were both on emergency, and it—

The bell rang, and I opened the door.

There he stood. He must have been 6-foot-4, at the very least. I had to look up at him to see his smile, but it was worth it.

"Is the doctor in?" he asked.

"I'm Dr. Rafferty."

"Good. I was hoping I'd be lucky enough to find you here. I just came along the street, taking a chance on locating a physician. You see, it's rather an emergency—"

"I gathered that." I stepped back. "Won't you come inside? I dislike having my patients bleed all over the front stoop."

He glanced down at his left arm. He was bleeding, all right. And from the hole in his coat, and the powder-marks, I knew why.

"In here," I said. We went into the office. "Now, if you'll let me help you with your coat and shirt, Mr.—"

"Smith," he said.

"Of course. Up on the table. That's it. Now, easy—let me do it—there. Well! A nice neat perforation, upper triceps. In again, out again. It looks as if you were lucky, Mr. Smith. Hold still now. I'm going to probe. . . . This may hurt a bit. . . . Good! . . . We'll just sterilize, now—"

All the while I kept watching him. He had a gambler's face, but not the mannerisms. I couldn't make up my mind about him. He went through the whole procedure without a sound or a change of expression.

Finally I got him bandaged up. “Your arm will probably be stiff for several days. I wouldn’t advise you to move around too much. How did it happen?”

“Accident.”

“Come now, Mr. Smith.” I got out the pen and looked for a form. “Let’s not be children. You know as well as I do that a physician must make a full report on any gunshot wound.”

“I didn’t know.” He swung off the table. “Who gets the report?”

“The police.”

“No!”

“Please, Mr. Smith! I’m required by law to—”

“Take this.”

He fished something out of his pocket with his right hand and threw it on the desk. I stared at it. I’d never seen a 5,000-dollar bill before, and it was worth staring at.

“I’m going now,” he said. “As a matter of fact, I’ve never really been here.”

I shrugged. “As you will,” I told him. “Just one thing more, though.”

“What’s that?”

I stooped, reached into the left-hand upper drawer of the desk, and showed him what I kept there.

“This is a .22, Mr. Smith,” I said. “It’s a lady’s gun. I’ve never used it before, except on the target range. I would hate to use it now, but I warn you that if I do you’re going to have trouble with your right arm. As a physician, my knowledge of anatomy combines with my ability as a marksman. Do you understand?”

“Yes, I do. But you don’t. Look, you’ve got to let me go. It’s important. I’m not a criminal!”

“Nobody said you were. But you will be, if you attempt to evade the law by neglecting to answer my questions for this report. It must be in the hands of the authorities within the next twenty-four hours.”

He chuckled. “They’ll never read it.”

I SIGHED. “Let’s not argue. And don’t reach into your pocket, either.”

He smiled at me. “I have no weapon. I was just going to increase your fee.”

Another bill fluttered to the table. Ten thousand dollars. Five thousand plus 10 thousand makes 15. It added up.

“Sorry,” I said. “This all looks very tempting to a struggling young doctor—but I happen to have old-fashioned ideas about such things. Besides, I doubt if I could get change from anyone, because of all this excitement in the newspapers over—”

I stopped, suddenly, as I remembered. Five-thousand and 10-thousand-dollar bills. They added up, all right. I smiled at him across the desk.

“Where are the paintings, Mr. Smith?” I asked.

It was his turn to sigh. “Please, don’t question me. I don’t want to hurt anyone. I just want to go, before it’s too late. You were kind to me. I’m grateful. Take the money and forget it. This report is foolishness, believe me.”

“Believe you? With the whole country in an uproar, looking for stolen art masterpieces, and Communists hiding under every bed? Maybe it’s just feminine curiosity, but I’d like to know.” I took careful aim. “This isn’t conversation, Mr. Smith. Either you talk or I shoot.”

“All right. But it won’t do any good.” He leaned forward. “You’ve got to believe that. It won’t do any good. I could show you the paintings, yes. I could give them to you. And it wouldn’t help a bit. Within twenty-four hours they’d be as useless as that report you wanted to fill out.”

“Oh, yes, the report. We might as well get started with it,” I said. “In spite of your rather pessimistic outlook. The way you talk, you’d think the bombs were going to fall here tomorrow.”

“They will,” he told me. “Here, and everywhere.”

“Very interesting.” I shifted tire gun to my left hand and took up the fountain pen. “But now, to business. Your name, please. Your real name.”

“Kim Logan.”

“Date of birth?”

“November 25th, 2903.”

I raised the gun. “The right arm,” I said. “Medial head of the triceps. It will hurt, too.”

“November 25th, 2903,” he repeated. “I came here last Sunday at 10 p.m., your time. By the same chronology I leave tonight at nine. It’s a 169-hour cycle.”

“What are you talking about?”

“My instrument is out there in the bay. The paintings and manuscripts are there. I intended to remain submerged until the departure moment tonight, but a man shot me.”

“You feel feverish?” I asked. “Does your head hurt?”

“No. I told you it was no use explaining things. You won’t believe me, any more than you believed me about the bombs.”

“Let’s stick to facts,” I suggested. “You admit you stole the paintings. Why?”

“Because of the bombs, of course. The war is coming, the big one. Before tomorrow morning your planes will be over the Russian border and their planes will retaliate. That’s only the beginning. It will go on for months, years. In the end-shambles. But the masterpieces I take will be saved.”

“How?”

I TOLD you. Tonight, at nine, I return to my own place in the time-continuum.” He raised his hand. “Don’t tell me it’s not possible. According lo your present-day concepts of physics it would be. Even according to our science, only forward movement is demonstrable. When I suggested my project to the Institute they were skeptical. But they built the instrument according to my specifications, nevertheless. They permitted me to use the money from the Historical Foundation at Fort Knox. And I received an ironic blessing prior to my departure. I rather imagine my actual vanishment caused raised eyebrows. But that will be nothing compared to the reaction upon my return. My triumphant return, with a cargo of art masterpieces presumably destroyed nearly a thousand years in the past!"

"Let me get this straight," I said. "According to your story, you came here because you knew war was going to break out and you wanted to salvage some old masters from destruction. Is that it?"

"Precisely. It was a wild gamble, but I had the currency. I've studied the era as closely as any man can from the records available. I knew about the linguistic peculiarities of the age—you've had no trouble understanding me, have you? And I managed to work out a plan. Of course I haven't been entirely successful, but I've managed a great deal in less than a week's time. Perhaps I can return again—earlier—maybe a year or so beforehand, and procure more." His eyes grew bright. "Why not? We could build more instruments, come in a body. We could get everything we wanted, then."

I shook my head. "For the sake of argument, let's say for a minute that I believe you, which I don't. You've stolen some paintings, you say. You're taking them back to 29-something-or-other with you, tonight. You hope. Is that the story?"

"That's the truth."

"Very well. Now you suggest that you might repeat the experiment on a larger scale. Come back to a point a year before this in time and collect more masterpieces. Again, let's say you do it. What will happen to the paintings you took with you?"

"I don't follow you."

"Those paintings will be in your era, according to you. But a year ago they hung in various galleries. Will they be there when you come back? Surely they can't co-exist."

He smiled. "A pretty paradox. I'm beginning to like you, Dr. Rafferty."

"Well, don't let the feeling grow on you. It's not reciprocal, I assure you. Even if you were telling the truth, I can't admire your motives."

"What's wrong with my motives?" He stood up, ignoring the gun. "Isn't it a worthwhile goal—to save immortal treasures from the senseless destruction of a tribal war? The world deserves the preservation of its artistic heritage. I've risked my existence for the sake of bringing beauty to my own time—where it can be properly appreciated and enjoyed by minds no longer obsessed with the greed and cruelty I find here."

"Big words," I said. "But the fact remains. You stole those paintings."

"Stole? I saved them! I tell you, before the year is out they'd be utterly destroyed. Your galleries, your museums, your libraries—everything will go. Is it stealing to carry precious articles from a burning temple?" He leaned over me. "Is that a crime?"

"Why not stop the fire, instead?" I countered. "You know—from historical records, I suppose—that war breaks out tonight or tomorrow. Why not take advantage of your foresight and try to prevent it?"

"I CAN'T. The records are sketchy, incomplete. Events are jumbled. I've been unable to discover just how the war began—or will begin, rather. Some trivial incident, unnamed. Nothing is clear on that point."

"But couldn't you warn the authorities?"

"And change history? Change the actual sequence of events, rather? Impossible!"

"Aren't you changing them by taking the paintings?"

"That's different."

"Is it?" I stared into his eyes. "I don't see how. But then, the whole thing is impossible. I've wasted too much time in arguing."

"Time!" He looked at the wall clock. "Almost noon. I've got just nine hours left. And so much to do. The instrument must be adjusted."

"Where is this precious mechanism of yours?"

"Out in the bay. Submerged, of course. I had that in mind when it was constructed. You can conceive of the hazards of attempting to move through time and alight on a solid surface; the face of the land alters. But the ocean is comparatively unchanging. I knew if I departed from a spot several miles offshore and arrived there, I'd eliminate most of the ordinary hazards. Besides, it offers a most excellent place of concealment. The principle, you see, is simple. By purely mechanical means I shall raise the instrument above the stratospheric level tonight and then intercalculate dimensionally when I am free of earth's orbit. The gantic-drive will be—"

No doubt about it. I didn't have to wait for the double-talk to know he was crazier than a codfish. A pity, too; he was really a handsome specimen.

"Sorry," I said. "Time's up. This is something I hate to do, but there's no other choice. No, don't move. I'm calling the police, and if you take one step I'll plug you."

"Stop! You mustn't call! I'll do anything, I'll even take you with me. That's it, I'll take you with me! Wouldn't you like to save your life? Wouldn't you like to escape?"

"No. Nobody escapes," I told him. "Especially not you. Now stand still, and no more funny business. I'm making that call."

He stopped. He stood still. I picked up the phone, with a sweet smile. He smiled back. He looked at me.

Something happened.

There has been a great dispute about the clinical aspects of hypnotic therapy. I remember, in school, an attempt being made to hypnotize me. I was entirely immune. I concluded that a certain degree of cooperation or conditioned suggestibility is required of an individual in order to render him susceptible to hypnosis.

I was wrong.

I was wrong, because I couldn't move now. No lights, no mirrors, no voices, no suggestion. It was just that I couldn't move. I sat there holding the gun. I sat there and watched him walk out, locking the door behind him. I could see and I could feel. I could even hear him say "Good-by."

But I couldn't move. I could function, but only as a paralytic functions. I could, for example, watch the clock.

I watched the clock from 12 noon until almost seven. Several patients came during the afternoon, couldn't get in, and went away. I watched the clock until its lace was lost in darkness. I sat there and endured hysteric rigidity until—providentially—the phone rang.

THAT broke it. But it broke me. I couldn't answer that phone. I merely slumped over on the desk, my muscles tightening with pain as the gun fell from my numb fingers. I lay there, gasping and sobbing, for a long time. I tried to sit up. It was agony. I tried to walk. My limbs rejected sensation. It took me an hour to gain control again. And even then, it was merely a partial control—a physical control. My thoughts were another matter.

Seven hours of thinking. Seven hours of true or false? Seven hours of accepting and rejecting the impossibly possible.

It was after eight before I was on my feet again, and then I didn't know what to do.

Call the police? Yes—but what could I tell them? I had to be sure, I had to know.

And what did I know? He was out in the bay, and he'd leave at nine o'clock. There was an instrument which would rise above the stratosphere —

I got in the car and drove. The dock was deserted. I took the road over to the Point, where there's a good view. I had the binoculars. The stars were out, but no moon. Even so, I could see pretty clearly.

There was a small yacht bobbing on the water, but no lights shone. Could that be it?

No sense taking chances. I remembered the radio report about the Coast Guard patrols.

So I did it. I drove back to town and stopped at a drugstore and made my call. Just reported the presence of the yacht. Perhaps they'd investigate, because there were no lights. Yes, I'd stay there and wait for them if they wished.

I didn't stay, of course. I went back to the Point. I went back there and trained my binoculars on the yacht. It was almost nine when I saw the cutter come along, moving up behind the yacht with deadly swiftness.

It was exactly nine when they flashed their lights—and caught, for an incredible instant, the gleaming reflection of the silver globe that rose from the water, rose straight up toward the sky.

Then came the explosion and I saw the shattering before I heard the echo of the report. They had portable anti-aircraft, something of the sort. It was effective.

One moment the globe soared upward. The next moment there was nothing. They blew it to bits.

And they blew me to bits with it. Because if there was a globe, perhaps he was inside. With the masterpieces, ready to return to another time. The story was true, then, and if that was true, then—

I guess I fainted. My watch showed 10:30 when I came to and stood up. It was 11 before I made it to the Coast Guard Station and told my story.

Of course, nobody believed me. Even D. Halvorsen from emergency—he said he did, but he insisted on the injection and they took me here to the hospital.

It would have been too late, anyway. That globe did the trick. They must have contacted Washington immediately, with their story of a new secret Soviet weapon destroyed offshore. Coming on the heels of finding those bomb-laden ships, it was the final straw. Somebody gave the orders and our planes were on their way.

I've been writing all night. Outside in the corridor they're getting radio reports. We've dropped bombs over there. And the alert has gone out, warning us of possible reprisals.

Maybe they'll believe me now. But it doesn't matter any more. It's going to be the way he said it was.

I KEEP thinking about the paradoxes of time-travel.

This notion of carrying objects from the present to the future—and this other notion, about altering the past. I'd like to work out the theory, only there's no need. The old masters aren't going into the future. Any more than he, returning to our present, could stop the war.

What had he said? “I’ve been unable to discover just how the war began—or will begin, rather. Some trivial incident, unnamed.”

Well, this was the trivial incident. His visit. If I hadn’t made that phone call, if the globe hadn’t risen—but I can’t bear to think about it any more. It makes my head hurt. All that buzzing and droning noise . . .

I’ve just made an important discovery. The buzzing and the droning does not come from inside my head. I can hear the sirens sounding, too. If I had any doubts about the truth of his claims, they’re gone now.

I wish I’d believed him. I wish the others would believe me now. But there just isn’t any time.

I Do Not Love Thee, Doctor Fell

This is, belatedly, Robert Bloch's first story in F&SF; and I could introduce the author adequately only by writing an essay of such length that we'd have to drop a novelet or so. Bloch has written every type of science-fantasy from screwball farce to Lovecraftian unmentionable slitherings; he's written a little of everything else too, from above-average paperback crime novels to very nearly every witty word that you've read in any American s.f. fan-magazine; and he is, with no exceptions, the best toastmaster in the world. There are many other facets of this sharply chiseled Bloch; but the important one on this occasion is that he's an intensive and acute student of psychology and psychiatry, and has here extrapolated those sciences to predict, with forceful conviction and threatening bite, a new disease of the mind.

BROMELY COULDN'T REMEMBER WHO had recommended Doctor Fell. The name had popped into his mind (funny, something like that popping into his mind at a time when so many things seemed to be popping out of it!) and he must have made an appointment.

At any rate, the receptionist seemed to know him, and her "Good morning, Mr. Bromely" had a warm, pleasant sound. The door of the inner office, closing behind him, had a harsh, grating sound. Both seemed oddly familiar.

Bromely sensed the same misplaced familiarity as he gazed around the inner office. The bookshelves and filing cases to the left of the window, the desk to the right, the couch in the corner almost duplicated the arrangement in his own office. This was a good omen, he felt. He'd be at home here. At home. But, you can't go home again. Home is where the heart is. You have stolen my heart, now don't go 'way. As we sang love's old sweet song on—

It took a tremendous, conscious effort to pull out of that one, but Bromely did it. He wanted to make a good impression on the Doctor.

Doctor Fell rose to greet him from his chair behind the desk. He was a tall, thin man of about Bromely's age and build, and Bromely received a vague impression that his features were not dissimilar. The subdued lighting did not lend itself to a closer scrutiny of the psychiatrist's countenance, but Bromely was aware of a look of purpose and intensity quite foreign to his own face.

The same purpose and intensity drove Doctor Fell around the desk, communicated in his hearty handclasp.

"You're prompt, Mr. Bromely," said Doctor Fell. His voice was deep and low. Deep and Low. Low and Behold. Behold, Bedad and Begob. Shadrach, Mesach and Abednego, Inc.

How he got out of that one, Bromely never knew. He was somewhat surprised to find himself on the couch. Apparently he'd been talking to Doctor Fell for quite some time—and quite rationally, too. Yes, he remembered, now. He'd been answering all the routine questions.

Doctor Fell knew that he was Clyde Bromely, age 32, public relations counsel. Born in Erie, Pennsylvania. Parents dead. Business, lousy. No business. No business like show business, there's no business I know—

Had he said that? Apparently not, because Doctor Fell's rich, deep, comforting voice moved right along, asking the questions and extracting the answers. And it was quite all right to talk to Doctor Fell, tell him all he knew. Fell was a good psychiatrist.

Bromely knew a little something about psychiatry himself. Oh, not the technical terms of course, but more than a smattering of technique. This was a routine orientation, preliminary to probing. And Bromely cooperated.

When Doctor Fell began to ask questions about his health and his general background, Bromely took a sheaf of papers from his inside coat pocket and handed them over.

"Here it is, Doc," he said. "Complete report on the physical, Had it taken last week." He indicated a second folded sheaf. "And here's the autobiography. All the names you'll need—friends, relatives, teachers, employers, the works. Everything I could remember. Which isn't much, right now."

Doctor Fell smiled in the shadows. "Excellent," he said. "You seem to understand the necessity of cooperation." He put the papers on the desk. "I'll check over this later," he told Bromely. "Although I imagine I'm already familiar with most of the contents."

Bromely got that panicky feeling again. Whoever had recommended Doctor Fell to him must also have talked to Doctor Fell about his case. Now who would that be? He hesitated to ask—not that he felt ashamed, but it would be an admission that he was pretty far gone if he couldn't even recall how he'd come here. Well, it didn't matter. He was grateful to be here, and that was the important thing. He needed Doctor Fell.

"You've got to help me, Doctor Fell," he was saying. "You're my last hope. That's why I've come to you. You must understand that, because it's the crux of the whole matter. I would never have come to you unless you were my last hope. I'm at the end of my rope. When you come to the end of your rope, you swing. I'm swinging, now. I'm swinging down the lane. Down Memory Lane. I wanted to be a songwriter, once. But my lyrics sounded as if they were stolen. That's my problem. Association. I've got too much association. Everything I do or say sounds like it's stolen from somebody else. Imitation. Mimicry. Until there's nothing original, nothing basic beneath to which I can cling. I'm losing myself. There's no real me left."

Bromely went on like this for about an hour. He said everything that came into his mind. The associative clichés poured out, and with them the desperate plea for help.

Doctor Fell scribbled in his notebook and said nothing. At the end of the session he tapped Bromely on the shoulder.

“That’ll be enough for today,” he said. “Tomorrow, same time? Let’s plan on an hour a day, five days a week.”

“Then you think you can help me?”

Doctor Fell nodded. “Let’s say that I think you can help yourself. Five days a week, from now on.”

Bromely rose from the couch.

Doctor Fell’s face wavered and blurred before him. He was very tired, very confused, but oddly relieved despite the physical strain that affected his vision. There was just one thing bothering him—and suddenly, he remembered it.

“But, Doc, I just happened to think. You know, I’m not doing too well with the business these days and five days a week—”

The hand gripped his shoulder. “I quite understand. But let’s put it this way. Your case—your problem, that is—interests me, personally. And even a psychiatrist has been known to extend his services on occasion, without fee.” Bromely couldn’t believe his ears at first. “You mean—it won’t cost me anything?” His expression of gratitude was genuine. “Doc, you’re a real friend. A friend in need. A friend in deed. Indeed.”

Doctor Fell chuckled. “Believe me, Mr. Bromely, I am your friend. You’ll find that out for yourself, in time, I trust.”

As Clyde Bromely went out the door he felt the phrases flooding through his brain. In God we trust, all others pay cash. My best and only friend, A man’s best friend is his mother.

The receptionist said something to him as he left, but Bromely was too preoccupied to catch her words. He was engrossed in thought, he was deep in contemplation, Deep in the Heart of Texas. Death and Texas. Nothing’s sure but.

The rest of the day passed in a blur. Almost before he realized it, tomorrow had come and he had come and here he was back on the couch.

Doctor Fell listened as he told him about his father and mother, and about the peculiar feeling he now had—the feeling that Doctor Fell reminded him of his father and mother. Brother and sister I have none, but I am my father's only son. Who am I?

"Who are you?" Doctor Fell asked the question, softly. "That's really what's bothering you, isn't it? Who are you? You can answer that question if you want to, you know. So try. Try. Who are you?"

It was the wrong question. Bromely felt it, and he froze. Somewhere, deep inside, words formed an answer. But he couldn't find the words. He couldn't find that spot, inside him, where the words came from.

For the rest of the hour he just lay there on the couch.

Doctor Fell said nothing. When the time was up he tapped Bromely on the shoulder, muttered "Tomorrow, then," and turned away.

Bromely got out of the office. The receptionist stared at him oddly, half-opened her mouth to say something, and didn't. Bromely drugged. Somehow he managed to find his way back to his own office.

He walked in and asked his girl for messages. Apparently whatever was wrong with him showed in his appearance, because she did that half-open-mouth trick too. Then she managed to control herself and tell him that CAA had called just a few minutes ago and wanted to see him. There was a chance to handle Torchy Harrigan.

That was the news he'd been waiting for. Bromely snapped out of it, fast. Torchy Harrigan—just signed for a new network video show—two pictures coming up with MGM—big deal with CAA, Consolidated Artists of America—personal representative—press releases to all dailies—

"Call them back and tell them I'm on my way over," he said. "Bromely rides again!"

Bromely was riding again. He was riding the couch in Doctor Fell's office. He was riding for a fall, riding hell-for-leather—

And all the while he was talking it out, gasping and sobbing and wheezing and choking it out.

"I can't explain it, Doc. I just can't figure it out! Here I had this deal sewed up with Harrigan, just the kind of setup I've been looking for. Two bills a week and all expenses, a chance to go out to the Coast with him, the works. Even turned out that his business manager is Hal Edwards—good friend of mine, known him for years. He gave Harrigan the pitch on me, built me up.

"So I walked in on Edwards and we talked it over, and then we went up to Harrigan's suite at the Plaza to talk it over. And Harrigan gave me the big hello, listened to Hal Edwards pitch for me—greatest flack in the business, all that kind of thing.

"You get the picture, Doc? The whole deal was in the bag. Harrigan was just waiting for me to give him the word on my plan for a publicity campaign. Edwards flashed me the cue and I opened my mouth.

"But nothing came out. You understand me? But nothing! I couldn't think of anything to say. Oh, there were words and phrases whirling around in my head, only they didn't add up. I couldn't think like a press agent any more."

All the while he talked, Bromely had been watching Doctor Fell's face. At first it seemed far away, but now it was coming closer and closer, getting bigger and bigger until it blotted out everything.

And Doctor Fell's voice was like distant thunder, then thunder near at hand, thunder overhead.

Vision and hearing played their tricks, but Bromely clung to Doctor Fell, clung to words that fell from Doctor Fell for he's a jolly goodfellow which nobody can deny.

Doctor Fell had been taking notes in shorthand. He glanced at them now as he spoke. In a moment, Bromely realized he was merely reading off a string of quotes from Bromely's previous conversation. The phrases droned on, louder and louder.

"Can't figure it out . . . sewed up . . . setup . . . two bills a week . . . the works . . . gave Harrigan the pitch on me, built me up . . . big hello . . . greatest flack in the business . . . get the picture . . . in the bag . . . give him the word . . . flashed me the cue . . . but nothing . . . didn't add up." Doctor Fell leaned forward. "What do those phrases mean to you, Bromely? What do they really add up to, in your mind?"

Bromely tried to think about it. He tried hard. But all he could come out with was, "I don't know. They're all slang expressions I used to use in public relations a few years ago. Come to think of it, they're a little dated now, aren't they?" Doctor Fell smiled. "Exactly. And doesn't that tie in with your final statement, that you couldn't think like a press agent anymore? Isn't that part of your problem, Mr. Bromely—that you aren't a press agent any more, really? That you're losing your identity, losing your orientation? Let me ask you once again, now: who are you?" Bromely froze up. He couldn't answer because he couldn't think of the answer. He lay there on the couch, and Doctor Fell waited. Nothing happened.

Nothing seemed to happen for a long, long time. How Bromely got through the next two days he couldn't remember. All he recalled were the hours on the couch—and it seemed to him that he shuttled back and forth between his office and Doctor Fell's more than once a day.

It was hard to check, of course, because he didn't talk to anyone. He lived alone in a one-room walkup apartment and he ate at one-arm counter joints. He wasn't talking to his office-girl, Thelma, any more either. There was nothing to talk about—no calls since the unfortunate Harrigan affair—and he owed her for three weeks' back salary. Besides, she almost seemed afraid of him when he appeared in the office. Come to think of it (and it was so hard to come to think of it, or anything else, so very hard) even Doctor Fell's little receptionist looked frightened when he walked in, without a word.

Without a word. That was his problem. He had no words any longer. It was as though his final effort, talking to Harrigan and Hal Edwards, had drained him dry of the ability to communicate. All the clichés had flowed out of him, leaving . . . nothing.

He realized it now, lying on the couch in Doctor Fell's office. Once more Doctor Fell had asked the single question, the only question he ever asked. "Who are you?"

And he couldn't answer. There was nothing. He was nobody. For years, now, he'd been in the process of becoming nobody. It was the only explanation that fitted. But he couldn't seem to explain.

With a start, he realized that it wasn't necessary. Doctor Fell was sitting close to Bromely now, breaking the long silence, whispering confidentially in his ear.

"All right," he was murmuring. "Let's try a different approach.Maybe I can tell you who you are."

Bromely nodded gratefully, but somewhere deep within him, fear was rising.

"Your case is quite remarkable in a way," said Doctor Fell, "but only because it's one of the first. I don't believe it will be the last. Within several years, there'll be thousands of men like you. The schizoids and the paranoids will have to move over and make room for a new category."

Bromely nodded, waited.

"You know anything about disease germs, bacteria? These organisms undergo swift mutations. Men. invent sulfa drugs and the germs: develop tolerance to sulfa. Men use antibiotics—penicillin, streptomycin, a dozen others. And the bugs adapt. They breed new strains; of bugs."

He things I'm bugs, Bromely told himself, but he listened. Fell went on, his voice rising slightly.

"Bugs change, but still their spawn on men. And aberration changes with the times, too—but still it spawns on men. Five hundred years ago the commonest form of insanity was belief in demoniac possession. Three hundred years ago men had delusions of witchcraft and sorcery. A man who couldn't integrate his personality created a.

new one—he became a wizard. Because the wizard was the symbol of power, who knew the secrets of Life and Death. The disintegrating personality seeks reaffirmation in Authority. Does that make sense to you?"

Bromely nodded, but actually nothing made sense to him any more. The fear rose within him as Doctor Fell's voice rose without.

"Yes, three hundred years ago, thousands of men and women went to the stake firmly convinced that they were, actually, witches and wizards.

"Times change, Bromely. Look what happened to you. Your personality disintegrated, didn't it? You began to lose touch with reality.

"You lived alone, without personal ties to reaffirm identity. Your work was phony, too—the epitome of all phoniness—manufacturing lies to create artificial press-agent personalities for others. You lived in a phony world, used phony words and phrases, and before you knew it, nothing you did was quite real to you any more. And you got panicked because you felt your sense of identity slipping away. True?"

Bromely felt the fear very close now, because Doctor Fell was closer. But he wanted Doctor Fell to stay, wanted him to solve this problem.

"You're not a fool, Clyde." Doctor Fell used his first name now and it underlined the intimacy of his words. "You sensed something was going wrong. And so you did what others are beginning to do today. You did that which will create, in years to come, a new kind of mania."

The fear was here, now. But Bromely listened.

"Some start by seeking the 'self-help' books, just as old-time sorcerers used to study grimoires. Some go further and experiment in all the odd bypaths of parapsychology—ESP, telepathy, occultism. And some go all the way. They cannot conjure up the Devil but they can commune with Freud, with Adler, with Jung and Moll and Stekel and the other archfiends. They don't chant spells any more, but they learn the new Cabala, the new language of Mystery. Schizophrenia, echolalia, involutional melancholia—the words come trippingly from the tongue, do they not?

"You should know, Clyde. Didn't you visit the library on those long dull days when business was bad, and read endlessly in psychiatry? Didn't you bury yourself, these past several months, in a completely new world of delusion and hallucination and obsession, of neurosis and psychosis? In other words, when you felt you were going crazy—just as in the past, men felt they were becoming possessed of the Devil—didn't you seek to fight it by studying psychiatry as the ancients studied the black arts?"

Bromely tried to sit up. Doctor Fell's face loomed closer, swung away, loomed closer again.

"You know what happened to those men, Clyde. They became, in their own minds, wizards. And you know now—surely you must have guessed—what has happened to you. During the past week, you couldn't be a press agent any more. You couldn't be a rational human being any more. In an effort to project, to invest in a new identity, you became a psychiatrist. And you invented me!

"You've told yourself that this office is something like your own office, my receptionist resembles your girl, I resemble you. Don't you understand? This is your office. That is your girl. You've been coming in daily and lying down here on your own couch. No wonder she's frightened, hearing you talk to yourself. Now do you know who you are?"

Was it Doctor Fell or the fear screaming in his ears?

"This is your last chance, Clyde. You've got to decide once and for all. You can be yourself again, completely, if you have faith in your own identity. If not, you're the first of the new maniacs. Let me ask you once again, once and for all: who are you?" "

Clyde Bromely lay there on the couch while the room whirled and swirled. He saw pictures, endless pictures: a faded snapshot of a little Clyde, clinging to Mamma's skirt—Bromely, Lt. j.g., U.S.N., in uniform—Speed Bromely, public relations, shaking hands with a top comic at a benefit show—Bromely sitting in the public library, seeking the answer in the ologies and the isms—Bromely lying on the couch, clawing at nothing.

Bromely saw the pictures, shuffled them, sorted them, and made his choice.

Then the fear fell away, and Bromely slept. He slept there on the couch for a long, long time. When he woke up it was dark and he was alone in the room. Somebody was rapping on the door.

It was his girl. He knew that now. He was in his own office, and his own girl came in, timidly and hesitantly, as he rose with a smile of renewed confidence.

“I was worried,” she said. “You being in here so long, and—He laughed, and laughed again, inside as he realized that the sound but dimly conveyed the new security he felt within himself. “I was sleeping,” he told her. “There’s nothing to worry about, my dear. From now on, we’re going places. I’ve been in a pretty bad slump for the past month or so—someday I’ll tell you all about it—but I’m all right now. Let’s go out for dinner and we’ll make plans.”

The girl smiled. She could sense the change, too. Dark as the room was, it seemed to fill with sudden sunlight.

“All right,” she said. “All right, Mr. Bromely.”

He stiffened. “Bromely? That patient? Don’t you know me, my dear?”

Mr. Margate’s Mermaid

CHAPTER I

THE man at the employment agency gave me a long look. “Why do you keep coming back?” he muttered, wearily. “There’s nothing for you. I’ve told you that a dozen times.”

I lost my patience.

“What’s wrong with me?” I snapped. “I’ve done everything the books advise. Look at me—my shoes are shined. My trousers are worn but neatly pressed. I haven’t got unsightly pores, or dandruff or five o’clock shadow. I use a deodorant. My fingernails are clean.”

Despite himself, I could see that he was impressed. I pursued my advantage.

“I smile pleasantly, don’t I? My handclasp is firm isn’t it? Look!” As a crowning gesture I produced a handkerchief and waved it under his nose. “See?” I exclaimed, triumphantly. “No tattle-tale gray.”

They employment man sat up and then shrugged.

“I know all that,” he conceded. “You come up to all the specifications except one, as far as a job is concerned.”

“And what’s that?” I asked.

“You can’t do anything.”

I kept still. I knew he had me there.

“Listen, Mister,” he said, patiently. “Your card says you’re a writer. And we just don’t get any calls for writers. Now if you could only do something useful—like plumbing for instance. Or if you were an arc-welder. Lots of calls for arc-welders.

“But no. You’re useless. All you can do is write.” A slight sneer crossed his face. “Can’t even operate a lathe,” he accused.

I bowed my head. It was true. I couldn’t operate a lathe.

“But I can type,” I suggested, desperately. “You surely must get plenty of calls for a stenographer.”

He grunted. “Wouldn’t you look cute now, sitting on a business man’s lap?”

“Never thought of that.”

He rose from his desk. “So you see how it is. You’re just not the type. Too puny for outdoor work or the army. Haven’t got a chance in a factory. My advice to you is to go back home and start pounding the typewriter again.”

I faced him and bowed.

“A very excellent suggestion,” I agreed. “But there are one or two slight difficulties. To begin with, as of this morning I no longer have a home. Nor a typewriter. My landlady is in possession of both.”

The employment man sighed sympathetically. “Sure tough. There must be some way out. Wonder what I’d do if I were in your shoes.”

“Have them re-soled, probably,” I told him. “My feet are touching the pavement.”

“Must be something,” he muttered, scratching his head. “Writer, huh? Inside work. Hey—maybe I’ve got it!”

He faced me across the desk and his voice dropped.

“Would you mind going to work for a screwball?” he asked.

“What do you mean, a lunatic?”

“No. Of course not. Why this guy is a millionaire. He’s just kind of eccentric.”

“You mean that if he were poor he’d be crazy.”

“What do you care? A job’s a job, and this is a good berth, if you fill the bill. Ever hear of Julius Margate?”

"No."

"Lives uptown. In a mansion, no less! I've checked. He called in last week—let me see now, if I can find the order." He bustled around opening a card file.

"Here it is. Yes, Julius Margate. He wants a house man. $200 a month, plus room and board."

"$200 a month and keep for such a job? He must be whacky!" I exclaimed.

"Wait. Listen to this. Man selected must be fond of animals, able to climb trees, a good horseman; must have Type C blood and an I. Q. of 180 or higher."

He looked at me.

"Well?"

I SMILED. "Happen to know my blood type is okay," I answered. "Got a transfusion once. I've got an I.Q. record lying around that I think I can get my hands on. I haven't climbed a tree for ten years, but I guess I can manage. I used to ride pretty well. I'm not fond of animals—but for $200 a month and keep I'll sleep with a rhinoceros."

"Maybe you'll do at that," commented the employment man. "I'll call, up Margate and see what he says. Drop back this afternoon around two."

"Doesn't he want me to go out there for an interview?"

"No. Told you he sounded like a screwball. Insists on phone interviews only. Says when he selects a man he'll send a guide down to take you to his place."

I let it go at that.

Promptly at two I returned. The employment agent was waiting for me. He ushered me into the private office at once.

"You've got the job," he informed me. "And you start today. Your things will be called for. All ready to go?"

"Suits me."

“Sign here. Usual commission.” I signed.

“What about that guide?” I asked.

“He’s waiting for you now in the outer office.”

I paused. “I didn’t see anyone there,” I objected. “That is, nobody but a blind man.”

“He’s your guide,” the employment agent told me. “I warned you Margate was a. screwball.”

We went back to the outer office. The fat blind man with the striped cane rose as we entered.

“Here he is,” said the employment man. He introduced me “And this is Captain Hollis.”

“Pleased to meet up with you.” The captain’s voice was a jovial boom. He grasped my hand, held it. “Sure we’ll get along fine. Boss ought to like you. You got long fingers. Like eels. Artistic, ain’t you?”

“Writer,” I admitted.

“Well ain’t that swell, dammit! Boss likes writers. Thinks they’re just too stinking intellecshool. He’s pretty intelleschool himself. But let’s heave anchor. The car’s outside.”

We left the building. Captain Hollis led the way, cane and all. He moved with marvelous celerity for a sightless man. He found the elevators and his cane pressed the down button with unerring accuracy.

He threaded his way through the outer lobby, using his cane for a needle. And once in the street, he walked directly toward a large gray limousine which stood resplendently at the curb.

A uniformed chauffeur opened the door. “This is Dave,” the captain told me.

“Pleased to meet you,” I said, climbing in.

“He’s deaf.” The captain thrust his face forward and his lips moved repeating my name and greeting.

Dave smiled. “Glad you’re with us. The Boss is gonna like you, I guess. You wear glasses. I’ll bet you read a lot.”

The limousine moved out into the traffic as we sat back. I turned to Captain Hollis.

"How about giving me a few tips on my new employer?" I asked. "He seems to be a most remarkable man."

"Who, the Boss? Listen, remarkable ain't the word for that guy. Some people might think he was a little balmy, but they just don't understand him. Kindest man in the world. Big hearted? Why, he loves everybody. He loves people you and I wouldn't put up with in a nightmare."

The captain shivered slightly. It was a startling phenomenon in so large a man.

"Not that I'm saying a word against the house-guests, you understand. They're all nice, decent folks in their way. But what a way!"

He shivered again.

"That's why I'm glad you're taking this job. I've been helping the Boss out around the house. It isn't easy for me, without my lights to guide me, and besides I can't seem to get used to them guests of his. Even if I went and brought a couple of them in the first place. I remember snagging Jory in Hungary. Before the war, that was. Dammit, there was a voyage! But—"

"I don't understand. What about Mr. Margate's guests? Who are they?"

The captain ignored my questions as he leaned forward suddenly to address Dave.

"Wait a minute! I nearly forgot something. Jory wants some flea powder. Better stop at the pet shop on our way up!"

Dave read his lips and nodded. A moment later the car turned in at the curb.

"You go in and get it," ordered the captain. "Here's the money. A large can of flea powder."

I DID. It was my first act in the service of Julius Margate and I was oddly disappointed. After all this build-up I expected something better than buying a can of flea powder for a guest's poodle.

When I returned to the car, the captain was already issuing a further order to Dave.

“Dammit, I’m losing my memory!” he growled. “We got to stop by the dentist for Mr. Simpkins.” Obediently, the car moved forward. The captain turned to me. “You’ll like old Simpkins,” he predicted. “He’s the best of the gang. Easiest to get along with, I think. Of course Simpkins isn’t his real name. Talks with an accent. But the Boss doesn’t care about a guy’s past if he’s working on the level now.”

The captain chuckled. “Poor Simpkins kind of over-stepped himself, though. That’s why the Boss made him go to the dentist today. It puts an end to all chances of accident.” His fingers went to my wrist.

“What time does your watch say?”

“Almost five.”

“Is it dark yet?” His sightless eyes blinked.

“Yes.”

“Good. Simpkins will be out. He was asleep when I brought him down. Lugged him up myself. He ought to be awake now. And will he be mad when he finds out what the dentist did!”

Again the captain chuckled.

The car moved on once more.

Dave turned his head from the wheel.

“There he is, waiting at the curb,” he indicated.

“Does he look mad?”

“Boiling.”

We pulled up.

I saw a tall, thin, middle-aged man with thinning hair. He did look mad—his eyes anyway. The rest of his face was covered by his cupped hands.

“Hello, Mr. Simpkins,” boomed the captain. “Climb in. Meet the new house man.”

He introduced me.

Tall Mr. Simpkins entered with a grunt. His black coat covered the seat beside me as he extended a bony hand. I grasped it, but not for long. It was icy cold.

“Gratified I’m sure.” said Mr. Simpkins, in a burring voice. “You will excuse me. I am very upset.”

His hand went back to his jaw as he turned to the captain.

“That was a very bad thing you did to me,” he accused. “Taking me to the dentist while I am asleep.”

“Boss’ orders.”

“Ah! I thought so. He is a hard man, Julius Margate. Do you know what he had the dentist do to me?”

“What?”

“He pulled all my teeth! When I woke up a few minutes ago I was lying in the chair and my teeth were gone. All of them!”

Captain Hollis began to laugh. “Dammit, that’s rich! Beg your pardon, Mr. Simpkins, but that’s rich!” The captain turned to me. “Don’t you think so?”

“I don’t understand,” I answered. “What’s so funny about pulling out all of a man’s teeth when he’s asleep?”

It was Simpkins who answered, sulkily.

“It isn’t funny at all. Losing my teeth is the worst thing in the world that could happen to me. Because,” continued Mr. Simpkins, in a dismal voice. “I happen to be a vampire.”

CHAPTER II

CAPTAIN HOLLIS was a very strong man.

I discovered this when I tried to jump out of the car.

Mr. Simpkins was almost as upset as I was.

“Don’t be afraid,” he whispered. “I won’t hurt you. My teeth are all gone, anyway. I couldn’t bite you if I wanted to.”

His bony hand pressed my shoulder. I winced.

“Honestly,” he pleaded. “I never bit anyone even when I had my teeth. Julius—Mr. Margate—always took excellent care of me. Bought me canned blood, the kind they use in transfusions. Liver extract. Anything I wanted. I was never hungry.”

“Best-hearted guy in the world,” Captain Hollis repeated. “Besides you’ve got nothing to worry about. You’re Type C, and Mr. Simpkins here is allergic to Type C blood; ain’t you now, Mr. Simpkins?”

“Of course, There’s nothing to be afraid of,” reassured the vampire. He mumbled badly through his aching jaws.

“If you’re a sample of Mr. Margate’s house-guests, I’m going to have a pretty tough job,” I answered.

“Not at all. Now take me, for example. I’m no bother to anyone. Of course, I don’t like to have mirrors in my room, and I can’t cross running water. You’d think I’d have trouble bathing, but I use liquid soap and oil.”

“I don’t want to know a vampire’s beauty secrets,” I retorted, somewhat harshly. Mr. Simpkins looked glum.

“You don’t like me,” he accused. “Nobody likes me.”

“There, there,” Captain Hollis consoled him. “Of course he likes you. We all like you. Doesn’t the Boss take care of you? Didn’t he bring you all the way from Transylvania and put you up in his swell mansion? Doesn’t he give you everything you want?”

“Everybody hates me,” the vampire mumbled. “I’m going out and let the worms eat me.”

“Don’t talk like that, dammit! You’re acting very ungrateful to the Boss. Why when we found you back there in Europe, you was starving to death. Sneaking into henhouses at night and killing chickens, you was. Living from hand to mouth. Thin—you was anaemic! And all the time afraid somebody was going to find out where you held up to sleep in the daytime.

“Now look at you! Got a swell boudoir rigged up down in the cellar. Nobody to bother you. All you got to do is come out at night and talk to the Boss. He’s gonna write you up in his book, he says. You’ll be famous!”

Mr. Simpkins smiled weakly. “Maybe I am a bit hasty,” he conceded. “And I assure you I shall be of little trouble.” He turned to me. “I am a noctambulistic soul. I sleep from sunrise to sunset. My wants are simple. I won’t bother you.”

This was evidently meant to console me. It didn’t.

“Listen,” I began, addressing the captain. “You might as well tell me everything now. What about these other houseguests? Has Mr. Margate got a couple of zombies boarding with him? Any ghouls to feed?”

“The Boss? Of course not—he wouldn’t have anything to do with no such creatures. Kindest guy in the world, But wait a minute. You can get the dope straight from him.”

I hadn’t realized it, but the car was turning into a driveway. We rode through an avenue of trees, hinting at spacious grounds beyond. The limousine pulled up before the steps of a large, rambling stone structure. The interior brilliantly illuminated, justified the captain’s description. It was a mansion all right, and a big one.

We climbed out—Simpkins, the captain, and myself. Dave the chauffeur drove off to the rear.

Simpkins rang the bell. The door opened. No butler stood there. Instead, a pudgy little man in an ornate purple lounging jacket fairly flung himself out onto the terrace. His shock of gray hair bristled with an excitement matched by the gleam in his darting black eyes.

“Here you are! How’s your jaw, Simpkins? Ha, ha—explain about that later. Matter of necessity. Want to see you tonight. And you—you must be the new house man.”

His hand pumped mine in a friendly, vigorous grip. “My name’s Margate. Julius Margate. Sorry, we haven’t got a butler. Can’t keep them. Devil of a servant problem. Hope you’ll be a bit more broadminded.”

He ushered us inside, bustling and talking in a quite breathless manner.

“Got a very good report on you from the agency, young man. Very good. Seem to be just what I need around here. So much to attend to, you know.

So much. But come along—I'll show you to your rooms later. Right now, dinner's waiting."

I followed the short man and the captain through the long hall. We entered a spacious dining room. The table was set for three.

"You're eating upstairs, aren't you?" Margate called to Simpkins. The vampire nodded.

"I'll be up to visit later," said the host. "Want to take some notes."

He turned to me.

"Hear you're a writer. Fine! You'll be interested in the book I'm doing. Helpful too, no doubt."

We sat down, following Margate's example.

"Jory's cooking," Margate said. "Had him go out and take Trina her fish. Gerymanx ate earlier. Took his stuff out myself. We'll have to teach our new house man how to feed our guests, eh Captain?"

Margate turned his gray head.

"Jory! he called. "Oh, Jory—we're ready now!"

Jory brought the platter in from the kitchen. I was introduced quite naturally. I correctly assumed that Jory was a guest, not the cook.

As far as I was concerned, Jory would be neither guest or cook in any house of mine.

JORY was a big man. Too big.

His arms were too long and his legs were too short. He didn't have any neck. His hair was long. And plentiful. It ran over his forehead and bristled on cheek and chin. It sprouted from his wrists.

If he were my guest I'd insist on his using a depilatory. And I'd send him to the dentist too. I didn't like the look of his teeth when he smiled at me.

"You new house man, huh?" he grunted.

"That's right, Mr. Jory."

"Okay. Where's my flea powder?"

I'd forgotten about that little item. I took the can from my pocket and handed it to him. "Thanks," he grunted.

His huge fingers tore open the lid. Raising the can, he doused his head liberally with the powder. With a nonchalant smirk he unbuttoned his shirt and poured flea powder down his chest.

"Jory—please!" objected Margate.

"Huh?"

"The moon will be up in half an hour. I'll powder you then after you change."

Margate turned to me.

"Jory's a werewolf," he explained. I tried to get up. The captain tripped me with his cane.

"He changes every night when the moon is more than half full," Margate continued. "But there's nothing to worry about. I've got his lycanthropy under control. He doesn't get violent unless he sees the moon, and I take care of that. Make him wear dark glasses."

Jory shuffled out of the room. The others began to eat. I didn't feel very hungry, somehow.

"You mustn't mind Jory," Margate told me, noticing my hesitation. "He's crude, I'll admit. Illiterate peasant type. Hungarian backwoods, you know. Hasn't got the breeding of Mr. Simpkins. But he means well. Faithful as a dog, too.

"That's his only trouble. That canine streak. You know," Margate confided, "I wouldn't want it to get around for the world, but in winter Jory has a very bad habit. He sheds! Dreadfully. Usually make him stay in his room. He prefers to sleep in that kennel in back, of course, but I see to it that his hamburger is waiting for him upstairs. Fleas bother him a bit, too. But not so much any more. When the captain captured him he was really—I confess—mangy."

Margate passed me my salad.

"You ever bathe a dog?" he asked. "You can give Jory a bath every so often."

Bathing a werewolf somehow didn't appeal to me. But I was past making objections.

"I'd like to introduce you to some of our other guests later this evening," Margate said. "But I doubt if I'll have time. I must talk to the captain here. Fact is, Captain, I've got another voyage planned for you."

"Now?" boomed Captain Hollis.

"Yes, for you and Dave both."

"What're we after this trip?"

"Never mind."

Margate glanced at me significantly.

"I'll tell you later. But it's the kind of thing I need you for especially. No one else could do it. And Dave has his part to play as well."

"Don't like it," the captain answered. "Risky business. Blockades and submarines and all. Where to?"

"Greece again."

"Russian-occupied."

"You'll get by if you follow orders. You'll be using my yacht, you know. Little danger of being fired on. And the regular crew. They'll handle things. All you must do is follow the map and act when the time comes."

"Something hard to capture?"

"Very hard. Hardest yet. No one but you could do it. There's a bonus in it, of course. Make it worth your while."

The captain grunted. Margate beamed on me.

"Well, young man—suppose you're drawing your own conclusions?"

"More or less," I admitted. "What do you make of my little household from what you've seen of it?"

"It's very—unusual," I ventured. "Unusual? Diplomatic word. Very. Tactful, aren't you? Why don't you come right out with it and say you think I'm crazy?"

"Because I suspect that I might be the crazy one."

"Ha. Good! Very good!" Margate leaned back. He offered me a cigar. I took it as we sipped our coffee.

"Don't alarm yourself," he told me. "It's very simple. I'm a collector, that's all. Just a collector. Hobby of mine. Many wealthy men collect books. Some collect paintings, or antique furniture. I collect mythological entities."

"So I see."

"Might call me something of a hunter, too. But I'm not interested in the usual big game. Besides, even if I have captured most of my guests, they are guests. And are treated as such. I rather flatter myself that I've improved their lot. It's not easy, in times like these, to be a vampire or a werewolf."

I AGREED with him on that.

"Perhaps you're wondering just what impulse led me to the pursuit of this little hobby?"

"I am."

Margate giggled.

"Oh, it's silly enough, I suppose. At least to people who fancy themselves the practical, hard-headed sort. As a boy, I mooned around a lot over books. Mythology. Bulfinch. You know the stuff. I inherited money. There was no need to work. I inherited a certain amount of intelligence, too, I claim. Enough intelligence to avoid emulating the average career of the wealthy man of leisure. You know the stuff—blondes, polo, blondes, golf, blondes, horses, blondes, tennis." He giggled again. "But I do like blondes," he added.

"You might say I rebelled against certain so-called rational concepts of reality. I began to study myth-cultures. I convinced myself that certain deviations from the accepted norm existed in Nature. That the legends of supernatural presences and entities might conceivably rest on a basis of truth. That you can't sit back and say, 'There is no such thing as a werewolf,' for example, if you've never looked for one. Besides, psychopathology has only recently admitted the psychotic existence of werewolves, if not the physiological possibility.

“I knocked around the globe a bit in the yacht. Picked up Captain Hollis, here. A good man, the captain. Lost his eyes in my service. A maenad scratched them out, off the Dardanelles.”

“She was a hussy, that one!” the captain boomed.

“We found a few things together, he and I. Things the hard-headed scientific boys never bothered to look for. They’re always willing to go chasing off to nowhere and back to capture a reported new specimen of gorilla, or something, but you never hear of them getting up an expedition to actually track down a sea-serpent, for example. Dullards!

“At any rate, you’ll meet some of my—discoveries—later. At the moment, I am engaged on a little writing project of my own. Sort of combination of clinical case-histories and a revision of mythology. That’s why my guests are here. I’m extracting their life histories.”

Margate smiled amiably.

“I think you’ll like it here, once you get accustomed to things,” he said. “There’s a number of tasks for you to perform, of course. But if you humor my guests a bit you won’t have any trouble. They’re all. goodhearted, if a little unusual.”

A crash interrupted his monologue.

“The kitchen!” the captain muttered.

Indeed, the noise of falling crockery and silver resounded from the kitchen doorway.

Margate was on his feet. I followed him.

“Damn that Jory! How often have I told him not to change in the house? He’s always doing that, and he always smashes the dishes!”

We stared into the kitchen.

Floundering amidst a welter of broken plates, a large wolf stared up at us with contrite eyes. The wolf had brown fur—like Jory’s hair, only more of it. The wolf was panting a little, and its red tongue lolled.

As we watched, it rose to its paws and uttered a little yelp of embarrassment.

“Oh, Jory, you’re so careless!” Margate sighed, shaking his head.

The wolf nuzzled against his leg.

"All right. But try to remember!"

I stared at the red eyes. Jory's eyes.

Now I was able to trace, not without a certain fascinated horror, the human outlines inherent in the wolf body. The bony structure of the ribs. The peculiar adaptation of elbow to joint. The finger-like pattern of the paws. And the human cast of the lupine muzzle.

The werewolf turned and began to scratch patiently at the door.

Margate stared at me.

"Oh dear!" he whispered. "Oh dear!"

"What's the matter?"

He stepped to the wall and took down a harness and muzzle. Stooping, he adjusted them about the wolf's body and throat.

"I'm sorry," he told me. "But I'm afraid you'll have to take Jory outside. I can tell he wants to go."

He placed the end of the leash in my nerveless fingers and pushed me forward into the night. The wolf tugged me into darkness.

"Just once around the block," Margate cautioned.

So I did it. My first duty in the house of my new employer was to walk his pet werewolf around the block.

CHAPTER III

I SLEPT soundly that evening, inspite of it all. I could save my nightmares for when I was awake.

Margate met me at the breakfast table. He was in bubbling spirits—as usual.

"The captain's left," he announced. "Got his maps and orders last night. Should be gone about six weeks, I estimate."

He chuckled to himself.

"If he succeeds this time, my collection will be complete."

“After something unusual?”

“Unusual is hardly the word! This one will really paralyze you! Hope he makes it all right.”

“Isn’t it a risky business for a blind man?”

“Riskier for a man with his eyes.” Margate babbled on. “But finish your breakfast. I’m going to show you around.”

I had hardly downed my coffee when Margate jumped up from the table, bursting with eagerness. “Come on, come on!”

He led the way into the yard. We walked along a shaded gravel pathway leading to the rear of the house. Margate stooped midway.

“Jory’s tracks,” he muttered. “Didn’t hear him come in last night. Oh well, he’ll sleep until noon or later. And Simpkins won’t be with us until sundown.”

We proceeded, moving between ordered flower-beds.

“Warm, isn’t it?” Margate commented. He paused in the shadow of a tree.

“It is hot.” I rested my hand against the trunk.

“Get your hands off me!” commanded a voice.

I looked around. There was nothing to see.

“You heard me!” The voice was high, feminine; yet strangely muffled.

I stared again. As I did so, a branch descended and slapped my face.

“Fresh!”

Margate laughed.

“That’s Myrtle,” he explained. “In the tree. A hamadryad.”

I wheeled and surveyed the tree. It looked quite ordinary to me.

“That isn’t funny,” came the voice from the tree. “Who’s the new fellow, Margate?”

“That’s our new house man.”

“Hmm. Not very polite, I must say.”

I thought it best to turn and bow at the branches.

"Sorry if I offended you. As a matter of fact, I was merely admiring your limbs. That's a lovely trunk you have there."

This was the right approach. I could tell that. A peal of girlish laughter was my reward. "Flatterer!"

"Not at all, I assure you."

"Margate," said Myrtle, softly. "I hate to say it, but I wish you'd remember to tell Jory to keep away from me when—"

"Of course, Myrtle. He's just thoughtless, that's all. How are things otherwise?"

"Pretty fair."

"Your new friend here can climb a tree. I might have him shinny up you if you want to be pruned at any time."

I recalled that tree-climbing was one of my requisites listed by the employment man. Type C blood, fond of animals, a tree-climber—yes, it worked in, all right.

"I'd be glad to handle your limbs at any time," I offered.

Myrtle laughed.

"How you talk!" Her branches shook coyly.

Margate moved on down the path. I followed. Myrtle rustled coyly in farewell.

"Lovely girl," my employer remarked. "Often wonder what she looked like. The captain picked her up in the Carpathians. Had to fight off a gang of peasants when he transplanted her." He sighed reminiscently.

We walked down a graveled pathway through the garden which led to the door of a large, low structure. It resembled a stable or barn.

"Want you to meet Gerymanx," Margate explained, as we entered. He bustled in. I had to stoop in order to pass the doorway.

Gerymanx stood in a large stall. Or rather, a part of Gerymanx. Gerymanx was a horse, and since his back was turned toward me, the part I gazed upon hardly constituted a proper introduction.

"There he is," said Margate. "Nice looking, isn't he?" He thumbed at the portion of Gerymanx which was visible. "Ever see anything like it before?"

I had an answer for that one.

SUDDENLY, at the rear of the stall, a man raised his head and peered intently at us. He was a stranger, and a rather disreputable one. Tousle headed and unshaven, he bared prominent yellow teeth in a sly grin.

It rather disappointed me to find Margate employing such a raffish-looking fellow. I told him so, under my breath.

"Not much of a stable-boy," I commented.

"Stable-boy? That's no stable-boy, that's Gerymanx."

"But I thought you told me this—this thing—is Gerymanx," I protested, weakly indicating the protruding brown backside of the horse.

"So it is. But the head is also Gerymanx. Don't you understand, my boy? Gerymanx is a centaur." He would be. I might have known it. But I could hardly control my confusion when the human head wheeled, the horse body pivoted, and Gerymanx trotted out of his stall to welcome us formally.

I am no judge of horseflesh, and certainly no judge of centaurflesh either, but I must admit Gerymanx was impressive. His horsebody glistened beautifully in the sunshine from the stable sky-light. His human torso, rising from the waist, was superbly muscled. I had always imagined centaurs to be somewhat shaggy. Gerymanx wasn't. He trotted forward, and upon our introduction, shook hands. He had to bend his elbows to do it, being considerably taller than myself.

"A pleasure," he boomed. "Mr. Margate here tells me you're quite a horseman. We must go for a ride together soon."

Margate beamed with pride. "Gerymanx is quite a pacer," he told me. "Four-gaited."

"Glad to get out again," the centaur went on. "No one has been around to exercise me but Dave, and he can't do anything but hang on. Thought I'd like to work out mornings and maybe enter the steeplechase this fall."

"He's very ambitious," Margate added. "Wants to race." He turned to the centaur. "How's the oat situation?"

“Pretty fair. You can tell this gentleman here what to do for me. I’d like to be curry-combed this week, if you don’t mind.”

“Your mane wants clipping,” Margate observed, critically.

“Guess it does.” The centaur smiled coyly. “You know, Margate, I’ve been thinking of having my tail bobbed.”

“Don’t do anything hasty now,” my host begged.

“But it’s all the style. I was looking at the Breeder’s Annual last night.”

“We’ll discuss that later,” said Mr. Margate, curtly. “Right now we have to be moving on. I’m sure you two will get to be great friends.”

He turned to me. “I must give you instructions on Gerymanx shortly. You’ll take care of him as well as Myrtle and the rest.”

We moved out of the stable as Gerymanx trotted back into his stall.

“Lunch time. Listen—I want you to call up the grocer in town and order a few items for me.”

We marched back to the house. “You understand, I can hardly allow tradespeople to get in here. You’ll meet them at the gate, of course. But let’s see now. We’ll need a roast for ourselves—and some raw hamburger—about two pounds—a bottle of Lextron—that’s Vitamin B extract for Mr. Simpkins—better get a bottle of Glover’s Mange Cure for Jory—five pounds of halibut steak—and then call the feed store and ask them to send up a bale of hay—a bottle of tabasco sauce—”

I used the hall phone.

“Afraid you’re going to be in for a little heavy duty these days,” Mr. Margate apologized. “What with the captain and Dave away. Why not run upstairs and take a shower before lunch? It might freshen you up a bit for the afternoon. I want to go over the notes for my book with you, if you don’t mind. Run along now—I’ll fix us a snack if Jory isn’t around.” I ascended the stairs to my own quarters. I had quite a nice bedroom with bath attached. I noted that my things had arrived some time during the morning. Jory must have brought them up.

It was quiet in my room. Quiet, and normal. That’s what I needed most. A touch of normalcy, after all this bewilderment.

I walked into the bathroom, reached around the shower curtains and turned on the water. Then I undressed, slowly. I had a cigarette—one of Margate's Turkish. I went back to the bath. I pulled aside the curtain, climbed in the tub.

"Hey!" said a voice.

I looked down.

THERE was a girl in the bathtub.

She was a very pretty girl. I noticed that at once. She had a long oval face, high cheekbones, deep blue eyes, and long, curly hair.

I also observed that she would look good in a sweater, though at the moment she wasn't wearing any that I could notice. And I noticed.

"Hey," she repeated, staring up at me.

I just stood there. Because a second glance afforded me certain observations of a disturbing nature. She was a pretty girl with long hair, all right—but her hair was green. A vivid green. Most unusual color.

"What are you trying to do?" persisted the girl.

"I was just going to take a bath," I answered, not too brightly.

"Well don't stand there on one leg like a stork, then," she replied. "Come on in. The water's fine."

I didn't move, but I was taken aback.

"Who are you?" prattled the chatter box in the tub. "My but you're skinny, aren't you?"

It was a trifle disturbing—this criticism. What would you say if you walked into your bathroom and a strange girl in your tub made disparaging remarks about your physique?

I was still pondering the problem when a discreet cough sounded from the doorway.

It was Margate.

He ignored me and strode toward the tub, staring down at the soapy water.

"So here you are, Trina," he accused. "At it again, eh? How did you ever get up here?"

"Jory carried me," answered the girl, defiantly. "I didn't think anyone would notice. Besides, I just wanted to use the bath salts."

"Well, you'll have to get out now. This is our new house man. He wants a bath, I imagine. That is what you want, isn't it?" he added, turning to me for corroboration.

"Yes."

"Oh very well. If you will be a pig, and hog it all for yourself." Trina sulked. "Lift me out."

I hesitated.

"Come on."

I stooped and lifted. She was slippery. But that wasn't the reason I almost dropped her.

I was staring at her waist. At the green—oh, it might as well be admitted! Trina was a mermaid.

"Shame on you," Margate scolded. "I thought I told you not to leave your tank." He sighed. "What will our new house man think of us, I wonder? Jory changing in the kitchen and you sneaking into his tub."

"I just wanted bath salts," the mermaid wailed. "And a chance to use this lovely mirror here to comb my hair." Her eyelids fluttered up at me coyly, like waving kelp. "Maybe you'll help me comb my hair?" she suggested.

"Not now!" Margate extended his arms. "Here, give her to me. Go ahead and bathe in peace."

He bore Trina from the room. A most attractive armful too. I bathed meditatively.

At the luncheon table, Margate confided in me.

"It's her French blood," he declared. "Trina's a Breton, you know. Found her off the coast of Brittany.

"She's the restless type, though. Wants to sneak out to bathing beaches, I suppose. Crazy about bath salts and perfumes. Guess she's lonesome. Used to a lot of oceanides and nereides around. To say nothing of sailors."

"I like her," I ventured. "I don't blame her for getting bored in a tank. It must be like living the life of a goldfish. Isn't there a swimming pool or something around here?"

"Say, that's an idea! You could dig her one! There in the garden. You know how to handle cement?"

"Guess I could manage:"

"Jory will help," Margate promised. "Say, that's fine."

We finished our luncheon in high humor. After a smoke we adjourned to Margate's study.

It was more of a library than a study, and more of a museum than a library. The walls were lined with bookshelves. I scanned the titles with eager curiosity.

"Quite a collection you have here," I commented. "Lots of sorcery."

Margate gave me an earnest glance. "Just for reading purposes," he emphasized. "Never monkey with the stuff personally. Too dangerous."

I noted a glass bell jar on the side table. A long, thin bone rested on a cushion within. Margate marked my interest.

"Supposed to be a unicorn horn," he explained. "But I'm inclined to believe it's a fake. Anybody knows there are no such things as unicorns."

I RETURNED to the large center table and desk. In order to avoid resting my finger on a mummified head I brought my hand down on a large, dark brown bottle. Margate gasped.

"Careful there! Don't jiggle that bottle! Got a djinn in there." I stepped back.

"Bought it from a sailor in Aden. Set me back a pretty penny. Don't know why I wanted it—I'm afraid to open the thing."

I stared into the brown, cloudy glass. I could see nothing. But when I lifted the bottle it gave forth a rustling sound—a most disconcerting noise to emanate from glass or liquid.

"Let me see, now," Margate began. He stooped over the desk drawers and began to draw forth sheafs of manuscript.

"Here's the case history of Mr. Simpkins," he muttered. "And the notes Jory is giving me. Cave stuff—archeological background from Gerymanx. What's this? Oh, the report of the Demonolatrical Society. 1946. Out of date."

He lifted his hands, eyebrows waggling in despair.

"You see? Everything's topsyturvy. Never get anything done this way. Need some system. A little order. Then I can get started again."

But somehow we didn't get at any filing system that afternoon. We sat down and got involved in a little discussion, during which my employer added a few scraps of information to my data on his life-work.

I learned that he had conducted this somewhat singular menage of his for about five years. Mr. Simpkins was his oldest guest; then Gerymanx, Myrtle, and Jory. Trina was really the latest acquisition.

They got along fairly well together, according to Margate. Of course he humored them. Kept them happy. And in return, they afforded him diversion enough to recompense him for the sacrifice of a normal social life.

"Never go out," Margate told me. "Couldn't afford to, under the circumstances. Never invite guests, either. But the book is coming along, and it's well worth it. When I am finished I'll take my place alongside of Frazer and Ellis. What Darwin and Huxley did in their fields I will do in mine."

He seemed a simple soul, did Julius Margate. I felt a growing affection for the man.

"Only one complaint," he confided. "People are always trying to palm off fakes on me. Those things get around, you know. I've had side-show dealers trying to sell me freaks. And some unscrupulous dealers try to peddle their fakes—monstrosities that never existed. Missing links, and basilisks. One Irish rogue had the cheek to claim he could secure a leprechaun. Anyone with any sense knows there aren't things like that. I ask you, now, is that right?"

He didn't wait for an answer, but rose to his feet with a frown.

"Dear me! Almost supper time. Better dash out to the gate for those groceries. I'll route Jory out. He's in the kennel, most likely.

"On your way back," he called, "I think you'd better take a run down to the cellar. Fix the furnace. It'll be chilly tonight."

I left on my errand. After lugging up the groceries I made for the cellar stairs, descended.

It was dark down there. I struck three matches before I located the furnace in the gloom.

I found the coal, filled the hopper. It took some time. Little red shadows danced on the walls behind me as I got the fire glowing. It was cheerful, warm. I began to whistle.

Then I heard the sound.

The creaking, groaning sound from the corner.

And a rustling. A slow, crawling rustle. A slithering noise.

I lit a match, held it up in none too steady fingers.

Fire swept across a mound of churning earth. A mound in which a box was set—a long, white box. A box that opened. Opened in darkness, as two long arms rose silently, swiftly.

Something sat up. Something with a long white face.

With a sudden start, I recognized Mr. Simpkins.

"You!" I gasped.

"Hello." Simpkins rose. The earth fell from his black coat. He stretched himself and yawned.

"What time is it? Forgot to set the alarm clock again."

I stared down at the coffin from which he had emerged.

The vampire stood beside me. "Pretty bad, isn't it?" he commented.

I shuddered in complete agreement. "Know what I'm going to do, my friend?" he asked.

"N—no."

"I am going to make our host purchase a new coffin for me. It's the least he can do to repay me for that scurvy trick of removing my teeth."

I nodded numbly.

"Since Dave is gone, you shall have to accompany me," he continued. "We can go tonight, I suppose."

"Go—where?"

"Why to the undertaking parlor, of course. Where else would you buy yourself a coffin?"

"I won't do it," I declared.

And that settled that.

After supper Mr. Simpkins and I went out to buy him a new coffin.

CHAPTER IV

JASON HARRIS operated one of the most thriving mortuary chapels in the city. Business was never dead. Mr. Harris himself was always on hand to welcome a fresh customer. That's the only way he liked his customers—fresh.

But he didn't like us.

I could tell that almost as soon as Mr. Simpkins and I entered his outer display rooms.

It had been a struggle to drag me this far. Both Mr. Simpkins and Mr. Margate had argued with me—pointing out that I was the only one who could drive the vampire down, and that night was the only opportunity Simpkins had of going out to make a personal selection. They clinched the argument by reminding me that I was, after all, an employee. And an employee must be obedient.

Now I wanted to get the whole business over with, quickly and quietly. So when Jason Harris moved forward to greet us, I lost no time.

"My friend and I should like to purchase a coffin," I began.

“Very well.” Mr. Harris assumed a mask of sympathy. “Might I inquire as to the nature of the bereavement in the family?”

Mr. Simpkins stepped out. “Never mind that. Just show us around this box factory of yours and we’ll make our own selection.”

“Of course.” Somewhat disconcerted by the callousness of the request, Harris led us over to an imposing bronze casket.

“Here is one of our latest models,” he began. “I want you to note the dignity of its outlines, the solidity of its construction, the—”

“What about a mattress?” inquired Mr. Simpkins, eagerly. “Has it got a mattress?”

“A mattress can be secured,” Harris assured him. “But I must ask you to observe this special feature—the method whereby the sealed casket is made airtight.”

“Airtight? Nothing doing,” Simpkins snapped. “How do you expect a man to breathe in an airtight coffin? Why he’d strangle to death!”

“But the deceased does not breathe—”

“How do you know? You ever been deceased? Come to think of it you do look a little dead on your feet.”

Mr. Harris was indeed quite pale.

“I don’t seem to understand you gentlemen,” he muttered.

“We just want to buy a coffin, that’s all. For a body.”

“What sort of body?” Mr. Harris persisted.

“Why no body in particular. Just any body.”

The mortician looked agitated. “You aren’t by any chance planning a murder? You’re not gangsters, I hope?”

“Of course not.” Mr. Simpkins gave out with a laugh that was meant to be reassuring. It wasn’t. “Say, I heard a good one about an undertaker who specialized in gangsters funerals. His motto was ‘Don’t Put All Your Yeggs in One Casket.’ Good eh?”

Mr. Harris didn’t think so. He looked distressed. I took advantage of his confusion to pull the vampire over toward a small modest-appearing gray box.

“What about this?” I suggested.

“Not bad,” Simpkins commented. “Streamlined. And plush lining. Always like a plush lining.”

“This is a very select model,” Harris assured us. “One of our most popular styles this season.”

“Never mind the sales build-up,” said Simpkins. “I’ll just try it out for myself.”

Lifting the lid, he climbed into the coffin and lay down.

“Very comfortable,” he grunted. “Lots of leg room.”

This statement didn’t please the undertaker either. He kept staring at Mr. Simpkins with a rapt expression, and his teeth began to chatter like a bunch of women around a Gin Rummy game.

“This coffin isn’t for you!” he exclaimed.

“Of course it is. I always pick out my own coffins when I get the chance.”

“Most people don’t get a chance,” Harris was forced to observe.

“Not me. I’m different. I’ve picked out five coffins in my time. Outlasted them all.” Without waiting to observe the reaction to this last statement, Mr. Simpkins suddenly banged the lid shut. A moment later he pushed it up again.

“Have to oil this lid,” he complained. “I might want to get out in a hurry some time. You know how it is.”

“NO, I don’t,” the undertaker confessed. “I don’t want to know how it is, either. You two get out of here. You are crazy.”

“A fine way for a mortician to talk to a customer,” Simpkins bridled. “All right. I don’t “Want your old box anyway. It’s lousy. Why I would be ashamed to be found dead in one of your coffins.” He rose. “Come on,” he told me. “We’ll try another joint down the street where the service is better. I probably can make a deal on a trade-in of the old casket, too.” Mr. Harris forced a smile. “Don’t be hasty,” he coaxed. “It’s just that I didn’t seem to understand. But I guess I do now. You want to purchase this coffin to sleep in, is that it?"

"Of course," said Mr. Simpkins, in a disgusted voice. "What would you do in a coffin?"

"Very little," the mortician assured him. "But, if I might inquire, why don't you purchase a bed?"

"Beds? Bah! The dirt gets onto the sheets," Simpkins complained. "And the light comes in, too."

"You sleep during the day?"

"That's right. I want something that's dark. Something to keep out the dirt. To say nothing of the worms."

"You have worms?" asked Mr. Harris in spite of himself.

"I'll say I have worms," answered the vampire.

"Dyspepsia is my trouble," the undertaker confessed.

"Maybe a coffin would help you, too."

"Never thought of it. Quiet in there, isn't it?"

"Very quiet. And think of the plush lining—all that satin and stuff!"

"Interesting idea, if a little morbid."

"Beds are expensive," the vampire continued. "And linen is high, too. I should think, with all these swell boxes lying around, you'd just hop into one for forty winks now and then."

Harris scratched his head.

"I'd have to talk it over with my wife first," he mused.

"Haven't you got any of these double caskets? The big jobs?"

"Yes. It might work out at that."

"Just a thought, friend. By the way—guess we'll take this one."

Harris resumed his professional interest. He quoted a price. I paid him.

"Do you want this delivered?" he asked.

"I'll take it with me," Simpkins responded. He grabbed one end of the casket and I took the other.

Harris followed us to the door. "But this is all so unusual—I'm a little confused. You really want to get into this coffin?"

“Sure as I’m alive,” Simpkins answered. Harris sighed deeply.

“Well it’s your own funeral.”

“Not bad!” Simpkins chuckled. “And don’t forget what I told you. Try a casket yourself for sleeping purposes. I’d love to see you in a coffin.”

The undertaker shuddered visibly.

“Oh, gentlemen,” he called, as we opened the door. “Just one thing more. It’s customary to have the name and address when anyone purchases a casket.”

Simpkins turned. Look me up out at Everest Cemetery,” he suggested, maliciously. “I’ve got a nice grave out there.”

Harris trembled.

“Drop in some time,” Simpkins added.

As we closed he door, the undertaker turned and ran back into his shop. His shoulders heaved.

“Now see what you did,” I accused, as we climbed into the car. “He probably won’t be able to work for a week now.”

Mr. Simpkins was contrite.

“I was only trying to be funny,” he apologized. “Besides let him close up the funeral parlor if he wants to. Business is probably dead anyway.”

I shivered as we drove off. Vampires I could learn to stand—but puns, never. If Mr. Simpkins didn’t behave, he’d find some worms on his pillow one of these days.

CHAPTER V

THE ensuing days were unexpectedly pleasant. Life quickly fell into a routine.

In the morning I usually went out to the stables and brought Gerymanx his oats and hay. Then I turned the hose on Myrtle. Afternoons I spent with Margate, trying to recopy his disordered notes and straighten out his reference sources in some kind of filing system.

At times I took Jory for a walk in the evening. Every Saturday night it was my duty to give him a bath. During the third week I had the rather unpleasant duty of shaving him, but on the whole I managed excellently.

At the time of the full moon I called up town and ordered a pair of motorcycle goggles. These fitted over his eyes more comfortably than the usual dark glasses, and he passed through the difficult days with a minimum of howling. Margate's system seemed to keep his lycanthropic instincts well under control.

Within a few weeks I had Mr. Margate's household running smoothly. My work in his study came to an end. He was able to sit down with his book material well organized. I saw little of him, these days—he spent most of his time taking new notes. Jory's recital occupied his immediate attention. Jory being rather stupid and illiterate, it was a difficult task to extract coherent information from him. But Margate persevered.

My first feeling of strangeness was almost completely dissipated. One can become adjusted to almost anything through, constant familiarity.

I no longer found it shocking when Jory assumed his lupine form before my eyes. The spectacle of Mr. Simpkins snoring in his cellar coffin did not alarm me. Myrtle's muffled voice from the tree-trunk became as natural a manifestation as the rustling from the branches of surrounding elms. Gerymanx was no bother at all. He read his racing form bragged heroically of his racing abilities, and had latterly become absorbed in a system of physical culture exercises he was taking through the mails.

Perhaps not visiting in town did it. Isolation inured me to the unusual. My duties were light, the food was excellent, and the hours passed swiftly.

Besides, there was Trina.

I got her out of that cellar tank in no time.

During the second week I began to dig the swimming pool. I worked alone, but it was a steady pace that I set for myself. Another week and I had the concrete laid. In the fifth week of my stay the pool was completed.

Trina didn't know, of course. I planned it as a surprise for her, with Margate's connivance.

When I carried her up from the basement she thought I was smuggling her in for a go at the bath salts—a frequent practice of mine which I might as well admit. We had become very friendly, Trina and I. After all, I'm broadminded enough to overlook little details like that emerald hair.

I took her out that afternoon and brought her to the pool.

At first she couldn't speak.

"Oooooooh!" she squealed. Tenderly, I threw her into the water. She splashed gaily. In a moment she swam over and put her arms around my neck.

"It's wonderful!" she whispered, and kissed me. It was the first time but not the last. I found it very nice. A mermaid's kiss is moist, and a little salty, but very interesting.

I'd built a little rockpile in the center of the pool. She sunned herself like a Lorelei, her livid curls shimmering in the breeze, the radiance of her scales glistening against the water. Her long, delicate fingers, with just the fascinating suggestion of a web at the palm, beckoned to me. I went in the house and borrowed a pair of Margate's swimming trunks to join her.

AFTER that time went very swiftly indeed. I spent hours out there on the rocks with her.

We'd swim awhile and sun awhile. She used to sing me some old Breton sea ballads in a piquant Flemish accent. Some of them were slightly bawdy, I suppose. I don't understand French very well.

Trina was happy for the first time in her life since she had been ensnared in Captain Hollis' nets.

"I've been like a fish out of water," she confessed to me. "It's like coming home again. Now, if I only had a few sailors—"

I put a stop to that talk in short order. Her weakness for seafaring men was really deplorable. But mermaids are like that, I suppose.

My fondest memories are those of the moonlight bathing parties. She and I in a world of silver water, gliding along under the moon. And afterwards we'd sit on the edge of the pool, roasting hot dogs or toasting marshallows over a little fire. It was beautiful while it lasted.

Then came the well-remembered day. Along in the seventh week it was.

Margate met me at the breakfast table with a worried frown.

"What's the matter? Still stuck on that Jory memorandum?" I asked. "That part about the relation of the moon-flower to the anthropomorphic tendencies?"

"No, it's not that," Mr. Margate answered. He ran his hand through his bristling gray crop. "It's Captain Hollis and Dave. They're nearly two weeks late. Haven't had a word—not a cablegram."

"It's nothing," I consoled him. "Perhaps. But they're on a dangerous errand."

It wasn't the first time Margate had told me that. He was constantly hinting but never revealing the nature of this quest.

"I wish you'd tell me," I said. "Maybe I could help."

"There's no way of helping," he answered. "Maybe I'm just a fool for planning this anyway. What good will it be if they are successful? I can't look and I can't listen. Never even see or hear what I get. Have to take my notes secondhand."

I COULDN'T make head or tail out of this recital.

"In case they do get back," Margate continued, "I'd better have you clear out the back room in the cellar. The big one. I've ordered sheet metal to cover the door. It's fairly soundproof. Just clear out the old furniture and leave the place vacant. We won't need any pen, or any food either, I don't suppose."

He sighed.

"The crew is reliable, though; Hollis has used the men before. They have their orders, but Hollis has to make the actual capture, of course. Dangerous business. Oh well, we'll just have to wait and see. Or rather, wait and not see.” Curiosity gnawed within me. I opened my mouth. But Margate rose and cut me off.

“Say! I just remembered—are you a blacksmith?”

“No. Can’t say that I am.”

His face fell. “Too bad. Knew I’d forgotten something when I listed your requirements.”

“What’s the matter?”

“It’s Gerymanx. He needs to be shod.”

“Oh.”

“Didn’t he mention that his hooves hurt him?”

“Come to think of it, he said something of the sort to me yesterday. I assumed it was just a minor complaint.”

“No, he needs shoes badly. And he’d like a manicure, I suppose.” Margate sighed. “Tell you what you have to do. Take the small truck into town and see the blacksmith there. I’ve got the address. Used to ride him down at night myself.

“But you’d better go. I want to stick around here in case Captain Hollis shows up.”

“You mean I put the centaur in the back of the truck and haul it to a blacksmith shop?”

“It’s all right. I’ve bribed this fellow heavily. Business being what it is in the smithy line these days, he keeps his mouth shut.”

“But what about traveling on the road?”

“Oh, if you use the county truck you shouldn’t have any trouble. Not much traffic.”

“All right.”

“Better get started.” Margate scribbled down an address and gave me some money. I turned.

“Be careful now,” he warned me. “And watch Gerymanx. He’s a wild one when he gets loose. Got ambitions, he has. And he’s too friendly. Keep him out of mischief and when he gets through bring him right back.

Whatever you do, don’t let him get into Droopy’s Tavern next door. He’s fond of the grape. We caught him that way, while he was drunk.”

I hurried down the path. Trina called out to me from the pool. “Coming in for a swim, dear?”

“Can’t make it. Got to hurry into town.” I stopped and gave her a kiss. “See you later.”

She flipped her tail at me saucily and turned away.

Gerymanx was at the stable door. “Margate says you’re taking me in for a pedicure,” he greeted me. “That’s right.”

“You want a saddle?”

“No. You’re coming in on the truck. And no monkey business either,” I warned.

The centaur’s face fell. “That’s too bad. I thought we might have a little canter around the park before we went to the smith’s.”

“Nothing doing. Can’t afford to attract any attention.”

I pulled it out of the garage. It was a small job, but I was grateful for the enclosed sides on the compartment. They completely hid Gerymanx’s astonishing body from view. Only his tousled head was visible above the railing.

“Take it easy,” he called out.

I took it easy. Very easy. Every time we passed a car on the highway I slowed down and I did my best to avoid jolting my peculiar passenger. It was almost lunchtime when we pulled up at the old brick smithy on the outskirts of town.

I backed the truck lip to the door and walked inside.

THE blacksmith, who by the most appropriate coincidence was named Smith, came to the door. He was a broad shouldered man with a bald head and a ruddy complexion.

“I’ve got a job for you,” I began, hesitantly. “Gentleman in back there wants to be shod.”

Smith cocked his head at Gerymanx, then smiled.

“Oh—you’re from Mr. Margate. I understand. Bring him inside, there’s nobody around.”

I led Gerymanx down the loading platform and hurried him into the stables.

“Make it snappy will you?” I requested, nervously.

“Take about an hour,” Smith told me. “Why not go next door and have a bite of lunch?”

It seemed like a sound suggestion. I entered Droopy’s Tavern and sat down.

Mr. Droopy—if that was his name—proved to be a short little man with red hair and a permanently bored expression on his unshaven features.

“Whatsa gonna be?” he asked.

I ordered a sandwich and a glass of beer. The sandwich was liberally salted. I had a second glass of beer. It must have been salted too, because my thirst increased. I had a third glass, a fourth.

All this time I could hear a merry clanging from the smithy next door. Smith was at work.

The ponding ceased abruptly. Smith came in through a side door with a pail.

“How’s it going?” I asked.

“Pretty hot work,” he told me. He turned to the bar. “Hey, Droopy—fill this up.”

Droopy took the pail over to the tap.

Smith went out again. In a few moments the clanging increased. Suddenly it halted once more. Smith re-entered with the empty pail.

“Very hot work,” he explained.

“Droopy—fill this up.”

Again he went out. Again the clanging rose. And in a remarkably short time, Smith walked heavily in with his bucket.

“Stremely hot,” he mumbled. “Fill ’er up, Droop.”

I watched Droopy fill the large pail. I ordered another beer myself. Smith stumbled out. More clanging. Then silence.

Smith wobbled through the door. “Heat’s terrific,” he hiccupped. “Gotta fill thish up, Droop, ol’ pal.” He went out. I listened intently. The clanging began again. But this time it held a peculiar cadence. A familiar cadence.

“Da-da-da-da dee-da, de-da de-da, de-da-da.

Where had I heard this before? I made for the side door and slipped into the smithy.

Gerymanx squatted on his haunches beside the blacksmith, whose left arm was locked around his neck. Both centaur and smithy held a hammer in their free hands. As I watched, they tapped merrily away on the anvil. Their raucous voices rose in a sour blending of the Anvil Chorus. The empty bucket, inverted, was perched on Gerymanx’s shaggy head.

“Hello, pal!” the centaur greeted me. I glared. “What is the meaning of this—this horseplay?” Gerymanx wobbled to his feet. “Wanna nother drink of beer!” he insisted. “Feet all shod. Now I wanna celebrate.”

“Gerymanx!” I yelled. “Come back here!”

But it was too late. The centaur trotted unsteadily through the side door and into Droopy’s Tavern.

He was up at the bar before the red-headed proprietor looked at him. From the waist up, it was a naked man who stared at the bartender and shouted, “Shoot the soup to me, Droop!”

“Where’s your clothes?” Droopy demanded.

“I’m masquerading,” the centaur temporized. I tugged at his elbow.

“Come on, get out of here.” I whispered.

“I don’t serve no naked persons,” Droopy declared. He stepped around the bar, then fell back. His eyes took in the horse body.

“Gawd!” he breathed.

Gerymanx turned what was meant to be a reassuring smile on the bartender.

“Told you I was masquerading, didn’t I?” he explained.

“Well, I don’t like it.” Droopy turned to me. “Get the blazes outta my joint.” he demanded. “And take this horse’s—whatever it is—‘with you!”

It was an ill-chosen moment for the entry of another couple. They lurched into the tavern; a tall, flashily-dressed man and an obviously befuddled woman. They stared incredulously at Gerymanx.

“Holy Moses!” muttered the man. “Do you see what I see?”

“Gawd, Harry, it’s a mounted policeman.” The woman peered tipsily at the centaur.

“What’d he do with his clothes?”

“And where’s his legs?” The man quavered. “He’s a horse!”

Gerymanx wheeled, offended. “Who you think you’re talking to?” he bridled.

“A talking horse,” the woman amended. “Harry, we better lay off the stuff for awhile.”

“Lay off me, that’s what you should do.” Gerymanx tried to prance and stumbled unsteadily. His hooves clattered against a cuspidor.

“I bet his mother was frightened by a merry-go-round,” the woman continued.

“Oooh—look out!”

FOR Droopy had rounded the bar, bearing a baseball bat. He bore down on Gerymanx with an oath.

“I’ll learn ya to horse around in my dump,” he grated. “What you think this is, a livery stable?” He lifted his bat menacingly.

Gerymanx wheeled. His forefeet rose. Droopy sailed over the bar. With an inhuman neigh, the centaur dashed forward. His charge carried him through the door. I raced after him.

In his drunken fury, the centaur careened into the street. By some unfortunate mischance a milk-wagon was standing beside our truck. The mare between the shafts looked up, startled.

At the sight of Gerymanx she neighed coyly. A slow blush spread over her equine cheeks. Gerymanx whinnied. Suddenly the mare's eyes gave a flicker of apprehension as they rested on the centaur's human torso. With a shrill, indignant squeal she dashed forward, carrying the wagon with her. There was a grinding crash as the wagon tipped sideways—right into our truck.

At the same moment Droopy emerged from the tavern. Up the street the milkman dropped his bottle-rack with a clatter and started to run our way.

"Now you've done it," I panted. "Wrecked the truck, too!"

"Get on my back," Gerymanx mumbled. The shock had sobered him. "We'll make a run for it."

I mounted hastily.

"Hang on to my neck."

I hung.

"Here we go."

We went.

The centaur's hooves struck sparks from the brick as he raced down the street. I clung to him for dear life.

"Whee!" he yelled. "This is more like it!"

A glance showed me that our pursuers were gathered in a knot around the milk wagon and truck.

"What a mess," I groaned. "How'll we ever get back?"

"I'll carry you."

"On top of the load you're carrying already?"

Gerymanx laughed.

"I feel great," he snorted over his shoulder. "Great. Let's go annoy some street cleaners."

"We're going home. Right now."

"Oh, don't be a wet blanket! I want to have fun. Let's go down to Saratoga. Maybe you could enter me in a race."

I allowed this revolting suggestion to go unanswered.

"Take me home," I commanded. "But—"

"Listen, Gerymanx," I said, slowly. "You've got a pretty soft berth there at Margate's, and you know it. If you don't behave, I'll fix you."

"What do you mean?"

"I'll tell Margate to sell you to an ice dealer. Then you'll have to pull a wagon all day long, and yell, 'Ice for sale' into the bargain." Gerymanx's pace slackened.

"All right," he grumbled. "All right."

"Stick to the side road now," I cautioned.

He did. It was a slow trip. We hid out behind billboards whenever I spotted a car ahead or behind us.

It was almost twilight when we cantered through the gate and up the drive.

"That's about enough excitement for one day," I sighed.

But—

CHAPTER VI

"COME right in!" Margate urged, standing on the steps. He waved his arms expansively. "Me too?" Gerymanx asked.

"Of course. Wouldn't be a party without you."

"But I'll track up the carpet—"

"Track away! We're going to celebrate tonight."

"What is all this?" I inquired. Margate's flushed little face held a slightly tipsy grin.

"Great news! Captain Hollis is back, and the trip's a success."

"Fine. Where is he?"

"He called from the yacht basin. He's hired a truck and he ought to be up in few hours."

"I'm anxious to see what he's got."

"You wouldn't be if you knew what it was." Margate snickered. "But come on, let's go inside and have a drink. I'm in the mood." Gerymanx clattered after Margate and I followed.

The house was brilliantly illuminated. Margate was following its example. I found all the guests in the parlor. Trina sat in a wash tub.

Mr. Simpkins was up and about. Jory, in his more or less human form, was busily mixing drinks.

“Success!” Margate proposed, passing glasses to the centaur and myself.

“How about some supper?” I suggested.

“Help yourself.” Margate indicated a row of bottles.

I shrugged. He was too far gone to argue with. I sat down next to Trina and tried to get into the spirit of things.

I didn’t succeed. Perhaps they were all too far ahead of me. Perhaps it was instinctive premonition. Maybe it was just the rotten sandwich I’d had at the tavern. Whatever it was, I was the skeleton at the feast. I couldn’t get in the mood at all.

When Gerymanx began riding Mr. Simpkins around on his back I regarded it as so much horse-play. Trina, noticing my dour face, turned away and began to flutter her eyelashes at Margate.

Jory, who had been taking a drink for himself every time he mixed for anyone else, soon lost all control. He charged right in front of us, and began running around the room on his paws. Everyone seemed to get a great kick out of the spectacle, but it gave me the chills.

Margate was maudlinly solicitous.

“Whassa matter?” he demanded.

“Come on, have a drink.”

“No thanks.”

“All right. Spoil the party. Go ahead.”

I forced a smile. “I’m pretty tired. Think I’ll hit the hay.”

“Whassat? Aren’t you gonna wait up to see the nice new specimen Captain Hollis’ gonna bring to the party? No welcoming committee?”

“I guess not.”

“All right, then.” Margate shrugged, and nearly fell over. “Get me bucket full of whiskey,” he called. Gerymanx trotted over.

"Bucket of whiskey? What for?"

"Myrtle isn't here. Gonna take it out and splash it all over her roots."

That was enough for me. I went upstairs to my room and climbed in bed.

Downstairs I could hear the murmurs from the parlor. The party was getting wild. I didn't like it. For the first time I was really ready to consider my situation. After all, this sort of thing couldn't go on forever. Trina was a nice girl, but you don't walk up the aisle with a mermaid. Mr. Simpkins was very nice, for a vampire, and Jory was an amiable enough werewolf. But we'd never be close friends. And being jockey to a centaur isn't exactly a recommendation to future employers. A man is known by the company he keeps.

If this kept up, people would soon be pointing their finger at me for an incubus, or something.

I'd better have a talk with Margate soon, I decided. Yes, Margate would have to let me go. I was a little worried about him, anyway. It was hard to say what new monstrosity Hollis was bringing—but it would complicate matters. All this secrecy, and the special room in the cellar, now; this meant something pretty outlandish.

And there was Margate, whooping it up downstairs. Happy as a kid with a new toy. And just as irresponsible. Irresponsible! That was it. That's what the matter was with the whole crew. They couldn't cope with life. They needed a nursemaid. Being fantasies, they weren't able to face realities.

Oh well, In the morning, now—I fell asleep.

I HAD the damnedest dream. It seemed to me that something sneaked into my room. It had Trina's hair and Jory's face, and it lumbered along on four hooves like Gerymanx. Somehow I got the idea that it had Mr. Simpkin's missing teeth and it wanted to bite me. All the while it came closer it was laughing like Margate himself. I tried to move, but couldn't. It squatted right on top of me and grabbed at my throat. Its mouth opened.

I woke up.

Strong hands were closing around my neck.

"What the—"

The hands relaxed.

"Wake up!" boomed a voice. It was Captain Hollis.

"How'd you get here?"

"I made it." The blind man was panting. "I had to get you. Come on."

I sat up. "What's the matter?" I yawned. "When did you get in?"

"About half an hour ago. Around midnight. But never mind. You've got to help me get them out! You've got to. You're the only one left."

"Where's Dave?"

"Dave's—'gone."

"What do you mean?"

"When we captured it. He got bit. Buried him at sea." The captain's hurried tones reached me as he jostled me toward the door.

"Tell me what happened," I muttered, as we went down the hall. "Where is everybody?"

"They're in the cellar. With it."

"With what?"

"Don't ask questions. That's what finished them. They were siting around drunk when I got in. I carried it into the cellar in a packing crate. But I passed Myrtle, and she's gone too."

"I don't understand."

We moved across the deserted parlor. I snapped on lights as we went. Hollis came after me, cane tapping.

"Don't try to understand," he whispered. "I couldn't stop them. They had to take a peek. Margate forgot everything. Said he wasn't afraid, dammit, and it was his after all. The whole crew made for the cellar."

"Come on." I went on through the kitchen. "They're all down there?"

"Yes."

"But what happened to them? What's the matter? What must I do?"

"Try and get them out. Think of a way."

"What's that?"

I flattened myself against, the wall of the dark staircase. A figure padded through the level below.

"Where?"

"Listen—footsteps."

"Jory. I know those paws."

It was Jory. The wolf was slinking down the cellar corridor.

"Jory—wait!" I called. He didn't look around.

We followed.

The wolf made straight for the door at the end of the hall. The metal-covered door. It stood ajar. His muzzle forced it wider. The gray body moved in.

"Stop—" Hollis began.

I heard a howl. Just one howl. A howl that rose, and then froze in midair on its highest quaver. After that, silence.

"It got him," Hollis whispered.

I moved forward.

Hollis clutched my arm. "Wait. Don't go in there."

"But you say they're all in there. You want me to get them out with you."

"I know. But you mustn't go in now. Not like that."

I faced the doorway. "Quit talking riddles. I'm going in."

Hollis held me.

I began to stare at the slight opening where the door hung ajar. It was dark beyond, but not so dark. A sort of subdued light filtered through. A light that didn't dissipate the darkness, but seemed to be a part of it. A stronger part.

IT WAS a violet, but sharper than a distinct color. Radiant. Like the reflection of a million Christmas tree ornaments. Gaudy. Alluring.

Then I felt it. The urge to enter. I wanted to see that light. It was like the ray emanating from a great jewel.

I brushed the captain's hand away.

“Let me go.” I muttered. “I want to go on.”

Wriggling from his grasp. I darted forward. I opened the door.

With a grunt, Hollis lunged. His fist caught me in the eye. I reeled back. His other fist lashed out. I stumbled, my hands covering my face.

“What in blazes—”

I reeled, steadied myself, took my hands away. Darkness.

“Hollis, you fool—you’ve blacked my eyes for me!”

“I know. Now go in!”

I groped my way through the door. He followed.

We stood in darkness. Two blind men, in a room filled with a violet light.

“Where are we?”

I groped along the wall. The room was silent. Too silent. “Jory! Trina! Where are you?” I whispered. “Margate!” No answer. I stumbled forward, hands outstretched.

I touched something. Something cold. My hands flew back. But there was no sound, no movement. I stretched my fingers forward once more. Again they rested on a cold surface. A hard surface.

I ran them along, tracing an all too familiar outline. Hair. A face. Trina’s hair and face. But hard and cold. Cold as—marble.

“She’s stone!”

“Of course. They’re all stone. All of them.”

I moved on. Another figure. I almost collided with it. It was a standing man. Bristly hair.

“Margate.”

Hollis sighed behind me.

“That’s why we both had to come in, dammit. To lift them out. They’re too heavy.”

“But Hollis—what is it? What did this?”

“The thing,” the captain answered.

My fingers fumbled toward a third figure.

“What thing?” I asked.

My fingers came to rest, and found the answer.

This surface was cold too, but it wasn't motionless. My hands moved over a long neck; and then up into an icy tangle. Hair.

But the hair moved, too. It was thick, horribly thick, in solid coils. Coils that suddenly came to life, writhing forth with a rustling.

Then I heard the hissing, felt the hair coiling around my wrist, jerked my hand away in frantic haste.

"Serpents!" I muttered.

"Get back!" Hollis yelled. "It's the thing—that damned Gorgon—the Medusa!"

As the hissing rose to a shrill crescendo I turned and ran blindly out of the cellar room.

CHAPTER VII

THAT'S the way it was.

It must have been over an hour before Hollis argued me into going back with him to get them out. I consented, finally, and we went to work.

They must have weighed at least three hundred pounds apiece. Gerymanx we had to slide across the floor—too heavy to lift. It was all we could do to keep him from chipping.

Two blind men, carrying statues. We made it, though. Until at last there was only the hissing thing.

We locked the door on it. It couldn't walk, of course. I wanted to burn the place, but it would cause trouble later on.

Hollis and I had a long talk. He wouldn't tell me much more about his voyage. Or about the charts and directions Margate gave him. I know he found it somewhere close to Crete, and that's all. He had to go into the cave alone—being blind, it couldn't harm him. It was after he had it out that Dave reached into the sack and one of the snakes bit him.

I shuddered over my own narrow escape when I heard that.

"Poor Dave," Hollis grunted. "Mebbe it was just as well. Boss had a later job for him. Going after one of these sirens—that's what you call them. Because he was deaf and couldn't hear it."

He wouldn't tell me anymore.

So there we were.

"We'll have to get some sleep," Hollis told me. "Then we can figure something out."

But in the morning there was nothing figured out. I could see a little, though my eyes were puffy and swollen. I got another nasty shock when I looked at the statues we dragged out.

Usually I admire life-like work, but these things were too damned life-like to suit me. Or to suit themselves, I suppose. Trina was lovely, though. It broke my heart to look at her. And Gerymanx looked quite imposing. Margate had one hand stuck out straight, as though to steady himself. Jory and Mr. Simpkins were both caught in mid-howl. Their mouths were still open.

"Now what do we do?" Hollis groaned. "We can't go away and leave that Medusa thing down there alive."

"Why leave it alive?" I asked. "We can kill it."

He laughed sarcastically.

"That's what you think," he told me. "It won't die."

"But Perseus killed one."

"Who?"

"A Greek warrior. He had some kind of sword—"

"Baloney. It's still alive, ain't it? This Percy-what's-his-name must have been kidding somebody along."

"Never thought of that."

"Well, think of it, then. I know it won't die. Because I tried it myself."

"You did?"

"Sure. After it got Dave. I pumped six shots into the thing."

"You didn't!"

"You bet I did, dammit. And on the voyage back—two of the boys blundered onto it down in the cabin. Snoopers. It got them both. After that the rest went to work. The cook took a knife to it, from the rear. No result. Except that it turned around. I cooked the rest of the trip."

"It won't die, huh?"

"That's right."

This was a prettier problem than I'd expected. I looked at the stone faces around me. No solution there. But there must be a solution. I couldn't run off and leave that thing down in the cellar. Somebody would investigate sooner or later. And then—more statues. "I'm going down there again."

"Oh, no you don't. You can see now." I'd forgotten that little detail. I could see. I stared at my puffy eyes in the mirror.

Then I got it.

"Wait for me. I've found the way out."

"Not me. I'm heading for that yacht, and I'm not coming back."

"But Captain—"

He tapped off. I was left alone. I acted fast. I found what I was looking for and went downstairs.

It was hard work unlocking the cellar door. It was harder work to nerve myself up to going in. The violet light shed its evil radiance through the chink of the keyhole.

But there was no choice. I opened the door and walked in.

The Medusa was against the wall in the center of the room. Alone, in Gorgonic glory. I heard the rustling whisper of the coiled tresses.

It didn't stop me.

I walked forward, holding the object I'd brought right squarely in front of my face. It was a shield. "Hey!" I called.

The Gorgon wouldn't understand English. But this didn't matter. Just so long as I attracted attention.

"Hey—look!"

I was almost on top of it. But it looked. It must have looked.

Because I heard the damnedest hissing shriek that ever issued from the lips of nightmare. Whether it was the Gorgon or the serpents in its hair I don't know.

That wail rose up as the Gorgon stared, and then there was silence.

After that, I stuck out my hand. I felt the cold face. The cold stony face.

It had worked.

I dropped the object I was holding. It shattered there on the floor. But I didn't need it any more. Nor Perseus' sword.

I'd killed the Gorgon in the only possible way. I turned it to stone by showing it its own face in the mirror. So—

THERE it is. I've got two choices now. I can go back to the employment agency and try to get another job. Something quiet and peaceful, like ditch-digging or assembly work in a boiler plant.

Or I could stay here and take care of my statues. I smashed the Medusa without looking at it. Used a crowbar. The others I have upstairs.

Margate has no relatives, so I might as well make myself at home. Let's see now—Trina would look good decorating the pool. Gerymanx would do for the foot of the staircase. I could make a gallery with Margate and Simpkins. As for Jory—I've got just the place for Jory.

I think that's the best solution, after all. Of course, I'll never touch anything that Margate dabbled in.

Which reminds me. That bottle, with the djinn inside. Maybe I can get rid of that, too.

CHAPTER VIII

AFTER a few days I stopped fingering bottles and began to drink from them. For Margate had a stock of fine liquor in his cellar, right next to the coffin that once housed Mr. Simpkins, the vampire.

Who can blame me? I was so lonely! Lonely for a sight of my unusual friends. I used to brush the statues every day with loving care. Particularly the statue of Trina the mermaid. Ah, there was a girl! I sighed when I thought of her, and the wonderful times we'd spent together. She and I would sit in the magic moonlight and I would toss her a fish. The sight of her piquant face as she twisted her neck and caught the fish in her mouth—it haunted me with wistful poignancy.

A man can stand only so much of such moon-drenched memories. I had to do something.

Of course, I could have left the mansion and sought a job elsewhere. But if I went away, who would brush the dust from the faces of my stone friends? Into what unsympathetic hands would I entrust the statues? I couldn't bear the thought.

SO I stayed. Stayed and studied.

Studied sorcery in the great black library of Julius Margate. Studied sorcery in the shadowed silence of dust-shrouded shelves.

I pored intently through endless pages, peered at passages in musty, iron-girdled tomes, perused with a perilous purpose.

For I was seeking a spell—an evocation—a rune or incantation—a rite or ritual—whereby I could summon my friends to animate life again. I sought to shatter that shroud of stone that swathed their souls.

Somewhere I must stumble across a solution, a means to kindle living flesh from marble. A mystic Pygmalion, I sought the formula to evoke a half-dozen Galateas.

There must be a way!

I read, and shuddered. Here and there were hints. Only a linguist could hope to translate Greek, Latin, medieval French and German, Sanskirt, Arabic and Hebrew.

Once translated, only a devotee of mantie arts would risk his soul to perform the dark offices necessary to conjure up Those who might grant the baleful boon of forbidden life.

But I searched. Day after day night after night. When the autumnal skies were black as my despair, I read on. When the ravening winds howled as mournfully as the sighs that rose in my throat, I pondered over the yellowed, crumbling pages.

The wings of ancient evil brushed my face and left deep lines etched about my eyes but I read on. I sat till dawn forever seeking a solution for my dark desires.

Seated one night in the study, I heard a knock on the great outer door.

I rose, startled. Wryly, I thought of Poe's Raven. But dismissing the absurd fancy with a grin, I shook off my bemusement and stalked down the hall.

As I went striding along, blood flowed back into my cramped limbs. I began to feel a little foolish about the whole thing.

I was going to see another human face finally, and I was self-conscious about the way I'd been spending my time.

More than that, I experienced a curious elation. I didn't know who in the world would be knocking on Julius Margate's door around midnight, but anyone would prove a welcome visitor to me. I thirsted for companionship.

Just the mere act of answering the door brought my spirits up with a bound.

I unchained the door, fumbled with the lock, threw the door open wide.

There was a sudden swoop.

A broomstick hit me in the face.

Riding the broomstick was a witch!

CHAPTER IX

I LAY flat on my back and stared up as the witch swooped into the hallway on her broomstick.

"Whoa, there," muttered the witch, and the broomstick clattered to a halt on the floor. The witch climbed off slowly. A dog and a cat jumped down from the shaft of the broomstick behind her. The witch dumped a large satchel on the floor.

All the while, I stared, recognizing her for what she was. Oh, she was a witch, all-right! The broomstick proved it—and so did the beaked nose, the wrinkled face, the gray, disheveled hair.

My first impulse was to stay right where I was, on the floor. It seemed somehow safer there. But the witch gave me a withering glance.

"Up off the floor with you," she snapped. "Is that any way to greet a guest?"

She placed her broomstick neatly in the corner.

I rose and faced her, mumbling my name. I didn't have the courage to hold out my hand in greeting.

She took no notice of the omission. A smile revealed her toothless gums.

"I am Miss Terioso," announced the witch. "An old friend of Julius Margate's."

"Is that so?" I answered, brilliantly.

"Used to see him around at covens," the witch explained.

"Covens?"

"Witch Sabbats," Miss Terioso enlightened me.

"But I didn't know he went in for such things."

"Oh, it was just a hobby with him. He dabbled a bit in witchcraft. Dabbled in everything, did Julius Margate. A bit of a dabbler and a bit of a babbler. Eh?"

Miss Terioso laughed. Some of the more sadistic radio advertisers might have liked that laugh for a spot announcement. I didn't care for it, myself.

"Aren't you going to ask me in?" she demanded. "Where's your courtesy, young sir?"

I indicated the parlor with a weak gesture. Miss Terioso's bent figure crept across the hall. She turned an evil profile toward me, and I'll swear she looked like something only a vulture would love. A mother vulture, at that.

“By the way,” she screeched, “better get some milk tor my dear pets here. My familiars, dear little lambs.”

I stared at the snarling, mangy dog and the hissing, scrawny black cat. They padded towards me stealthily.

HASTILY, I backed into the hall and ran to the kitchen. Returning with a saucer of milk, I found the witch and her two familiars in the parlor under the lamplight.

“That’s a courteous young man,” approved Miss Terioso. “Let them sup on milk. Of course it’s not as good as the real red stuff, but it’s better than nothing. Eh?”

I nodded, but the last half of the nod was a shiver.

“Look at the darlings,” commanded the witch. “My two sweet lovelies!”

“What are their names?” I asked, just as if I wanted to know.

“I call the cat Fido and the dog is named Puss,” she told me.

“Very nice,” I answered.

The witch sat down and raised her legs. With a shock I noticed that she was wearing slacks under her black skirt.

“Those slacks—” I began.

She giggled softly, like a wounded tigress.

“What’s wrong with them?” she demanded. “Nothing immodest about slacks, young sir! I have to wear them. I’m certainly not going to ruin a good pair of silk stockings riding a broomstick.”

This sounded logical.

“As it is, I’m worried about a straw shortage for my broom,” Miss Terioso complained. She opened her big satchel and took out a woolen knitting bag and two knitting needles.

“Do you knit?” I asked.

She giggled again. “Not exactly.”

Reaching into the knitting bag she extracted a tiny wax mannikin and began to stick her knitting needles into its body.

"Just a poppet," she explained. "Do you mind if I work while we talk?"

"Not at all," I gulped.

She put the poppet away and reached into the big satchel again. When her hand emerged again it was clutching something.

A human arm!

She reached in again and drew out a leg. A shapely leg, but a severed limb, for all that.

"Murderess!" I choked.

Miss Terioso smiled. "Flatterer!" she cooed. "I haven't really murdered anyone in years! No, young sir. These are not human limbs. They are the limbs of a window dummy. Here."

She began to bring out more appendages from her satchel. Another arm, another leg. A torso. And finally, a lovely head with a red wig.

Expertly, she fitted the various parts together. Soon a complete window dummy stood before us. A very pretty redheaded window dummy—distinctly female.

"Just a notion of mine," Miss Terioso explained. "I began to think that my poppets were too small to really get delicate work into them with the needles. So I bought this window dummy. It's still a wax figure, but a life-size one. Clever, eh?"

"Clever is no word for it," I said. And it wasn't.

Suddenly Miss Terioso shrugged.

"But let us get down to business, then," she declared. "I am here for a definite reason. I want Julius Margate."

"You can't see him." I spoke too rapidly to be cautious about it. "You can't see him. He's turned to stone."

The witch grinned.

"I know. I know all about it.

He's stone and the rest of his freaks are statues, too. And I want him."

"You want his statue?"

"Yes."

Was I crazy, or did Miss Terioso blush slightly?

"I—I used to have a crush on the old fool," she explained. "I'd like to have him around for sentimental reasons."

Somehow this didn't sound convincing. She looked about as sentimental as a barracuda.

There was more here than met the eye. I decided. So I also decided on a little strategy.

"By the way, Miss Terioso," I began. "Before we get down to details—would you care for a little refreshment?"

The witch simpered. "Don't mind if I do, young sir. Have you a bit of human—" She checked herself hastily. "No, I don't suppose you would," she sighed.

"Be right back," I promised.

AND I was. I went down to the cellar, rummaged around, and emerged with a fifth of Irish whiskey and two glasses. Bearing the refreshments back to the parlor, I poured out two neat shots.

Miss Terioso drained her glass.

I refilled it.

Miss Terioso drank the second as a chaser, so I refilled it again.

"Very pleasant," she told me. "I enjoy something mild for a change."

"One of Margate's prize bottles," I remarked.

"Speaking of bottles," she interrupted, "I meant to tell you this before. I not only want to buy Margate and the other statues, but that geni in the bottle as well. He has a geni in a bottle hasn't he?" I admitted it. "But what I want to know," I said, filling her glass for the fifth time, "is what you want with those statues."

She drank. I refilled her glass. "I told you," she repeated. "I am sentimental about the old son of a poltergeist. I'd like to have him around to look at. Eh?"

The liquor was working. The witch was getting slightly tipsy. I refilled her glass once more and proceeded artfully.

"Come now," I coaxed. "We're friends, aren't we? You can tell me the truth. What do you really want with those statues?"

"Ha!" cackled Miss Terioso. "He's so artful, this kind young sir. Me thinks he wants me to betray the fact that I intend to re-animate those statues myself and bring them back to life. But he'll never squeeze a word about it from me, he won't! Eh?"

I smiled and pressed my fingers together judiciously before my face.

"Suppose someone wanted to bring the statues back to life," I said, just as if I'd never heard her maunderings. "Would it be possible through sorcery?"

"Anything is possible through sorcery, my pet," said the witch. "If one is willing to pay the price." She cackled, grabbed the bottle, and clawed it to her scrawny bosom.

"Now the price for a fine young man like you would be high," she mumbled. "But an old hand like myself—blast you, there are ways and means of paying very little. Of striking bargains, as it were. I should conjure a demon . . . a friendly one, of course . . . and I should not sell my soul. I could not, for I sold it long ago. Long, long ago."

The witch began to sing Long, Long Ago in a voice like a tugboat's whistle. I coughed discreetly.

"Eh? It's the problem of animating those statues, isn't it, dear sir?" Miss Terioso smiled. "I have a sort of due bill on Hell, so to speak. There are certain powers and perquisites coming to me. I should just summon my demon, ask the boon, and the statues would be warm flesh and blood in the twinkling of an owl's eye!"

She drank again.

"But how do you summon demons?" I demanded.

"You hold a Black Mass," she answered. Everybody knows that." Suddenly a look of crafty reticence spread over her wrinkled countenance. "But I'm talking too much.

I see that now. I'll not tell you how to hold a Mass to Satan, never fear. I'd be such a silly to tell you, eh?"

I was prepared for this. For suddenly I saw a way of bringing back my friends. So I proceeded deliberately about my appointed task.

"You can't fool me," I mocked. "You and your talk about Black Masses and witchcraft." I rose and smiled. "You and your ridiculous little wax figures. And this foolish looking window dummy here!" I tapped the red-headed dummy with an accusing finger.

"You aren't a witch," I told her. "Just a broken-down dressmaker, I'm thinking. All this is nonsense."

She rose to the bait.

"Nonsense, is it?" screeched Miss Terioso. "I'm not a witch eh? I, the most famous sorceress in three continents and four dimensions?"

"Black Mass," I chortled, scornfully. "That's horseplay of another color."

Miss Terioso gulped the last drink in the bottle and lurched to her feet. She stared at me with bloodshot eyes.

"You can't hold a Black Mass," I snickered.

"Oh, can't I?" snarled the witch. "I'll show you! I'll not only hold a Black Mass—I'll blessed well hold one with stripes if you like!"

CHAPTER X

MISS TERIOSO swayed out into the wide hallway. I followed at her rundown heels, gasping in mingled apprehension and excitement.

Then we stood in the huge room that held the statuary. I lit a lamp and revealed the stony images of my friends. There was pot-bellied little Julius Margate, his face a marble mask of bewilderment. Gaunt Mr. Simpkins hovered, his false teeth forever frozen in an embarrassed grin. Jory, as a stone wolf, held a petrified paw in the air. Gerymanx was a noble Grecian centaur and looked somehow natural in stone. And Trina made a beautiful mermaid. She had a gorgeous shape—plenty of these and those, and fins, too.

I sighed.

The witch wheezed alcoholically in my face.

“Think I can’t do it?” she muttered.

“A Black Mass? It’s ridiculous,” I told her. “I understand you must draw a pentagon in blue chalk, and use holy wafers and sacramental wine. And you intone the Lord’s Prayer backwards in Latin, and use the body of a naked woman for an altar.”

“Right,” said the witch.

“Well, you haven’t got the facilities, so that’s that!” I jeered.

Miss Terioso tittered drunkenly.

“I’ll fix that,” she promised. “You’ve got some chalk, haven’t you, dear boy? Margate must have some around for his own spells.”

I rummaged through the library and returned with a stub of blue phosphorescent chalk.

I found Miss Terioso on her way back from the kitchen, laden with packages.

“Here’s the chalk.”

She set to work on hands and knees, drawing a glowing blue line. Panting, she arose.

“That’s no pentagon,” I exclaimed.

“Ran out of chalk,” mumbled the witch. “It doesn’t matter, really.”

She faced me and began to chew on something.

“Holy wafer?” I asked.

“No,” said Miss Terioso. “Haven’t got any. This is a graham cracker. Same thing, almost.”

She drank something out of a cup.

“Sacramental wine?”

“Coca-cola,” the witch explained. “They will probably never know the difference.”

Suddenly she ran tipsily out of the room and returned with the window dummy, which she placed across two chairs.

"We have no naked woman for an altar, so the dummy will have to do," said Miss Terioso. "Here goes for the invocation."

As the phosphorescent chalk glowed in the darkness, the witch crouched over the window dummy mumbling sonorously.

"Wait a minute," I interrupted. "That doesn't sound like the Lord's Prayer backwards in Latin."

"Don't remember the Latin," sighed the witch. "I'm using pig-Latin."

She continued. After a moment she began to make passes with her clawlike hands. Her voice deepened, then rose shrilly. I recognized rumbling syllables and shrieking vocables.

The cadence was rhythmic. In my fancy the blue lines of the pentagon began to dance in pulsation with her pronouncements.

It wasn't fancy. The lines moved. The room swayed. Her voice shrieked.

Miss Terioso turned blue in the face. Her drunken mumblings slurred oddly. She began to sway.

The sight was very impressive. She looked just as though she had been given a Mickey Finn.

With a supernatural belch, Miss Terioso slid to the floor in a dead faint.

"Out like a light," I sighed. "Oh well, I might have known the old hag couldn't do it."

"Do what?"

"Why, that she couldn't—hey!" I wheeled suddenly as I realized that a strange voice had addressed me.

Staring across the blue line I saw the strange owner of the strange voice.

This time I almost slid to the floor.

But not quite. I gazed at the presence on the other side of the pseudo-pentagon.

Was it a demon?

If demons have red, scaly bodies like gigantic lizards, and semi-anthropomorphic limbs, slick hairless skulls, and faces like grinning death

—then it was a demon, all right.

Or a demon, all wrong.

Because despite this terrifying aspect, there was something horribly bedraggled about this apparition.

HIS eyes were bloodshot. His checks were scratched. His arms hung limply, and his chest rose and fell in despairing gasps. I noticed that his tail was dragging.

"Go ahead," said the deep voice, in accents that congealed my vertebrae. "Go ahead, make sport of me! You accursed human midge! You enscorcelled scum, you foul thaumaturgical imposter! You're not fit to be impaled on a spit for a weenie roast in hell!"

"What do you mean?" I gulped.

"What do I mean? The infernal impudence of the nigromantic nincompoop! I mean you bungled the whole ceremony! You used the wrong materials, you gave the wrong accent to the invocations, you even left out part of the Gloric Chant!"

"But—"

"And what does that mean? I'll tell you what," snarled the demon, and his eyes flashed at 400 degrees Fahrenheit. "It means I was dragged bodily through five-dimensional space. It means I was twisted through the veritable warpings in the spatial continuum! I was bruised and battered and banged and buffeted, and nearly annihilated before I got here! My mundane simulacrum was almost impossible to assume.

"And why? Because an amateur sorceror like yourself didn't know how to call me. Why you don't know enough to raise the dead! Why don't you read the rule books?"

"Wait a minute," I temporized. "I didn't call you. She did—Miss Terioso, the witch. She was drunk and forgot a lot of things."

"Drunk eh?" said the demon, with a self-righteous smirk. "Serves her right. Never touch the stuff myself. Wine is a mocker."

I nodded.

The demon did an alarming thing. He thrust his head out on his rubbery neck. It stretched a good foot.

As he darted his skull forward and back restlessly, I diffidently jumped a yard to one side.

"Well, now that I'm here, what are you going to do about it?" demanded the demon. "Have I wriggled through the dimensions all for nothing? I want something to eat, something to kill, or something to bargain over."

"I'll bargain with you," I said boldly.

"You? The demon sniffed. "You aren't a sorceror. What can you offer me? Your soul?"

"I don't think so," I hesitated.

"Current rate of exchange is very favorable," said the demon suddenly all coaxing smiles. "I pay highest prices."

"Not interested," I insisted.

"Then I might as well go," the demon sighed.

Inspiration smote me.

"Wait a minute," I snapped. "I'll give you a wonderful trade. How would you like to own a geni?"

"A geni? You have a geni?" The glare on the demon's face registered red incredulity. "I doubt that very much."

"I have a geni in a bottle," I told him. "Wait right here and I'll be back in a flash with the flask."

He waited, and I was.

Barely a minute passed before I returned, bearing the curious old bottle from Margate's library. Within it gurgled the geni, like a shrunken mermaid.

The demon goggled.

"You have got one at that," he admitted. His eyes narrowed to cunning slits.

"What are you asking for it?" he purred.

"A boon."

"Be specific."

“I want these statues reanimated,” I said, waving my arm to embrace the stone images around me. “I want their souls, or life-force to return to flesh instead of stone.”

“That’s very difficult,” said the demon, thoughtfully. “Couldn’t you settle for something easier? How about a blonde? Lots of you magicians seem to go for deals involving blondes. A nice blond succubae, now, with big—”

“Never mind,” I insisted, “I want those statues alive.”

The demon shrugged. “I don’t know.”

“Think of the geni,” I said, shaking the bottle. “One of your own kind. A helpless prisoner in a bottle. How would you like to be shut up in a bottle, like—like an olive?”

The demon winced. I knew I had him.

“I am too soft-hearted,” he rumbled. “But I’ll do it. Or try to do it. A most unusual request, and there’s so much to arrange.”

“Get to work,” I said. “I’ll toss you the bottle in a moment.”

“Hold on,” advised the demon. “This is liable to be a bit messy.”

It was.

I didn’t mind the way the air changed colors as the demon crouched in the center of the room, croaking gutturally as he squatted like a malignant frog.

I didn’t mind the great quaking wind that rose to howl through my hair.

I didn’t mind the smoke and the flame.

But when the chandelier crashed from the ceiling and hit me on the head, I minded very much indeed.

The world went black and I went to sleep beside Miss Terioso on the floor.

There was a confused impression of a gigantic hand grasping the geni-bottle, a muffled illusion of smoke and shouting, and then I went out, like the proverbial light.

The next thing I knew I was awake, spitting out a mouthful of broken glass.

“What a hangover!” I whispered.

“Oh, yeah?” said a strange voice.

CHAPTER XI

I SAT up. Miss Terioso and the shattered chandelier still lay on the floor. But the demon had vanished from the chalk formation, and the bottle with the geni was nowhere to be seen.

I groped for the light, seeking the source of the voice.

Radiance flooded the room and I stared at the statues.

Statues no longer!

They were alive. I saw familiar flesh once more. The grotesque bodies of men and the wolf and the centaur and mermaid were moving.

I ran over to Trina. The beautiful mermaid with the lovely green hair stared up at me with a radiant smile.

“Trina, darling!” I whispered, taking her in my arms.

“Get away from me or I’ll kick your teeth down your throat with my hoofs!” boomed a gruff voice.

“But you have no hoofs, dear,” I laughed. “You’re a mermaid. You have a—”

“Don’t you call me ‘dear’, you oaf! I’m a centaur!” growled the voice.

I stepped back in dismay.

That voice—I recognized it—was the voice of Gerymanx the centaur! But it came from Trina’s body!

I rushed over to Gerymanx.

“Hello, my friend,” came the calm words. Again I recognized the voice from the centaur’s body. It was the voice of Julius Margate!

“Who—who are you?” I whispered.

The centaur smiled. “I’m Margate, of course. Who else would I be?”

I gulped. “You’re sure?”

“Of course.”

“Come here.” I grabbed the centaur’s arm and led the figure over to a full-length mirror.

“Take a look,” I suggested.

HE looked at him—at the horsebody projecting behind him. When he saw what he was dragging around in the rear, the man almost collapsed.

“But I’m Margate!” he wailed. “What am I doing in Gerymanx’s body?”

“What is Gerymanx doing in Trina’s body?” I asked.

“Who is in my body?” Margate suddenly yelled. He ran over to confront his body and reached out a cautious hand to grasp the chest.

“What are you reaching for, dearie?” lisped a high voice. “Be careful how you handle my trunk.”

“Myrtle!” whispered Margate. “Myrtle, the hamadryad.”

“Of course,” answered Myrtle. “Can’t you recognize my limbs?”

“What is all this?” demanded the rasping voice that had roused me from unconsciousness. I turned to face tall Mr. Simpkins.

“Why am I not a wolf?” demanded the voice. “Who stole my form? Why am I a wolf in My Simpkins’ clothing?”

It was Jory the werewolf, in the vampire’s body. As I expected, the vampire was now wearing the wolf-form instead.

“Is this a way for a self-respecting vampire to be?” groaned the wolf. “Going around on all fours like an animal?”

“Something terrible has happened,” I gasped. “You’re alive, but your souls got into the wrong bodies. The demon made a mistake. You’ve switched.”

Then I remembered. Gerymanx was in Trina’s body. But where was Trina?

I stared out the open window. Then I saw it—the tree, the tree of Myrtle the hamadryad. Trina had to be in the tree! It must have been transformed through the open window like the rest of the statuary.

Running across the room, I bounded out on the lawn and threw my arms around the tree-trunk.

“Trina,” I whispered. “Trina, darling!” There was no answer.

“Trina, speak to me!”

Not a leaf rustled.

I stumbled back into the room. “Trina,” I groaned.

“Here I am, darling!”

The familiar voice fired my blood.

I turned my head.

Coming toward me was—the red-headed window dummy!

She fell into my embrace, the lovely waxen figure, and we kissed.

I shuddered. She was alive—but still wax.

Now I understood. In the mixup, the window dummy, having, no soul, probably entered Myrtle’s tree. Trina entered the body of the window dummy.

So there we stood.

A vampire in a werewolf’s body, a werewolf in a vampire’s. A man in a centaur’s form, and a centaur in a mermaid. A mermaid in a window dummy, and a tree nymph in the shape of a man.

And I myself, in one hell of a mess!

MISS TERIOSO couldn’t have picked a worse moment to regain consciousness. Which is probably why she picked this moment.

The witch rose from the floor and her bleary gaze swept the room more thoroughly than her broom could have done the job. In a moment comprehension came to her.

“So you made your own bargain with the demon,” she scolded me. “Gave him the geni, I warrant? A clever young sir, aren’t you. I’ve a good mind to—”

Then she saw the face of Julius Margate.

Instantly a change swept over Miss Terioso. I remembered she had admitted having a crush on Mr. Margate—and her actions now confirmed the fact.

She simpered coyly, straightened her stringy hair, and assumed a smile such as one sees on the face of a particularly hungry crocodile.

“Why Julius my dear!” she gushed, advancing on Mr. Margate with a sickening leer. “I’m so glad to see you.”

“Keep your hands off me, you old cow!” shrilled a high voice.

Miss Terioso halted and stared at the man.

“Don’t look at me that way, you Walpurgistic wench!” said the voice from Margate’s body.

Miss Terioso, not realizing that Margate’s body was now in habited by Myrtle the hamadryad, was confused.

“Here I am,” called another voice. “It’s me, Julius Margate, over here.”

The witch turned to face the centaur. Her face was shock-proof, but her lips twitched.

“Don’t you recognize me, sugar?” asked Julius Margate, waving his tail coyly.

Miss Terioso gaped at the centaur.

“Who is making sport of me?” she snapped. “What sort of jest are you playing?”

“Nobody’s making fun of you,” insisted Margate. “Come on over and get-friendly. I’ll give you a ride around the block if you like.”

The witch froze. “I don’t want a ride around the block,” she announced. “I’m getting out of here.”

She swooped across the hall and returned with the cat and dog under her arm. She set her satchel and broomstick down.

“I’m leaving, baggage and broomstick,” sniffed Miss Terioso. “Oh, yes, I must take my window dummy, too.”

“Not me,” said Trina.

The witch goggled at the redheaded wax dummy.

“Did you speak?” she demanded.

"Of course. What's the matter with your ears, outside of their looks?" Trina replied.

"Something is very much wrong here," the witch declared.

"I've been trying to tell you," I said. I explained briefly.

Miss Terioso nodded.

"Nevertheless, the window dummy is mine. It's my poppet, and I shall pop off with it."

"Go fly your broomstick," shrilled Trina the mermaid. "And don't call me a dummy, you Halloween bag!"

"She's right," said Margate, from the centaur's body. "You have no claim on a soul. You'd better go now."

"You dare to order me out of your house?" screamed the witch.

"I dare to throw you out," said Margate.

Miss Terioso made for the door, hastily. She mounted her broomstick and turned.

"Very well," she sniffed. "Good riddance to all of you. And as for you, Julius Margate, you're just a—oh, go look in a rear-view mirror and see what you are!"

The door banged s-hut behind her.

THERE was an ominous silence.

I felt the danger of that silence. I knew my peculiar friends. They were bad enough to handle in their own weird bodies. But now that those bodies were all mixed up, I'd better do something in a hurry.

"You must be hungry after such an ordeal," I said. "Let's all go out to the kitchen and I'll whip up a snack to eat."

We did.

They ate ravenously. The sight of a mermaid eating oats and a centaur smoking a cigar rather spoiled my own appetite. And the clumsiness of all of them in their new forms did something to general table manners. But hunger ruled for a while.

Then they finished, and gloom reigned.

“This is a fine mess sighed Gerymanx. “What do we do now? Usually after a meal I go out for a brisk trot around the stable and grounds. But now I’m a mermaid. I can’t even canter.”

“I’d like to go out and have the birds perch on my limbs,” sighed Myrtle. “But I can’t, in this man’s body. It’s so difficult. I doubt if I can even get a robin to build a nest in my hair.”

“Don’t you dare put bird-nests in my hair,” yelled Margate, from the centaur’s body.

“Your hair?”

“That body you’re wearing still belongs to me,” Margate insisted. “I expect you to take good care of it.”

“What about me?” asked Jory, disconsolately. “I’d like to howl in the sunshine at dawn. But in a vampire’s body I’ll have to sleep all day in a musty old coffin.”

“That’s nothing,” responded Mr. Simpkins the vampire. “Just look at me in this wolf’s form! I’m afraid I’m going to shed all over the place. And I can’t seem to get the knack of changing back into a man! You’ll have to give me some lessons soon, Jory.”

“Your troubles are mild.” insisted Julius Margate. “How can I go out in polite society in a centaur’s body? It’s enough to give anybody a fright.”

Trina pouted at me from the window dummy’s body.

“Can I take a swim in the pool?” she whispered.

“No. Your wax will spoil,” I told her sadly.

“We’ve got to settle this problem somehow,” said Julius Margate. “Wonder if we could call up that demon again and make him put us in the right bodies?”

“Not without selling somebody’s soul,” I told my employer. “I’ve made the only trade I could, and from now on, souls are the articles of exchange. And I won’t sell my soul, I’ll tell you that!”

Margate shook his head.

"We'll have to figure it out," he declared. "It can't go on like this forever. It isn't natural for a werewolf to be a vampire, and a centaur to be mermaid."

"It isn't natural for a mermaid to be a window dummy either," said my red-headed companion. "I'm dying to be tearing a herring." Her words smote my heart.

"I'll think of something, folks," I promised. "Tomorrow night, when Mr. Jory wakes up at sundown in Mr. Simpkins' body, we can get together again and figure something out. Right now we all need sleep after this excitement." So, yawning at dawning, we went to bed.

I fell asleep as soon as my head hit the pillow. But I didn't dream.

The way things were going, I was having my nightmares when I was wide awake.

CHAPTER XII

"WE'VE got to do something, bright now!" insisted Julius Margate, over the supper table.

The heads of his bedraggled companions nodded in eager assent.

"I'm sick of sleeping in a coffin," said Jory the werewolf. "I want to go back to my dog kennel." He shot a malicious glance at Mr. Simpkins in his wolf's body.

Simpkins wagged his tail. "What about me?" he complained. "I turned into a man in the daylight but when the sun set tonight I became a wolf again. And I don't like it. I think I'm getting the mange." Gerymanx the centaur, in his mermaid form, propped both elbows on the table and sighed. "Being a mermaid is no fun, either," he declared. "I can't go near that swimming pool unless I get a pair of water wings.

"Imagine a mermaid who doesn't know how to swum!"

He started to expand on the theme, then turned in shocked surprise to survey the body of Julius Margate. Julius Margate's human body rose and began to divest itself of clothing.

“What goes on here?” I asked, in a startled voice.

“Oh,” said Myrtle the hamadryad, from within Margate’s body. “I’m just pruning off these clothes, that’s all. I can’t stand the pressure on my limbs.”

“Please, for the sake of decency,” I protested. “Wait a while. I’ll find a way to restore you all to your proper shapes.”

“Hurry, darling.” It was the voice of Trina in my ear. The wax dummy leaned close. “I do so want to kiss you,” said the girl, wistfully. “But every time I try it, my head falls off.”

“Yes, hurry up,” yelled Julius Margate, from the body of Gerymanx the centaur. “I’m afraid to visit the barber shop to get my tail clipped.”

“Too bad,” I sympathized.

“And that’s not all,” sighed Margate. “I wish you’d go and steal the witch’s broom and use it to sweep out the stable.”

“What?”

“Why don’t you go and visit the witch tomorrow? Persuade her to hold another Black Mass.”

“What do you mean?”

“Well, she has some kind of a due-bill on hell, hasn’t she? She can get the demon to switch us back into our regular bodies. Then we can be self-respecting mermaids and vampires and werewolves again.”

“Brilliant!” said Margate.

“But the witch is mad at us,” I objected.

“Then you must soften her up,” Margate told me “Make love to her, or something.”

“Make love to a witch? A dizzy old spinster like her?”

“She’s not so bad,” Margate lied. “She’s not exactly a spring chicken, either,” I answered. “She’s more like a vulture.”

“It’s the only way out,” Margate snapped “You’ll have to do it. You can’t let us down this way.”

I sighed and nodded.

Trina nibbled my ear with waxen lips. "Just remember," she whispered. "Make love to her, but no funny stuff. I get jealous so easily. Why it makes my wax melt to think of you in her arms."

"It makes my blood freeze to think of that," I replied.

"Even if you have ice-cubes in your veins, you must go through with it," implored Julius Margate. "Tomorrow you woo the witch." And so it was decided.

NEXT afternoon, after getting directions from Julius Margate I left the mansion on the hill and set out along a winding path through the woods to the house of Miss Terioso.

Carrying a basket on my arm, I approached the cottage feeling like Little Red Riding Hood on her way to Grandma's house.

Miss Terioso's cottage looked something like Grandma's house at that—except for the red and green smoke that poured from the crumbling stone chimney as I walked up the path.

The smoke assumed ghastly, billowing shapes, and I averted my eyes. I preferred to read the signs on the cottage lawn.

"MISS TERIOSO—BLACK, WHITE, & ALL COLORS OF MAGIC"

"LOVE PHILTRES. FORTUNES TOLD. PSYCHO-ANALYSIS"

"UNFAMILIAR SPIRITS KEEP OUT"

I knocked on the door, letting my trembling wrist provide the leverage.

Miss Terioso stuck her head out. "We don't want any," she said. "Oh, it's you, young sir. Step in, won't you?"

I would, and did.

There was a bearskin rug in the hallway. As I put my foot on it, it grunted horribly, and the gigantic head rose with gnashing teeth.

"Down, Bruno!" commanded the witch. The rug subsided, and regarded me through malevolent glass eyes.

I stood in the witch's cottage glancing around at the ancient furniture—1890 vintage, and typical of an old maid's home.

Miss Terioso resumed her seat by the fire and took up her knitting. She was silent, absorbed.

I looked at the placards on the walls. There was a Charter Membership in Local Coven Number 9, a neatly embroidered motto, decorated with mandrake roots, reading “A Fiend in Need Is a Fiend Indeed”.

Then I broke the silence.

“What are you knitting?” I inquired.

“Oh, just a shroud,” said Miss Terioso, brightly.

I coughed. “I’ve brought you a little present,” I coaxed.

Her eyes brightened. I handed her the basket. She opened the cover.

“What is it?” she asked.

“Just a little wax fruit.”

“Wax fruit?”

“To melt down into poppets,” I explained.

Miss Terioso favored me with a warm smile.

“How kind of you,” she gushed.

I turned on the charm. “I was so delighted to see you the other evening,” I said, sitting down. “I admired you greatly.”

“You did?” She positively simpered.

“Yes. I said to myself, ‘now there’s a girl with real high spirits about her,’ that’s what I said.”

“Flatterer! I usually consort with low spirits,” Miss Terioso gurgled.

“I was wondering if you’d care to have a date with me,” I ventured. “How about going out tonight?”

“Why, there’s no Sabbat tonight.”

“I wasn’t thinking of a Sabbat,” I answered. “Just a little stepping.

You know, hitting a few high spots.”

“You really want to?” beamed the witch.

She blushed. “Very well. But first I must go to the beauty parlor. I’ll drop you off at home on the way and then pick you up afterwards when we go out.”

Miss Terioso rose and bustled over to her broomstick.

I gulped.

"We're not going to ride that thing, are we?" I asked.

"Why, of course," she declared.

Trembling, I mounted the broomstick behind her. She opened the cottage door, muttered a few words under her breath and we were off in the twilight.

CHAPTER XIII

I DON'T know whether or not you've ever ridden a broomstick, but it's not an experience one is likely to forget. I don't like to think about that soaring sweep through dusk-driven skies. All I can say is that for my money, the broomstick will never replace the horse.

When I was finally dropped off—literally—at my destination—

Miss Terioso waved farewell and called that she would come back from the beauty parlor and pick me up again.

For several minutes I wondered if she would have to pick me up, actually, before I'd be able to stir. But after a time I groaned, stood up and hobbled into the house.

The gang bombarded me with questions.

"Did you see her?"

"What did she say?"

"Did you make a date?"

I answered definitely. "I'm taking Miss Terioso out to dine and dance this evening," I announced. "Margate, I'm borrowing one of your tuxedoes. And about $30 in cash."

Trina walked up to me, her wax arms swinging in agitation.

"I'm jealous," she confessed. "Take me with you as a chaperone."

"Impossible," I sighed.

"Then I'll go alone, with Myrtle in Margate's body," she declared. "I don't trust you with that baleful hag."

"I'll hitch up the station-wagon," Margate chimed in. "Then I'll harness myself to it and pull the rest of you into town."

I protested.

"Do you want to spoil everything? You'll make a terrible scene in human society! Leave everything to me," I argued.

"But—"

There was a thump from upstairs.

Miss Terioso had made a three-point landing on the roof.

"Get out of sight," I commanded. "Don't let her see you and arouse her anger. I'll skip upstairs and change and crawl out the skylight to join her. Now all of you stay here and behave. I'll have you back in your bodies before morning."

They scattered, and I scampered.

Five minutes later I joined Miss Terioso on the roof.

I stared at the vision in the starlight.

For Miss Terioso was changed. The magic of the beauty parlor had wrought a startling transformation.

This was no old crone who awaited me, but a radiantly lovely woman—a vivid brunette with lips red as love's own fire. Her eyes sparkled and she smiled with pleasure as she noted my reaction.

"Life in the old gal yet, eh?" she said. Her voice was low, husky.

I said nothing, but mounted the broomstick and put my arms around her. Her nearness was intoxicating.

We sailed up toward the stars. Her hair streamed in the wind, mingling with the moonlight.

I enjoyed the ride.

All incongruity was forgotten. By the time we landed on a fire-escape and clambered down to reach a nightclub entrance, we were chatting merrily.

We swept into the lobby of the club and Miss Terioso checked her broomstick in the cloakroom.

A waiter led us across the dancefloor to a table.

“Champagne,” I ordered.

I didn’t need it. I was intoxicated as I say, by her presence. But revolving drunkenly in the back of my brain was the consciousness of my purpose.

Soon I would artfully wheedle and cajole her into changing my friends back. But the evening was young now, and I could enjoy myself first. Enjoy her company. Gaze into those burning black eyes. Hold her flowery-fragrant fingers.

We lifted our glasses.

“Here’s to you,” murmured Miss Terioso.

“Here’s to—us,” I corrected.

“Yes,” she sighed.

We drank.

After that I tried to sit on her lap.

Now, thinking back, I know what must have happened. Miss Terioso was an old hand at the game.

She’d probably anticipated this, the old she-wolf, and slipped a love philtre into my drink.

But the effects were startling.

All at once I knew that I was madly in love with Miss Terioso. The thought of my friends, the thought of Trina—all was forgotten.

SHE gave me a demure glance and I held her hand and stared into her inscrutable eyes and I leaned forward over the table, and then I got hit in the head with a human leg.

Yes, a human leg sailed through the air and hit me on the back of the head!

That’s one way to sober a fellow up.

I turned quickly and stared!

Lying on the floor was a leg. With a shock, I recognized it. Trina’s leg, from the window dummy!

Employing my knowledge of trajectory I wheeled around and stared at a table across the way.

Sure enough, Trina had made good her threat! She sat at another table with Myrtle in Margate's body.

I collected my scattered wits hastily. Then, bending down, I collected the scattered leg, rose politely, mumbled an excuse to Miss Terioso, and stalked over to the table carrying the wax leg.

"Pardon me, madam, but I think you've lost something," I said, for the benefit of eavesdrop-, pers. Trina accepted the leg, bent down, fastened it on again, and winked.

"What the hell's the big idea?" I whispered furiously. "I thought I told you to stay home."

"We're going to keep an eye on you," Trina answered. "After getting an eyeful of that glamorous hag, I don't trust you any further than I can throw my limbs."

"We're all here," added Myrtle, from Margate's body.

"No!"

But as I glanced around, I saw Mr. Simpkins and Jory at another table, in each other's bodies. Jory's body had resumed human shape.

"Margate and Gerymanx are outside, in the centaur's and mermaid's bodies," Myrtle added. "They came-in the wagon."

"I hope to heaven they stay there," I sighed. "What if the customers saw them?"

It was a hideous thought. As things were, the situation was bad enough. No sooner had I uttered the words than I caught a snatch of conversation between Myrtle and a stranger at the adjoining table.

Myrtle, in Margate's body, had probably been drinking. The stranger certainly had. His little bloodshot eyes revolved woozily as he mumbled.

"Pardon me," sir," he hiccuped. "But that lady at th' table wish' you—has she got wooden leg, huh?"

"Sure," answered Myrtle, gaily.

"Mos' unusual," said the drunk.

“What’s unusual about that?” demanded Myrtle, suddenly argumentative. “Why shouldn’t she have a wooden leg? Me, I’m all wood!”

Under the influence of liquor, Myrtle forgot she was in Margate, and thought of herself as still being a hamadryad in a tree. But the drunken stranger didn’t know this. He peered incredulously.

“You’re all wood? he echoed.

“Of course,” said Myrtle. “Do you want to examine my trunk?”

“You’re crazy!” sneered the drunk, wobbling to his feet.

“I am not,” said Myrtle. “I can prove that I’m a tree. Why, I even have termites!”

“I wouldn’t brag about it sir.”

“Say, who are you calling sir?” shrilled Myrtle. “I’ll have you know I’m a lady! A hamadryad.”

The drunk stared at Julius Margate’s body.

“I wouldn’t admit such a thing,” he declared passionately.

“What’s wrong with that?” Myrtle flung back. “Some of my best friends are hamadryads! And if you don’t stop annoying me—I’ll have my girl friend throw her head at you!”

The drunk drew back in panic.

Mr. Simpkins, in Jory’s body, stalked over to the scene and quickly led Myrtle away in time to prevent mayhem.

Jory, in Mr. Simpkin’s body, quietly left the room.

Out of the corner of my eye, I saw Miss Terioso advancing on me. I kicked Trina’s waxen shin.

“Keep quiet from now on,” I ordered. “Nearly had a riot as it is. Now I’ll steer Miss Terioso away from here before she recognizes you.”

I turned, bowed to the advancing witch.

“Let’s dance,” I suggested.

I danced with the witch on the nightclub floor while my window dummy sweetheart regarded me with a smouldering light in her lovely glass eyes.

CHAPTER XIV

FORTUNATELY, I was dancing and didn’t see the scene in the outer bar. But I heard about it later—plenty.

Mr. Simpkins, in Jory’s body, had retired to the bar for a quiet and meditative drink.

“What’ll it be?” asked the bartender.

“Got any bl—give me Scotch,” said Mr. Simpkins, quickly, erasing his original thought.

The Scotch arrived. Simpkins paid for it with a $20 bill.

The sight of the greenback fluttering in the breeze acted as an unwitting signal to a tall blonde draped over the end of the bar. She uncoiled herself and advanced sinuously on Mr. Simpkins.

“You look sad, Mister,” she observed. “Are you lonesome?”

This remarkable technique overpowered Mr. Simpkins quite completely. He was pretty unworldly, being a supernatural entity.

“I am sad,” he sighed.

“Tell Olga what the matter is,” coaxed the blonde, summoning the bartender and ordering a Silver Fizz. “Why are you sad?”

“Well,” breathed Mr. Simpkins, “I used to be a vampire, but I’m not any more.”

Olga blinked. This stranger was pretty drunk.

“You know how it is,” he mournfully observed. “I’m hungry for blood. Now all I get is dog biscuits.”

“Say,” said Olga, perturbed. “Who do you think you’re kidding? That’s a funny line for a guy to hand out to a girl. You look like a wolf to me.”

This was definitely the wrong thing to say.

“I am a wolf,” muttered Mr. Simpkins.

“What do you mean, you’re a wolf?” laughed Olga, back on familiar territory again. “You’ve got to show me, brother!”

Mr. Simpkins, naive soul, sighed.

“Right here?” he asked.

"Sure. Why not?"

"All right," said Mr. Simpkins. "I'll show you."

He descended from his bar stool and crouched on the floor. He threw his head back and began to whimper. Suddenly his body seemed to quiver. A plastic horripilation coursed through his frame. His forehead melted to a slant. His nose lengthened. His arms and legs furred.

Mr. Simpkins turned into a werewolf on the barroom floor.

Olga saw and was convinced. She was so convinced she began to scream.

About that time, Miss Terioso and I were dancing near the doorway. Miss Terioso heard the scream and turned her head.

She looked out.

Her gaze was not attracted by Mr. Simpkins, but by Jory. He stood at the checking counter, and he was grabbing Miss Terioso's broom.

"Come on," gasped my dancing-partner, running off the floor.

"Where are you going with my broomstick?" she yelled at the fleeing Jory.

"I'm just borrowing it to use outside," he called. "Don't forget, Margate is in Gerymanx's body out there."

"Come back here," yelled the witch, leaping after him.

Hell broke loose with a vengeance.

Miss Terioso clawed at Jory. She beat the poor man over the head with her broomstick, uttering shrill imprecations.

A flying form launched past me as I wavered in the doorway.

It was Trina, in the window dummy's body She hurled herself on Miss Terioso, valiantly coming to Jory's aid.

Miss Terioso turned.

Before I could intervene, she grappled with the red-headed dummy. Before the eyes of the shrieking spectators, she tore the window dummy apart, literally limb from limb.

A torso, a head, and pairs of arms and legs fell to the floor.

Behind me came another scream. I turned in time to see Myrtle, in Margate's body, exchanging wild blows with the drunk from the next table.

"Good God, what next?" I gasped.

I started toward the howling wolf on the floor. Then something thundered past me from the outer door.

Margate, in the body of the centaur, charged into the night-club lobby. Squirming in his arms was the mermaid—Greymanx. Stamping his hoofs, the terrible apparition bearing its hideous burden, roared down the bar.

"What is all this?" boomed Margate, flicking his tail and neighing wildly.

Arms encircled me. I turned to face Miss Terioso, brandishing her broomstick.

"Let's get out of here, eh?" she panted. "Get on the broomstick before it's too late."

I mounted in a daze.

The howling wolf, the prancing centaur, the fighting man, and the dismembered body of the window dummy blocked our path. We sailed over them all.

Sailed over them—and into the arms of the police!

CHAPTER XV

JUDGE NUMBOTTOM heard the story. First he heard it from the drunk who insulted Myrtle. Then he heard it from Olga the come-on girl. After that he got a few stumbling sentences out of me.

Finally he listened to Patrolman Lossowitz as he explained the whole thing, from ghastly beginning to untimely end.

"So she says she's a tree, Your Honor," mumbled Lossowitz, unemotionally. "Meanwhile out in the bar this guy is telling Olga he used to be a vampire but now he's a werewolf. And he turns into a wolf.

"Meanwhile, the witch tears this other woman to bits, and then the centaur and the mermaid run in, and the witch tries to beat it on a broomstick with this guy here.” Lossowitz pointed to me.

Judge Numbottom pointed to Lossowitz. His face was purple and he could hardly speak. The veins bulged on his bald forehead.

“Stop that kind of talk,” he gasped, weakly. “After all, this is a night court, not a bedtime story session. I’m a grown man, Lossowitz, am I not?”

“Yes, Your Honor,” said Lossowitz meekly.

“Yes, what?”

“Yes, you’re not,” Lossowitz declared, uncertainly.

“Shut up! You can’t think straight or talk straight! Admit you were drinking in this night club!”

“No, Your Honor. Not a drop.”

“You don’t drink drops, I realize that. Probably a bottle,” decided the terrible old man. “But drunk or sober, you couldn’t see such things. Bring in the prisoners, Lossowitz, and let me question them myself.”

Obediently, Patrolman Lossowitz marched out and returned with Myrtle, Trina, Margate, Gerymanx, Jory, and Mr. Simpkins in tow. Miss Terioso marched before them, indignantly waving her broomstick.

Judge Numbottom took one look at the man, the centaur, the window dummy, the mermaid, the second man, and the wolf. Then he hid his face in his hands.

“No, no!” murmured. “Cover them up. Lossowitz! Get blankets and at least cover some of them up. That horse-thing and that human fish, anyway!”

It was a matter of minutes before Judge Numbottom raised his haggard face. He winced as he stared at the motley assemblage. Finally his eyes lighted on Miss Terioso as the most attractive and normal-looking prisoner.

“Will you please step forward and answer a few questions,” he said, controlling his voice.

Miss Terioso advanced.

“Your name?”

“Miss Terioso.”

“Your—your occupation?”

“Oh,” she replied lightly. “I’m just a witch.”

Judge Numbottom began to turn purple again. “I beg your pardon,” he rasped. “I must have misunderstood you.”

“I’m just a witch, Your Honor,” she said. “I ride broomsticks.”

“Go on,” sighed the Judge. “You nauseate me strangely.”

“Well, it all started when these people turned into statues,” said Miss Terioso.

“Statues?”

“Yes, Marble. Stone, you know. They’re all statues, really.”

“Looks like a statue-tory offense,” put in Lossowitz, unhelpfully.

“I don’t understand,” sighed the Judge.

“This man can confirm my story,” said Miss Terioso, pointing her broomstick at me.

“That’s right,” I answered. “These people were once statues, in my charge. But as you see, they’ve undergone a change, Your Honor. That’s simple enough. I haven’t got all my marble statues any more.”

“You haven’t got all your marbles any more, you mean!” snarled Judge Numbottom. “Step down, you two. You’re driving me crazy!”

Margate, in Gerymanx’s body, sidled forward.

“Let me help you,” he suggested. “I owned these people before they were statues.”

JUDGE NUMBOTTOM looked at the horse’s body protruding from under the blanket. He favored Margate with a long, painful scrutiny.

“Who and what are you?” he whispered.

“I’m a centaur.”

Lossowitz interfered again. “The guy is lying, Your Honor!” he bawled, excitedly. “He ain’t no centaur. I seen lots of centaurs when I was in Washington!”

“Shut up!” thundered the Judge. “Let me speak to the others.”

He addressed the mermaid in the centaur’s arms.

"What about you, young lady?" he asked, forcing a smile. "What is the reason for your—ah—piscatorial disguise?"

"Who are you calling a lady?" snarled the voice of Gerymanx from the mermaid's body. "And what kind of a fishy remark are you making about me being piscatorial?"

Judge Numbottom was sorry he started the whole thing.

"Can't any of you talk sense?" be begged.

"Let me help you." said Jory, from Mr. Simpkins' body. "It's very simple. You see, I used to be in that body over there."

He pointed at the wolf form now worn by Mr. Simpkins.

"You were in the body of that animal?" Judge Numbottom's eyes started from their sockets.

"Why not?" piped the wolf.

"A talking wolf?" moaned the Judge.

"Well, if it disturbs you so much," sniffed the wolf. He bent forward and began to go through contortions. It was a fascinating if repulsive spectacle. Slowly, the wolf turned into a man.

"You see?" he asked.

"I don't want to see!" groaned Judge Numbottom.

"Then look at her!" suggested Lossowitz, pointing at Trina in the body of the redheaded window dummy.

The window dummy was redheaded no longer. With a clatter, the dummy's head dropped to the floor.

"So sorry," said Trina. "Looking at a sight like that wolf is enough to make anyone lose their head."

She stooped and picked up her head slowly.

Judge Numbottom's eyes were almost resting on his cheekbones.

"It's sorcery," he sobbed. "Sheer black sorcery! And how can I press a sorcery charge at election time?"

I stepped up.

"Listen, Your Honor," I whispered. "I think I have a way to straighten this matter out. Never mind getting the story straight. I know a way to restore these people to their rightful forms. Then we can forget the whole thing."

"How?" gasped the Judge.

Briefly, I told him about Miss Terioso holding a due bill on hell. She could evoke a demon and order him to restore my friends to their rightful shapes.

"Incredible," objected the Judge.

"No more incredible than what you've seen here," I reminded him.

"Why doesn't she do it, then?" he asked.

"She's stubborn. I suggest that you force her to do it."

"How?"

"Issue a court order commanding her to evoke the demon and make the change."

The Judge sat up.

His eyes flashed fire. "I'll damned well issue the order," he snapped. "If not, I'll have the lot of you jailed for the rest of your unnatural lives."

CHAPTER XVI

"HAVE you got your due-bill on hell ready?" I whispered nervously, crouching next to Miss Terioso in the darkened courtroom.

"It's right here in my satchel," replied the witch. During the past hour her glamor had fallen away, and she was once again the familiar crone-like figure, as she puttered around making passes in the air.

Judge Numbottom had ejected the drunk, the come-on girl, and Patrolman Lossowitz from the chamber, leaving us in privacy.

A bailiff had been dispatched to secure the ingredients Miss Terioso required for the ceremony of the ritual, and now she went through the parody of the Black Mass and the moment for evoking the demon neared.

My fine finned and furry friends moved restlessly to and fro as her voice rose in awesome crescendo.

The climax came.

Amidst a shaking of walls and a rumbling of far-off vortices between the stars, the red demon slithered into tri-dimensional being in the center of Judge Numbottom's court.

A gasp rose from the assemblage.

"To think of me, acting as an accessory in this black magic," hissed Judge Numbottom morosely. "Oh, Lord—what's that?"

He saw the demon.

So did my friends.

The demon stretched a rubbery red neck and blinked with nyctaloptic eyes.

"It's you again," he growled, squatting near me.

I shrugged. "Not at all. This lady called you."

I indicated Miss Terioso, who nodded. The witch swept commandingly before the creature of darkness.

In low tones she conversed with the entity.

"You want me to switch them?" the demon asked.

"Yes."

"And you have a paper entitling you to—ah—services?"

"Here it is."

Miss Terioso fluttered a piece of paper.

"Very well," sighed the demon. "Here goes."

He paused. "I shall have to freeze them into marble again before I unscramble their psyches," he said.

"Very well."

"Don't worry," I told Trina, moving close to her. "It will just be a minute."

That is all it took, and I was glad.

For my very spine shook at the violence of the psychic force that concentrated itself in the room.

Gazing through the phosphorescence of the chalk lines, I saw a horribly unnatural transformation. Men, mermaid, centaur, and wolf, turned to gleaming white stone. They froze in marble attitudes on the floor.

"So," breathed the demon. He was sweating horribly, as sparks rising from his body attested.

"Now for the second step," he muttered. "But give me the due bill first."

His voice addressed the witch. But his eyes couldn't reach her.

It was I who finally located Miss Terioso in the darkness. She stood by the window, the open window, and she was already bestriding the broomstick.

"She's not going through with the deal!" I yelled. "She's double-crossing us and making a getaway!"

It was true.

The demon realized it instantly.

"Come back!" he shouted.

"Farewell!" called the witch.

She rose in midair.

The demon, like a gigantic rubber ball, bounded after her.

He soared, with dynamic propulsion, through the window.

I rushed over to the ledge and peered outside.

Hovering in midair, witch and demon clawed wildly in writhing tangle of arms and legs. She was trying to hold on to the piece of paper. He enfolded her in his red arms, hissing.

The broomstick wobbled.

SUDDENLY came a cataclysmic crash of thunder, a burst of eye-ball searing luminance, and then—nothing.

Witch and demon were gone. "Trina," I whispered.

A lifeless window dummy stared at me with glassy eyes.

Judge Numbottom switched on the lights.

He rubbed his eyes.

"It is the order of this court," he whispered, "that these statues be confiscated. Immediately. And taken out of sight. Not a word of this must get out. You understand?”

I nodded.

“Julius Margate’s house will be put up for sale under court order,” he added.

“The window dummy?” I whispered.

“Will await claim by rightful owners,” he told me.

And so it ended. I left Margate, his friends, and his house. And now I try to forget.

Of course, I still see the window dummy every day.

That’s all I have left, you know. All I have to prove that it really happened.

So I see the window dummy every day. And you can come and see her yourself if you like.

She’s the third one from the left—in our biggest department store window.

You Could Be Wrong

It started the day that Harry Jessup bought a TV set. Even then it might have worked out all right, only he started to worry about the commercials.

The end was inevitable. Too bad that the innocent victims had to be his own wife and a good friend. Or was "innocent" the right word?

WHEN Harry Jessup came back from Korea, he wasn't aware of the change. Not immediately.

Marge was still waiting for him, so they got married and bought a little ranchhouse out in Skyland Park. Harry got a job at Everlift, and although he noticed money didn't seem to go very far these days, he managed to get along. He and Marge made friends with the couple next door—the Myers, very nice people; Ed Myers was a CPA—and pretty soon they bought a television set.

That's probably what set him off.

One night he and Marge were watching the Sloucho Marks quiz show. Harry had always liked Sloucho in the old days, when he was making pictures, and he could still quote most of the lyrics to Hooray For Captain Mauldin.

Marge kept laughing at Sloucho's cracks during the program, and she was a little surprised to see that Harry was just sitting there, staring at the screen. He never smiled. When it was time for the last commercial, Harry got up and turned off the set.

“What’s the matter?” Marge asked.

Harry muttered something that sounded like, “Fake!” but Marge wasn’t really interested in his reply. She’d asked a purely rhetorical question and intended to follow it up with certain remarks which she now delivered.

“I thought it was a very funny show, myself,” she said. “What’s wrong with you, Harry? You always liked Sloucho Marks before.”

“Yeah,” Harry said. He just sat there, staring at the blank screen.

“You’ve got to admit he’s the cleverest ad-libber in the world,” Marge persisted. “Maybe he’s a little corny, but I’d like to see you do any better, Harry Jessup.”

Harry scowled at her.

“Perhaps I could,” he murmured, “if I had four writers.”

“Four writers?” Marge was genuinely shocked. “What are you talking about?”

“He’s got four writers,” Harry said. “I read about it in the paper.”

Marge sniffed. “Why, I never heard of such a ridiculous idea! Everybody knows it wouldn’t work. How can anybody write such a show in advance when they don’t know who’s going to be chosen as contestants?”

“They know,” Harry told her. “It’s all fixed in advance. Rehearsals and everything.”

“Nonsense!”

“Some of the people who are going to be on the show even advertise ahead of time in the Hollywood trade papers,” Harry said.

“Who told you that?”

“Read it.”

“Well, I don’t believe a word of it,” Marge declared. “I think you’re just jealous, or something. I bet you wouldn’t mind trading places with Sloucho Marks any day.”

“Maybe I could,” Harry answered.

“What are you talking about?” Marge sat down heavily and began tapping her foot.

“I mean, maybe I could be Sloucho Marks,” Harry said. “How do you know you’re seeing the real Sloucho on TV now?”

“Oh, don’t be ridiculous! Just because he’s given up wearing that false moustache—”

“Did you ever see him before without it? I mean, outside of his last movies where he appeared alone?”

“No—but—”

“Maybe there isn’t a real Sloucho,” Harry persisted. “Maybe there never was. Remember in one of his early movies where he stood in front of this mirror frame and thought there was glass in it? And Cheeko put on a moustache and pretended to be his reflection? Cheeko looked just like Sloucho. Anybody can, with a little makeup.”

“What’s come over you, Harry?”

“Nothing. It just occurred to me how easy it would be to pull off a stunt like that nowadays. Anybody with four writers and a physical resemblance could act the part. The whole thing’s a fake from start to finish. A pretended ad-libber purporting to interview phony contestants in a comedy show which is supposed to be a quiz program. All a big fraud.”

“I don’t understand why you’re getting so riled up over-nothing,” Marge snapped. “If you get right down to it. Sloucho certainly didn’t write all his own parts in the old days.”

“Of course not.” Harry sighed. “But nobody ever tried to pretend he did. When you saw him on the stage or in the movies, you knew it was make-believe. Now they try to get you to think it’s real. That’s what bothers me.”

“But it is real. You saw it!” Harry Jessup shook his head. “No I didn’t. And neither did you. All we saw was a wave-pattern, reproduced. You don’t really see a picture on TV; your eyes merely interpret it that way. Same as moving pictures—they don’t move. I was reading all about it in Popular ——”

Marge sniffed again. “Did it ever occur to your precious intellect that maybe what you read is phony, too? Just because it’s printed somewhere, that’s no reason you have to believe it any more than if you saw it.”

Harry blinked. “I never thought of that angle before.” Marge saw her advantage and pursued it. “Well, suppose you think about it before you sound off any more. How do you know it’s true Sloucho has four writers? That could be a lie, too.” She smiled triumphantly.

“Yes.” Harry didn’t smile back. “Yes, it could be, couldn’t it? But why—that’s what I want to know. What’s the meaning of it?” He paused and stared down at Marge’s foot.

Marge noticed his stare and stopped tapping. “Sorry,” she said. “Didn’t mean to get on your nerves.”

“Well, it does,” Harry declared. “I wish you wouldn’t wear those heels. You’re five-feet-two. Why must you pretend to be five-feet-four?” Marge went over and put her hand on Harry’s forehead. When she spoke, her voice was soft. “What’s gotten into you?” she asked. “Don’t you feel well?”

Harry reached up and clasped her hand. He pulled it down to eye-level. “Nail polish,” he muttered. “Pretending you have red nails. Don’t understand it.”

“You’re sick. You’ve got a fever——” Marge rose. “I’ll get the thermometer and we’ll see.”

He shook his head. “I don’t need any thermometer.” Marge decided to humor him. “Just for fun,” she said. “After all, it’s a brand new one. I just bought it, and we might as well get some use out of it.”

“New one. That’s just the trouble. It might be a phony, too. Built to register fever when there isn’t any.”

“Harry!”

“I’m going to bed.” He stood up and shuffled over to the door. “You asked what’s gotten into me,” he said. “I don’t know. Maybe it’s honesty.”

Marge knew better. Harry had a fever, all right. He went to work Friday, but when he came home his face was flushed and his eyes were red. He didn't say very much, either.

They sat down to eat, and Harry stared at his plate. "What's this?" he asked in a harsh voice.

"Mock chicken legs."

"Mock chicken?" Harry pushed his plate away. "Why can't we have real chicken for a change?"

"I don't know. I just thought——"

Harry was looking over the table now, muttering to himself. "White bread. You know how they make white bread these days? Take all the nourishment out and then fortify it artificially with vitamins. Oleo instead of butter. Process cheese. That's synthetic, too. And instant coffee—"

"But you know how much regular coffee costs nowadays, dear."

"Doesn't matter. Suppose it was beer instead of coffee. Same thing. Brewed with chemicals instead of the old way. Even the water isn't water any more—it's something filled with chlorine and fluorine and heaven only knows what."

Harry pushed back his chair.

"Where are you going?"

"Out for a walk."

Marge drew in her breath. "You aren't going down to the tavern—?"

He made a barking sound, then caught himself. "What's the matter with me?" he said. "Can't I even come up with a genuine laugh any more? It's getting me fast, the thing's contagious, isn't it?"

"Harry, you promised you wouldn't go to that tavern—"

"Don't worry about me." He smiled. "Tavern! It isn't a tavern, it's a saloon. No such thing as a real tavern, you know. Just a name they use to make it sound fancy. In a real tavern you used to be able to drink whiskey. Nowadays you get something called a blend—65 per cent or 72 per cent neutral spirits, artificially aged in imitation-charred casks. Fake!"

Marge came over to him, but he pushed her away. “Why do you use perfume?” he asked. “You don’t smell that way, really.”

“Lie down,” she whispered. “I’ll call Doctor Lorentz.”

“Don’t want a doctor. Just going for a walk. Got to think.” Harry looked at the wall. “Quit my job today.”

“Quit your job?” She was suddenly tense. “Why?”

“Tired of it. Tired of making brassieres. Falsies. That’s what they call them and that’s what they are—false. I want to get into something real.”

He backed over to the door. “Don’t worry. We’ll work things out. I’ll figure a way, if there is a way.”

Then he was gone.

For a moment, Marge watched him through the window, then bit her lip and hurried to the telephone.

Harry came back in about an hour. Marge met him at the door.

“Feel better, dear?” she asked.

“Yeah.” He patted her shoulder. “I’m all right.”

“Good.” She smiled. “Ed Myers is in the living room.”

“What’s he doing here?”

“Just dropped in to visit.

Thought he’d like to talk to you, I guess.”

“You guess!” Harry stepped back. “You told him to come over, didn’t you?”

“Well——”

“Lies,” he muttered. “All lies. Oh, what the hell, I’ll see him.”

He strode into the living room.

“Hello, Harry,” said Ed Myers. Myers was a big, blonde, jolly fat man with round baby-blue eyes. He sat there in the easy chair, puffing on a cigarette.

“Hi,” Harry said. “Want a drink?”

“No, thanks. Just dropped in for a minute.”

Harry sat down and Myers grinned amiably. “How’s tricks?” he asked.

“Tricks! It’s all tricks.”

“What’s that?”

“You heard me. You ought to know. You and this ‘just dropped in for a minute routine. Marge called you over, didn’t she?”

“Well——”

“What did she tell you?” Harry leaned forward, his expression angry.

“Nothing, really. That is, she said you’d been sort of under the weather lately. Figured there might be something on your mind you’d like to talk about. And seeing as how I’m a friend of yours——”

“Are you?”

“You know that, pal.”

“Do I? I’m beginning to wonder if I know anything. Maybe that’s it—I didn’t know, but I’m starting to find out.”

“I don’t get it, Harry.”

“Just took a walk. Walked around the block a couple of times, then down to the corner. What did I see?”

“You got me, pal. What did you see?”

“Fakes. Phonies. Frauds.”

“This doesn’t sound like you, Harry.”

“How do you know what I sound like? Really, I mean?” Harry Jessup bit his lip. “Listen, and I’ll try to explain. I walk down the street and I look back at this house. This house—what is it? They call it a ‘ranchhouse.’ Why? It’s not on a ranch. It’s not the kind of a house anybody ever built on a real ranch. Just a five-room crackerbox with a fake gable in front and a fake chimney to indicate a non-existent fireplace. This neighborhood is full of them. A thousand neighborhoods are full of them. Must be five, maybe ten million such places built in the last few years.”

“So why get excited over a thing like that?”

“I’m not excited. Just curious. About a lot of things. Skyland Park, for instance. That’s the name of this suburb, isn’t it? But it’s not a park, and there’s no view of the sky around here. Everything’s blotted out by TV aerials. People sitting in the dark, watching something that's not real but pretending to themselves that it is."

Ed Myers chuckled. "Marge told me about Sloucho Marks," he said. "Mean to say you let a little thing like that get on your nerves?"

"It isn't a little thing, Ed. At least, I don't think so. Everything's like that nowadays. I didn't understand at first when I came back, but I get the picture now. I got it tonight. The TV all over, and men standing outside washing their cars. Hundreds of average men, but none of them own an average car."

"How's that again?"

"Ever stop to think about that, Ed? No average cars any more. Everybody's got a Commander, or a Land Cruiser, or a Coup de Ville or a Roadmaster or a Champion. Even the poorest slob owns a Super Deluxe Model. Aren't there any plain, old-fashioned automobiles any more? I haven't seen any. Just millions of Hornets and Ambassadors and Strato-jets, driven by people who have no place to go. No real place, that is. They drive to the movies and see 3D which isn't really three-dimensional, or they go over to a grocery store built like an Italian Doge's palace which calls itself a Supermarket and offers Below Cost Bargains yet still makes a profit, and ——"

"Dig this!" Ed Myers chuckled again. "You talk like a Commie."

"How do you know how a Commie talks?" Harry retorted. "You ever hear one? Did you ever see one in the flesh?"

"Why, no, but I read the papers, everybody knows about Communists."

"You mean everybody is told about them. You read what's printed, that's all. How do you know any of it ever happened?"

"Hey, wait a minute, Harry!"

"You read about the President's latest speech, but he didn't write it—some team of ghostwriters ground it out. You read about the war, and what you read is censored. You read about some movie star, and it turns out to be a planted publicity story, concerning an interview that never occurred. How do you know what actually happens? Or if anything is actually happening?"

"Say, you are serious, aren't you?"

"I don't know. I walked and walked tonight, trying to figure things out. Nothing makes sense. Ed, I saw the kids in the street. Little kids running around playing cops and robbers, cowboy and Indian, playing war. It scared me."

"Why should it scare you, pal? Didn't you do those things when you were a kid?"

"Sure. Of course I did. But I didn't play the same way. I knew it was a game, just making-believe. I'm not so sure about the kids today. I swear, from the way they act, they think it's real."

"Harry, you're making a mountain out of a molehill."

"That's the fashion, isn't it? If I really knew how, I could become quite wealthy in these times. Anybody who can take a molehill and persuade people into thinking it's a mountain is right in style. Look at that!"

Ed Myers was lighting another cigarette, but Harry snatched it out of his mouth.

"Here you are," he said. "Perfect example. The world's finest tobacco, isn't it? Mildest, choicest, most expensive blend. That's how it's advertised. Do you believe it? Do you realize there are a hundred brands that cost more, taste better?"

"But everybody knows about advertising——"

"I'm not talking about advertising. It used to be bad enough, when advertising was the only big offender. But things like this are happening all over. We're losing the truth, Ed. The truth about everything. Politics, government, world affairs, business, education—we get it all through a filter, selected and distorted. Where has reality disappeared to?"

"You're getting yourself all worked up over nothing," Ed Myers said. "What you need is a vacation, little relaxation."

"Relaxation? How? I listened to the radio last Sunday. Jack Benny. He did a show which was supposed to take place ten minutes before he went on the air. In the middle of the program he pretended he was going on the air and got himself introduced all over again. Then in a few minutes, during the pretended show, he was supposed to go over to visit the home of a cast-member. By this time I couldn't even follow what he was pretending to pretend.

"Movies are worse. Did you ever see that oldie, Sings Again? Larry Parks plays Jolson, of course, but Jolson did the singing. That's par for the course these days. But then, in the middle of the picture, Parks as Jolson is supposed to meet Parks as Parks. And he plays both parts. Parks-Jolson talks to Parks-Parks about making a picture of Jolson's life, and then the picture of Jolson's life goes on to show how a picture of Jolson's life was made. Only what is shown isn't what really happened to begin with, so ——"

"Calm down, boy!" Myers grinned. "It's all in fun."

"I'm calm. But I'm not so sure about the fun part. Not any more. This is getting serious. I happen to like real things. And everything is ersatz."

"You're just picking out a few examples and magnifying them all out of proportion."

"Proportion? How do we know what proportion is? You've got to have something to measure against. Pontius Pilate asked 'What is Tuth?' I'm still worried about the answer."

"Well, if you want to drag religion into it——"

"I'm not dragging religion into it. Look at yourself, for example." Harry Jessup was on his feet now, almost shouting. "You're wearing a sports jacket. You a sportsman by any chance? No. Examine those pearl buttons. Are they made of pearl? Not on your life. That gold watch-band—it's not gold, is it? Regimental stripe tie. You ever belong to the Coldstream Guards? Your shoes, with the leather heels that aren't even leather. Fake, every bit of it a fake! And you're so used to a world of fakery you aren't even conscious of it any more. CPA, that's your job. Filling out fake income tax returns for fake business men who contribute sums for fictitious government expenditures——”

“Harry, you’re shouting!” Marge came into the room. “What’s wrong?”

“Everything.” He went over to her how and his finger stabbed again and again. He talked for Ed Myers’ benefit. “Look at her. Blonde curly hair. Know why? Bleach and a permanent wave. Two false teeth in front. Foundation garment to disguise her shape. Been married to her for almost a year, and I swear I’ve never seen her real face—just a lot of makeup. Makeup and fake mannerisms, that’s all she is!”

Marge started to cry. “You see,” she sobbed. “That’s what I meant. He’s been like this ever since last night.”

Ed Myers wasn’t smiling, any more. He nodded gravely. “Maybe we ought to call some specialist and——”

“Wait a minute,” Harry said. “Wait a minute! You think I’m cracking up, don’t you? You think I’m real gone in the head.”

Myers shrugged. He didn’t say anything.

“The rest?” Marge stopped sniffling. Ed Myers hunched forward, picking at his ear.

“Yeah. I never said anything about it before, because I thought it was just a lot of malarkey when I heard it. Now I’m not so sure.”

“Heard what?” Myers asked.

“About the bombs.” Harry took a deep breath. “Last year, when I was in Korea, this rumor came along. Nobody ever found out how it started. Anyway, we all heard it. According to the way it went, the Russians came over and bombed the United States. Bombed hell out of it. That was one story. At the same time, we heard another. This one was different. According to the second rumor, it wasn’t the Russians at all. Some of our own scientists came up with a new kind of bomb. They tested it but there was a chain-reaction, a big one. Blew up the whole damn' country!"

"A specialist——" Myers began.

"Wait. Let me finish. Then you can call your specialist, if you want to. Somebody ought to be able to give me an answer."

Marge came over to Harry and put her hand on his arm. "Listen to me, Harry," she said. "Are you trying to tell me you think the country was destroyed while you were in Service?"

"I don't know," he muttered. "I don't know what I'm trying to tell you, or myself, either."

"Be reasonable, Harry. Think for a moment. You're here, aren't you? and so are we. We're in this country. So how could it be destroyed? Do you see any ruins, any signs of bombing?"

"No. But I wouldn't. Not if all the real things were gone and the fakes remained. You can't destroy what actually doesn't exist."

Ed Myers stood up. He glanced significantly at Marge. "Let me use your phone," he said.

Marge waved her hand. "Wait. Not yet. Give him a chance to explain."

"Thanks." Harry smiled up at her gratefully. "You know, this business of seeing things proves nothing. They say when you're born, you see things upside down. I don't understand it, but the image is supposed to be received on the retina that way, and then translated by the brain so that you think it's right-side up. The whole business of seeing is cockeyed, anyhow. This thing that looks like a table, as I remember it, is just trillions and trillions of little particles jumping up and down in waves. All our senses are playing tricks on us; smell, hearing, everything. Lots of people get hallucinations——"

"Don't they, though?" Myers glanced again at Marge, and picked at his right ear once more.

"Please," Marge whispered.

Harry went on. “So maybe none of us ever comes close to Reality, after all. We just sort of agree amongst ourselves that certain things are real and certain things are not real. We base those agreements on the evidence of our senses; if we all get just about the same reactions, we decide to believe or disbelieve accordingly. You follow me?”

“I think so,” Marge said. “But doesn’t that prove you’re living in a real world?”

“Not any more. Not since this phony stuff took over, the way it has in the last ten years or so. I said our senses can play tricks. Maybe they’ve gotten so used to the fakes they can’t detect the difference any more. Maybe there’s a sort of a balancing-point somewhere. As long as 50 per cent of our environment is real, we’re safe. We can still recognize it, use it as a gauge to judge our surroundings. But when there isn’t 50 per cent left—when more than half of the things we see, or hear, or say, or do, or own or experience are false—then how can we tell? Maybe we reached that point a long time ago and didn’t know it. Maybe we’re all hypnotized into believing in the existence of a lot of things. If that was so, then the real world could actually disappear and we’d never even suspect it. Because all the illusions we’ve come to think of as reality would still remain.”

“Sort of a mirage, eh?” Ed Myers nodded. “You sure worked yourself up a theory, boy. But there’s kind of a hole in it, isn’t there?”

“Hole?”

“Well, just for the sake of argument, supposing something like that had happened. Let’s even use that rumor you and the troops heard over in Korea, about how the whole country was knocked out by chain-reaction. Then how could you come back here again to live? There’d be nothing left, isn’t that right? No people, no buildings, no radio or TV or books or movies or any of the stuff you’re so badly worried about.”

“But if we believed it was here——” Harry started, then stopped. “Come to think of it, I guess you’re right.”

“Of course I’m right.” Myers smiled again. “You just think about it a while, boy. Everything’ll straighten out. Take a rest for a few days, you’ll get over it."

Marge smiled, too. "You gave us an awful scare, Harry."

"Scare?" Harry Jessup blinked. "Scare? Could that be it?"

"Could what be what?"

"Scare. The flying saucers scare. Remember? We heard all about it. Sure—that could be the answer!"

"Oh, Harry, for heaven's sake——"

"Same deal. Nobody knew whether they were real or fake either. But suppose they were real. And they dropped the bombs. A new kind. Wiped out the country and took over. Nobody'd ever know. They'd send out fake reports, create an illusion that nothing had changed. People coming in from abroad would find everything the same. So accustomed to fakery in normal life they wouldn't notice the difference. Just as I didn't notice."

Ed Myers groaned. Marge sighed.

"That's the answer!" Harry cried. "It has to be the answer! Nobody left at all, and the whole thing an illusion built up to protect whoever or whatever owns this country now—built up to fool the few real people left, the ones in Service who came back! They'll just have to keep things going until we're dead and buried and then the masquerade is over.

"No wonder they keep pouring out more and more synthetics all the time! Do it to deaden our faculties, get us so used to the artificial we'll forget there ever was anything real. Who remembers when Hopalong Cassidy was lame, when Wild Bill Hickok was an outlaw instead of a hero? Today kids think there really was a man named Sherlock Holmes—if there are any kids, that is."

"Are any kids?" Marge shuddered. "Do you know what you're saying now? Are you inferring that——?"

Harry paused. "Yeah," he said, slowly. "Yeah. Come to think of it, I am."

He walked over to Ed Myers, who was still picking his ear. Suddenly he reached out and grabbed at Myers, trying to reach the side of his head.

Myers ducked, moved back in alarm.

"That gray spot," Harry whispered. "I think I know what it is, now."

“Keep away from me!” Ed Myers yelled.

But Harry didn’t keep away. He lunged forward, grabbing up the paper-knife from the desk and bringing it down with a single, startling motion.

There was a ripping sound. Harry plunged the paper-knife into Myers’ head.

“Look!” he shouted. “I was right—nothing but sawdust! Sawdust and a bunch of cogwheels.”

Myers fell to the floor and lay still.

Marge began to scream.

“Look!” Harry yelled. “Sawdust, all over the rug! Can’t you see——?”

He stopped. Marge kept staring at the floor, her scream subsiding to a whimper. “Harry, you’ve killed him.”

“How could I kill something that isn’t real? Something stuffed with sawdust?”

“Take another look,” Marge said. “That isn’t sawdust. It’s blood.”

Harry took another look. The knife clattered to the floor. He stared down at the slowly widening red pool. . . .

He was still staring when Marge went to the phone. He was still staring when she came back. He was still staring when the squad-car arrived.

After that there were questions, many questions, and a lot of men crowded around, and somebody came in with a camera and flashbulbs and took pictures, and then they took Ed Myers’ body away, and finally they took Harry away too.

At the end, there was nobody left but Marge. She was all alone and there was nothing else to do, so she got out the dustpan and the broom and swept up the little pile of sawdust from the floor.

THE END

The Miracle of Ronald Weems

As salesman rate, Ronald was a fair brassiere man; but he was a whiz at chemistry sets—especially ones containing alcohol—which sent him flying high!

THINGS were very quiet in ladies' underwear that morning.

Nothing was going on in panties, either. Girdles held up fairly well, but brassieres were sagging.

So was Ronald Weems.

He stared across the counter and down the third-floor aisle of Lacey's Department Store and muttered to himself. "Bloomers!" he sighed. "I'm sick of them!"

The small man meant it. He was bored with bloomers, fed up with frillies, petulant about petticoats.

Five years as Assistant Buyer in Ladies' Lingerie had left a lasting mark on the man.

Aside from that, Ronald Weems' soul was as spotless as an angel's wing. And perhaps that was the actual cause of his discontent. Normally, a man of thirty manages to acquire at least a few interesting stains and blemishes, suitable for a spiritual dry-cleaning. But Ronald Weems had led an immaculate life.

His maiden aunts—now deceased—had seen to that. They belonged to the Old School, as they never ceased telling Ronald throughout his adolescence and early manhood.

Ronald didn't know precisely what they meant by the Old School. He visualized it vaguely as a place where rigid rules were neatly and impeccably written down in a firm hand on shiny, sterile blackboards. Rules like "Don't-forget-to-wear-your-rubbers-it-looks-like-we-might-get-some-rain" and "Please-wipe-your-feet-before-you-come-in" and "Never-smoke-in-the-parlor-it-makes-the-curtains-smell".

Fortunately for them, the maiden aunts had shuffled (ever so sedately, though) off this mortal coil just prior to Ronald's promotion to Ladies' Lingerie, five years ago. They would never have approved of their nephew working in proximity to feminine underthings. In fact, one of their chief aims in life had been to keep him far, far away from feminine underthings in any form—or feminine forms in any underthings.

And they had succeeded, Ronald now mused, only too well. For although five long years had passed since their passing, Ronald was still living according to the rules of the Old School. He had bought and sold millions of pairs of hosiery, and never once handled a leg. He knew nothing of limbs—except for the vague awareness that he was now out on one.

For Ronald was in love.

At least he thought he was in love. The combination of sleeplessness, stomach palpitation, hot flushes and nervous excitement is often diagnosed by physicians as hyperacidity. But Ronald didn't feel as though he needed a physic. He felt as though he needed Amy Cooper.

Amy Cooper worked upstairs, in Toys. She looked rather like a toy herself—one of those chubby, cuddly yellowhaired plush kittens—although Ronald had never dared tell her so. Any more than he had ever dared rush up to her and say, "Look, honey, my stomach's upset. Let's get married."

He had danced with her at the Annual Employee's Ball, taken her to the movies a half-dozen times, and dined with her at the cafeteria upstairs. He had always behaved like a perfect gentleman, which is a polite way of saying he'd never gotten to first base.

Ronald was perfectly sure that his maiden aunts would have approved of his conduct, and he couldn't quite figure out why Amy Cooper didn't seem to. It had never occurred to him that Amy wasn't a maiden aunt.

Nevertheless, on this particular November morning, Ronald Weems was conscious of a sudden heart-burn which reminded him of two things—it was almost time for lunch, and he wanted very much to see Amy.

Noting that the floor was almost deserted, save for the clerks and a few unstylishly stout customers who were obviously Just-looking-Thank-You, Ronald darted through the side doorway and into the office of his immediate superior.

QUENTIN Bickerstaff thrust his square jaw over the edge of his square desk. "Ah, Weems, there you are! Wondered where you'd been keeping yourself. Everything all set for this afternoon?"

"Yes, sir. I've had all the chairs put out, and the electricians are working on the lighting."

"Umph," Bickerstaff commented. "I want everything perfect, understand? There must be no hitches."

"I'm sure you'll find we're well prepared, sir." Ronald stared at the big THINK! and SMILE! signs on the off ice-wall and caught himself wondering why it was that Mr. Bickerstaff never seemed to do either. He banished the disloyal thought immediately and coughed discreetly.

"Do you imagine I could take an early lunch hour?" he asked.

"Lunch?" Mr. Bickerstaff's eye brows rose like astonished caterpillars. "How can you think of lunch at a time like this? When the whole fate of our Department hangs on the success or failure of this afternoon's style show?" He slammed his fist on the desk, causing the SMILE! sign to rattle violently against the wall. "Do you realize how far we're behind on our girdle quota for the year? Do you know we're overstocked by at least eight thousand brassieres—four thousand of them in A-cups alone?"

He glowered at Ronald, then sighed. “But I suppose you don’t care,” he said, bitterly. “You’re a young man. Brassieres mean nothing to you. You’re more interested in filling your stomach than in filling A-cups.”

“But everything’s taken care of—” Ronald ventured.

“I know.” Bickerstaff nodded. “That’s not the point. The point is, Weems, you’ll never get anywhere in this line. I can see it now. You haven’t the feel for Ladies’ Lingerie. Maybe you belong in Nighties.”

“Oh, don’t say that, Mr. Bickerstaff!” Ronald cried. “I love my work, you know that. I’m very happy in Negligees and Briefs, believe me I am.”

“It isn’t enough to love this Department,” Bickerstaff declared. “You have to live it. Now take me, for example. While you’re concerned only about food, I am thinking only of brassieres. Night and day, that’s all I have on my mind. And I won’t rest until I somehow manage to put those eight thousand brassieres where they belong—in the hands of our customers.”

“But brassieres don’t belong on hands,” Ronald objected.

“I know that.” Mr. Bickerstaff flushed slightly. “It’s just a figure of speech. What I mean to say is, I think of it as my mission in life to find eight thousand women who need brassieres—four thousand of them for A-cups. And if there aren’t four thousand, maybe they can be squeezed into them. Where there’s a will there’s a way.”

“What way would you suggest?” Ronald asked, genuinely interested. “Some sort of shoe-horn, perhaps?”

“Ohhh—” Bickerstaff wailed, “Go to lunch!” As the younger man headed for the door he called after him, “But no dawdling. Back at one, promptly. I’m picking Laura Lee up at the airport and the photographers will be here for pictures.”

Ronald nodded. He knew all about Laura Lee, for Hollywood bakes its cheesecake well, and Miss Lee’s fame as a movie starlet had preceded her. Bickerstaff counted it as quite a triumph that he had secured her to model in this afternoon’s Lingerie Fashion Show. “A perfect C-cup!” he’d gloated.

Ronald didn’t particularly care whether or not Mr. Bickerstaff escorted Laura Lee from the airport or not this noon. He was much more interested in escorting Amy Cooper to the cafeteria. Let Mr. Bickerstaff have glamour—until his C-cup runneth over, Ronald decided. He'd take Amy any day.

Going up in the elevator he found himself wondering, for the first time, whether Amy Cooper was an A. B. or C. Then he shed the thought quickly. Such A-B-Cs were not part of the curriculum in the Old School.

THE Sixth Floor was Toyland, and Ronald quested in search of his babe. He found her behind the counter administering to the wants of a matronly woman and her small son. The child was as skinny as a lead-pencil and his head came to a most appropriate point.

“Here we are, Precious,” the woman was cooing. “Now Mother will buy you a lovely painting set.”

“Dowanna painting set!” muttered Precious.

“Of course you do,” his mother beamed. She smiled at Amy Cooper. “He's really quite artistic, you know. You ought to see some of his work.”

Abruptly, Precious leered at Amy. “Sure,” he said. “How'd you like to see my etchings?”

“Why, that's no way to talk!”

Mother was abashed.

“Well, I can't show her no nudes. You tore up all my nudes,” Precious pouted.

“Amy bit her lower lip. “Your son seems somewhat precocious,” she ventured. “Perhaps he might be interested in a scientific toy—a chemistry set, perhaps.”

“Yeah,” Precious gloated. “That's more like it. Then I can make Mickey Finns for the kids on the block.”

Ignoring this last remark, Amy led the woman over to a display of chemical toys. Ronald followed behind Precious.

“Now here is the very latest,” the girl said. “Something brand new, imported from Germany.

"Oh boy!" Precious exclaimed, grabbing for the box, which contained a large assortment of test-tubes, retorts, and vials of colorful liquids. "Does this stuff make stink bombs, hey?"

"I'm sure you'll find it very educational," Amy told the mother. "Your child can perform actual experiments with this."

Precious began to scrabble through boxes of powder, his eyes gleaming. "Can I make an atomic bomb with this?" he queried, hopefully. "Can I blow up the world?"

"Put that down!" his mother demanded. But Precious was fondling an assortment of glass vials. "Gee!" he cried. "Acid! I can use this stuff in my squirt-gun!" Before anyone could stop him he had uncorked a vial and was hopping around in a frenzy of anticipation. "Wow!" he said. "Looka how it fizzles!"

The liquid did indeed fizzle. It began to bubble out of the container, squirting the counter, and gushed over the box of chemicals. Mother and Amy stared aghast—and it was Ronald who stepped up and took the vial away from Precious.

"Better put that down, little boy," he advised.

Precious smiled, nodded, and then kicked him viciously in the shins. Amy Cooper fluttered her hands nervously.

"Please!" she said. "Oh, just look at my counter—and the set, it's ruined! I'm afraid you'll have to purchase it, Madame. We can't hope to sell it to anyone else."

Madame sniffed. "What? Do you expect me to buy damaged merchandise? Why, I never heard of such a thing!"

"But your child is responsible—"

"Responsible? After you deliberately excited him?"

"But this is an expensive set," Amy wailed. "If you don't buy it, they'll take the price out of my salary."

"Sorry," said the woman. "It's your own fault for getting Precious so upset. He's very high-strung."

"I'd like to see him strung even higher," the girl declared. "About thirty feet off the ground, on the end of a strong rope."

With a sniff and a yank, mother and son departed. Amy put her head down on the counter. "Oh, Ronald!" she sighed. "Now what do I do? Eighteen dollars for a chemistry set—"

"I'll buy it," Ronald said.

"You? But—"

"Never mind." He smiled. "Wrap it up. I've got a nephew who'll like it. He won't care if it's a little stained."

Amy looked up and returned his smile, with interest. "That's awfully nice of you, Ronald. You're really very sweet."

RONALD would cheerfully have surrendered his eighteen dollars for the compliment alone, but after taking his money Amy wrapped and presented him with his unexpected purchase.

"Here you are," she told him. "One slightly shopworn Little Jim Dandy Home Chemical Set." She tucked a strand of fluffy hair into place at the nape of her neck. "But you haven't told me yet—what brought you up here in the first place?"

"The elevator," Ronald replied. "That is, I mean—I thought I'd come up and take you to lunch."

"Well." Amy glanced at her watch. "It is time, isn't it? Come on."

With the package under one arm and Amy Cooper under the other, Ronald was happy for the first time that day.

He carried his happiness up to the cafeteria on Ten and maintained it midway through their meal.

Then two things happened to dim his delight. He asked her for a date for the evening and she demurred.

"Sorry, but I can't, Ronald," she said. "I'm going out this evening."

Ronald gulped back his disappointment. "Well, maybe we could just have supper together, then."

“If you like,” the girl said, indifferently. “But I must be home by eight.”

“What’s so important?” Ronald asked.

“Please, I don’t like it when people are inquisitive,” the girl pouted. “But if you must know, tonight’s the night my Sewing Club meets.”

“You never told me you belonged to a Sewing Club.”

“You never asked me,” Amy replied.

“But is that so vital?” Ronald persisted. “I mean, couldn’t you just skip it for one evening? I thought we could really go out and have a good time—”

“Sorry!” Amy Cooper shook her head. “Tonight we do fancy-work and I can’t possibly miss the lessons. Rut if you like, I’ll let you take me to a nice expensive place for dinner.”

“That’ll be fine,” said Ronald, and he really thought so. He reached out across the table, actually on the very verge of taking her hand, when suddenly there was another interruption.

The interruption was big, bluff and burly. It had blonde, curly hair and a boyish grin.

“Ah, here you are!” it boomed. “Looking all over for you.” It boldly squeezed the hand Ronald had timidly reached for and sat down at the table.

“Relax, folks!” it said. “Stu Lacey has arrived and the situation is well in hand.”

Ronald didn’t agree. He wanted no part of Stu Lacey, even as a gift—although he might look well on a silver platter, roasted and with an apple stuck in his mouth.

But Amy beamed fondly on the blonde young man. “How are things up in Advertising?” she asked.

“The most,” Stu answered. “Did you see today’s spread on the fashion show? Featuring Laura Lee, of course. Judging from the pictures she sent, she’s got quite a spread herself. Had trouble squeezing her into eight columns full.” He chuckled.

Well, thought Ronald, he could afford to. He was the nephew of the owner of the store, he was young and handsome, he had the world by the tail and Amy Cooper by the. hand.

Amy was smiling up at him. “I know all about the fashion show,” she said. “Ronald was just telling me.”

“That’s right, he’s in the department, isn’t he?” Stu Lacey grinned. “Is it true you’re ashamed of your work?” he asked. “I understand you fellows in the brassiere department never admit what kind of jobs you have. When anybody asks, you say that you’re engaged in an uplift movement.”

RONALD, who had heard every possible variation on the feeble gag during the past five years, smiled stoically. But Stu was undeterred.

“Well, I must say I envy you, with Laura Lee on your hands this afternoon. What’s your part in the show, exactly? Are you doing the fitting? You two may end up as bosom friends.”

Ronald flushed. “Please,” he said. “After all, there’s a young lady present —”

But to his dismay, the young lady was snickering. “I think that’s cute,” she said. “Stu, you’re such a character! Don’t be so stuffy, Ronald.”

“That’s his business,” Stu remarked. “Stuffing and padding.

Putting lip a good front, you know.” He glanced at his watch. “But say, aren’t you due back upstairs? The show must be just about ready to start in a few minutes.”

Ronald noted the time, gulped, and rose. “Yes,” he sighed, misererably. “I’d better run along.” He eyed the girl. “Coming, Amy?”

Stu waved him away. “I’ll take care of her,” he said. “You go ahead and handle Laura Lee. If that’s the correct term, and I think it is.”

Ronald blushed, nodded, and stumbled away. He clutched the chemistry set to his bosom and rode grimly to his destination.

Ladies’ Lingerie was fluttering with activity. Milling and jostling, the audience pushed its way down the aisles toward the north end of the Department, where a wooden platform had been erected and backed by curtained partitions. Chairs had been set up in semicircular rows facing the stage and Ronald arrived too late to supervise the job.

Indeed, the store’s organist was already installed at one corner of the stage, and electricians switched on a battery of lights. The show was virtually ready to begin.

Ronald started for the back, to deposit his package, when Mr. Bickerstaff suddenly materialized from behind the curtains. He spied Ronald and bore down on him.

“Where have you been?” he demanded. “And what have you there?”

“Nothing,” the young man gulped. “Just a chemistry set I bought.”

“Chemistry sets? Here we are, up to our neck in brassieres, and you’re out buying chemistry sets.” He snorted. “Damned things are no good anyway—unless you can use them to invent some kind of bust-developer.” He seized Ronald by the shoulder. “Take a look at the crowd,” he groaned.

Ronald eyed the capacity audience. The women had filled the semicircle of seats surrounding the stage.

“Looks like a full house,” he said.

“Bah!” Mr. Bickerstaff was not impressed. “Same old story. Too fat or too thin. Fat ones should go to the hammock department. Thin ones don’t need our brassieres either—they can stop downstairs at the drug counter and buy a box of Band-Aids.” He glowered. “But we’re going to sell them merchandise this afternoon, we’ve got to! And there’d better not be any slipups.”

Ronald nodded. “Is Miss Lee here?”

“Of course. She’s backstage, dressing. Or undressing. A very charming young lady.” Bickerstaff’s jaw relaxed a trifle.

“What does she look like?”

“Lovely,” said the Head Buyer. “Perfect 36.”

“Blonde or brunette?”

“I didn’t notice,” Bickerstaff snapped. “Who has time for such nonessentials?” He waved Ronald towards the stage. “Get up there and tell the organist we’re ready to start. Then pick up that carton of handbills and pass them out to the clerks backstage. They can distribute them to the audience during intermission—we've got all the sale prices listed on the things."

The young man hesitated. "Can't I just put my chemistry set in the office, first?"

"Park it backstage," Bickerstaff commanded. "There's no time to delay. Now, move!"

RONALD moved. He spoke to the organist, and that worthy began to pedal his extremities. Then Ronald darted behind the curtains and found the three clerks and the carton of handbills. For a time he was quite busy. Too busy to notice the half-dozen models who wriggled past him, awaiting their cues; too busy to listen as Mr. Bickerstaff stepped out on the platform and delivered his opening announcements to the crowd.

The show was well under way when at last Ronald was free to peer through the curtains and watch its progress.

To the accompaniment of music, the girls paraded across the stage and down the aisle into the audience. They promenaded one at a time, while Mr. Bickerstaff described the undergarments they wore.

Ronald, despite his familiarity with the business, found himself blushing once more at the sight of the models. He scanned the audience, grateful in the realization that it was almost entirely feminine. Here and there the spotlight reflected from a bald head, but men were few and far between. Ronald noted one wizened little character in the second row who seemed incongruously out of place—but decided that like the others, he must be somebody's captive husband. Perhaps he belonged to the fat dowager beside him; the one with the gaudy diamond bracelet worn over her gloved wrist.

Ronald watched the bracelet glitter until his eyes were dazzled by other things, such as the gleam of platinum in a girl's hair.

She stepped out on the platform and a low murmur arose from the crowd. They had recognized Laura Lee.

The starlet made her appearance—and an almost complete appearance it was—in a black negligee, covered with sequins that matched her hair. She turned her head and Ronald caught a glimpse of an oval face and slanting eyes. Then she advanced to the center of the platform and began her promenade.

All eyes centered on the girl, and Mr. Bickerstaff began to do a bit of quiet gloating. As she moved down the aisle, Ronald found himself admiring the metronomic precision with which Laura Lee undulated her trim torso—at least he told himself it was the precision he admired, rather than the torso itself. Somewhat abashed at the notion, he glanced hastily away.

And it was then that he caught the glitter of the diamond bracelet once more. The fat dowager was leaning forward, and the bracelet seemed to be slipping off her wrist.

Slipping? Not exactly. The seedy little man beside her was quietly unclasping it and preparing to drop it into his pocket.

Ronald parted the curtains and bounded across the stage. Even as the little man removed the bracelet, Ronald was halfway to his side, and his sudden shout stopped the starlet's promenade performance.

The fat woman turned to stare. The small thief looked up, startled, just as Laura Lee brushed her way past down the aisle. Swiftly the small man rose, stumbled forward.

Ronald caught him by the collar and plumped him back down again in his seat.

LAURA Lee stood uncertainly as Mr. Bickerstaff bore down on the scene in full cry. "What's the meaning of this?" he demanded.

Ronald shrugged. "Sorry to interrupt," he answered. "But I saw this lady being robbed of her diamond bracelet."

The fat dowager clutched her wrist with sudden dismay, to say nothing of pudgy fingers. "It's gone!" she gasped.

“Of course it is,” Ronald nodded, “And I think it’s in this man’s pocket.”

The little wizened gentleman looked up and wrinkled his nose in distaste. “Ain’t nothin’ in my pocket,” he announced. “Nothin’ but fuzz.”

“Let me see.”

Mr. Bickerstaff leaned over and groped in the right hand suitcoat pocket with his fingers. Then he repeated the performance on the left pocket.

“He’s right,” Bickerstaff announced. “Nothing in there but fuzz.”

“Try his trousers,” Ronald urged.

The little man wrinkled his nose again. “No use,” he said. “Same kinda fuzz down there, too.”

“But my bracelet is gone!” wailed the woman.

“And I saw him take it,” Ronald insisted.

The little man scowled. “You tryin’ to incinerate I’m a cannon?” he demanded. “I’ll sue the store!” His voice was penetrating, and the crowd didn’t miss a word.

Mr. Bickerstaff began to redden behind the ears, as if a beautiful sunset was disappearing behind his bald head.

“You’ll sue?” shrilled the dowager. “My bracelet’s gone. I’ll sue!”

“Let’s both sue, lady,” the little man suggested. “I gotta good shyster—he’ll take this jernt for every penny it’s got.”

Bickerstaff glanced at both of his irate customers, then turned to Ronald. “You!” he muttered. “You started this! I’ll give you just thirty seconds to produce that bracelet or else—”

Ronald waved his arms. “But I tell you, I saw it happen. He did take it, and then he got up and tried to run away, and he bumped into Miss Lee, and—”

A gleam of comprehension came into his eyes as he turned and advanced to the edge of the platform where the statuesque platinum blonde still poised en negligee.

“Now I understand,” he said. “That’s what happened. He planted the bracelet on her.”

“Twenty seconds!” Bickerstaff hissed.

“Must be in the sleeve.” Ronald began to paw the starlet’s shoulder.

“Oops—forgot—this doesn’t have sleeves,” he said. “Then there’s only one place he could have put it. Down here—”

Laura Lee jumped a foot out of her professional aplomb. “Hey,” she demanded. “What do you think you’re doing?”

“Just looking for a bracelet,” Ronald explained, smiling placatingly at her and Mr. Bickerstaff.

“I don’t happen to wear any down there,” the starlet told him. “As you can all too plainly see. Now stop that—”

“Ten seconds!” Bickerstaff said. Ronald struggled desperately. “Please, Miss Lee,” he begged. “Hold still. I’m not doing what you think I’m doing.”

“Even if you were, I wouldn’t hold still,” she retorted. “Besides, your hands are cold.”

Laura Lee jerked away. The abrupt gesture catapulted Ronald to the floor, and there was a loud snap. At first he thought the girl’s patience had given way, but a roar from the crowd told him otherwise. It was her negligee. Floating down, it covered his face just in time to hide the blush. Amidst the din, Laura Lee’s brassiered bosom and pantied posterior scooted across the stage to the curtains.

Over the howling of the mob Bickerstaff had no trouble in making himself heard. “You’re through!” he shouted “Get out of here this minute!”

Somehow Ronald managed to stumble backstage, pick up his chemical set, and depart.

There was no question about seeing Amy Cooper for dinner. There was only the need to get home, fast.

After what had happened today, he had no future with Amy. He had no future with Ladies’ Lingerie, either. In fact, Ronald meditated bitterly, he had no future at at all.

ARRIVING at the apartment, he flung himself into a chair and the depths of the most profound depression he had ever known.

This, he decided, was the end. Might as well finish the job.

“I’ll kill myself, that’s what I’ll do,” he muttered. Rising, he groped his way into the darkness of the kitchen. “Cut my throat,” he murmured. He opened the table drawer and fumbled for a knife. “Ouch!” Ronald yelled, as his finger grazed the edge of a piece of cutlery. He retreated to the parlor, gating at his bleeding thumb. “Can’t use a knife,” he decided. “Too sharp. I’m liable to hurt myself.”

Ronald was not exactly in a logical frame of mind, but it would be a mistake to judge him harshly. Five years in Ladies’ Lingerie does things to a man.

Abruptly he contemplated the chemistry set.

“Just the thing,” he told himself. “Poison. There should be a lot of poisonous chemicals in there.”

He unwrapped the Little Jim Dandy Kit, took off the cover, and considered the imposing array of vials and powders. A large bottle of colorless liquid attracted his eye.

“Might as well try it,” he sighed. He raced out to the kitchen and returned with a glass. He was too well-trained to think of drinking out of the bottle.

Pouring three ounces of the liquid, Ronald closed his eyes and drew the glass to his lips. “Well,” he whispered. “Here goes nothing.”

The stuff smelled strong. He had to force himself to swallow, and then his throat began to burn. Somewhere in Ronald’s stomach it seemed as though a Boy Scout had rubbed two sticks together and achieved spectacular results.

“Oooh!” Ronald groaned. “I’m dying! Wonder what it was—cyanide?”

Through tear-dimmed eyes he read the label. “Pure Grain Alcohol—180 Proof.”

Ronald had just taken his first drink.

Surprisingly, the bonfire in his stomach seemed to subside, and there was now only a warm glow, that rose throughout his body and heated his face and forehead pleasantly.

Hardly realizing what he was doing, Ronald poured again. Once more he drank, and this time an entire troop of Boy Scouts won their merit badges in his esophagus.

But he didn't die. And now, somewhat woozily—for six full ounces of Grain Alcohol can kindle quite a conflagration—Ronald grasped vials and bottles at random and shook a small portion of their contents into the glass. An ounce of red, an ounce of green, an ounce of blue; jigger of that yellow liquid, a pinch of whitish powder. The resultant cocktail began to simmer and fizzle as the various components seethed and blended into a purple liquid.

He stared at the glass, and as the warmth of the alcohol bathed his body, he hesitated for a moment. Maybe he was making a mistake, after all. But no—his girl was gone, his job was gone, and he had nothing to live for. This was the best way.

Closing his eyes, he drained the glass at a gulp.

Boy Scouts and bonfire vanished from his stomach, hurled into nothingness by the force of an atomic explosion. A Bikini Test reached its successful conclusion somewhere in the neighborhood of Ronald's liver.

With a gasp, the young man tottered and fell up.

He landed with a dull thud, on the ceiling.

CHAPTER II

IT was several moments before he opened his eyes. Dazed, he stared down at the room below. He blinked, closed his eyes again, then parted his lids once more.

The sight remained, unchanged. Ronald was lying on the ceiling and staring down at the parlor.

“I’m dead!” he whispered. “If I could get through I’d float right up to heaven. But—where’s my body?”

He searched the floor, seeking to catch sight of his corpse. But there was none to be seen. Glancing down, he was aware of his material presence, apparently quite intact, lying here on the ceiling.

“That’s impossible!” he told himself. “How can I be lying up here?”

Now that he noticed it, he wasn’t exactly recumbent. He was floating rather; floating ever so gently at the top of the room. He turned over gingerly, banging his head on the chandelier.

The sharp stab of pain convinced him.

“I’m alive,” he decided. “But what keeps me from falling? I should be on the floor.”

There was a sudden whoosh and Ronald thumped down on the carpet. Fortunately, he hadn’t had time to tense his muscles and he made a perfect three-point landing without undue damage to his body. His mind, however, was far from intact.

“This can’t be,” he muttered, dazedly. “Those chemicals are giving me hallucinations. Bumping my head on the chandelier—I must have imagined it.”

He tried to stand up. More accurately, he visualized himself as standing, and found that he was floating to his feet. It was a giddy feeling, and he didn’t exactly enjoy it. He willed himself to stand erect, and that only made him feel worse. Truth to tell, Ronald was more than a little drunk. The alcohol—plus the haphazard combination concocted from the chemistry set—had done its work only too well.

He wavered from side to side, then glided over to a mirror on the wall. Conscious of his slight stature, he rose on tiptoe to peer at himself. Hardly aware of his actions, he lifted about a foot in the air and hung there, staring.

“True,” he mumbled. “There I am. So I must be alive. And I can float.” Dizzy, he closed his eyes and lay down on the air. Now the sensation was rather pleasant. He opened his eyes again and waved his arms, at the same time willing himself to move towards the sofa.

“Foolish,” he said. “Don’t need the sofa. Perfectly comfortable right here.”

And he was. As fright left him, bewilderment gradually faded away. He began to move around the room, accustoming himself to this new method of locomotion. There were, he discovered, two ways of controlling his floating ability. He could use his arms and legs for steering and thus swim through the air; that was one method. The other, and more startling, was simply to will himself to a certain height at a certain distance. Both systems seemed equally effective.

“Lightheaded,” he murmured.

That’s how I feel. Must be awfully drunk. Everything going around and around.” No sooner had he expressed the thought than he caught sight of himself in the mirror, revolving in midair like a human top.

“If Amy could only see me now,” he told himself.

Well, why not? Ronald arrested his movement and floated over to the clock. It wasn’t much past seven. He could go over and visit Amy until it was time for her to leave for the Sewing Circle.

Come to think of it, that wasn’t such a bad idea. After all, he had to tell somebody about this seeming miracle. Inebriated though he was, Ronald realized that his peculiar condition warranted investigation and explanation; yet he could hardly venture to call upon a stranger. Amy would be the logical person to see.

But when he willed himself down once more and attempted to head for the door, he found himself weaving dangerously. “No use,” he sighed. “Too much to drink. Never make those stairs.”

But then, he remembered, he didn’t have to. Why bother with stairs?

RONALD put on his hat and coat. The night was chilly and he didn’t want to run any risks.

After thus taking all suitable precautions for his health . . . and safety, he turned and jumped out of the fourth-storey window.

For a moment he felt panic as he fell. Then he righted his body by flailing his arms and with effortless inclination, propelled himself down the alleyway at a height of about twenty feet. Taking a deep breath, he shot forward across the street and into the continuation of the alley in the next block.

Luckily, traffic was light, and the night was moonless. His airy progress was unnoted. His body whizzed past the back windows of countless apartments, but nobody looked out to observe him. The city-dwellers were following their usual nocturnal patterns this evening; watching television, quarreling, or drinking beer. Some were watching television and quarreling at the same time. Some were watching television and drinking beer. A few of the more impoverished ones were just quarreling and drinking beer while watching the neighbors' television. It was a typical night in an urban community.

Typical, that is, for everyone except Ronald Weems. He was flying, and he loved it.

The sudden exhilaration surprised him. Part of it was due to his intoxicated condition, of course, but over and above that he felt the surge of unexpected release. He sensed power and a new awareness that came of finding himself free.

He had been short. Now he was tall.

He had been confined to Ladies' Lingerie for five years. Now his domain was limitless.

He had wanted to do away with, himself. Now—

"I'm really living," he whispered, as the sharp wind cut his cheeks, as the night air wrapped around him like a black blanket. He waved his arms gaily, willed himself forward at greater speed.

What would that old fool Bickerstaff say if he could see this? For that matter, what would anyone say? For the first time, the full possibilities of his newfound talent revealed themselves. Why, he could become rich and famous! Maybe he could go before the CAB and get himself a commercial license—pick off a fat government contract as a chartered carrier of airmail.

But Amy would advise him, she'd know what he ought to do. Ronald chuckled as he flew. He passed the city hall with its clock-tower. Almost eight. If he hurried, he'd just manage to catch her before she went out. He could scarcely wait to see the look on her face.

Amy's apartment building loomed ahead. Ronald swooped down along the alley and circled the side of the structure until he reached her third-storey living-room window. The shades were up, the light was on. He'd just make a landing out in front and ring her doorbell. On the other hand—

On the other hand, why bother? Ronald chuckled again. He'd fly right up to the window itself and surprise her.

He did.

But, unfortunately for Ronald, Amy surprised him.

For as Ronald gazed through the glass, at precisely five minutes past eight, the young lady was just opening her front door. At first he thought he was too late—that Amy was departing for her Sewing Circle date.

Then he changed his mind, for Stu Lacey walked into her living-room.

A great deal happened in the next five minutes, but none of it seemed to have anything to do with what usually goes on in a Sewing Circle. There was, admittedly, quite a bit of fancy work, although the only thing knitted was Ronald's brow.

Stu Lacey and Amy had made themselves extremely at home on the sofa, and there was no telling what might have happened next if Amy hadn't peered over her shoulder.

She let out a subdued shriek.

"What's the matter, baby?" Stu demanded. "Did I pinch you too hard?"

"No, but you'd better," the girl declared. "I could swear I just saw a face looking through the window."

Stu turned and shook his head. "Nothing there," he said. "Besides, it's impossible. There's no porch or fire-escape, and we're three flights up. Must be your imagination.".

Amy nodded and pursed her lips invitingly. Stu bent towards them in the age-old manner of romance, to say nothing of a kid trying to get a drink from a bubbler. Then it was his turn to freeze at attention.

“You’re right!” he declared. “There is something out there. I just saw it myself.”

He rose and headed for the window. Amy followed.

“Gone now,” he muttered. “But I’m sure I did see a face.” He opened the window and peered down at the sheer drop to the street below.

“Nothing now, though,” he assured the girl. “Maybe we’-re both upset. How about a drink?”

Amy nodded. Leaving the window open, they repaired to the hall cabinet and the girl procured a bottle.

“Never mind the soda,” Stu said. “I want mine straight. That face gave me a nasty start.”

“You got a nasty start the day you were born,” a voice declared, hallowly.

“What did you say?” Stu Lacey demanded.

“I didn’t say anything,” Amy answered, returning from the kitchen with glasses.

“Could have sworn I heard somebody talking,” her companion muttered. “Oh, well. Let me pour—”

“Eek!” eeked the girl. “There it is again!” She pointed at the window. Stu dashed towards it but once more he peered out upon darkness.

“We’re both imagining things,” he decided.

Amy shook her head. “Not me! This time I’m positive I saw a face.”

“What did it look like?”

“All staring and horrible. It must be a Peeping Tom.”

“Peeping Tomcat, more likely,” Stu said. “See for yourself, there’s no one here.”

Satisfied, the girl nodded and poured a drink. Stu closed the window.

“Better?” he asked. “Come on, baby, relax.”

He took her into his arms and demonstrated in a very active way just what he meant by relaxation. Once more, the girl started.

“Stu,” she whispered. “I thought you closed the window?”

“I did.”

“Well, don’t look now, but it’s open again.”

The window was indeed open. A cold blast blew up Stu Lacey’s neck.

“This joint is haunted,” he mumbled, pouring himself another drink.

“I told you!” Amy shivered, and not entirely from cold. She grabbed the bottle and reduced its contents. “You should have seen that face—all grinning and horrid, just hanging there and goggling at me.”

“Was not.”

“Was not what?”

“Was not goggling.”

“I didn’t say you were, Stu,” the girl told him.

“I never said you did.” He blinked. “That wasn’t my voice.” It was his turn to reach for the bottle. “I’m going to close that window,” he promised. “But not until I have another drink.”

“Good idea,” the voice boomed from behind them. “Let’s all have one.”

RONALD WEEMS stood lurching in one corner of the room. His face was reddened equally by exposure to wind and to 180 proof alcohol, but he grinned amiably.

“Quite a Sewing Club you have here, Amy,” he remarked. “For a small membership you certainly get a lot accomplished.”

Amy Cooper flushed. “Why—why, I was just about to leave, Ronald,” she said. “Stu is driving me over. He’s going to carry my yarn.”

“I don’t see any yarn,” Ronald answered. “Except maybe the one you were handing me.” He took the bottle from Stu Lacey’s nerveless fingers and downed a healthy swig.

Stu stared at him intently. “How did you sneak in here?” he demanded. “The door’s locked.”

“Window’s open,” Ronald reminded him.

“Now don’t tell me you crawled up the bare bricks for three storeys—that’s impossible.”

“Of course it is,” Ronald agreed, mildly. “Matter of fact, I flew.”

“Flew?”

“Floated, if you prefer. Or rather, if I prefer. I can float or fly, whichever I choose.”

“You’re drunk!” Stu Lacey accused.

“Right.” Ronald wobbled, then recovered his balance. “That makes it even more fun. Did you ever try floating when you’re drunk? Very strange sensation.”

Amy Cooper put her hand on his arm. “No wonder you didn’t take me to dinner,” she said. “You were out getting high instead.”

“Sure.” Ronald tilted the bottle again. “Easy for me to get high. Want to see?”

Holding the bottle, he performed an entrechat that would have done credit to Nijinsky and ended up with his head against the ceiling.

Stu Lacey and the girl found themselves staring open-mouthed, but neither of them applauded.

“Think of it,” Ronald called down to them. “Two hours ago I was finished. The brassiere sale turned out to be a bust. I thought I was down for the count. And now I’m a rising young man.”

He kicked his legs again. “Not used to liquor,” he apologized.

“Pardon me. Maybe I’d better lay down and take a little nap.” And he stretched out on the ceiling, closing his eyes.

Amy Cooper clutched her companion. “Do something,” she whispered. “This is serious.”

“You’re right,” Stu agreed. “He has the bottle up there.”

“I’m going to call the police,” Amy decided. “I don’t want a human fly hanging around my apartment.”

Ronald opened his eyes. “Not a human fly,” he muttered. “Not a Peeping Tom, either. Just flitting around, thought I’d drop in and pay you a little flying visit. That any reason to call the police?"

Stu Lacey was holding his head in his hands. "I don't believe it," he moaned. "Tell me I'm drunk. Tell me I'm seeing things."

"But we're both seeing it," Amy reminded him. "And: hearing it, too."

"I'm not an it," Ronald said. "Just a poor misguided square who's never been around. So all right, I've learned my lesson. Don't bother about me, Amy. Go on with your Sewing Circle or whatever you call it. I'll just catch forty winks up here, out of your way."

Stu pulled himself together with an effort. "Now see here," he began. "You can't get away with this—"

"Oh, stick to your knitting!" Ronald peered down at Amy Cooper. "Maybe it's a good thing I found out about you the way I did," he murmured. "Maybe that's why I was given the power."

The girl wasn't following his remarks. She was heading for the phone. "Close the window, Stu," she called. "Don't let him get away! I'm calling the police right now. He's crazy."

SHOCKED into sudden sobriety, Ronald swooped after her. "But Amy, you don't understand—I came to you for help, I want to explain what happened—"

Amy Cooper grabbed the phone and yanked the cord into the bedroom, slamming the door. "Keep away from me," she screamed. "Stu, close that window and grab him!"

Stu did his best. As Ronald soared overhead, the blonde young man rushed for the window.

"All right, if that's the way you want to play," Ronald muttered. "Here, have a drink on me."

He dropped the bottle. The bottle, landing squarely on Stu Lacey's head, dropped him.

And Ronald dropped out of the open window.

For a moment he hung there, kicking empty air. He was badly shaken. It was true that he'd come to Amy Cooper seeking aid. Instead of consolation he'd found consternation. Now he had literally nowhere to turn.

What was worse, from a distance came the faint wail of sirens. The sound grew louder.

"She did it!" he told himself. "She called the cops!"

Quickly, he swooped along the alley. He had almost reached the end when he saw the flash of a squadcar's searchlight beam. Somersaulting in midair, he reversed his path and soared back to the other end.

Then he realized that his method of locomotion was, to say the least, conspicuous. He willed himself to descend and landed with a thump that rocked his heels, on the alley pavement close to the far exit.

The searchlight stabbed against the apartment building walls behind him, and he could hear the sound of running feet. Suddenly a voice rang out. "There he is! Stop—stop or I'll shoot!"

Alarmed, Ronald crouched beside a garbage-can. Peering out, he discovered that the remarks were not addressed to him, but to a diminutive figure that now floundered up the alley towards him. Behind came three minions of the law, their long arms extended, hands brandishing revolvers.

A shot echoed through the alley, then another. The running figure weaved and ducked, but the searchlight glared. The pursuers raised their weapons again.

This time the light shone directly down the alley, outlining their moving target. This time they would not miss.

Ronald made his decision. He didn't know who was running, or why, but he did know that he disliked policemen; especially policemen with guns. They were on the side of the Bickerstaffs and the Stu Laceys—and as such, automatically his enemies. Besides, he couldn't let a man be shot down in cold blood. Maybe that's why he had the power, too.

At any rate, he'd find out. And now.

With a welling of will that propelled him forward like a cannonball, Ronald whizzed along the alley, scooped up the running figure in his arms, and soared a hundred feet above the highest rooftop.

The searchlight swept crazily, seeking him in the sky, and from far below came the whine of bullets and the wail of bewildered men.

But Ronald flew fast and free into the night, cradling the diminutive fugitive.

A voice chirped feebly in his ear. “Solid, Dad!” it said. “Dig that crazy jet propulsion!”

Ronald gazed down.

Smiling up at him tenderly was the little pickpocket from the department store.

CHAPTER III

“HOW did you get here?” he gasped.

“Search me, buddy. Here I am, running down the alley and minding my own business, and you come along and make with the break. I was just gonna ask how you did it.” The little man scowled in perplexity. “You don’t happen to be a character name of Superman, huh?”

Ronald shook his head and shifted the little man’s weight to his left arm.

“My name’s Ronald Weems,” he said.

“Pleaseda meetcha, I’m sure. Hey, wait a minute!” The shrill voice rose. “You’re the party what hollered copper on me this afternoon, ain’cha? In the department store, where I was negotiatin’ for that diamond bracelet!”

Ronald nodded ruefully.

“So what am I hanging around you for? Lemme go!” the little man wailed.

“I wouldn’t make such a request if I were you,” Ronald declared, gazing down at the city far below. His companion followed his gaze and shuddered.

“Yeah. Guess you’re right at that. But look, Dad, where you figger on taking me?”

Ronald shrugged as best he could, under the circumstances. “I haven’t the faintest idea,” he declared, dodging the City Hall tower. “Want me to drop you somewhere?”

“You better not!” the man gasped.

Ronald slowed down. “Then perhaps you might as well introduce yourself and tell me what you happened to be doing in that alley-way.”

“My name’s Guilty Mil tie, and I was just dodging cops is all.”

“But why were you dodging them?” Ronald persisted.

“So they wouldn’t catch me, of course,” Guilty Miltie answered. “Jeez, how dumb can you get.”

“Never mind that, now. I want the truth. What were you up to?”

“I was up to the second storey, if you must know,” Miltie admitted. “I’m a cannon, see?”

“Frankly, I don’t. You’re mighty small to be a weapon of any sort.”

“All the better,” Miltie declared. “Us short ones have a advantage. We’re closer to the pocket. We can snitch and switch.”

“You mean you’re a pickpocket, eh?”

“I was, until this afternoon. You reformed me.”

Ronald smiled. “You mean, because I foiled you in your attempt to steal that bracelet?”

The little cannon nodded. “That’s it. I figgered my techneek was shot, I’d better give it up and reform. So that’s why I was in the alley tonight. I decided to go in for burglary, instead.”

“Oh, great!” Ronald groaned. “Not so great. Somebody got the cops, and I had to drop from the second-storey window and slam for a lam. Lucky you come along or I’d be real cool in the cooler.” He winked at Ronald. “Got to thank you for that, pal. But hey, how’d you manage this flying trick? You got a motor in your pants, or something?”

The young man shook his head. “No. It’s just a little talent I seem to have developed.”

“Suits me fine,” Miltie declared. “Well, it doesn’t seem to suit anyone else. I went to tell my girlfriend about it, and she’s the one who called the police. They saw me take off with you, so I expect everybody's looking for me by this time. Which reminds me—what am I going to do? I can't take you home with me. They'll stake out there."

"Then how about coming along with me?" Miltie asked. "I think a guy with your gimmick can go a long ways."

"Where, for instance?"

Guilty Miltie pointed towards the left. "Across the river," he said. "Maybe I'm only a little cannon, but I know some real torpedos. The guy we want to see is Ace Diamond."

Ronald hesitated. "Is Mr. Diamond a crook?" he inquired.

"Nah, don't worry. He's just a respectable big-time gambler, is all."

"Well, in that case—" Ronald sighed. "Oh, what have I got to lose? Show me where to go."

GUILTY Miltie showed him.

Five minutes later they spiralled down beside what appeared to be a deserted warehouse on the waterfront across the river.

"Good to get my feet on terror firmer," Miltie declared. "That was some ride. Come on, here we are. Just you let me do the explaining, see?"

He led Ronald up to a doorway and knocked discreetly three times. Nothing happened.

"I don't understand it," the little pickpocket muttered. "That's always suppose to be the signal, ain't it? Knocking three times? Oh, well."

He began to knock less discreetly with both hands and then with his feet. That did it. In a moment the panelled top of the door slid open and a face stared out. It was a big fat face that hadn't seen a razor for some time.

"So?" it muttered.

"So let us in," Guilty Miltie answered.

"Who are you?"

"Don't you recognize me? I'm a friend of Ace Diamond's."

The face wagged dolefully. “Huh,” it said. “If you was a friend of Ace Diamond’s, you’d know he ain’t got no friends.”

“But I got to see him—I’m in trouble.”

“You’ll be in more,” the face promised, “unless you scram outta here.” The panel slammed shut.

“This is embarrassing,” Miltie said. “Can’t figger why he’s so cagey. Must be a big game going on tonight.” Suddenly his eyes narrowed. “Hey, we can still get in. I know a way.”

“How?”

The little man pointed overhead. “Window,” he said. “Come on.”

“But won’t Mr. Diamond be angry if somebody breaks in on him so—abruptly?”

“Nah. He’ll love it!” Miltie grabbed Ronald by the shoulders. “Come on,” he urged. “Going up!” And up they went, to the second floor, hovering around the side of the building until Ronald’s small passenger discovered an unlocked window. The room beyond was dark and deserted. In they climbed, tumbling to the floor. Miltie headed for the door, which led down a passageway to a large, well-lighted room.

Ronald stood there, getting his first glimpse of a gambling den.

The space around the half-dozen green tables was well occupied by eager patrons. Two roulette wheels spun, a chuck-a-luck cage rattled, dice thumped. The operators behind the tables wore evening clothes, and they weren’t the only ones—many of the customers were similarly attired, although several seemed in the process of losing their boiled shirts.

Down at the far end of the room the largest crowd was gathered around a big dice-table, behind which sat a corpulent gentleman with a dazzling smile. Ronald didn’t need an introduction once he saw the smile. The man had diamonds set in his teeth.

“That’s your friend, isn’t it?” he whispered.

Miltie nodded, “Yeah. And I can see he’s busy, all right.”

Ace Diamond was indeed quite busy. At the moment he was engaged in raking in a large bundle of greenbacks.

“He seems to be very lucky tonight,” Ronald observed.

“Sure.” Miltie chuckled. “He’s lucky nobody’s examined his dice.”

“You mean Mr. Diamond cheats?”

Miltie shivered. “Don’t say things like that around here,” he said. “He’s kind of sensitive. Also, his boys are.” A nod indicated half a dozen solitary figures lounging at intervals along the far wall.

“I’m not so sure I want to meet your Mr. Diamond after all,” Ronald said.

“Aw, come on—” Miltie started forward, then stopped.

“What’s the matter?”

“That dame,” he wheezed. “The one with the dice now—”

Ronald stared, recognized the platinum hair. “Laura Lee, isn’t it?”

“It is. And if she recognizes me, I’m cooked!”

“Hey, where are you going?”

But the little pickpocket had already gone, leaving no forwarding address. He darted through the crowd, pausing only to snatch two wallets, and plunged down the front stairs.

RONALD turned to follow, then hesitated. Laura Lee was up here. After he’d been fired this afternoon she must have discovered the missing bracelet on her person. Perhaps she could vindicate him if he asked her. It was worth a try. He could at least speak to her.

Accordingly he moved down the aisle towards the big table. As he did so he wobbled a bit. “Liquor,” he reminded himself. Although the giddy feeling didn’t seem to be connected with intoxication. Rather it was as though the chemicals he had absorbed were bubbling and seething in his system. A wave of heat scorched through his skull and he closed his eyes. When he opened them again he had the sensation of being able to see more clearly than before.

And what he saw was very simple. Laura Lee, holding the dice, was tossing the contents of her purse onto the green table. Ace Diamond grinned at her, counted the bills, matched them from his pile.

The starlet did not return his smile. “This had better be it,” she declared. “I still don’t see how you managed to clean me in fifteen minutes.”

“Luck,” Ace Diamond grunted. “Come on, let ’em roll!”

The platinum blonde picked up the dice and held them for a moment. Beneath the mask of mascara, the patina of powder, Ronald caught the momentary glimpse of a nervous tic. The girl was frightened, he decided. He knew that look only too well—he’d worn it himself, many times.

Ronald regarded the dice in her hand. He hoped she’d win now. Let’s see, what did it take? A seven, or an eleven. Of course, that’s what she was muttering. “Come on, seven!”

“Come on, seven,” Ronald repeated, under his breath.

The dice bounced down on the table, hit the backboard, came to rest. A five and a two.

“Ah!” sighed the girl.

“Well, whaddya know!” Ace Diamond shrugged and glanced at the spectators, then at Laura Lee. “Your dice, your bet.”

She pushed the entire stack of bills forward. “I feel as if my luck has changed,” she said.

Again she threw the dice. Ronald remembered that four and three also make seven. Curiously enough, these were the numbers that came up.

So did Ace Diamond’s eyebrows.

“Well, I’ll be damned,” he said, thus demonstrating his ability to predict a sure thing. “Do you mind if I give you a new pair of dice, lady?”

Laura Lee eyed him suspiciously. “I rather like these,” she pouted.

Ronald edged over to her and nudged her. A wild surmise gleamed in his eyes. “Go ahead,” he whispered. “Let him switch.”

The starlet glanced at him in surprise, then curiously.

“Haven’t I seen you somewhere before?” she asked.

“We met informally,” Ronald muttered. “But I wish you’d take my advice. I think you’ve got a winning streak.”

The platinum curls tossed. “All right.” She faced the fat gambler. “Bring out the ivories.”

Ace Diamond nudged a sallow gentleman at his left, who immediately produced a fresh pair of dice. He rolled them out on the table to the girl, and as she scooped them up Ronald noted that they had landed to show one and one—snake-eyes. This was not in itself unusual, because these dice happened to be covered with nothing but single dots on every side.

Laura Lee held them without inspecting them. She turned to Ronald and smiled. “Well, Mister, seeing as you’re advising me, what do I bet?”

Again Ronald felt a strange surge, compounded of equal parts of power, confidence, and Grain Alcohol. “Shoot the works,” he said.

The girl pushed her imposing stack of folding money forward. Ace Diamond smiled. His left-hand man counted the bills carefully, and Diamond matched them. It took everything he had in front of him, plus a sizable addition from his trousers pocket.

A reverent hush fell over the assemblage. The worshippers of Dame Fortune had deserted the minor altars and now crowded around this table, awaiting the major sacrifice to come.

Ace Diamond stuck a gold toothpick between his glittering fillings.

“Roll ’em, lady,” he urged.

And Laura Lee rolled ’em.

Six and one make seven, Ronald thought.

The dice bounced. A one came up. And then, another one.

Six, Ronald thought. That should be a six.

“Snake eyes!” Ace Diamond shouted. “I collect.”

He reached for the money, then his hands hesitated. Ronald broke the silence. “Perhaps you need glasses.” he said. “That’s a one and a six.”

“Glasses?” Diamond scowled. “Have I gone crazy, or did that one turn into a six just now.”

“You’re right, boss,” muttered the left-hand man. “I seen it myself.”

“But that’s impossible!” Diamond yelled, as Laura Lee scooped her winning into her handbag. “It can’t be a six. Somebody cheated—I know, on account of there’s nothing on them dice but ones.”

“Glasses,” Ronald said. “Nice, strong glasses. I know the name of a reliable optometrist—”

Ace Diamond stood up slowly and pushed his jaw halfway across the table. “You know a lot of things, don’t you, buddy?” he said. “Such as what the lady should bet, what comes up on the table. Very sharp. But I am not interested in your optometrist.”

“Sorry,” Ronald said.

“I am hoping you know the name of a good undertaker,” Ace Diamond continued. “Because unless the lady here gives back that dough, you are gonna need one, fast. Grab her, Thorstein.”

The sallow man named Thorstein put his hand on Laura Lee’s shoulder. Nobody made a move to stop him, because he put his other hand on the table—and there was a pistol in it.

Ronald gulped air, and at the same time absorbed confidence and sudden decision. He whirled the girl around and slipped an arm under hers.

“Don’t be scared,” he said. “No matter what happens. Just hang on tight. Or tightly. No time for grammatical niceties.”

And indeed, there wasn’t. Before the astonished starlet could frame a protest, her protesting frame was lifted off the ground and Ronald soared over the table.

Ace Diamond stared up, jaws gaping to reveal every one of the 18½ carats in his mouth.

The crowd gasped and scattered, as well they might, because Thorstein was waving his pistol.

“Ooohh!” gasped the girl. “He’ll shoot!”

Ronald lowered his head and crashed forward, brushing against the hanging light-fixture. The globes shattered and the room was plunged into darkness. A shot made a scarlet exclamation point to the crash of the chandelier.

There were screams and curses, and then guns blazed from the far wall as the other attendants got into the act.

“Wh-what are you doing?” quavered the girl, clinging to Ronald’s neck.

“Looking for the door I came in by,” he told her. “I think I know where it is, now. Keep your head down—here we go!”

And there they went, through the dark doorway and into the office beyond. The window was still conveniently open.

Kicking the door shut as he sailed past it, Ronald swirled for the window.

“Where are you going now?” breathed Laura Lee.

“Out, of course. Where else?”

“What a way to die!” Shuddering, she closed her eyes as Ronald jumped out the second-storey window, holding her in his arms.

He felt the now familiar falling sensation and almost automatically kicked his heels. Nothing happened. He was still falling—although far from still.

It wasn’t working!

Now it was Ronald’s turn to close his eyes. They were still closed when the two fugitives landed; a double landing in more ways than one. The first stop was momentary, on the canvas roof of a convertible that was speeding down the alleyway. When the roof collapsed, they collapsed, in the back seat of the car.

No bones were broken. As the car gained speed, screaming out of the alley on two wheels, they regarded each other in shocked surprise.

Then, almost simultaneously, they peered at the driver. He turned and leered at them cordially.

“Where to, folks?” said Guilty Miltie.

“Hanover Hotel,” breathed Laura Lee, and promptly fainted.

CHAPTER IV

"SHE'LL be all right," Miltie said, for the fifth time, as Ronald fanned the platinum blonde with a wad of greenbacks from her handbag. "What I wanna know is, what happened?"

Briefly, Ronald described his experiences since the pickpocket's departure. He omitted mention of the changing dice-numerals, however; that little detail still puzzled him. Even more baffling was the sudden loss of his strange powers.

"But what I want to know is," he concluded, "where did you get this car?"

"I come downstairs, see?" Miltie explained patiently. "And I decided to take a little walk for myself. Until in the parking lot back there I noticed this here car. So I figured walking is nice but riding is nicer."

"In other words, you stole the car."

"I borried it," the little man snapped. "I was gonna bring it back, honest I was. Maybe take a little drive out to California or someplace first. I figger it's a patriotic duty like, to see America first."

Ronald shook his head. He was at a loss for words. He was at a loss for thoughts, too. So much had happened to him today—so much that was baffling, inexplicable, and unpredictable. He could no longer apply his sense of values to a changed and apparently still-changing world. As late as this afternoon he'd have maintained a firm opinion that borrowing cars for trips to California was wrong. But then again, as late as this afternoon he'd have held an equally firm opinion about the impossibility of floating, flying, or changing the spots on dice.

No! it was too much for Ronald. His muscles ached from unaccustomed exertion, his head ached from unaccustomed contact with ceilings, chandeliers and convertible canvas. Besides, the glow of of the alcohol was wearing off.

Ronald was quite weary when the car pulled up before the entrance of the Hanover Hotel. He eyed the somnolent starlet. "Guess we'll have to carry her in," he said.

Guilty Miltie shook his head. “Not me, buddy,” he said. “She wakes up and what does she do? Recognizes me from this afternoon and hollers copper, that’s what. No, you gotta carry her alone. Besides, you can always fly up.”

“That’s just it,” Ronald murmured. “I can’t fly. Something’s wrong.”

“Your opinion,” retorted Miltie. “I figgered something was wrong when you could.” He gunned the motor. “Anyways, from now on, you’re on your own.”

“My own what?” Ronald asked. But Miltie didn’t answer. The convertible drove off, leaving the young man standing on the sidewalk with the girl in his arms.

“Wake up!” he said, shaking her violently. “You’re home!” Slowly, Laura Lee opened her eyes. Then she shuddered.

“Now I remember you! You’re the one who went after me this afternoon.”

“I wasn’t after you,” Ronald protested. “I was just after that diamond bracelet.”

“Not very flattering, are you?” Laura Lee sniffed. “Honestly, that’s all you men think of is money.”

“I wasn’t thinking of money,” he told her. “If I was, I could have stolen your purse just now while you were unconscious.”

“That’s right.” She smiled at him, and Ronald was surprised at the warmth in her eyes. “You did save me, didn’t you? But I can’t quite see how—diving out of the window that way—”

“Maybe a drink would help,” the girl suggested. “I have ever so much liquor up in my suite.”

“Lead the way,” Ronald answered. His reply surprised him; it was not like Ronald Weems to pay midnight visits to hotel suites in search of liquor. It was not like Ronald Weems to look fondly on young women who paraded around publicly in their undies; who gambled and drank and exhibited none of the demureness of Amy Cooper. But, on the other hand, he reminded himself, Amy Cooper wasn't particularly demure at heart. She drank, too. He'd learned that tonight, along with a lot of other things.

Going up to Laura Lee's suite seemed to be merely a matter of continuing the educational process.

ONCE established on a sofa, glass in hand, Ronald relaxed. The liquor was good; it didn't seem to burn nearly as much as the Grain Alcohol. And Laura Lee, under the softer light of a lamp, didn't seem nearly as hard and brassy. In fact, she was almost subdued.

"Now," she said. "Tell me about yourself."

"There's really nothing to tell," Ronald said. But he started to talk, and somehow the words came out. He meant to mention only the incidents of the day, but in the end he seemed to find it necessary to explain a lot of things. About Amy Cooper, and five years in Ladies' Lingerie, and the maiden aunts, and Mr. Bickerstaff.

Laura Lee refilled his glass and her own several times, and talking became increasingly easy. Ronald told her about the bracelet again, and she nodded.

"You were right, you know," she said. "I found it when I got back-stage. It must have slipped down into—anyway, I found it. But by that time you were gone. And this Mr. Bickerstaff told me he'd fired you. I felt just awful about it."

"You did?"

The girl's eyes widened. "Of course I did. Why do you suppose I went to that crummy gambling joint tonight? Do you think I spend all my time whooping it up?"

"I didn't know," Ronald said. "I thought all movie stars went in for debauchery."

"Sweet of you to say so." Laura Lee splashed more whiskey into their glasses with an angry gesture. "But for your information, I'm not a movie star. Just a starlet. That's a polite word for a girl who gets a stock contract, dyes her hair platinum, and poses for pinup pictures when she isn't running around the country on cheap publicity stunts like the Lingerie Show this afternoon."

She stood up and paced the carpet. "From the way you describe your relatives," she said, "you had aunts in your pants. They brought you up to be a Perfect Gentleman of the Old School. Isn't that it?" Ronald nodded miserably.

"Well, I didn't have aunts," Laura Lee continued. "I just had Momma. Or, rather, she had me. Momma always wanted me to be a Great Actress. So while you were learning to wipe your feet on the doormat, I was taking tap and ballet and elocution lessons. I got a lot of rules shoved down my throat, too. But Momma had her way. Before she died, I got this studio contract. And for the past two years I've stayed, doing a few bad bits in a few bad pictures—but mostly posing and chasing around this way. Up until today you were under Mr. Bickerstaff's thumb. Well, I had Mr. Flick."

"Mr. Flick?" Ronald echoed. "Mr. Flick is a flack. A public relations man to you; a cheap press-agent to me. He's the one who set up this deal today. He's the one who fired me after I raised glory hell about you being fired on account of that bracelet—"

"You raised hell on my account? And you got fired?"

She stared indignantly. "Well, he said he'd notify the studio that I'd made a public scene, and they'd fire me. And he pulled out right after dinner. So I took a few drinks and went to this Ace Diamond's place; Flick had told me about it, he always knows about such things. I had five hundred dollars and I thought if I was really fired, maybe I'd better use the money and try and see if I could win some more. Only I didn't, until you came along and changed my luck. And then you saved me, like the chivalrous goof you are —"

"I'm not a chivalrous goof," Ronald protested.

"Never contradict a lady," said Laura Lee. And kissed him.

Ronald learned that Grain Alcohol is not the only thing that can produce a strong reaction.

SHE snuggled on his lap and stroked his forehead. “Thanks,” she whispered. “Thanks for being so brave, and rushing me out of there. How you ever managed to jump up like that and put out the lights I’ll never know—and diving out of the window that way was wonderful.”

“B-but I didn’t jump,” Ronald insisted. “I flew. And when I went out the window I thought I could float down.”

Laura Lee sat back, biting her lower lip. “Huh?” she commented.

“Didn’t you realize I was flying?” Ronald persisted. “Wait, let me tell you about what happened this afternoon, after I got fired.”

And he completed his story—from the moment he opened the Little Jim Dandy Home Chemical Set until his arrival at the gambling den.

When he finished, Laura Lee poured silently, drank swiftly. “So that’s how it is,” she said. “Psychic trauma.”

It was Ronald’s turn to say, “Huh?”

“Shock reaction,” she said. “You poor, poor guy. Don’t you see what happened? Getting fired that way just tore your world to bits, didn’t it? So you went home and decided to end it all, didn’t you?”

“Are you trying to tell me I’m crazy?” Ronald asked. “All this happened—I know it did.”

Laura Lee shook her head. “Of course you’re not crazy,” she told him. “But you are mentally upset. Wanting to commit suicide proves it.”

“Since when are you a psychiatrist?” Ronald demanded.

“You can’t be in the movies for two years without learning something about psychiatry,” Laura Lee answered. “That’s all you hear. Anyway, just take my word for it. You were in a shock state, remember? So you took a drink—that Grain Alcohol is powerful stuff and you’re not used to liquor in any form. Then you ran into this pickpocket and he brought you to Ace Diamond’s place.”

“But Amy Cooper and Stu Lacey,” Ronald interjected. “I saw them.”

“Fantasy,” the girl sighed. “All fantasy. Like that stuff about drinking chemicals and flying.”

“Look, I can prove it. Come home with me and I’ll show you the chemistry set; you can see I drank out of it.”

“At two in the morning?” Laura Lee smiled. “I’m not going up to your apartment to look at chemistry sets, believe me!” She giggled softly. “Why Ronald, you must be drunk—making like a wolf.”

“I’m serious,” he declared.

“I know you are. And so am I. Tomorrow I think you’d better see a doctor, just to clear this up. Then I’ll take you back to Mr. Bickerstaff and see that you’re given your job again.” She sat down once more. “After all, it’s the least I can do for you.”

Ronald passed a hand across his forehead. He was beginning to feel a trifle woozy, what with the excitement and the liquor and the nearness of her. “I don’t know,” he murmured. “Maybe you’re right and I did imagine most of what happened. You’re quite sure I wasn’t flying?”

“No,” the girl admitted. “I’m not. Everything happened so fast—you grabbed me and they started shooting. But I was under the impression that you jumped, carrying me. Of course, I’m no fool; I kept my eyes closed.”

“I know I flew,” Ronald insisted. “All right, if you say so. But that can wait until tomorrow when you see the doctor.”

“Tomorrow?” Suddenly Ronald remembered. In his experiences, real or imaginary, Amy Cooper had called the police. If it had actually occurred, then they would still be watching his apartment. He couldn’t take the risk of going home.

And this was honestly all he had in the back of his mind. when he faced the girl, beside him and said, “What about tonight, though?”

Whatever Laura Lee had in the back of her mind, it didn’t stay there long. “Why, Ronald!” she said, and moved into his arms.

CHAPTER V

MORRIE Bund, M. D. was a nervous man. This afternoon he had a nervous patient.

Ronald Weems faced him in the consulting room, clutching his chemistry set under one arm. Last night's experiences had unsettled him considerably, and he had awakened with Laura Lee and a large feeling of guilt.

The girl had insisted that he visit a physician, however, and Ronald in turn had been equally stubborn about picking up the chemistry set. Finally, in order to please him, Laura Lee had taken his key and ridden over to the apartment in a cab. There she picked up the Little Jim Dandy and returned with it, reporting that she had not encountered any members of the police force on the premises.

Ronald immediately opened the kit and brandished the partially empty vials and bottles. "See," he told her, "I did drink this stuff yesterday. This proves I could fly."

"It proves nothing of the sort," Laura Lee retorted. "Except that you're going to the nearest doctor for an examination."

The nearest doctor turned out to be Morris Bund, and while a determined Laura sat in the outer waiting-room, Ronald hesitantly told his story.

"It all started," he said "when I yanked off this girl's negligee." Dr. Bund, who had been taking notes on his patient's age, weight and previous medical history, sat bolt upright. "You yanked off a girl's negligee?" he repeated, as though he hadn't quite heard aright. "Might I ask where this event took place?"

"Why, in a department store, of course. I work there."

"And is yanking off negligees one of your duties?"

"No, of course not," Ronald explained. "I was looking for a diamond bracelet."

Dr. Bund shook his head. "I'm not sure you've come to the right place," he sighed. "You ought to have gone to my brother-in-law, down the hall. He's a psychologist."

"I don't need a psychologist," Ronald insisted. "If you'd only listen to me—"

"Go ahead," Dr. Bund said, chewing on his mustache. "You were looking for a diamond bracelet. Yours, I presume?"

"No. It was stolen."

"Kleptomania," the Doctor muttered. "I knew you ought to see my brother-in-law."

"I'm not a kleptomaniac," Ronald shouted. "I'm only trying to tell you what led up to my condition. If I hadn't yanked off her negligee I wouldn't have been fired. If I hadn't been fired I wouldn't have tried to commit suicide—"

"Attempted suicide, eh?" The Doctor rose. "Really, Mr. Weems, if you'll permit me to call my brother-in-law in for consultation, I'm sure we'll get results."

"But I'm not here about the suicide effort," the young man persisted. "It's what happened afterwards. You see, I drank these chemicals and all at once I started to float. Then I discovered I could fly, and also change the spots on dice, and when the gamblers started shooting at me I jumped out of the window. Now my only question is, Doctor—do you think there's anything wrong with me?"

Morrie Bund retreated towards the door. "Certainly not," he said. "From your story, I'd judge you are perfectly normal. What you just told me could happen to anyone. Now, if you'll excuse me just a moment, I have to make a phone-call."

He disappeared hastily, and Ronald tiptoed to the door and peered into the reception room. The nurse sat at her desk and Laura Lee paced the floor, but as he suspected, the Doctor was gone.

"Come on," Ronald told the starlet. "We're getting out of here. This guy thinks I'm crazy—he must have gone after his brother-in-law. He's a. psychiatrist."

"But Ronald, don't you think perhaps—"

"I don't think perhaps," he answered. "Let's go. Hurry, now."

He opened the door leading to the outer hallway, then shrank back. "Take a look," he breathed. "Do you see what I see?"

The girl peered down the corridor.

"Yes," she whispered. "I do. Must have followed us from the hotel."

Sure enough, standing next to the elevator was Ace Diamond and his left-hand man Thorstein. They were engaged in a mumbled colloquy, although neither of them could have spelled it.

"That's what the desk-clerk said," Diamond muttered. "She went out with this guy right after she asked where she could find the nearest croaker."

"Think we plugged him last night?"

"I dunno. That isn't important. What I'm after is my dough. And also this character. Anybody that can fly—"

Laura Lee shut the door quietly. "They're waiting for us," she said. "Now what?"

"Stand guard," Ronald told her. "I'm going back into the office. It's safer there. When the Doctor comes back, I'll explain. Maybe he can let us out another way."

RONALD retreated once more and took his place beside the desk. Suddenly he felt giddy. On an impulse, he opened the Little Jim Dandy set and took out the bottle of Grain Alcohol. A healthy swig served to quiet his nerves. He decided to take another, and was just finishing the bottle when the door swung open.

He jumped, but it was only Morrie Bund. And behind him, a thin, bespectacled gentleman who Ronald immediately identified as the brother-in-law.

"This is Dr. Clobberheimer," the physician said. "I took the liberty of telling him about your case, and he's very much interested. I wonder if you'd just go over it with him while I step out for a cup of coffee?"

"No, don't go!" Ronald cried. "I have to tell you something first." He lowered his voice to a whisper. "There are a couple of gangsters out in the hall now. They're after me."

Dr. Bund exchanged a significant glance with his relative. Then he beamed at his patient. “I’ll be very careful,” he promised. “You needn’t worry about me.”

“I’m worried about myself,” Ronald murmured. “What can I do?”

“Just relax. They won’t bother you as long as you’re in here,” said Dr. Clobberheimer in a soothing voice.

“All right.” Ronald slumped wearily in his seat as Morrie Bund made his exit. “Maybe you’ll believe me,” he said.

“Of course.” Dr. Clobberheimer gave him a thin smile. “I’m sure there’s a logical explanation for all this.”

“That’s the spirit.” Ronald was heartened. “You see, I guess I didn’t explain matters too clearly to Doctor Bund. First of all, there’s my background.”

“Right.” Dr. Clobberheimer leaned forward. “In cases like this background material is all-important. To begin with, what do you do?”

“I’m in Ladies’ Lingerie,” Ronald told him.

“Aha!” said the psychiatrist. “A transvestite, eh?”

“You don’t understand—I’m not in Ladies’ Lingerie any more, not since yesterday.”

“Obviously,” Dr. Clobberheimer purred. “I can see that for myself. You’re dressed quite normally, I agree.”

“But I am normal,” Ronald wheezed. “It’s just that last night I was able to float, and to fly.”

“The flying dream,” muttered the savant. “Very commonplace, that. Of course you realize the Freudian interpretation?”

“It wasn’t a dream. It happened. I drank some chemicals from this set here.” Ronald exhibited the Little Jim Dandy outfit. “First,” he said. “I took on quite a lot of Grain Alcohol. Matter of fact, I just finished the rest of the bottle a few minutes ago. Otherwise I could offer you a drink.”

“And then we’d both fly together, eh?” Dr. Clobberheimer said.

“Nothing of the sort! Are you inferring I merely suffered from hallucinations?”

"Grain Alcohol can have that effect," Clobberheimer told him. "But my brother-in-law mentioned a suicide attempt, too. That's what really bothers me. What happened?"

"Give me a glass and I'll show you," Ronald said. The psychiatrist handed him a water tumbler. Ronald opened the vials and bottles and, carefully estimating the amount by the height of the liquids remaining, quickly duplicated the potion he had consumed last night.

"Here," he said. "This is what I drank. And then I floated and flew and guessed the spots on dice. I could predict what was coming up, even change the spots—"

"Delusions of teleportation, levitation, and telekinesis," Dr. Clobberheimer said. "Very, very interesting." He leaned forward. "Young man, I believe you need a thorough examination and a prolonged rest. A few months or so in a private instit—"

"Never!" Ronald stood up. "I'm telling you the truth."

"As you see it," Dr. Clobberheimer purred. "But I'm afraid you don't realize the gravity of the situation."

"Yes I do." Ronald lifted the glass. "When I drink this stuff, the gravity of the situation is that there is no gravity."

"Wait a minute—" the Doctor shouted.

"I guess there's only one way to prove that I'm not lying," Ronald said. And drank the bubbling, fizzing brew.

Waves of heat coursed through him. Clobberheimer rushed from the office, summoning Dr. Bund's nurse. "Get a stomach-pump!" he shouted. "A man just tried to commit suicide."

THE nurse swung into action, with Laura and the psychiatrist behind her. Armed with a revolting-looking instrument, the efficient disciple of Florence Nightingale returned to the consultation room.

Ronald awaited her calmly, hands folded across his chest.

Clobberheimer turned to Laura. “You’d better go outside,” he said. “There may be a painful scene, in case he turns violent. One never knows, in cases like these.”

The platinum blonde trembled. “You mean—he is crazy?” she quavered.

“Oh, I wouldn’t say that,” Dr. Clobberheimer reassured her. “Just a touch of paranoia, with schizophrenic complications, plus a bit of hysteria.”

“What does that mean in English?”

“He’s nuttier than a fruitcake. Go outside,” the psychiatrist told her.

Laura retreated.

Doctor and nurse advanced.

“Get up on the table, Mr. Weems,” the thin psycotherapist coaxed. “Get up on the table and let the nice nurse use the nice stomach-pump.”

“Come one step closer,” Ronald warned, “and I’ll take off.”

“Nurse has seen men undress before,” Dr. Clobberheimer said.

“I’m not talking about undressing. I mean I’ll fly.”

“Mustn’t fly off the handle,” the Doctor cooed. And, softly, to the nurse, “Get behind him now—quickly!”

They lunged, one from in front and one from in back. Lunged, and collided with each other. For Ronald wasn’t standing there any more.

He was sitting upside down on the ceiling.

“Oh my goodness!” breathed the nurse.

“Great Jung!” murmured the Doctor. “Jumping gestalt, what’s the meaning of this?”

“I told you,” Ronald said. “Now, what about watching this?”

In rapid succession, he offered a demonstration of walking on the ceiling, flying from one side of the room to another, and floating gracefully in mid-air.

“Levitation,” Dr. Clobberheimer said. “Good Stekel, I’d never have believed it! You do have the power of teleportation after all.”

“And what was that other business?” Ronald called.

“Telekinesis. The ability to move objects through mental power.”

“Such as those coins in your pocket?”

As Ronald spoke he closed his eyes A shower of silver emerged from Dr. Clobberheimer's trouser-pocket and dropped to the table.

"I never really tried this before," Ronald muttered. "When I willed the dice, I thought it was just making a wish. I didn't know I was actually moving them. And when I called the results, it was a combination of telepathy and telekinesis, apparently. Such as this—when I make all your coins land heads up."

As he uttered the phrase, half of the coins on the table rose and spun forward. Doctor and nurse examined them.

"He can do it, all right!" Clobberheimer frowned. "I'll be a dirty Behaviorist if he can't!"

"Now do you understand?" Ronald persisted. "It's something in the combination of those chemicals. Apparently the effect of the dose I took lasts about four hours and then wears off. But until it does, I can do almost anything I want—fly and all the rest."

"This is important!" the psychiatrist said. "It opens up vast new vistas. Professor Rhine's experiments are nothing compared to this. We've used narcohypnotic therapy, why not chemical aids for the factors? Mr. Weems, I believe you've stumbled onto something vital and revolutionary. The first step will be to analyze the exact chemical components of that solution you mixed. Then we'll arrange a series of demonstrations, get a patent on the formula, and—"

"Later," Ronald said. "Right now, I want you to do me a favor."

"Anything," Dr. Clobberheimer told him. "Anything at all."

"Just step outside and tell my girl to come in," Ronald urged. "I want you to inform her I'm not crazy."

"Delighted," the Doctor answered.

But he was not delighted when he opened the door leading to the outer office.

"She seems to have left," he murmured.

"Left? But that's impossible. Or—oh, no!" Ronald swooped through the doorway, headed for the second door leading into the hall. It too was deserted. Ace Diamond and his henchman had gone.

"They kidnapped her, that's what they did!" Ronald muttered.

"Who kidnapped what?"

"Those gangsters I told you about. That part was true, too!" Ronald danced on air helplessly. Suddenly he turned and sailed down the corridor.

"Come back!" shouted the psychiatrist. "Where are you going?"

"After her, of course!" Ronald said. "Hang onto my chemical set, though. I'll be back."

The nurse blinked unbelievingly. "Look at him go," she whispered softly. "Just like a bird."

Dr. Clobberheimer nodded. "Something tells me," he said, "that the goose hangs high."

CHAPTER VI

RONALD wasn't exactly hanging, and he wasn't exactly off on a wild goose chase. As he spiralled down the staircase and landed upright once more in the lobby, he had already come to a definite conclusion. Ace Diamond must have taken Laura Lee to his establishment. Why, he didn't know—but there was one sure way of finding out.

Ronald glanced at the crowded street and realized he'd never dare to take a chance on flying in broad daylight. And, as is inevitable whenever one is desperately needed, there wasn't a taxi in sight. Ronald sighed, then thought of his telekinesis.

He closed his eyes and concentrated. Abruptly, a cab ground to a halt at the curb before him.

The driver was cursing melodiously. "Better not get in, Mister," he said. "Something's gone wrong with the steering gear. I was just coming up Stover Street, heading straight, when I swear this heap did a U-turn and landed me over here."

"I'm sure you'll find there won't be any more trouble," Ronald assured him. He climbed in and gave the warehouse address and they started off.

In daylight the warehouse looked less forbidding. Ronald paid the driver and headed for the front door. He rapped several times with no answer. The door was locked. Taking a look around to make sure he was unobserved, the young man flapped his arms and ascended to hover on air outside the second-storey window. It wasn't fastened, and he had no trouble gaining entrance.

But the gambling joint, like the dummy warehouse below, was deserted. Ronald shook his head. Of course; it would be too much to hope for that Ace Diamond would bring the girl here. For the moment he was stymied.

He went back to the window again and stared out. Perhaps he ought to notify the police. They would know what to do. But one of the things they'd do would be to lock him up—after all, Amy Cooper and Stu Lacey had issued a complaint. Besides, trying to explain his peculiar condition was impossible; he'd already gone through that ordeal. No, the police were out. The situation was hopeless.

Ronald stared out across the river at the city. So much had happened in the last twenty-four hours that he could scarcely comprehend anything in proper perspective. Certainly the city itself seemed different. Heretofore it was a forbidding spectacle to Ronald; a vast stone maze through which he crept unnoticed and unnerved.

Now it no longer presented the same challenge; the stone walls weren't obstacles, for he could fly above them. A chemical miracle had done that for him, and a glandular miracle as well. Maybe the Little Jim Dandy set had enabled his body to fly, but Laura Lee was the one who had sent his spirit soaring. Laura Lee—he had to find the girl, had to—

SOMETHING sputtered and purred in the alleyway below. Ronald glanced down and his eyes focussed on a red convertible with a broken top, slowly backing into a parking area.

“Miltie!” he breathed, and launched himself out of the window. A moment later he came to rest beside the vehicle. Sure enough, Guilty Miltie was at the wheel.

“What are you doing here?” Ronald inquired.

“Bringing the car back, like I said I would,” Miltie told him. “I been driving around and thinking things over, and I decided to go straight from now on. Even gonna get me a job.”

“What kind of a job?”

“Well, I dunno,” Miltie mused. “I alius had kind of a way with kids. So maybe I’ll try peddling reefers.”

The little man beamed virtuously. “But how come you’re back here too?” he asked.

Ronald told him, telegram-fashion, in ten words.

“Put the snatch on her, huh?” Miltie mused. “Sounds bad, don’t it?”

“Never mind how it sounds,” Ronald answered. “What I want to know is, where’d he take her?”

“Prolly out to his country place,” Miltie decided. “He’s got a greenhouse down the road about five miles.”

“A greenhouse?” Ronald was surprised. “I never thought Ace Diamond was the type who went in for horticulture.”

“Oh, he likes them, too,” Miltie assured him. “Even if they ain’t got no culture.”

“I mean I never thought he’d raise flowers.”

“But he does,” Miltie insisted. “He raises poppies. For opium, you know.”

“Could you drive me to the greenhouse now?” Ronald asked.

“I ain’t suppose to drive this car,” Miltie pointed out. “It’s not my propitty.”

“Well, I could fly you there, I suppose.”

“In daylight? Not me, buddy! Them farmers’d think we was a flying saucer or something and haul out the old shotguns.” He sighed heavily. “Might as well get in,” he said. “I’ll take you.”

So it was that Ronald and his loose-fingered friend careened out of town, down a county trunk road, and up the pathway to the small, tree-bordered dwelling beside the glassed-in greenhouse.

“They’re here, all right,” Miltie exclaimed. “I recognize his car in back. The one with the gun-turret on top.”

Ronald alighted from the car.

“Careful!” Miltie warned. “They can see us out here. Liable to pop you.”

As if ready and willing to prove this statement, the door of the cottage swung open and Ace Diamond appeared, a motherly smile on his face as he glanced down at the machine-gun cradled in his arms.

“Don’t move!” he called. “That means both, of you. No flying, no funny business either. The girl’s inside.”

“Then you admit you kidnapped her?”

“Admit it? I’ve been trying to reach you on the phone ever since we got here. Now I see you saved me a dime. Much obliged.”

“I don’t understand,” Ronald said.

“So I’ll make it real simple.” Ace Diamond grinned. “We got your girl, right?”

“Not right, but you’ve got her,” Ronald answered, bitterly.

“And you’ve got something we want,” Diamond told him.

“What’s that?”

“This flying gimmick.” Ace Diamond shook his head. “I never seen nothing to compare with that little trick you pulled off last night. I couldn’t get to sleep, just thinking about it. And finally, it come to me.”

“What come to you?” little Miltie piped up.

“Why, the idea, of course. How to use this gimmick in my business. Now you take like a bank, for instance. I never touched one before, account of the burglar alarms. They got all the cages and stuff wired. Minute you touch ’em, or even show up with a rod, somebody knows. But suppose you didn’t touch ’em. Suppose you just flew over ’em and didn’t pull a rod until you was right inside with the cashier? And instead of making a getaway in a hot car, you just flew off?”

“Who, me?” Ronald demanded, incredulously.

“Yeah, you! That’s my deal, chum. You rob me a bank, I give you back your dame. Fair enough?”

Ronald hesitated, then shook his head. “Never,” he said.

ACE Diamond lifted the muzzle of the machine-gun. “I’m not kidding,” he said. “It’s either-or. And you better make up your mind in a hurry, because I’m tired of holding this thing. It’s too heavy.

I never could figure out how Burt Lancaster does it in the movies.”

Ronald gulped and glanced at Guilty Miltie. Miltie gulped back at him.

“He means it, Dad,” whispered the pickpocket. “So which do you wanna be—a live bank-robber or a dead duck?”

“I can’t hold up a bank,” Ronald insisted. “I’ve had no experience.”

“You’ve had no experience bein’ dead, either,” Miltie reminded him. “Also, there’s the girl.”

Ronald sighed. “Yes,” he said. “There’s the girl.” He turned to face Ace Diamond once more. “All right. I’ll do it.”

“Now you’re talking!” The gambler urged them forward. “Just step inside and let’s make plans. Tonight’s downtown shopping night—everything’s open. The way I got it figured—”

But Ronald didn’t listen to him. He could see Laura Lee sitting on the sofa inside the cottage. The hood named Thorstein sat next to her, yet she seemed none the worse for wear. At the sight of Ronald, she rose and came forward.

“Darling—are you all right?”

“Sure,” Ronald told her. “I’m just fine. I’ve been captured and in a little while I’m going to rob a bank. What more could I ask?” He turned to Ace Diamond. “Promise she goes free if I do the job?”

“Scout’s honor,” said Ace Diamond.

Laura Lee squeezed the young man’s arm. “You’re doing this for me, aren’t you?” she whispered. “Oh, Ronald—to think I got you out of Lingerie and into all this trouble!”

“Not your fault,” he answered.

Ace Diamond coughed discreetly. “Sorry to break up the scene,” he said, “but we gotta get down to business.” He seated himself at the kitchen table and summoned Thorstein to keep an eye—and a pistol—cocked on the prisoners.

“Suppose I draw you a diagram,” he began. “Now the First National Bank has a layout like this—”

Half an hour later he had covered the tablecloth with lines and done the same to his forehead.

“It’s no use,” he sighed. “No matter how you work it, robbing a big bank just ain’t a one-man job.” He turned to Ronald. “You can see that, can’t you? Even if you fly, it takes a man to cover the front door and a man for the guard, and a third guy to stick a gun on the crowd, and a fourth guy to handle the tellers and cashiers, and a fifth guy to actually collect the dough.”

“Then I don’t have to rob the bank?” Ronald asked, eagerly. “Right.” Ace Diamond smiled. “The robbery’s off. I’ll just rub you out, instead.”

“Rub me out?”

“Sorry. That’s the way the ball bounces.”

“Tough,” Guilty Miltie consoled. “Hate to see you go like this, pal.”

“You’re going, too,” Ace Diamond decided. “No witnesses.”

“Who—me?” Guilty Miltie hopped up and down in his chair. “But you can’t do that! I’m on your side, I’m just as big a crook as you are! Ain’t you got no ethics?” Ace Diamond shook his head.

GUILTY Miltie snapped his fingers. “Hey, wait a minute,” he said. “Maybe I got an answer figgered out.”

“Better make it fast,” Diamond advised. “Thorstein here is getting itchy.”

“While he’s scratchin’ hisself, listen to this.” Guilty Miltie leaned forward’. “You say it takes five or six guys to knock off a big bank, huh?”

"Right."

"So what's stoppin' you? You got five or six guys on your payroll, ain't so?"

"What's stopping us," Ace Diamond explained patiently, "is that none of us can fly like Ronald, here."

"But you can!" Miltie exclaimed. "All's you need is some of them there chemical sets."

"What chemical sets?"

"Don't tell them!" Ronald whispered. But it was too late. The little pickpocket had already launched on his explanation. Diamond listened attentively, and the smile came back.

"So you see how it is," Miltie concluded. "You just go down to Lacey's Department Store and buy yourself a bunch of Little Jim Dandy Home Chemistry outfits, or whatever they're called. And you're in business." He grinned up at the gambler. "Now, if you'll let us all go, we'll be square, huh?"

"Uh-uh." Ace Diamond shook his head.

"Whatsamatter, don't you believe me?"

"Of course I believe you," the gambler answered. "But it isn't that simple. First off, we got to get the sets. And if you think any of the gang is gonna walk into that department store with their bare faces hanging out and buy such stuff, you're crazy. If it works, and we rob the bank, some smart copper'll put two and two together. Also, we got to know a few other things—such as just how to mix the chemicals, and all that."

"But Ronald here can tell you what to use," Miltie pointed out.

"He can, but he won't," Ronald said, firmly.

"I think different," Diamond told him. "Which do you want for supper—a bellyful of porkchops or a bellyful of lead?"

"Well, now that you put it that way—"

"I also think something else," Ace Diamond went on. "I think you are the guy who can go downtown and buy those chemistry sets for us." He glanced at Thorstein for confirmation. "Sure, why not? You know your way around the store and everything. Just take a fast run down there right now. You'll be back in time for supper. I'll get the rest of the boys lined up and right after we eat, you can show us how to mix up that flying cocktail of yours. Then we can knock over the bank tonight, before downtown shopping closes. Nice, fast job."

Ronald glanced at Laura Lee. Then he squared his shoulders. "All right," he said. "I'll do it." He stood up and headed for the door.

"Wait a minute," Ace Diamond called after him. "You got company. I'm sending Thorstein along, just to keep an eye on you. Not that I don't trust you or anything." He chuckled. "And one more thing. I suppose you hope maybe somebody will recognize you and remember. Or somebody will recognize Thorstein. Well, I got a way around that, too. This is almost Christmas shopping season, you know. Well, on the way downtown, here's what you're gonna do—"

CHAPTER VII

AND that's what they did.

Less than an hour later, Ronald and the gangster named Thorstein emerged from the Carnival Costume Shoppe wearing outfits that were a veritable smorgasbord for moths.

"Santa Claus, yet!" Thorstein grumbled. "At my age, I gotta put on a crummy red suit and whiskers and carry a dopey bag around."

"If you'd only listen to me," Ronald said, "you wouldn't need to. Just let me go to the police, explain everything, and we'll be all right."

"No dice," Thorstein told him. "It would ruin me in the profession. So just follow orders, see? And remember, Santa Claus or no Santa Claus, I still got this heater on you. None of those flying tricks tonight."

Sighing, Ronald led the way to Lacey's Department Store.

It was almost the dinner-hour, and although the place was open for the coming evening, the crowd was light. For this small favor, Ronald was duly grateful. Few customers bothered to observe the passage of the two Santa Clauses down the first-floor aisle. Ronald felt conspicuous enough as it was; besides, his beard was tickling him.

Through the ride back to town, he had been awaiting an opportunity to fly, to say nothing of flee—but Thorstein was always alert. Now, as they invaded the department store, he realized that even if he had the chance, flying would soon be out of the question. His four hours were almost up; the influence of the chemicals would be wearing off.

Meanwhile, there was work to be done.

But Thorstein, oddly enough, seemed in no particular hurry. Walking along at his side, the hoodlum suddenly remarked, “That stuff about the chemicals is true, huh?”

“Definitely,” Ronald assured him.

“What do they call it when a guy floats and flies like that?”

“Levitation.”

“And what about moving those dice, the way you did last night?”

“Telekinesis.”

“Well, let’s see some.”

“What do you mean?”

“You heard me,” the hoodlum growled. “Let’s see some. There’s the jewelry counter. You got that canvas bag. Let’s see you make some of them necklaces and stuff move into the bag.”

“But that would be stealing—”

“If I shoot you, that would be murder,” Thorstein assured him, “But I’m gonna, unless you obey orders.”

Ronald, blushing beneath his beard, concentrated on a tray of necklaces standing on the jewelry counter. Almost instantly, they slithered, snake-like, into the gaping depths of the bag he carried.

“Wow!” Thorstein observed. “What a deal.” He tugged Ronald along the aisle. How about some stockings, hey? My girlfriend could use a few pair.”

“This isn’t a shopping tour,” Ronald reminded him. “Nor a shoplifting tour, either. Suppose we’re caught?”

"Nylons," Thorstein insisted. "And then maybe we can get her a purse."

Trembling, Ronald approached the stocking-counter. Once more he performed his telekinetichnique, and once again escaped undetected.

"Purses, now!" said the triggerman, happily. "Let's pick out a big one—my girlfriend likes to carry her heater inside. You know how dames are."

Ronald nodded. Urged by the goadings of the gunman, Ronald managed to acquire, in rapid succession, a red velvet purse, a large flagon of perfume, two ashtrays, and the attention of a thin gentleman wearing a derby hat.

"Don't look now," Ronald whispered, "but that's Amos Shamus, the store detective. I think he's spotted us."

"Awright," Thorstein growled. "Let's get up to the Toy Department and buy those chemical sets and beat it."

THEY sought an elevator, and the detective followed, unobtrusively. Just as unobtrusively, Thorstein poked his gun in the neighborhood of Ronald's kidneys. "Don't tip him off," he whispered, "or you get it. If he makes trouble, stall him."

The elevator brought them to Toyland and they hastened down the aisle to the counter where the chemistry sets were displayed—and where, Ronald noted, Miss Amy Cooper was also displaying herself.

As they neared the girl, Amos Shamus stepped up and tapped Ronald on the shoulder.

"Pardon me," he said, "but might I ask what you have in that bag?"

"Christmas presents, of course," Ronald replied, prompted by the jab of the gun in his back.

"Kind of early for delivery," the detective grunted. "Seeing as how Christmas is six weeks off yet."

"But you don't understand," Ronald said. "I'm not getting them for gifts. They're—well, they're for the store here. I suppose you saw me picking them off the counters."

"Then you admit it," the detective answered. "I thought I saw you at work."

"Of course you did." Ronald forced a smile through his whiskers "Me and my partner here, we work for the store. Up here in Toyland. He's the head Santa Claus and I'm his assistant. He has seniority because his beard is longer."

"Work here, huh?" Amos Shamus didn't seem quite convinced.

"Certainly. Didn't Mr. Lacey tell you about it downstairs? It was his idea." Ronald babbled. "We sit on a throne, you know, and hand out gifts to the kiddies. Every once in a while we run out of merchandise and have to go down and replenish our stock for the little brats, bless them."

Thorstein nodded in confirmation, but Amos Shamus reached for Ronald's sack.

"Let's see what you've got in there," he demanded. He thrust his arm inside and came up with an ashtray and the flagon of perfume.

"Fine stuff for kiddies," he commented. "Ashtrays, yet. And what about this perfume?"

"That's for a kid who doesn't smoke," Thorstein supplied, unhelpfully.

The detective inspected the perfume with startled eyes. "Scents of Sin," he murmured. "What kind of a business is that?"

"Some of the girls are a bit precocious," Ronald told him. "You know how it is."

"I don't know how it is," Amos Shamus said. "I'm a respectable married man, with eleven children."

"With eleven children you'd hardly have a chance to be anything else." Ronald said. He waved at the detective. "Keep the perfume. Maybe one of your kids could use it."

At this juncture Amy Cooper entered into the conversation. Leaning over the counter, she regarded Ronald with curious eyes.

"Don't I know you?" she asked. "Your voice sounds very familiar."

"This is my first day on the job," Ronald answered. "My partner and I are just on our way to Santa's Throne. We merely stopped by to pick up half a dozen of these chemistry sets. You know, the Little Jim Dandy outfits."

"Little Jim Dandy?" Amy Cooper's eyes widened. Reaching out abruptly, she yanked Ronald's beard. "I thought so! It's you again!"

"Amy, don't!" Ronald gasped. But it was too late. First his beard, and then all hell, broke loose.

"Aha!" shouted Amos Shamus, reaching for his gun.

"Drop it!" shouted Thorstein, who didn't have to reach. "Now, hustle!" He turned to Ronald. "Stick six of them sets in your bag."

"Why not in yours—there's more room," Ronald suggested.

"Oh no there ain't." Thorstein grunted softly. "On account of he goes in my bag. And her."

A little knot of customers and salespeople collected just in time to view the spectacle. True to his word, Thorstein stuffed first the detective and then Amy Cooper into his sack and knotted the neck tightly.

"What is all this, some kind of publicity stunt?" asked one of the clerks.

"Must be. Nobody would be giving people away as a Christmas present, would they?" asked her partner.

"Make a nice gift to some cannibal, perhaps," replied the first.

"I never thought of that. But then, who wants to give gifts to cannibals? Maybe they don't even celebrate Christmas."

"That doesn't look like a publicity stunt to me," said a portly gentleman. "Not the way those two in the sack are squealing. I think somebody should call the police. Do it myself."

He waddled away and Thorstein whirled.

"All right," he snapped. "You got the sets? Then come on—let's go!"

"And run into the cops downstairs?" Ronald answered. "You heard what that man said about calling the police."

"Then we'll fly," Thorstein decided.

"But the power—it only lasts about four hours—I may run out of gas, or levitatory force or whatever, right in midair."

“You’d better not!” Thorstein grated, grimly. “Quick, over to the windows!”

Ronald gazed down from the sixth floor at the city below. If he jumped and couldn’t fly it would be sheer suicide. If he didn’t jump—the gun in his back told him it would be sheer murder.

Thorstein, clutching the sackful of chemical sets, grabbed him around the waist.

“Let’s go!” he commanded. “From the looks of things, the law is already here.”

Indeed, the boys in blue were pouring out of two elevators simultaneously. Ronald caught only a glimpse of them before the gun pressed and he jumped.

There was a moment of frantic falling, and then he kicked his legs and willed himself to straighten out.

Let go of my arms,” he panted. “I need them for steering.”

“Gawd!” breathed the gangster. “What a way to travel. I just forgot that I get airsick when I fly.”

“You’ll be worse than airsick if the chemicals give out,” Ronald reminded him. “Here we go.”

And there they went, across the twilight city. Ronald flew high, despite his burden; grateful for the dusk that masked his progress. He headed for the river—he could follow it to the country road.

“Think we’ll make it?” Thor stein breathed.

“Guess so. We’re almost over the river now,” Ronald told him. And then, as he lurched, “Oh-oh! Guess I spoke too soon. Something—something is happening—look out—”

“Stop!” Thorstein screamed. “We’re going down!”

“I know it,” Ronald panted. “But I can’t stop. I don’t have any brakes.”

“We’ll fall right in the river,” Thorstein yelled. “We’ll be drowneded.”

“Drowned,” Ronald corrected him.

“Now he tells me!” sobbed the gangster. “Oops—” They hit the water with a splash, and disappeared.

CHAPTER VIII

"SO that's how it happened," Ronald told Ace Diamond, as he dripped on the rug before the cottage fireplace. "Thorstein was out cold when I managed to drag him up on the bank. You'll probably find him there. I had to walk the rest of the way. Here are the chemical sets—all the stuff you'll want to use is in bottles and vials, so there's no harm done."

The fat gambler grunted. "Nice of you to come back," he said. "Why didn't you take it on the lam?"

Ronald made a helpless gesture. "Where could I go?" he sighed. "The police are looking for me all over town. Besides, I had to bring you this stuff, so that you'd let Laura Lee go. That was our bargain, remember?"

"Right." Ace Diamond showed the 18½ carats of fillings in his teeth. "Just one more little thing, though. You'll have to show me and the boys how to mix these chemicals for a proper dose." Ronald stared around the room. In addition to Laura Lee and Guilty Miltie, five of Diamond's henchmen were henching all over the place.

"Come here, boys," Diamond ordered. "And pay attention."

Ronald opened the topmost Little Jim Dandy set and began to collect glasses from the cupboard. Carefully, he measured out the Grain Alcohol.

"This first," he commanded. "All of it."

Laura Lee bit her lip. "Ronald—" she began, then fell silent as he glanced at her.

"It's the only way," he said. "Now, everybody, drink."

The gambler and his pack dutifully downed the concoction.

Ronald set to work with vials and flasks. Diamond squared his jaw. "No funny stuff, now," he said. "This had better make us fly or else."

"You'll fly," Ronald promised. "But be patient. I have to remember exactly the right quantities of everything. There must be some kind of delicate chemical stasis achieved, I imagine. Now—I think I've got it. If you'll all please drink—"

Diamond lifted his glass. "Okay, boys," he murmured. "Here's to crime."

They gulped in unison.

“I don’t feel any different,” Diamond declared. “Kind of woozy, but no different.”

“Wait a minute or two,” Ronald counseled. “It takes time to work. Now—try to float.”

“How?”

“Just sort of let yourself go limp, and imagine that you’re rising. There, like that.”

Ace Diamond smiled and rose to the ceiling like a fat balloon. He hung there, leering. “You did it!” he exulted. “Come on, boys—try it.”

They tried it., In a moment all six were suspended from the ceiling.

Laura Lee observed them open-mouthed. Finally she managed to speak. “Ronald—then it is true! You’re not whacky, after all.”

“Of course I’m not, darling.”

“Somehow, I almost wish you were,” said the girl. “When I think of what you’ve done. Now they’ll go out and rob the bank, maybe kill a few innocent bystanders—”

“I had to do it,” Ronald soothed. “It was the only way to save you, remember?”

ACE Diamond flew around the room in a lazy circle, like a wingless walrus, and lighted again before the fireplace. “Come on down, boys,” he called. “Let’s get organized. We’d better get started. You all have your instructions.” Ronald rose, grasping Laura Lee by the arm. “Well, you won’t be needing us any more,” he said. “So we might as well be going.”

Yeah,” Guilty Miltie added. “Have a nice time at the bank-robbery. Money happy returns and all that.”

“Hey!” Diamond’s voice—and gun—halted them. “Not so fast!”

"But you promised if I got you the chemicals, we'd be free," Ronald protested. "Scout's honor."

"Fooled you that time," Ace Diamond chuckled. "On accounta because I never was a Scout. My old lady wouldn't let me join—said they played too rough." He scowled. "You folks are coming with us, see? We need you."

"I told you I wouldn't rob a bank—"

"Who's asking you to? All you and the little jerk and the lady got to do is fly along with us and come inside. We'll just use you for shields, in case anybody wants to start shooting."

He turned to his cohorts. "Grab 'em," he ordered. "And let's go." Within moments, the illy-assorted gathering was soaring through the nighted skies towards the city. Ronald and Guilty Miltie were held securely by two of the thugs, while Ace Diamond himself carried Laura Lee. It was definitely not a pleasant journey, although Diamond seemed to think so.

"Won't be long now," he gloated. "What an idea! Look at the trouble we save, not having to monkey around with wiring systems and burglar alarms. We don't even need a getaway car. And think of the dough we used to waste on gasoline! If we knock over the First National Bank tonight, nothing can stop us. Tomorrow we can knock over the Second National Bank, and the next day we'll tackle the Third. Why, this here flying gimmick is gonna revolutionize the whole bank-robbing industry!"

"Look, boss," said one of the henchmen, flying close. "How do we know this joker didn't double-cross us? Maybe he tipped off the cops and they're waiting for us to show up."

"Not likely," Diamond told him.

Ronald, overhearing the remark, added bitter confirmation. "The last people I'd go to would be the police," he said. "It seems to me as if I've spent the past forty-eight hours being chased by either cops or robbers, or both. You needn't worry."

And they didn't. "Here we are," Diamond shouted suddenly, as he swooped down towards a tall building. The others followed.

“Fly in the shadows,” the gambler cautioned. “Land here in the parking lot.” The group obeyed orders. Once on the ground they proceeded in a wedge formation towards the door of the First National Bank.

“In we go,” Diamond said. “Never mind the customers. Hurry up, that alcohol’s making me dizzy.”

Pushing Laura Lee before him, he entered the bank. Two more gunmen grasped Ronald and propelled him forward. The others dragged a struggling and protesting Guilty Miltie.

Employees and customers glanced up idly as the group entered, but nobody had any intimation of what was about to occur until the entire party suddenly became airborne.

FROM a height of ten feet above the cashier’s cage, Ace Diamond suddenly shouted, “Reach, everybody! This is a stickup.” Guns in the hands of the hovering henchmen threatened aerial bombardment.

Arms rose and jaws dropped.

“Fine,” Ace Diamond said. He dropped towards the rear of the cashier’s cage. “Now, I want everything you got, and I want it fast.” He landed solidly behind the counter, pressing Laura Lee before him. The cashier glanced at his gun, then hesitated.

“Three seconds,” Ace Diamond said. And wobbled. “Oops!” he said. “Did I hear something crash?”

He did indeed. One of the gunmen suddenly plummeted to the floor and lay there, writhing. There was another thump as a second of the party fell, dragging Guilty Miltie after him. Then, in rapid succession, the three remaining henchmen followed suit. Ronald landed on his feet and raced towards the gambler.

Ace Diamond’s face was now as blue as a baboon’s backside, and equally expressive. He tried to steady himself against the counter. “Back—” he wheezed. “Or I’ll shoot—”

He brought up the gun and then toppled forward. There was a final thud and he too was out like a lout.

Then Laura Lee was in Ronald's arms, the cashier was on the phone and the police were everywhere.

After that came confusion, excitement, and eventually, explanations. The entire party was hauled down to the police station, and it wasn't for quite a while that Ronald and Gully Miltie were released from the cell housing Ace Diamond and his five comatose companions.

But finally they told their story, and were officially released.

Laura Lee met them outside.

"I still don't understand what you did to them," she sighed. "I had a wild hunch you might try changing the chemicals in some way—and yet they could fly, right up until the last."

"I didn't change the chemicals," Ronald grinned. "All I did was add something. On the way back after falling in the river I stopped at a tavern. It took a lot of talking and a considerable amount of money, but I got what I wanted to use in the Grain Alcohol."

"What was it?"

"I wouldn't know the chemical name," Ronald confessed. "Phenop-something. But it worked. You see, I remembered a remark some kid made the first time he saw one of these sets. Something about using them to mix up a Mickey Finn. That's what I put in the Grain Alcohol. And it worked."

"Boy, did it work!" Guilty Miltie exclaimed. "You should of seen, in the cell—"

Ronald silenced him with a look. "Never mind," he said.

"Okay, Dad." The little pickpocket waved his hand. "I'll be shoving off, I guess."

Ronald held out his hand. "Right. Good luck. Oh, by the way, what are your plans?"

"I'm gonna retire, I guess," Guilty Miltie said. "Now that I'm rich."

"Rich?"

“Sure. Just pulled my last job, while we was in the cell. Neatest bit of pickpocketing anybody could ask for.” Miltie slid his hand into his trousers and then withdrew it, palm upward. Resting between his fingers was a glittering array of diamonds.

“Lifted them right outta Ace Diamond’s teeth,” he exulted. “Guy never even stirred!”

He padded off, but neither Ronald nor Laura Lee noticed his departure. They were already making tracks for the Hanover Hotel.

It wasn’t until the next day that they were really bothered by reporters. And it wasn’t until the day after that that the call came from Hollywood.

“That was Flick!” Laura Lee reported. “They want me back at the studio. All that newspaper publicity and everything—it’s got them excited. Promised me a decent role right away, to cash in on the notoriety.”

“Well, let’s get started then,” Ronald said. “I’ve done my job. Just been down to see the guy who manufactures those chemistry sets. Turns out his name really is Jim Dandy, too. Anyway, I explained everything and he’s taking the set off the market. But we’re turning the formula over to the government. Make a nice defense weapon.”

“Did you see the papers, darling?” Laura Lee asked. “There’s an item announcing that your old girl friend is getting married.”

“To Stu Lacey, I suppose.” Ronald nodded. “Well, anyway, I beat her to it.”

“That you did.” Laura Lee smiled, smugly. “So let’s you act like a husband and go order our plane reservations for Hollywood.”

“Plane reservations!” Ronald paled. “Not on your life! We’re going on the train. No more flying for me!”

“All right,” the girl answered. “Maybe it’s just as well those chemicals don’t have any permanent effects at that.”

AS it turned out, her assurance was a bit premature. But the realization didn’t come until almost a year later, when a nurse came flying into her room at Cedars of Lebanon Hospital, just as Laura Lee came out of the anaesthetic.

She smiled up at the nurse and murmured. “What is it—-boy or girl?”

The nurse gulped. “It’s a boy,” she gasped. “A bouncing baby boy.” Her voice rose to a wail. “But that’s just the trouble, lady. How do we get him to stop bouncing against the ceiling?”

THE END

The Big Binge

Ever wonder what would happen if you let your inhibitions run wild? Elmer Klopp had quite a few—and they were galloping all over town! . . .

I'M not going to guarantee the truth of everything in this story. To begin with, I heard it from a friend who heard it from a friend—and you know what that means. One or two of the events seem to strain my credulity to the point where it may have to wear a truss.

But on one point I'm reasonably certain, so let's start right there. The grasshopper was invented in a college town.

The grasshopper, for the benefit of you lucky, lucky people who have never encountered it, is a green drink. It contains, among other ingredients mercifully nameless, creme de menthe, and the color may account for its name. However I prefer to think it's called a grasshopper because after imbibing two or three you really start hopping.

Elmer Klopp found that out the hard way.

He downed the first foaming concoction about four in the afternoon, one day late in the month of October. Let it be said in his defense that the bleak, rainy day contributed to his mood. The grasshopper was merely a catalystic agent. As time went on, it became cataleptic.

Elmer was the sole customer in Ye Olde Gin Mill, and that was just as well. For a second grasshopper jumped down his gullet, and then a third.

They may have been called grasshoppers, but they were acting more like locusts.

The locusts swarmed. They rose to his brain and ate away awareness. By six o'clock, Elmer Klopp was in a green fog. He sat there at the bar of Ye Olde Gin Mill and let it swirl around him. Somehow it brought tears to his eyes.

All at once a face peered out of the fog and wiggled its lips at him. It was a red face, with hair and eyebrows to match. Elmer thought it looked very pretty in the fog. After looking at it for several moments he realized there was a body attached to it, and recognized the proprietor of Ye Olde Gin Mill, one Michael Finn.

Mr. Finn was addressing him.

"Why are you crying?" he asked.

Elmer Klopp took out his handkerchief and blew his nose. Some of the fog disappeared. And back came bitter reality—the bitter reality that had driven him into the tavern in the first place, caused him to drink for the first time in his twenty-two years.

He leaned forward and looked at Michael Finn gravely. "Can you keep a secret?" he asked.

"Sure thing," said the bartender. "What is it—woman trouble?"

Elmer shook his head. "No," he said. "Another kind."

The bartender sighed. "Don't try and fool me," he warned. "I been in this business for ten years, and there ain't no other kind of trouble. Guys with secrets always turn out to have woman trouble."

"Do they?" Elmer asked. "I'll bet you've heard some unusual stories."

"Only two," Michael Finn replied. "All woman trouble can be divided into two kinds. Either a guy is after some dame he can't get hold of, or he's got some dame he can't get rid of." Michael Finn's eyes took on a look of bloodshot compassion. "Come on, now, which kind is yours?"

Elmer sat up straight. He was getting soberer by the moment. "Neither," he insisted. "My problem is worse."

"Trust me," said the bartender.

“Well,” Elmer sighed. “I’m drinking for the first time in my life because I want to be an S.O.B.”

Michael Finn’s eyes now registered bloodshot astonishment. “You do?” he breathed. “And you sit there and admit it?”

“Why not?” Elmer was defiant. “Nothing would make me prouder than to become an S.O.B.”

“And you think drinking will help?”

“Most of them drink, don’t they?”

THE bartender nodded emphatically. “I’ve had my share of S.O.B.s in here, lapping it up,” he declared. “But I wouldn’t blame their condition on liquor. You can get to be an S.O.B. in a lot of ways.”

“No I can’t,” Elmer said. “That’s just the trouble. They won’t let me.”

“Who won’t let you?”

“Why the other S.O.B.s, of course!” Elmer downed the rest of his grasshopper. “They know I had my heart set on it, but do you think they cared? Why, I would have been one of the best-behaved S.O.B.s on the campus. Sort of a model S.O.B., you might say. I would have behaved like a true S.O.B. to everybody I met—my friends, the professors, the co-eds, everybody! It would have been like a career to me.”

“Some career,” the bartender muttered. “But say, I don’t follow you. You talk as if the rest of the S.O.B.s had some kind of club and kept you out of it. Don’t tell me them guys have organized a union?” He reflected for a moment. “Not that it would be a bad idea. So many S.O.B.s running around these days, they’d have quite a membership.”

“You don’t understand,” Elmer insisted. “The S.O.B.s are exclusive. They have standards to maintain.”

“You mean you got to pinch babies and seduce old maids before you can get it?” Michael Finn was interested. “This I didn’t know.”

“Oh, nothing like that. But you need a certain status, and I guess I just don’t have it. I’d never be well known like most of the S.O.B.s, I guess.”

“Don’t be discouraged,” the bartender soothed. “You’re young yet. If you really got your heart set on being an S.O.B. you can probably make it. Why don’t you start planning ahead—maybe you can figure out a way of cheating some widows and orphans, or robbing a bank or something.”

Elmer sat up even straighter. “I’ll have you know that true S.O.B.s don’t indulge in that sort of thing,” he announced. “An honest S.O.B. is sober, truthful, law-abiding and kind.”

“Not the ones I met,” Michael Finn murmured.

“All S.O.B.s are strictly legitimate,” Elmer told him.

“Hey!” The bartender wiped his forehead with the bar-rag. “Are you sure we’re both talking about the same kind of S.O.B.?”

“There’s only one kind on this campus,” Elmer assured him. “The members of the Sigma Omega Beta fraternity. S.O.B.—that’s their initials.”

Michael Finn turned away. “Oh,” he said, in a strangled voice. “Well, on that I buy a drink.” He began to concoct the insecticide for another grasshopper.

“So you go to school here, eh?” he asked, over his shoulder. “What are you, a senior?”

“Sophomore,” Elmer replied. “Got a late start. I did a hitch in the service. My folks both passed away before I got out, so I decided to get an education. That’s why I came to Hardnox.” He accepted the drink gratefully. Michael Finn watched him down it.

“How do you like it?” he asked. “The drink? Perfect.”

“No, the school.”

“Not so good,” Elmer confessed. “When I entered the University of Hardnox, I thought I was going to do more than study. I thought I’d make friends, have a little social life. My folks are gone and I’m lonesome. But here I am a sophomore and nothing’s happened. I had my heart set on being pledged to Sigma Omega Beta—and they passed me up. Guess I’m not important enough to bother with.”

“Good student?”

“Pretty good. But lately I can’t seem to concentrate on my studies.”

"What about sports?"

"Oh, I went out for football. But I don't have the build for it. Coach Gutz put me on the third-string and I've never played yet." Elmer winced. "He thinks I'm chicken, I guess."

The bartender nodded. "Buster Gutz is a hard man," he replied. "But did you ever stop to figure maybe he's right about you?"

"In what way?"

"Well, maybe it's none of my business, but I'm going to say it anyway. You know, being a bartender is sort of like being a psychologist. I mean, you see all kinds of people day after day, night after night. You watch 'em trying to have a good time, you listen to them when they got troubles. And after a while you get so you can sort of size them up.

"Way I've got you sized up, you're too normal."

Elmer blinked. "Normal? What's wrong with that?"

"Nothing. If you're happy. But you ain't happy, chum. You're miserable. Like you said, you came to college hoping to make friends. You been a fair student, you went out for football, you behaved yourself—like you said, this is the first time you even took off on a little toot. And maybe that's just the whole trouble. You're so normal nobody even notices you. If you raised hell now and then, perhaps you'd amount to something. Better to be an S.O.B.—either kind of an S.O.B.—than to be nobody at all."

THE young man shook his head at the bartender in bewilderment. "This is the first time anybody ever suggested such a thing," he confessed. "I wouldn't know how to begin."

"Take women," Michael Finn said.

"I'd like to," Elmer assured him. "Only I don't know any I can take."

"You see?" The bartender shrugged. "You're just too average to even attract a dame. But the more I think of it, the more I'm positive that's what you need. A nice, good looking chick with a figure like this Gina Lollobrigida, say. You like Gina Lollobrigida?"

“She has her points,” Elmer admitted. “But where would I ever find such a girl?”

Michael Finn didn’t answer. He merely gulped and stared at a point directly behind Elmer’s back.

Elmer turned and almost collided with the body of a girl. It was the kind of body it would be pleasant to collide with; and it was certainly Lollobrigidean in every sense of the word. Elmer stared into an oval, upturned face and encountered a pair of dark eyes. The eyes were not looking at him, however, their gaze was reserved for the bartender.

“Sorry, Miss,” Michael Finn said. “I didn’t see you come in.”

“Oh, that’s all right.” The girl smiled. “Eve been here for quite some time, as a matter of fact. Sitting in that booth over there.”

“Then you heard—” Elmer began to redden.

For the first time she looked directly at him, and Elmer finished the job. “Yes,” she admitted. “I couldn’t help but overhear your remarks. And I must say I agree with your bartender friend.”

“About me? But you don’t even know me!”

“That can be easily rectified.” The girl gave him a long, cool stare. “You seem to be about as simple as they come. But that’s not why I’m here.”

“No?”

“No.” She paused, then continued. “I heard you were looking for a woman. What I want to know is—would I do?”

“Do?”

“Very monosyllabic, aren’t we? Well, that doesn’t matter. All I need is a yes-or-no answer. And the question is—how would you like to come up to my apartment?”

Elmer Klopp stared at the brunette, and somewhere he found an answer. “How would I like to come up to your apartment?” he murmured. “Why, with the greatest possible alacrity. That’s how.”

“Come on, then,” smiled the girl. “I simply can’t wait to get you on the couch.”

Michael Finn let out a strangled gasp. As Elmer descended from his stool, the bartender reached out and tried to grasp his arm.

“Wait a minute, son.” he whispered, wheezily. “Maybe you and I better have a little heart-to-heart talk, first. Dames can be quite a problem—they take a lot of handling.”

“Never mind,” flashed the girl. “I’m sure this gentleman can do his own handling without any further instructions.”

Grasping Elmer’s arm, she dragged him out of Ye Olde Gin Mill and into the night.

The rain had ceased, and a moon peered through ragged clouds. The girl led him over to a car parked at the curb.

“Climb in,” she said. “It’s only a short drive.”

It was, but none too short for Elmer. He glanced at the darkhaired damsel beside him and realized he should be trying to make conversation. But what the bartender had said was true; Elmer had little or no experience with women. He didn’t even know how to make conversation, let alone anything else. And he had always let alone anything else.

For her part, the girl was equally silent. She didn’t so much as glance his way—just drove swiftly and expertly up the campus. They turned off on a wide street bordered by stately trees, then drew to a halt before a large, old-fashioned house set well back on a big lawn.

“Here we are,” she announced. “We’ll sneak in the back way. My apartment’s on the third floor, and I don’t want to risk anyone seeing us going up together.” She gripped his arm conspiratorially, and Elmer suddenly realized that her nearness—bottled and distributed in scented, liquid form—was so overpowering it would soon run all other intoxicants off the market.

Together they circled the walk and found the rear entrance. The girl switched on a light, then removed her shoes. “Take yours off, too,” she commanded. “And walk softly.”

They tiptoed up the stairs, until they reached the big white door on the third landing.

"Here we are," the brunette whispered. She fumbled with a key, opened the door, groped for a lamp-switch. "Come in," she urged, and Elmer was conscious of the suppressed excitement in her voice—matching the suppressed excitement in his own breast, where his heart seemed to be practicing for a mambo contest.

Was this it? Was this really the beginning of a new, rich life after all?

He couldn't quite believe it. But here he was. Here he was, in her apartment. Yes, and she hadn't been fooling—the big red couch dominated the room.

Elmer watched her as she removed her coat, fluffed out her hair, and rolled up her sleeves. She was humming, now, and smiling. Suddenly she turned to him and her eyes gleamed with excitement.

"Well, what are you waiting for?" she breathed. "Hurry up and lie down on the couch." Elmer gasped. "Y-you really mean it?" he whispered.

"Of course I mean it, stupid," said the girl. "Lie down on the couch and let me start psychoanalyzing you!"

CHAPTER II

ELMER Klopp stared. "Psychoanalyze me?" he demanded. "Is that why you invited me up here?"

"Of course. What other reason could I possibly have?" the girl retorted. Then she paused, flushing indignantly. "Surely you didn't misconstrue my intentions?"

"I guess I did," Elmer admitted. "and I beg your pardon. I've never misconstrued a woman before in my life."

"That's just why I brought you here," the girl told him. "When you were talking to the bartender about not knowing any women, I got interested. I thought I'd like to find out about your sex-life."

"Then you are interested in sex, after all?"

"Of course," said the girl. "After all, I mean, what else is there?"

"What else indeed?" Elmer agreed. "Sure you don't want to join me on the couch?"

"No," she declared. "I'm just interested in sex."

"So am I. That's why I made the suggestion."

"I'm talking about sex in the abstract," she answered. "Not in the concrete."

"Sex in the concrete—that would be rather messy, come to think of it."

"See here," the brunette interrupted. "There's no need to be flippant. I don't believe you think sex is as important as I do."

"Try me and see," Elmer suggested.

"Very well, then—lean back and start talking."

"Talking?"

"Certainly. How else does one approach sex?"

"I'd heard there were more direct methods."

She sighed and bit her lip. "We certainly don't seem to speak the same language," she observed. "I'm speaking of my interest in sex from the psychiatric standpoint. There's nothing personal in it for me, nothing at all."

"Come to think of it, there hasn't been a helluva lot in it for me, either," Elmer volunteered. "But a pretty girl like you—" He paused. "Say, are you really a psychiatrist?"

"Tm not a psychiatrist," the brunette admitted. "Not yet, anyway. Just a graduate student. Next year I start my pre-med training. But meanwhile, I'm doing a thesis on maladjustment amongst college students, and I thought I'd get your case-history for my records."

She sat down next to the couch, grabbing a notebook and pen from the end-table. "Let's begin at the beginning," she said, crisply. "Your name?"

"Elmer Klopp." He sat up, eyeing her. "Come to think of it, what's yours?"

"Ada," she told him. "Ada Noid."

"Not old Perry Noid's daughter?"

"I'm his niece. My uncle is not married."

"Then this must be his house." Elmer gazed around the room with reawakened interest. "Gosh, it looks normal enough."

"Why shouldn't it look normal?" Ada demanded.

"Well—uh—I guess you know the rumors about your uncle's place."

"My uncle does not run a boarding-house."

"Rumors." Elmer spelled the word. "They say he has all kinds of crazy machines he uses in his experiments."

Ada drew herself up erect. "First of all, 'crazy' is a word without clinical significance," she said. "Secondly and more important, my uncle is head of the Psychiatry Department of this University. He is a brilliant scientist, even though he may be just a wee bit batty."

"Is he the one who got you interested in this sort of work?"

"Yes. He adopted me when I was only a baby. If it hadn't been for him, I'd have—" The girl paused. "But I'm supposed to be interviewing you."

"Forget it," Elmer said. "You wouldn't get much of a case-history out of me, anyway. I've led a dull life. Let's just talk, instead."

SO they talked, and before he knew it, Elmer was giving her his case-history in conversational form. He didn't tell his story the way he had to the bartender; somehow the presence of the ravishing brunette inspired a greater intimacy. It was mainly a confession—not of misdeeds but of lack of any deeds; a recital of shyness and loneliness.

From time to time Ada nodded in agreement. "I know what you mean," she said. "I've heard things like this before. You'd be surprised if you knew just how many young people today, are really lonely inside. The introvert, the isolated personality, is out of fashion—and adolescents strive to conform. Hence the meaningless fads in fashion, speech, amusement, all part of the tendency to seek group-approval and in-group status. But underneath many a crewcut is a hidden egghead, if you know what I mean."

"I know." Elmer nodded. "And I'm just beginning to discover that underneath some Italian-cuts there can be some mighty good sense. I—I'd like to see your postgraduate paper some time."

"My thesis?" It's incomplete, and what I've written is still in the first draft. But if you really are interested, I could get it for you."

"I wish you would."

"It's in the closet," Ada told him. "Somewhere in back on the top shelf here. Everything's such a mess." She regarded the chair somewhat dubiously. "I better not try standing on this—it might collapse."

"Let me lift you up," Elmer volunteered, gallantly.

"Well—"

"Come on."

He put his arms around Ada's waist and boosted her up. She was heavier than he'd expected, but pleasantly so.

"Move in a little closer," she called. "I can't reach."

Elmer moved in a little closer, and promptly got his head tangled in a cluster of dresses hanging from the closet-hooks.

"Steady!" she commanded. "Quit moving your neck that way."

"Ummppplfff," Elmer explained. "Can't—see—"

"Look out!" Ada cried. "Oh, that dress around your neck—you're choking—here, let me unwind it—"

She leaned down and tried to disengage the garment from Elmer's throat. Elmer promptly lost his balance. With a strangled grunt, he toppled to the floor. Six dresses and Ada fell on top of him.

"Let me out of here!" he gasped. "Here, let me get this skirt off my face —"

"That's my skirt!" Ada exclaimed. "Quit tugging at it!" But the damage was already done, or rather, undone. The skirt came free in Elmer's hand. Ada coiled up in his lap and grabbed for it.

At that particular moment the door opened and a short, bald-headed gentleman in evening clothes waddled into the room. He looked like a penguin with a pince-nez. He looked like—"Perry Noid!" breathed Elmer. "Merciful God!"

“I am not a deity,” Professor Noid observed, drily. “And if I were, I doubt if I would be inclined towards mercy in this particular situation. Might I ask, young man, just what you are doing with my niece?”

“Why—research—” Elmer stammered. “I mean, she just invited me up here for a little experiment—”

Perry Noid glared through the pince-nez. “An experiment involving the removal of her clothing?” he demanded.

“Just going through her effects,” Elmer explained. “She said she was going to show me her thesis.”

“Her what?”

“My thesis, Ada corroborated. “We were looking for it in the closet, but I guess it’s not there. I was just going to ask Elmer here to rummage through my drawers—”

“Rummage indeed!” snapped Professor Perry Noid. “Exhibitionism is bad enough, but I draw the line at sadism.”

Elmer stood up. “I assure you my intentions were perfectly honorable,” he said.

“That’s right.” Ada rose and slipped into her skirt once more. “As a matter of fact, if anyone’s to blame, I am. I invited this young man up to my room. I’ve been taking his case-history.”

“Nonsense.” Perry Noid removed his pince-nez and polished the lenses on the edge of his goatee. “How often have I told you that such methodology is archaic, outmoded? The wish is father to the man. Find out the nature of the wishes, the daydreams, and you have a clue to the gestalt. Gratify those wishes, and all traces of neurosis or psychosis vanishes. To paraphrase the old rhyme, ‘neuroses are fled, psychoses are through.’ All this chap or anyone else needs is a few sessions with the Psycopathfinder.”

ADA sniffed. “That’s all very interesting,” she said. “But I notice you still teach your classes to use the orthodox approach in therapy.”

"Naturally," Professor Noid restored both the pince-nez and his goatee to their proper places. "You know I must. My invention is still in the experimental stage. Until I am satisfied that it is perfected, until the results can be demonstrated and proven before an accredited group of investigators, I must keep my own theories secret. But surely you, my own niece, should have faith in my methods. Instead, I find you sneaking young men up to your room in the middle of the night—"

"It's not the middle of the night," Ada declared. "It's scarcely eight o'clock. Why, the homecoming rally doesn't start for another hour and a half yet."

"What's the home-coming rally got to do with it?" demanded her uncle. "You didn't look as though you were attending any rally just now."

"But I intended to go," Ada protested. "I'm riding on one of the floats."

"What about this person?" Professor Noid turned to Elmer. "I warn you, the explanation had better be good. Don't tell me he was getting you into your costume for the homecoming rally. This I wouldn't believe, unless by some chance you plan to go as Lady Godiva." He paused. "Well, I'm waiting."

Ada flashed Elmer a desperate glance. "It's really very simple," she said. "Actually, I was just taking his case-history as a sort of preliminary. I meant to surprise you with him."

"Instead I surprised you with him," the Professor nodded. "But just what do you mean, surprise me?"

"Well," the girl improvised. "You've been talking about the Psychopathfinder, and verifying your experiment. And it occurred to me that Elmer, here, would be the perfect subject. So I was going to check his background and then bring him to you."

"Really? That was very thoughtful. And it's true, I've been looking for a human subject. Of course, I suppose you've explained that an experiment might be dangerous."

"Not with him," Ada said, quickly. "I made sure of that in my interview. He has practically no trace of traumatic incident, and his sex-drive is almost non-existent.”

“How did you find that out?” asked the Professor, then added hastily, “No, don’t tell me! But are you sure he understands what is involved in such a test?”

“Of course.” Ada took a deep breath, and again looked at Elmer imploringly. “As a matter of fact, he volunteered. Didn’t you, Elmer?”

If she hadn’t taken the deep breath, Elmer probably wouldn’t have answered as he did. Certainly if she hadn’t taken a deep breath and worn that particular sweater, he wouldn’t. But the combination brooked no denial. “Y-yes,” he said. “Anything you say.”

If the deep breath did its work, the deep sigh of relief that followed completed the job. But the Professor paid no attention to the by-play. He rubbed his hands.

“Let’s get started, then,” he said. “You’ll find my methods a bit unusual, but don’t let that disconcert you. For example, just now you may have noticed how I rubbed my hands.”

“Flaccidly,” Elmer observed.

“That’s right. Whenever one reads a book or a story, one inevitably finds characters who rub their hands briskly. I got to thinking about it and decided we adhere too closely to the conventions. From that time on I made a practice of rubbing my hands flaccidly, if at all. Mine is an iconoclastic nature.”

HE led the way down the hall, chattering as the two young people followed.

“I suppose this iconoclastic streak is what led to my original break with orthodox theory,” he remarked. “After years of teaching sophomorons the so-called basic elements of psychiatry according to the standard texts, I began to question the validity of their principles. I found myself taking everything with a grain of gestalt. The id, the ego and the super-ego may serve their purpose as theoretical concepts, but in actual practice a psychiatrist finds it hard to effect a cure. Even the so-called normal students seem aberrated to me. Just a bunch of crazy, mixed-up ids."

"What's he talking about?" Elmer muttered to Ada, as they trailed the Professor down the stairs.

"He's explaining how he got started on his experiments," she told him. "The thinking that led to the building of the Psychopathfinder."

"I finally came to the inevitable conclusion," the Professor was saying, as he ushered them into his study. "Psychiatric treatment, as normally administered, is largely useless. Anybody who goes to a psychiatrist ought to have his head examined."

The Professor sat down behind his desk. On the wall overhead was a large sign, reading SHRINK!

"Fortunately I had an excellent background in the physical sciences. My work in shock-therapy, electro-encephalography, stood me in good stead. I began to think of constructing a mechanical analyzer."

You mean a psychiatry machine?" Elmer asked, interested in spite of himself.

"Why not? In effect, the so-called standard Lie-Detector is just that. True, its functions are limited, but it does effectively analyze certain psychic components. The cyberneticists, with their computing machines—their mechanical brains—gave me a further clue to the construction of what I finally came to call the Psychopathfinder." Professor Noid paused and milked his goatee with thoughtful fingers. "No doubt Ada has told you about my own personal theories of analytic procedure."

Elmer opened his mouth, but Ada answered for him. "I explained everything," she said. "He knows a great deal about psychiatry."

"Good." The Professor smiled. "How do you feel about the cathartic method?"

"Never use 'em myself," Elmer said, truthfully. "Glass of hot water in the morning is just as effective."

"True! I can see you've thought the problem through, just as I did. Ordinary analysis, even so-called depth-analysis, is just a waste of time.

Removing inhibitions and psychic blocs by searching out the original causation buried in the subconscious is a lengthy procedure. Much easier to dramatize those suppressed desires and thus eliminate the personality defects.”

“But are you sure it will work?” Ada asked.

“Now you’re talking like one of my stupid colleagues,” the Professor snapped. “Full of prejudice and dogma. No wonder that psychotherapy today is so psychopathetic! Of course it will work—didn’t I tell you I’ve already tested the machine on those white rats? And then on some black rats, too?” He glanced at Elmer. “You’ll find I’m like that all down the line,” he said. “Broadminded. I don’t draw the color-line. I believe all rats were created equal.”

“I didn’t hear about the rats,” Ada said.

“Well, you won’t hear about them now,” the Professor declared. “Instead, if you’ll step this way, I’ll show them to you.”

He rose and led them to a door set in the wall of his study. Producing a key, he unlocked it and opened the way into what proved to be a large and well equipped laboratory.

“Why, this is quite a place!” Elmer marvelled, glancing about the white-tiled room and noting the elaborate electrical apparatus, the leaping arcs and sputtering retorts.

“Isn’t it?” The Professor rubbed his hands languidly. “I never could have afforded to build it myself. I bought it second-hand from a Hollywood studio after they were through using it in a science-fiction movie. Got the whole thing for less than five thousand dollars, including two rubber Martians and an old Frankenstein’s monster costume.”

HE walked over to some cages near the wall. “Here are the rats,” he proclaimed. “Take a look at the difference.”

Elmer and Ada peered into the cage. Three or four rats, sleek and fat, slumbered peacefully.

“I don’t see anything changed about them,” the girl said. “They’re awfully plump, yes, but—”

“Don’t touch the bars!” cried the Professor. “They’ll crumble!”

“Why?”

“Look and see.”

They looked and saw. In place of the conventional bars, the front of the cage was criss-crossed with long strips of aged cheese.

“Limburger!” Ada sniffed. “Why did you put up bars made out of cheese?”

“That’s just the point, my dear. I didn’t. The rats did. After one treatment, they commenced to exert latent psychic energy towards their suppressed goals. The same electrical energy manifested by the brain in encephalographs was transformed into positive use by the machine. Their wishes took substance—and the bars of their cage turned to cheese.”

“Let me get this straight,” Elmer said. “You mean you’ve got a new method of psychotherapy? A machine that makes wishes come true?”

“Utilizing the basic energy of the human brain,” the Professor assented. “That’s all there is to it. A preliminary mechanical hypnosis by-passes the inhibitory blocs on both the conscious and subconscious level. The energy released immediately formulates the suppressed desires that are usually dramatized in a distorted form in dreams, neurosis or psychosis. Once materialized as independent entities, the subject can gratify his wishes and eliminate conflict. Or, on another level, he can materialize his phobias and conflict-images and thus be rid of them. In either case, the end-result is complete sanity.”

“The rats were crazy for cheese and now they’ve got all the cheese they want so they’re satisfied, eh?” Elmer muttered. “I suppose if you tried it on dogs, they’d want bones?”

“Not always,” smiled the Professor. “I did try it on dogs, of course. Two of them were what you might call fairly well-adjusted to begin with. They materialized bones in their cages. The third dog chose to materialize a half a dozen lamp-posts.” He coughed discreetly. “Of course, one must expect some unusual results when one in effect grants every wish. I remember I made the mistake once of trying it on rabbits and—"

He shrugged. "But never mind. If my niece vouches for your basic normality, you should have nothing to. fear. In fact, this experiment may have pleasant results for you. Not quite as pleasant as for the rabbits, perhaps, but—"

He drew Elmer over to the other wall. A large black machine stood next to a switchboard; connecting the two were a dozen wires and cables. The machine itself resembled nothing so much as an old-fashioned stereoptican, such as can still be found in the Penny Arcade at an amusement park. The only difference appeared to be that this machine's viewing-surface was enlarged so that the entire head could fit inside.

"This is it?" Elmer asked.

"This is it," nodded Professor Noid. "The Psychopathfinder. The greatest revolutionary concept in therapy since the discovery of sex! First Freud and then Noid! My boy, rest assured that if your volunteer efforts prove successful, you will share my fame. I promise to give you full credit when I write up my monograph—mention your name in a footnote, or something."

"That's mighty nice of you, Professor. But just what do you want me to do?"

"Why, nothing at all. You might care to take a look at the insides of the apparatus, though. Go ahead, stoop down. I'll switch on a light."

Ada stepped forward. "Please," she said. "You're sure he can't be harmed—?"

"Not a chance," boomed the Professor, jovially. "The voltage is infinitesimal; the subject's brain builds up its own charge. No danger at all. Go ahead, my boy—take a look. Stoop to conquer."

Elmer stooped.

The Professor conquered.

Elmer stuck his head into the apparatus, waiting for the light to switch on and a view of the interior to emerge. Instead, something else happened.

THE Professor threw a switch and the machine started to drone and shake. At the same time something pressed tightly against Elmer's temples, neck and forehead. His skull was squeezed and held inside the machine. He began to drone and shake, too. In front of his eyes a spiral pattern appeared—a circular pattern that revolved and held his attention even as his body fought for release. All at once he felt himself falling forward—not physically but psychically. His entire being seemed drawn into that spiral, whirling around and around and around—

"You started the machine!" Ada whispered. "That was a dirty trick!"

"That was the scientific approach," Professor Noid corrected her. "No pre-conditioning. Observe, the hypnotic effect supervenes rapidly. One more notch here and I'll induce deep trance. There! Now to release the energy for image-materialization."

"It's like shock-therapy," Ada said.

"Not at all! This is completely involutional on all levels. Whatever is most completely suppressed in this young man's mind will manifest itself in actuality once the treatment is over. Note the change in him when I complete the cycle."

He switched off the machine and Elmer's body sagged slightly. Ada ran over to him. "Are you all right?" she murmured, pulling his head out of the opening.

The young man smiled at her. "Sure, I feel fine," he said. "What happened? When does the treatment start?"

"It's all over," Ada told him. She turned and regarded her uncle skeptically. "It's all over, and I don't notice any change in him at all."

"That's right," the Professor agreed. "But you might take a look at yourself. He just stared at you, didn't he?"

"Yes, but—"

Ada glanced down at her body, then clothed herself in a blush.

And well she might, for aside from the blush, Ada was completely naked.

Elmer let out a gasp. "Believe me, I had nothing to do with it," he murmured. "I just looked at you, and your clothes came off—there they are on the floor—”

“So I notice.” Ada stepped over the tangled heap and advanced towards him. “I don’t know how you managed it,” she grated. “But you’re going to pay for this little trick!”

“No!” Elmer protested. “It’s not my fault, I assure you.”

Ada looked far from assured. The young man retreated towards the door.

“Come back,” called the Professor. “It’s just the treatment, don’t you see? I can explain.”

“Over his dead body,” Ada suggested. “Which I’ll have ready for you in about a minute, now.”

But Elmer didn’t wait. As the nude female descended upon him-, he turned and bolted—through the hall, down the stairs, and out into the night.

CHAPTER III

ELMER kept running until he reached Main Street. Here the crowds gathering for the homecoming parade impeded his progress.

Panting, he slowed down to a walk. At the sight of the students swarming over the sidewalks, he quickly closed his eyes. It seemed the safest thing to do. No telling what might happen if he looked at people.

Something had happened to him, all right. Or all wrong, rather. Professor Noid’s machine was probably responsible, but that was no consolation. He didn’t care to think about it; what he wanted to do was reach the safety of home and bed.

Eyes closed, face flushed, hair disheveled, he reeled along the curb.

A voice shouted, “Hey, Klopp!” He recognized the tones.

Despite himself, Elmer halted and turned to confront the porcine visage of the president of Sigma Omega Beta. William Shooter, better and more appropriately known as ‘Bull’, was a Big Man on the Campus. And well he might be, weighing in the neighborhood of two hundred and twenty pounds. Quite a rough neighborhood it was, too; for ‘Bull’ Shooter was a football star on the gridiron, an amateur boxer in the ring, and an almost professional wrestler in the back-seat of his convertible.

His wrestling companion tonight seemed to be a voluptuous blonde, who fluttered her long eyelashes coyly at the Big Man.

Elmer didn't share her admiration. He had a pretty accurate notion that 'Bull' Shooter was one of those who had seen to it that he wasn't pledged to the fraternity.

Nor did Elmer have a welcoming smile for Shooter's crony, one Warty Weems. Weems had a girl of his own, a bespectacled redhead with the intellectual look of a codfish who has read a book.

"Come here, Klopp!" commanded Shooter. "Wanna talk to you."

"Sorry," Elmer mumbled, closing his eyes again. "In a hurry." He tried to move past, but Warty Weems blocked his path. "You heard what the Big Man said," he grinned. "What's the matter, got no manners?"

"Why, he's drunk!" Shooter whooped. "Sure, that's it! Look at him—staggering along with his eyes closed. Klopp, I'm surprised at you!"

"I'm not drunk," Elmer insisted. "Just in a hurry."

"Then why do you keep closing your eyes?" Shooter came closer, and Elmer realized that if anyone could be accused of intoxication, the Big Man was the logical candidate. "Whatsa matter, don't you like the way my babe looks?"

"She's very pretty, I'm sure," Elmer said, hastily. "But you'll excuse me if I keep my head turned the other way. I—I've seen all I want to see of women for a while."

"What kind of a remark is that?" Warty Weems wanted to know. "And why do you keep looking back over your shoulder?"

"To see if I'm being followed," Elmer explained. "Do either of you happen to notice a naked woman back there?"

"Naked woman?" Shooter perked up his ears to get them out of the way of his grin. "You trying to tell us you're being chased by a naked woman?"

"Well, not exactly. But one did try to attack me a little while ago. I barely escaped. That is, I escaped, and she was bare." Elmer found himself reddening again. “Please, let me go home. This has been a confusing evening.”

“No you don’t!” Shooter grabbed his arm and arrested his progress. “I want to hear the rest of this business. Little squirt like you comes along and tries to hand me some crud about naked women chasing him—that doesn’t go, chum. Now let’s have the straight story. How did you get mixed up with this naked woman in the first place?”

“I didn’t get mixed up with her.” Elmer shook his head. “And she wasn’t naked until I undressed her.”

“You?” Warty Weems was incredulous.

“With my eyes, of course,” Elmer tried to explain. “I just took one look at her and her clothes came off.”

“Sounds goofty,” observed ‘Bull’ Shooter.

“Sounds drunk,” Warty Weems amended.

“Sounds interesting,” the blonde girl ventured.

“Sounds aberrated,” snapped the redhead.

“No such thing,” Elmer told her. “It was all an accident. But I don’t dare to look at women now or the same thing might happen again. That’s why I keep my eyes shut.”

“Nonsense,” the redhead declared. “It’s all pure rationalization. Or impure rationalization. You ought to see a psychiatrist.”

“I just did,” the young man protested. “And that’s how everything started.”

Bulk Shooter took him by the arm. “Now see here, Klopp,” he said. “I always had you figured for an oddball character. But when you come around and try to confuse people with a lot of crazy baloney about undressing people with your eyes—that’s all, brother! I got a good notion to pop you one, just to teach you a lesson in courtesy.”

“Go ahead!” Warty Weems urged, hopping up and down in alcoholic excitement. “Teach him good manners. Break his arm for him!”

THE Big Man on the Campus grinned. “That would be rude,” he admonished. “However, I will make you a deal, Klopp. Either you open your eyes and look at us like a human being or I will black them for you.”

“C-can’t we compromise?” Elmer suggested. “Couldn’t I just open one eye?”

“Both,” his captor insisted.

“All right—but you’ll be sorry.”

“Go ahead,” urged the redhead. “It will clear up your delusions. Seeing is believing, you know.”

“I know,” Elmer sighed. “But do you?”

She found out quickly. Elmer opened his eyes and stared at her for a long moment.

“You see?” she cried. “Nothing happened. Say, it’s getting chilly this evening, isn’t it?”

“P-pick up your clothes,” gulped Warty Weems. “You’re naked as a coot.”

“What do you mean by that statement?” the redhead demanded. “I’ve always wondered what a coot is and why it’s so—” She halted as her gaze travelled down over her body. “Oh!” she gasped. “It’s true!”

“I warned you, didn’t I?” Elmer reminded. Quickly he tore his eyes away. Unfortunately the next recipient of his gaze was the voluptuous blonde with the long eyelashes.

One glance, however, altered her appearance considerably. First the long eyelashes fell off, and then the voluptuous figure disappeared. As dress and bra vanished, the curves melted away and she stood there in dismay, if nothing else; revealed to all the world as a figure of scrawn.

‘Bull’ Shooter’s reaction was instantaneous. With the courageous chivalry of a big man confronting a little man, he roared, “Undress my girl, will you? Take this!”

Elmer refused his generous offer by ducking, but the Campus Hero caught him in an armlock. By this time a large group of passing students had halted at the curb, attracted by the sight of a scuffle and the presence of two nude girls. Delighted at their good fortune, they now prepared to witness a murder as an additional bonus.

But Elmer wasn't cooperating. As 'Bull' Shooter tightened his grip, Elmer focussed his attention on his enemy's belt-buckle.

"Pardon me," he panted. "But I think your trousers are falling down."

"Thank you," said Shooter. Then, "Migawd, they are down!"

"I'll hold him for you," Warty Weems volunteered.

"Hold your shorts," Elmer advised. And in a moment that's what both of his opponents were doing. Elmer took advantage of the occasion to plunge blindly into the crowd and race away.

"What's going on here?" demanded an elderly gentleman, as Elmer elbowed him aside. "Or should I ask what's coming off here? On second thought, I needn't ask, need I?"

It would have done him no good, for by this time the young man was halfway up the block, and gaining speed. From behind him came shouts and shrieks, but he didn't bother to look back. He kept going, panting and puffing, until he rounded the corner. Here sheer instinct—and the odor of fermented hops—guided him into a place of refuge. Gasping, Elmer tottered into the dim confines of Ye Olde Gin Mill.

Michael Finn gazed at him patiently from behind the bar. "What's the matter?" he inquired, mildly. "Lumps in the couch?"

Elmer permitted his eyes to open but avoided gazing directly at the bartender. "Give me a drink," he pleaded. "Give me a lot of drinks."

"Grasshoppers?"

"No—I want something in a hurry."

"Little eye-opener, eh?"

"Not that!" Elmer groaned. "Give me something to shut 'em, quick!"

"Double-brandy?"

"A double-double-brandy," the young man amended. "Make it two double-double-brandies." Shrugging, the bartender poured. Slurping, the young man drank. "Whoosh!" he said. "That's better. Do it again!"

“Now take it easy—you’ll pass out if you put it down that fast,” Michael Finn warned.

“Just the idea,” Elmer said. “Want to pass out. Got to pass out, quick, before I look at too many people. Lucky you don’t have any customers here tonight.”

“What’s so lucky about it?” Michael Finn wanted to know. “Everybody’s at that damned rally and parade. You’re the only business I’ve got.” He watched as Elmer took the second double-double brandy and downed it. “Though come to think of it, what more do I need? You’re drinking like a whole bar-full of customers.”

“More,” Elmer demanded.

THE bartender hesitated.

“Please,” he said. “Are you really serious about wanting to pass out? And if so, why?”

“Told you,” Elmer reminded him. “So I won’t look at people. When I do, things happen.”

“You been looking at that girl, is that it?”

“Yes. I wish I’d never set eyes on her.”

“Is she that bad? Seemed like quite a dish.”

“Tell me more,” urged Michael Finn. So Elmer told him more. Elmer, in fact told all; up to and including his recent encounter with ‘Bull’ Shooter and party.

“You sure you ain’t just making this up?” the bartender demanded, when he concluded. “Honest, now—look me straight in the eye.” Elmer looked him straight in the eye. Michael Finn’s tie, shirt and underwear tops flew off. So did his toupee.

“If the rest of you wasn’t out of sight back of the bar, I’d have stripped you bare,” Elmer told him.

“Then it’s the truth you’ve been telling,” the bartender gasped. “The naked truth.”

“Exactly. I can’t seem to control it either. I look at somebody and—poof! Now do you see why I want to get blind drunk?”

“Only solution,” Michael Finn agreed. He dressed thoughtfully. I’ll join you in a double-double myself.”

He did. Several double-doubles later the two were still discussing the mystery of Elmer’s ability and Professor Noid’s strange machine.

“Don’t know what happened to my mind,” the young man said. “But it had better wear off soon. Can’t go around this way—turn the whole world into a nudist colony.”

“You could wear blinders,” Michael Finn suggested.

“I’m no horse.”

“An excellent point. I’ll drink to that.” He paused. “Well, how about keeping your eyes closed permanent-like?”

“Then I couldn’t watch television,” Elmer protested.

“Well, maybe you could get yourself one of them Seeing Eye Dogs. He could watch television for you.”

“Splendid!” Elmer drank again. “Come to think of it, that’s the best way to watch television, judging from most of the programs I’ve looked at.” He blinked. “Know something? I think this brandy is working.”

“You mean you can’t take clothes off any more? Try me.”

“Hold still.”

As the bartender posed, Elmer concentrated on his figure with both eyes. For a moment Michael Finn’s necktie flapped feebly, then subsided.

“I’m safe!” Elmer exulted. “I don’t think I could take the dressing off a piece of lettuce at ten paces.”

“Good. One more double-double should do the trick.”

“It’s already doing something,” Elmer confessed. “I’m getting so that I see double-double. F’rinstance, those girls there.”

“Those girls?” The bartender turned, just as Ada entered the place.

“So there you are!” she called. “I thought I might find you here!”

“Keep away from me!” Elmer begged.

“It’s a deal—just so you don’t subject me to another public striptease.”

“Don’t worry about that,” Elmer assured her. “I’m all right. Been drinking—lost my evil eye, or whatever it was.”

“Glad to hear it,” Ada replied. “Then you’re not angry?”

“Of course not.” She settled down on the bar-stool beside him. “My uncle explained everything. It wasn’t your fault.” She sniffed and stared. “My goodness, you have been indulging, haven’t you?”

Elmer leered happily. “Think nothing of it,” he said. “Never felt better in my life.”

“Take your hand off my knee when you say that,” Ada cautioned him.

“Here!” Elmer called. “Let’s all have ’nother double-double.”

“You’ve had enough,” Ada declared. “One more will bring you face to face with delirium tremens. Besides, it isn’t safe for you to be drinking like this in your present state. That’s why I came looking for you. My uncle wants you to come back and take another treatment in the Psychopathfinder.”

“Another treatment?” Elmer shuddered. “Never! Won’t catch me sticking my head in that infernal machine, nosiree!”

“But it’s all a matter of adjustment—he says the first experiment merely brushed the surface, released some of the common, suppressed fantasies. Another treatment will probe deeper and restore your contact with reality.”

“Don’t need contact with realty. ’M doing okay.” Elmer wobbled on the stool. “Things going round and round now, but at least got all their clothes on. Dizzy. Must be drunk, all right. Get dizzy then, huh? See things, too.”

“Please,” the girl begged. “Let me take you back for another treatment. My uncle is worried about you.”

“Nothing t’worry ’bout. I’m fine.”

“Oh—you!” The girl climbed down from the bar-stool and regarded him indignantly. “And to think I gave up a chance to be in the parade just to come out and argue with a stupid, inebriated—”

"Poo!" Elmer remarked. "Run along, leave me be. Happy like this. Wanna see things."

"See what you please," Ada retorted. "I'm going."

"Tell Prof'ssor I'm happy like I am," Elmer called after her. "Me and my lil old pink elephant."

"What pink elephant?"

"That one, over there, in the corner," Elmer said. "Don't you see him?"

Ada and Michael Finn both stared at the corner, then at each other. Then they stared at Elmer.

"Dear Lord!" breathed Ada. "He does need a treatment, and that's definite!"

"Maybe we all need treatments," Michael Finn shuddered. "You see it, too?"

"I see it," Ada admitted. "We all see it, don't we, Elmer?"

"Tha's right," babbled the young man, happily. "Nice big pink elephant. Biggest and pinkest one I ever saw." He giggled. "Better give it a drink, hey? I think it wants one."

Sure enough, the biggest and pinkest elephant in the world advanced and put its trunk on the bar.

CHAPTER IV

"NOW what do we do?" Ada had accepted and downed her second drink, unable to tear her eyes from the spectacle of the pink pachyderm as it absorbed the greater part of a pony of beer.

"Maybe if you sober Elmer up it'll go away," Michael Finn suggested.

"You're probably right," the girl agreed. "After all, it's just an embodiment of a hallucination. Another form of wishfulfilment."

"You leave my pink elephant alone," Elmer pouted, maudlinly. "See? He loves me. Watch him put his trunk 'round my neck."

"I can't bear the sight!" Ada confessed. She turned to the bartender quickly. "How do we sober him up?" she murmured.

"Fresh air would help."

"Good. I'll take him outside."

"And leave me here alone with that beast? Not on your life, lady!"

"But we can't take him."

"You'll have to take him. After all, he ain't my hallucination."

"Wouldn't you like to keep him for a pet?" Ada asked, desperately.

"Huh. Fine pet!" The bartender regarded the elephant balefully. "Got a hunch he ain't even house-broken."

"Maybe you could train him," the girl argued. "Doesn't the sheer challenge of it grip you? Think of tackling a big job like that."

"I am thinking about it," the bartender replied. "And I don't like it."

"But if you succeeded, you'd be famous." Ada adopted her most cajoling manner. "Why, you could become an authority in the field. Write a book about it, perhaps. How to Housebreak an Elephant. Who knows, it might be a bestseller. Worse ones than that have made it."

"I'm no author," said Michael Finn. "And I ain't no wet-nurse to pink elephants, either. I advise you to get him to hell out of here before he gets drunk too. Guzzling up all that beer, anything's liable to happen. Suppose the elephant starts to see pink men?"

"Awright!" Elmer, who had been petting the the pachyderm, now turned and scowled. "I can take a hint. I know when I'm not wanted. Come on, Lucy, le's go."

"Lucy?" Ada frowned. "What kind of a name is that?"

"You an authority on elephant names all of a sudden?" Elmer demanded. "This is my elephant and I'll chris'n her what I please. Named her Lucy on purpose—short for hallucination, see?"

"I see." Ada hesitated. "You aren't really going to walk right out on the street with her like that, are you?"

"Course not!" Elmer climbed up on the bar-stool and tottered triumphantly. "Gonna ride her. Come on, you too."

“Not me!”

“Said you wanted to be in the parade, didn’t you? Well, this is your chance.”

“Maybe that’s a good idea,” Michael Finn agreed. “If you join the parade, people will think it’s sort of a stunt, like.”

“Well—”

Through the door came the sound of cheers and music. The homecoming parade in progress.

“Come on,” Elmer urged. “You want me to take ’nother fling at that Psychopachyderm or whatever it is? Got to get to your uncle, then. This is easiest way.”

Ada hesitated. Then, “The things one has to do in the interest of science,” she muttered. And climbed up behind Elmer on the elephant’s back.

Michael Finn lurched around the bar and opened the door. “Better duck,” he cautioned.

They ducked. The pink elephant stepped out across the sidewalk and into the street as the parade moved by. Elmer tugged at its ears and guided it into the procession.

There were stares, gasps, and then applause. In the array of floats and costumed marchers, the pink elephant did not seem too incongruous.

“Hey, this is fun!” Elmer declared, as they lumbered along in the wake of a band. “And you know something? The bartender was right—I am sobering up, fast. This air is wonderful!”

“Try to look dignified then,” the girl advised. “We may get away with this yet.”

And they almost did. Nearing the judge’s stand at the head of the street, the elephant plodded majestically past. Elmer was indeed sobering rapidly, and in an effort to convey this good news to Ada, he now turned and stared at the girl.

“I’m all right now,” he announced, proudly.

"Oh, fine!" Suddenly she groaned. "You're all right—but look at me. No, don't look at me, you've done it again!"

And he had.

THE crowd and judges were suddenly treated to the spectacle of a pink elephant bearing a naked girl who seemed to be clawing and cursing at her male companion.

Cheers mingled with laughter, then turned to shrieks of consternation. For Elmer, glancing about wildly for some means of escape, let his gaze fall on the crowd at random. And wherever it fell, clothes fell with it.

His eyes swept the judges' stand—and literally swept it bare.

"Stop that!" Ada screamed. "You're undressing half the university!"

"I can't help it," Elmer panted. "I'm getting soberer by the minute!"

As if in final proof of the statement, the pink elephant began to wobble precariously beneath them. Then, abruptly, it disappeared.

The two of them plunged to the pavement. Nobody noticed the sudden vanishment, being much too occupied with a search for their missing garments.

Elmer landed with a thump, catching the girl as she descended. "See, it's gone," he muttered. "I'm cold sober."

"I'm cold, period," Ada chattered.

"Take my coat," Elmer urged, gallantly. "Maybe we can find some place and have a drink."

"What? And bring back that pink nightmare again? Not on your life! We're going to find my uncle right away and get you straightened out."

She dragged him to the sidewalk through the unclad throng, and they sought the sheltering shadow of the trees.

Elmer peered back at the pandemonium in the street. People in varying stages of dress and undress rushed to and from; while from the judging stand, nude gentlemen in top-hats waved their canes and gesticulated indignantly to naked policemen.

“Pity we can’t stick around,” he sighed wistfully. “Maybe we could have won a prize.”

“Will you come on?” panted the girl. “My teeth are chattering. Your coat doesn’t begin to cover me in the back here. What do you expect me to do?”

“Nothing,” Elmer told her. “Except grin and bare it.”

Stifling a groan, the half-naked damsel dragged him off into the night.

CHAPTER V

“SO OU’RE back,” Professor Noid muttered, opening the door hastily.

“In the flesh,” said Ada. “As you can all too plainly see.”

“Good.” The Professor rubbed his hands weakly. “For a while I was a bit worried.”

“Nice of you to be concerned,” his niece remarked, in a bitter voice. “But there’s really nothing to get upset about. Our boy Elmer here has been undressing half the population while sober—and when he was drunk, he materialized a hallucination of a pink elephant.”

“A pink elephant? Really?” Professor Noid peered over the top of his pince-nez. “I’d like to have seen it. Full-size, I presume?”

“Very full,” Ada said.

“Might I inquire as to its sex?”

“Female,” Elmer said.

“Ah!” The Professor’s goatee wagged excitedly. “Very significant, that. It shows I have succeeded in removing some of your inhibitions.”

“I wish you’d remove some of his exhibitions, too,” the girl exclaimed. “I’m tired of losing my clothes in public.”

“Then let’s go inside,” the Professor suggested.

“Are you suggesting I lose my clothes again in private?”

“I’m suggesting nothing,” her uncle told her. “That’s all up to Elmer.”

“Like heck it is!” Ada’s tone was fervent. “See if you can snap him out of his nude mood altogether.”

"Maybe I can get drunk again," Elmer suggested. "It worked once before."

"Then we'd have the elephant on our hands," the girl reminded him.

"This I'd like to see," the Professor said. "Was it African or Indian, by the way?"

"It was awful!" Ada shuddered. Briefly she recounted the events in the tavern and during the parade. The Professor nodded and made notes.

"How long do you think this will keep up?" Elmer asked.

"I think I can assure you that you won't be troubled after another treatment," Professor Noid said, soothingly. "Now that the commonplace surface fantasies have been uncovered, materialized, and eliminated, we can probe deeper and reach the basic problems. But I promise you, one more session with the Psychopathfinder and your present troubles will be dissipated."

"They're dissipated enough already," Ada grumbled. "You should have seen how drunk he got!"

"Excellent!" The Professor rubbed his hands together in listless abandon. "Before the treatment he'd never have had the courage to get really drunk. Just goes to show he's making progress."

"What's your idea of complete success?" inquired his niece. "When he starts running around committing rape and arson?"

"You needn't be afraid," the Professor soothed. "I doubt if he'd ever set fire to you."

He led them into the laboratory. The black unit loomed balefully before them.

"Let's go to work," Professor Noid said. "Ada, you take notes."

ELMER blinked dubiously. "I'm not so sure about this," he muttered. "One treatment and I went haywire. What might another do?"

"We won't know until we try. This is all highly experimental."

"And I'm the guinea-pig?"

"You might put it that way, yes. But you're a better guinea-pig than you were beforehand." The Professor regarded him seriously for a moment. "All your life, probably, you've been carrying around this subconscious voyeuristic desire to see people in the nude. By fulfilling it, your conflict in this area has been resolved. I'd venture to guess that from now on, you won't want to be a Peeping Tom any more."

"Right," Elmer agreed.

"Also, I'd hazard you've always had a suppressed desire to get blind drunk and allow your fantasies to take over. Hence the rather stereotyped hallucination of a pink elephant. You won't want to surrender to that impulse again, now that you've realized it, will you?"

"Definitely not! I've had my fill of elephants." Elmer grinned. "Now I'm beginning to understand, I think. This machine hypnotizes you, releases inhibitions, and harnesses the electrical energy of the brain to materialize suppressed concepts that cause conflict—is that it?"

"The electro-psychic energy," the Professor corrected him. "And probably not from the brain alone, if the gestalt concept is taken into consideration."

"But how do you know how many suppressions I have?" Elmer asked. "Or how many conflicts?"

"You've probably got all of them." Professor Noid butted the air with his goatee. "That's another part of my theory. In orthodox psychiatry, patients are classified according to individual labels. We have the schizoid, the paranoid, the subdivisions of the hebephrenic, catatonic, and so forth. But the majority of authorities admit that there are few classic cases—in which the patient exhibits only the pure, undifferentiated symptoms of a single psychosis. The syndromes tend to overlap. Do you follow me?"

"Vaguely," Elmer admitted. "I sort of tripped and stumbled over that hebephrenic stuff back there."

"Well, it doesn't matter." Professor Noid shrugged. "Point is, my theory holds that every man possesses the potentialities of all the neuroses and psychoses known. In essence, each of us is a latent multiple psychotic—phobic, masochistic, sadistic, cycloid, aggressive, withdrawn, hysteric, compelled, obsessed; a schizophrenic rogue's gallery of conflicting personality components, as it were."

"Were it?" Elmer asked. "Then you mean to say, the next treatment can turn me into anything?"

"Not exactly. It will merely accentuate whatever lies in the next layer of the subliminal and release it. Then we can go on to a still deeper area. It's like peeling an onion."

"But I don't want to be a peeled onion!" Elmer stared fiercely at the Professor. Abruptly, the Professor's clothes dropped.

"Well, I don't want to be peeled, either," the scientist told him. "And I'm sure you can't go around undressing people all the rest of your life, either. You're lucky you got away with it tonight—another such episode and the police might take a hand."

"You're sure the treatment will cure that?" Elmer asked.

"Quite."

"But what if it brings on something worse?"

"We can eliminate the next phase with still another treatment." The Professor dressed thoughtfully.

Elmer was silent. Ada glanced at him and smiled.

"All right," he said. "I suppose there's no choice."

"Good. Put your head in there."

Elmer approached the machine, bent forward. Once again the Professor threw the switch—there was the droning and the shaking, and the sight of the hypnotic spirals drawing him down. As Elmer sagged, Professor Noid busied himself with various levers on the control-panel.

"You're sure you know what you're doing?" Ada whispered, anxiously.

"Of course," her uncle told her. "Note that I'm stepping up the reactor-factor. The first treatment had projective results—he externalized, altered his environment. Now we'll try for introjection; a change in himself."

"Don't hurt him," the girl murmured.

"Fond of him, are you?"

“Afraid so. I don’t quite know why—he’s such a schmoe.”

“Maternal instinct.” The Professor got clever with a lever. “There, I think that does it.”

And it did.

ELMER’S sagging body slid to the floor. He sat there for a moment, holding his head in his hands.

“How do you feel?” Ada bent over him, eyes clouded with concern.

“Yikes!” screeched Ada, and bolted for the door.

“What’s the matter?” Elmer rose and approached the Professor.

“G-get back!” The psychiatrist cringed against the wall, his goatee sagging in dismay.

“Is something wrong? Tell me?” Elmer insisted.

For answer, the Professor pointed a trembling finger at a mirror in the corner.

Elmer approached it and stared at his own face.

Only it wasn’t his own face any more.

Leering up at him from the glass was the reflection of a. hairy, brutish countenance—the fanged, fierce and fiendish face of a gorilla.

“Oh!” gasped Ada.

“Oh no!” amended Elmer, feeling his face with furry fingers. “What’s the meaning of this monkey-business?”

“I told you the next change would be introjective,” the Professor exulted, rubbing his hands in hysterical apathy. “He has uncovered the brutal, primitive side of his nature, the atavistic heritage we all share.”

“You can have my share,” Elmer groaned. “But speaking of uncovering—these clothes itch.”

His paw-like hands scrabbled at buttons and belt, and in a moment he stood before them naked; if a hirsute adult male gorilla can be considered naked.

Ada retreated to her uncle's arms.

"Am I that awful?" Elmer asked, moving forward, his knuckles scraping the floor.

"Worse!" the girl shuddered. Elmer took another look in the mirror and confirmed the fact. "It's like something out of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," he muttered.

"True." The Professor stroked his niece with one hand and the goatee with the other. "That particular story has a sound psychological basis. Every one of us has a concealed, primitive side."

"It should be concealed," Elmer told him. "And if you think I'm going to walk around in the body of a gorilla, you're nuttier than I think you are—which, by the way, is considerably." He swayed before them. "Put me back in that machine of yours and give me another treatment, fast."

"But can't you put up with it for just a few hours?" The Professor asked. "Long enough for me to study you a bit? I'd like to try you with a Rohrsach test and the Poretus Maze; see how your reflexes respond."

Elmer growled and raised a hairy arm. "I'll show you how my reflexes respond if you don't hurry up and change me back," he threatened.

"Why, what's come over you?" Ada whispered. "You're so savage—"

"It's the bestial aspect," her uncle said. "The change is more than bodily. Maybe I'd better do as he says. No telling what his brutal instincts might lead him to in his present state."

Elmer started over to the Psychopathfinder. "Get busy," he commanded. "I'm so brutal I scare myself. I have the funniest feeling that I want to pound on my chest and roar."

"No, not that!" the Professor begged. "Think of the neighbors. If anyone should hear you now, or see you—"

"Speaking of hearing," murmured Ada. "Seems to me as if there are footsteps on the stairs."

"No!"

"Someone's coming down the hall," the girl insisted. "I'm sure of it."

Professor Noid glanced at Elmer in frantic despair. "Hurry up," he whispered. "Hide yourself, quickly!"

"But where?" Elmer demanded.

"Never mind—lay down on that table over there—do something—anything—"

Elmer started for the table.

A moment later the door opened and a stranger walked into the room.

CHAPTER VI

"GOOD evening," said the stranger, briskly. "I trust I'm not disturbing anything?"

The Professor offered him a weak smile and weaker handclasp. "No, not at all," he said.

"I rang the doorbell several times but there was no answer. Finding the door open, I took the liberty of coming upstairs. After all, you did invite me over tonight, didn't you? Something about a remarkable discovery you've made?"

"Uh—yes." The Professor turned to Ada. "I don't believe you two have met, my dear. This is Dr. Noodlemayer, head of the Department of Anthropology. My niece, Ada."

Lying on the table, Elmer cocked one eye at the anthropologist. He saw a tall thin man whose bushy eyebrows and mustache seemed interchangeable.

"I know I'm late," Noodlemayer was saying, "but I didn't want to miss the homecoming parade."

"Anything worth seeing?" the Professor asked.

Noodlemayer passed a hand over his forehead. "I'm not sure," he answered. "In fact, since seeing that parade I'm not sure of anything." He pulled a pint bottle from his inside coat pocket. "If you'll forgive me, I think I'll have a medicinal libation." He uncorked the bottle, smiling apologetically at the Professor. "I trust you will ignore this lapse," he said. "Very seldom indulge."

"What it is?" asked Ada, curiously.

"Harmless alcohol," Noodlemayer assured her. "Generally use it to pickle my specimens in." He drank deeply.

"Er—how are your specimens?" the Professor ventured.

"Pickled, as I said," Noodlemayer replied. "And as I soon hope to be, myself." He shuddered, then handed the bottle to his colleague. "That parade tonight! I couldn't believe my own eyes! I was standing near the judging platform, and in the middle of the affair people seemed to suddenly go mad. It was like a saturnalia, really—they began tearing off their clothes and capering about." He paused, eyeing Ada. "I trust I'm not offending you," he ventured.

"I think it's very offensive not to offer a lady the first drink," she said.

"Excuse me." Noodlemayer passed her the bottle. She gulped, shivered, and returned the diminished pint to her uncle, who drank quickly.

"You may not believe this," Noodlemayer continued, "But for a moment I thought I saw a pink elephant in the parade, too."

"Possibly." Professor Noid smiled vaguely. "Some of the students may have rented an elephant from the zoo and dyed it pink, you know."

"I know." Noodlemayer tipped the bottle again, smiling self-consciously. "But while I was looking at it, the beast disappeared. And that's when people began losing their clothes. It was like a Bacchic orgy."

"Speaking of Bacchus," Ada said, "Are you sure you weren't drinking before the parade, too?"

"Well—just a nip," Noodlemayer confessed. "I had about a pint or so of this stuff left over after preserving an alligator, and I hated to waste it."

"Alligator?" Ada shuddered and grabbed the bottle, downing another stiff drink. "Brrrr! A few slugs of this and I can understand why you saw pink elephants and naked people. You've got the d.t.s."

"Have I?" Noodlemayer asked. "But I feel quite sober, I assure you."

"No sober man sees pink elephants," the girl insisted. "Just thinking about them has driven me to drink."

"Well, let's talk about it downstairs," the Professor said, hastily, eyeing Elmer as he endeavored to lead Dr. Noodlemayer from the room.

"But. you were going to show me the results of your recent experiments," Noodlemayer protested. "You said something about a new machine and exciting advances in—"

"All a mistake," the Professor assured him. "I was drunk when I called you. As a matter of fact, I wish I were drunk now." Nervously, he reached for the pint bottle again, and took a final pull.

"Well, if you really feel that way about it," Noodlemayer beamed, reaching into his coat once more, "I just happen to have another bottle with me. You see, I actually preserved two alligators."

AT the sound of the word, Ada snatched the second bottle from his hands. She tilted it expertly.

Elmer, watching from the table in the corner, realized that all three of them were rapidly showing the effects of their hasty tippling. The Professor and Ada both drank to calm their apprehensions.

Once more the psychiatrist endeavored to lead Noodlemayer from the room. "Downstairs," he coaxed. "We can all relax and take our shoes off."

"Please, no," Noodlemayer begged. "I don't want to see anything else removed this evening. I still am not sure if it was real or imaginary. Maybe your niece is right. I might have indulged too freely. Perhaps I should give up trying to preserve alligators."

Once more Ada grabbed at the bottle. "Must you talk about such loathsome things?" she asked. "Alligators and elephants—what next?"

Noodlemayer turned, a placating smile on his lips. It froze suddenly, then crept up under his mustache and disappeared. "W-what's that?" he gasped.

"What's what?"

"Over there—in the corner, on the table." He pointed a wavering finger. "Am I completely deranged, or do I see the body of an anthropoid?"

"Which question do you want answered first?" Ada began. But Noodlemayer walked over to the table and peered down at Elmer. Elmer promptly closed his eyes and lay still, trying not to breathe noticeably.

The Professor started forward, but it was too late. Noodlemayer reached down and prodded Elmer's chest with his finger.

"It is a real gorilla!" he exclaimed. "I'm not that drunk!"

"I wish you were," muttered the Professor, despairingly.

"What did you say?"

"Now you went and spoiled it," Ada answered, quickly. "That's why we wanted to get you out of the room. We meant it as a surprise."

"It is a surprise," Noodlemayer agreed.

"No, you don't understand." Ada giggled in alcoholic inspiration. "You weren't supposed to see this for another two months yet. It was my uncle's idea."

"Was it?"

"Of course," Ada rattled on. "You understand how fond he is of you. So he decided to give you this gorilla for a Christmas present. Didn't you?"

Professor Noid nodded helplessly.

"We were talking it over, just the two of us, trying to think what kind of a gift would be useful to an anthropologist. And we decided a gorilla would be just the thing."

"Dandy," Noodlemayer agreed. "I've always wanted one."

"So we figured." Ada took a drink out of the bottle for added stimulation, and apparently found it. "Only we were going to wrap it up nicely in gift-paper and tie a big blue ribbon around it. What fun it would have been watching you opening your present and trying to guess what was inside! Wouldn't it have been?"

"I can't imagine anything more jolly," the Professor groaned, wrenching the bottle from her hands and ingurgitating rapidly. "A stuffed gorilla for Christmas—leave it to my niece to think up an appropriate sentimental remembrance. Of course, it's spoiled now."

Noodlemayer took the bottle, drank absently, and then sniffed. "It doesn't smell spoiled," he said.

"The gorilla? Of course not, because it's stuffed."

"Stuffed? What did you stuff it with?"

"Oh, all sorts of things." Ada waved vaguely. "We took it to a taxidermist."

Noodlemayer peered down at Elmer and his eyebrows waggled.

"I'm trying to classify it," he said. "Strange. The pectoral development is that of gorilla beringei or uellensis, but the zygomatic processes resemble gorilla castaneiceps or even may etna. I can't decide if it's a coastal or a mountainous specimen. Where did you get it?"

The Professor opened his mouth, but Ada broke in quickly.

"We raised it ourselves," she said. "From a chimpanzee."

"Impossible." Noodlemayer passed his hand over his forehead again. "You're just trying to confuse me."

"Here, have another drink," the Professor said. "That ought to help."

NOODLEMAYER finished the bottle. Then he tapped Elmer's forehead. "Something wrong here," he declared. "Did you say you had this specimen stuffed by a taxidermist?"

"Of course."

"But the brute's forehead seems warm."

"Maybe the taxidermist lied to us," Ada suggested. "Maybe he only claimed to have stuffed it."

"Then it's just a corpse," Noodlemayer nodded. "And not long dead, either, I'd guess." He ran his hand down across Elmer's nose.

That was a mistake.

Elmer sneezed.

"Yow!" the anthropologist commented, flinching and drawing back. "It's alive!"

"Now really," the Professor told him. "Maybe you've had too much to drink, old man. Remember those d. t. s."

"But I heard it," wailed Noodlemayer. "I saw it wrinkle its black snout at me!"

"Take it easy," Ada soothed. "This ape is quite dead. Can't feel a thing." Smiling she picked up the empty pint bottle and brought it down across Elmer's forehead. "You see?"

"I see!" Noodlemayer's jaw dropped as Elmer sat up.

"Hit me with a bottle, will you?" he growled. "A fine trick! And when the bottle was full, you wouldn't even come near me."

"It's alive—and talking!" Noodlemayer cried.

"I don't hear anything," said the Professor, innocently. He turned to his niece. "Do you, Ada?"

"Certainly not. Dr. Noodlemayer, you're blotto."

"Y-you mean to tell me you can't see it move?" The anthropologist shrank back against the wall, trembling. "Why, it's getting up—it's taking those clothes off the floor, putting them on—what kind of a monster do you have here? Is this the experiment you were telling me about?"

Ada stepped over to Elmer and hastily whispered in his oversized ear. "Lie down!" she breathed, hoarsely. "Now see what you've started?"

The gorilla shook its head. "I'm tired of lying down," he told her. "Tired of watching everybody else drink and have a good time. I'm leaving." Clumsily, it adjusted the clothes over its bulky body and knotted shoelaces with prehensile thumbs.

"Now she's talking to it," Noodlemayer wailed. "Listen, you can hear it!"

"Nothing of the sort," the Professor said. "Come downstairs and let me fix you a nice drink."

But before the unnerved anthropologist could accept the invitation, the gorilla had blocked the doorway. The simian countenance leered incongruously above the clothing.

“W-where are you going?” Ada demanded. “You can’t go out like this.”

“Oh can’t I?” Elmer answered.

“Just you watch and see. I’m through with your uncle and his thicks. Turn me into a gorilla, will he? All right, I’m going to enjoy myself before I vanish like that pink elephant.”

“Come back!” Ada called. “I’ll give you a banana.”

But it was too late. Scraping his knuckles along the floor, Elmer disappeared down the hall.

“Now what?” whispered the Professor.

The girl sighed. “I don’t know,” she said. “You were saying something about giving Dr. Noodlemayer a drink. Let’s all have one and try to think. Or not to think.”

“I saw it,” Noodlemayer insisted. “I saw it, I heard it. I’m going to phone the police!”

“First the drink, remember?” Professor Noid propelled the anthropologist out of the laboratory. “First the drink, and then you can call the police about the pink elephant and the gorilla and the naked alligators, or whatever you think you saw.”

“I-I’m so confused!” Noodlemayer groaned, as they descended the stairs.

“You aren’t the only one.” Ada halted at the bottom of the landing and surveyed the telltale evidence of the open front door. “And something tells me a lot of people are going to be still more confused before the night is over.”

CHAPTER VII

AS the first step towards confirming her prediction, Elmer crouched in the doorway of a hamburger stand on Main Street. He was suddenly conscious of an overpowering hunger. Here it was, almost midnight, and he hadn’t eaten dinner. All of this drinking and metamorphizing had stimulated his appetite; he had to eat.

Still, he hesitated. Gazing through the window, he discerned two couples seated at the counter of the hamburger joint. They were obviously college students, and he wondered how they would react to his appearance. Well, there was only one way to find out.

Squaring his shoulders and trying to walk erect, Elmer entered.

He seated himself at the counter, crouched low to avoid the gaze of the collegiate couples, who were engrossed in playing footie down at the far end. But he could not hope to hide his countenance from the counterman.

That gentleman now stepped in front of him and opened his mouth to solicit an order. But when the counterman gazed into Elmer's hairy, bestial face, his jaws refused to function. So did the rest of him, which was just as well—for if he could have moved his legs, the counterman would have taken a running start for parts unknown.

As it was, he peered at the clothed gorilla in strangled silence. When finally he managed to articulate, all that came out of his mouth was a feeble, "Ulp!"

"What's that?" Elmer demanded.

"I said, 'ulp!' " the counterman declared. Then, as if realizing that this beast had indeed addressed him, he murmured, "So you can talk, too?"

"Why not?" Elmer wanted to know. "Doesn't everybody?"

"Only human beings," the counterman replied.

"Meaning I'm not one?" asked Elmer, menacingly.

"I—I didn't say that."

"Well, you'd better not," growled the ape-man. "Or I'll tear your head from your scrawny shoulders." He reached over and grasped the counterman by the collar. "I'm hungry," he rasped. "Bring me five or six hamburgers."

"Cooked or raw?" the counterman asked.

"Cooked, of course! What makes you think I'd eat raw meat?"

"Why—I dunno—I thought they served it at the zoo—"

Elmer gave him a shake that rattled the fillings in his teeth. "Are you insinuating that I come from a zoo?" he roared.

“Why, no, but—”

“I’m a student here at the university.” Elmer told him. “I should think you could tell that by looking at me.”

“Oh, sure. One of them backward students, huh? I—”

Another shake silenced the hapless counterman. “Never mind the conversation,” Elmer thundered. “Hurry with those hamburgers.”

Released, the counterman scurried away.

“No onions,” Elmer called after him. “People who eat onions aren’t popular.”

“It would take a lot more than not eating onions to make you popular with me,” the counterman declared, from the safety of the kitchen.

The altercation had attracted the attention of the two couples at the end of the counter, and all four were now staring curiously at Elmer.

“Do you see what I see?” demanded one of the girls of her escort.

“I’m afraid I do,” that youth sighed.

“It’s an ape,” the other girls said. “An ape in men’s clothing.”

“A square ape at that,” said the second young man. “Nobody wears pink shirts any more.”

“Since when did they accept gorillas as students at this university?” the first gal asked.

“I don’t know,” her escort puzzled. “Maybe Buster Gutz managed to get him enrolled so he could play on the football team.”

The second girl squinted myopically at Elmer. “Are you sure it’s a real gorilla?” she asked. “Maybe it’s just somebody who needs a shave.”

“If so, he needs one worse than anybody I ever saw,” said the fourth student, earnestly. “But not as badly as I need a drink.”

“I’ve got to find out about this,” declared the first girl. She rose and approached Elmer.

“Excuse me,” she began, “but just to settle a friendly argument—are you a man or a monkey?”

ELMER started to growl at her, then checked himself. Curious, this tendency to fly off the handle. Perhaps the Professor had been right about his Jekyll-Hyde theory. Elmer felt definitely brutal and aggressive. But common sense prevailed. He smiled, baring his fangs.

"I'm quite human," he said. "This is just a costume I wore to the parade tonight."

"Of course!" The girl smiled. "We should have thought of that. My, it's quite realistic, isn't it? Where did you get all that hair from?"

"My girl friend's father runs a barber-shop," Elmer explained, glibly. "She saved the sweepings for me."

"Kind of her." The co-ed touched Elmer's hand. "I see you even had enough left over for your fingers."

"Oh, I'm covered with the stuff," Elmer said. "There was plenty to go around."

"Around what?" the girl wanted to know.

"Everything."

"She must have saved it for months and months."

"Saved what?"

"The hair. You know, this girlfriend you were telling me about."

"She did," Elmer asserted. "But then, it's an old habit of hers. She keeps boxes of it for souvenirs. Sort of an hairloom, you might say."

"Are you sure you're not kidding me, mister?" the girl asked him.

"Why should I kid you about a thing like that?" Elmer wanted to know. "Obviously I can't be a real gorilla. Real gorillas come from Africa—how would I be able to speak English?"

"I never thought of that," the girl mused. "Not that I'd particularly care to."

"Here's your hamburgers." The counterman slid the plate down and retreated quickly. Elmer reached out and crammed a hamburger into his mouth—then another, and another. The girl watched him swallow them and her eyes widened.

The other three students gradually approached and peered at Elmer. He stopped midway through the fourth hamburger and regarded them intently.

"What's the matter?" he asked. "Haven't you ever seen a man eat a hamburger before?"

"Not in one gulp," the second girl said. "And it isn't so much your manners—it's your teeth. Don't tell me those big yellow fangs are part of the costume, too?"

"Those big yellow what?"

"Fangs."

"You're welcome," said Elmer, hastily. But the girl was not to be diverted.

"I asked if those were your real teeth," she said.

"Certainly not!" Elmer snapped, consuming his fifth hamburger in the same gesture. "It so happens I have another girl-friend whose father is a dentist, and she saved me—"

He halted, conscious of the stares of the two males. "What are you looking at?" he demanded.

The college boys did not reply. They merely gestured helplessly at Elmer's feet.

HE glanced down and realized the source of their display. During the wait at the counter he had unconsciously kicked off his shoes, which were far too small for his apish toes and broad, wrinkled heels. Now the two nether paws were bare, curling around the bottom of the stool.

"T-that's no costume," one of the young men declared. "I don't care how many girl-friends you've got or what their fathers do for a living. None of them could have saved you toes like these!"

"Then it is a real gorilla!" the second girl exclaimed. "I knew it all the time." She headed for the door. "I'm getting out of here!" she announced, suiting the action to the words.

"Wait for us!" Her three companions followed hastily.

Elmer rose from the stool, tugging on his shoes. The counterman stared.

"They'll call the cops," he said. "So you'd better pay me, quickly, before the police get here."

"Nice reasoning," Elmer grated.

"Now look, you caused enough trouble," the counterman said. "How am I ever gonna live it down? Folks find out I been serving gorillas in my place, it'll get a bad name."

"For the last time, Em not a real gorilla," Elmer told him. "And that's the truth."

The counterman smiled bitterly. "What are you then?" he asked sarcastically. "I suppose you're going to tell me you're just an organ-grinder's monkey."

"Right," Elmer said.

"Who ever heard of an organ-grinder's monkey that size?"

"He had a pipe-organ," Elmer explained. "Now goodnight."

"Running off without paying, huh?" called the counterman.

"I'm not sticking until the police show up," Elmer said.

"Well, go ahead, then. I don't care. They're bound to catch you, anyway. Can't hope to escape unnoticed, the way you look. Which is, to put it bluntly, awful!"

The counterman ducked just in time as Elmer aimed the sugar-bowl at his head, then darted from the hamburger stand.

He peered up and down the street. The four students had disappeared from sight, but Elmer had audible evidence of their recent activity. The counterman had guessed correctly; they had turned in an alarm. For Elmer could hear the sound of sirens in the distance.

As they grew nearer, he hesitated and then started down the deserted street at random. He had to find a place in which to hide, and quickly. There was no getting away from it; his hairy countenance was incapable of passing unnoticed.

Elmer ran along the curb, cursing softly as the pavement scraped his dragging knuckles. The sirens grew louder. He scanned the darkened storefronts and headed for the nearest one as a flash of light down the street signalled the coming of a squadcar.

Crouching in the doorway, he debated his next move. Obviously there was only one thing to do. Gripping the handle of the store entrance, he crushed it beneath his powerful fingers. The lock yielded and he ducked into the shop, closing the door behind him just as the squadcar swept past.

He turned and blundered into the rear of the store. Oddly enough, in view of his recent conversation with the college-girl, he appeared to have hidden himself in a barbershop. A curtained doorway in the rear seemed, to lead to the barber's living-quarters.

ELMER crept down the hall and into the back room. Sure enough, a baldheaded gentleman lay slumbering upon a cot. Elmer stared at him silently for a moment; then, struck by a sudden inspiration, switched on the light.

Being suddenly awakened in the middle of the night to find a gorilla staring down at you is not necessarily the world's most enchanting experience. At least it did not seem that way to the barber, whose name was Al O'Pecia. His reaction was normal enough, considering the circumstances. Being bald-headed, his scalp stood on end.

"Get up!" Elmer ordered, in a deep growl. Mr. O'Pecia tried to crawl under the bedclothes. "Go away," he said, hoarsely. "I knew I never should have went and drank that last bottle of hair-tonic."

Elmer yanked the covers down. "Up!" he insisted.

"I'm dreaming," Al O'Pecia murmured. "I gotta be. Tell me I'm dreaming."

"Pinch yourself and see," Elmer advised. "On second thought, I'll do it for you."

His ape-like fingers tweaked the barber's nose.

"Yeowtch!" observed the barber, and got up, fast.

“What’s the idea of breaking in here in the middle of the night?” he demanded.

“You’re a barber, aren’t you? Well, I need a shave.”

Al O’Pecia rubbed his eyes and gazed at his strange visitor. “You can say that again, brother. I ain’t never seen anyone who needed a shave worse.” Then he shook his head. “But I don’t open until nine in the morning.”

“You’re open right now,” Elmer told him. “I can’t wait.”

“Look like you been waiting quite a long time.” The barber searched for his slippers. “You look more animal than human, with all that fur.”

“My mother was frightened by a yak,” Elmer explained. “Or was it a hair mattress?” He watched the barber don a robe. “Never mind. Just don’t ask any questions and I’ll make it worth your while. You shave me the way I tell you, and there’s ten dollars in it for you.”

The barber’s eyes narrowed. “Aha,” he breathed. “Funny business, eh? You one of them escaped convicts or something?”

“I told you, no questions,” Elmer said. “Ten bucks, in advance.”

“Twenty,” said the barber. “What kind of a clip-joint are you running here?” Elmer asked. But he paid. And the barber shaved him as directed, although his hands trembled whenever he came in close contact with the brutish face.

The brutish face looked considerably less brutish, Elmer was pleased to note, once the barber had finished his work. A carefully scalloped hairline made Elmer resemble a crewcut collegian with a broken nose.

“Good enough,” he told Al O’Pecia, “Now shave my hands.” The barber did so, grumbling.

“I don’t like this business,” he said. “Something funny going on. You don’t hardly seem human.”

“I am, though,” Elmer answered. “How I got this way would take too long to explain.”

“I’ll bet it’s a hair-raising story,” the barber ventured.

“It is,” Elmer assented. “Now, if you’re finished, I’ll get out of here. You can go back to bed and forget anything ever happened.”

“I may go back to bed,” the barber declared, “but I doubt if I’ll ever forget.”

“One thing more,” Elmer said, eyeing the barber’s feet, which were extremely large. “I want a pair of your shoes.”

“Anything,” the man told him. “Just so you go away and stay away. Though why you need shoes in the jungle is beyond me.”

Ignoring his grumbling, Elmer accepted a pair of oversize moccasins which fitted his feet perfectly.

Thus accoutred, he sallied forth again into the night. Oddly enough, despite the hectic events of the past six hours, he didn’t feel tired. On the contrary, his hirsute body seemed filled with almost boundless energy.

ELMER paused before the shop, scanning the silent street. No squadcars were in evidence. The campus mall was deserted. He moved along restlessly, his long arms dangling to the pavement. Crossing over to the wooded mall, he made a sudden decision. Why scrape his knuckles this way?

Reaching up, he grasped the branch of the nearest tree and swung himself aloft. The sensation was exhilarating. Elmer began to swing from tree to tree, Tarzan-fashion.

As he did so, he became acutely conscious of the change in himself. It was physical, yes; but more than physical. For the first time in his life, Elmer felt truly aggressive. More than that, he experienced a queer elation compounded of primitive urges. There was this impulse to beat his chest, roar, fight, seek a mate.

The voice of reason faintly told him he’d better take advantage of his shaven face and return to his boarding-house room and bed. Still he swung along restlessly, seeking he knew not what in the crisp silence of the night.

Delighted with his newfound agility, he swung higher and higher, seeking the topmost branches of the great trees. Thus his remote forebears might have travelled milleniums ago. The evolutionists were right, Elmer decided—there must have been apes in his family tree.

He hurtled past the second-storey windows of the faculty houses lining the side of the campus. Most of them were darkened, and there was no danger of detection. When Elmer saw a light loom ahead, he ducked and hesitated. As he did so, he peered into the room to see if his progress might be observed.

But the occupants of the room were much too busy to look out of the window at this moment. In spite of the fact that Elmer no longer had any desire to be a peeping Tom, he paused and stared.

One of the occupants was well worth staring at. She was a tall, leggy blonde of generous proportions—said proportions being confined, at the moment, in only the sheerest of negligees. In his dual role of Jekyll and Hyde, Elmer found she appealed to his tastes as a gentleman and as an ape.

Oddly enough, the girl's companions in the room did not seem to share his sentiments. The two men appeared to be arguing with the blonde. Elmer squatted on the limb of the tree before the window and scrutinized them.

One of the men was tall, the other short; both were bearded The tall man did most of the talking. He pounded on the vanity table and pointed at the blonde, who shook her head emphatically. The short man said something and again the blonde tossed her curls.

Then both men shrugged. The tall man stepped forward and took the blonde by the arm. As she tried to break free, the small man ran forward, holding something in his hand—something that flashed and glittered.

The blonde opened her mouth to scream, but the tall man's hand came down over her face as he held her. And the little man ran at her with his knife.

Had Elmer Klopp witnessed such a scene just six hours earlier, he would have fallen out of the tree in sheer dismay. But the Elmer Klopp of six hours earlier was gone. In his place was a powerful, ape-like figure spoiling for a fight.

He spoiled no longer. With a lunge, he swooped forward, kicking in the window-pane and swinging to the center of the room.

THE two men looked up. As the tall man released the blonde, she opened her mouth, but no scream came out—only a gasp, as Elmer went into action.

One paw brushed the knife to the floor. One paw grasped the big man by the collar. Then Elmer had them both by the beards. He banged their heads together expertly. Eyes rolling, they collapsed.

Growling deep in his throat, the ape-man dragged his victims to the window and casually tossed them out. Then he peered down at the grass below.

Apparently unconsciousness had caused them to fall without any muscular tension, and the jar of landing revived them; neither man showed any signs of broken bones, but only a singular determination to get up and run off into the night. Elmer watched them disappear.

Then he returned to the middle of the room, stooped, picked up the knife, and hurled it out of the window.

"Silly idea, trying to cut you up," he grunted. "Couldn't they see there's enough of you to go around?"

"You don't understand," the blonde told him. "That wasn't what they had in mind at all."

"Then they were even sillier," Elmer said, eyeing her in frank admiration.

"You really think so?" she murmured, stepping forward.

Six hours ago, Elmer Klopp would have run out of the room as fast as his legs could carry him. Now, he merely took three steps forward, in the right direction. It may not have been the proper direction, but proper or improper, it brought results.

The blonde nestled against his barrel-chest and gazed up at him, her big eyes rolling soulfully. "You were magnificent," she said.

"Crashing out of the night, crushing their heads together. You reminded me of my first husband—"

"Never mind your first husband," Elmer suggested, kissing her.

"Whoo!" said the blonde, when at last she was able to free her lips. "It is strange. Your kiss, too, is familiar. My second husband—"

"Bah!" Elmer pushed her back. "This is no time for an autobiography."

The blonde tendered him a sidelong glance. "You are so right," she murmured. "The hero deserves his reward." She swayed closer, and her hands caressed his neck. Elmer promptly switched out the light.

"So," the blonde giggled. "That is discreet. Sergei, my third husband, was also discreet."

"How's this for discretion?" Elmer asked, suiting the action to the word.

But before the blonde could answer, footsteps sounded in the hall outside the bedroom door.

"Good Lord!" Elmer groaned. "Don't tell me that's your fourth husband arriving?"

"No," whispered the blonde, faintly. "You need not fear on that account. My fourth husband is dead."

"Good," Elmer told her.

"Not so good," the blonde responded. "I'm afraid the one outside happens to be my fifth."

CHAPTER VIII

DR. Hans Noodlemayer was a badly bewildered man. After Elmer's flight, he had permitted himself to be taken downstairs by Professor Noid and Ada.

The Professor and his niece saw to it that Dr. Noodlemayer imbibed several quick drinks in succession, nor were they remiss in following his example. By the time an hour passed, Noodlemayer was completely confused.

Once he had been quite sure that he'd seen people losing their clothing on Main Street. He believed he had witnessed the appearance and disappearance of a pink elephant. He thought he had discovered a talking gorilla in the Professor's laboratory.

But what with the liquor, and the frantic babbling of Ada and her uncle, he was no longer certain of anything. They had him almost convinced that these events were a figment of his imagination. One final stiff drink—a triple brandy, poured by the Professor—left Noodlemayer in a state where he could not distinguish between preconceptions and reality. And by the time he reeled out of the house, he was hopelessly muddled. He didn't know his assumptions from a hole in the ground.

In order to avoid holes in the ground—real or imaginary—

Noodlemayer walked very slowly. Once he thought he saw two bearded figures racing frantically through the tree-bordered campus, but he could not be sure. Nothing was right any more.

Noodlemayer shook his head. Ever since his last anthropological field-trip, a year ago, things had been strange. It was then, in Kirghiz, that he had met and married Sonia. Dear Sonia, with her exotic ways; her feline fancies. Like a cat, she preferred a nocturnal existence; like a cat, she was apt to claw and bite when unduly provoked. But even so, the late marriage had proved pleasant to Dr. Noodlemayer. The presence of a young and beautiful wife attracted many new friends to his home; almost every evening, while he worked on his papers, Sonia would entertain a coterie of students or unattached faculty members.

Yet Hans Noodlemayer had no reason for jealousy. For Sonia never seemed to retain the same admirers for long. A month or two and they vanished from the social scene, to be replaced by others.

Certainly she was devoted to his welfare. It was she who urged him to take certain steps for his own advancement on the faculty. It was she who suggested he make friendly overtures to Professor Noid.

As a matter of fact, Sonia seemed to know a great deal about what went on behind the scenes at Hardnox.

“Why don’t you find out what your friend the Professor is up to?” she had inquired. “I hear he’s been working on some kind of experimental machine lately. Maybe it’s something you could use in connection with your own studies.”

That was what had prompted the friendship leading up to this evening’s bewildering events.

Noodlemayer didn’t know what to make of it. He glanced at his watch, noticed that it was after one o’clock. Sonia would still be up, of course. She usually remained awake until four or even five in the morning and dozed the day away. He could tell her what had happened, and perhaps she’d be able to explain. A clever woman, Sonia, with a surprising fund of knowledge at her painted, pointed fingertips.

Dr. Noodlemayer approached his house with renewed confidence, then halted as he realized that the lights were out. Sonia had retired, after all.

In that case, he decided, he’d enter quietly. He was careful about opening the door and cautious about closing it. He switched on the hall light and tiptoed softly up the stairs.

Then he heard the sounds coming from his wife’s bedroom. Her voice, and another—a deep, masculine voice.

Abruptly, confusion swept over Noodlemayer once more. Confusion, and alcoholic anxiety. After all, a man can take only so much without cracking. Naked women, pink elephants and garrulous gorillas had overloaded Noodlemayer’s quota, and brandy tipped the balance. Now, the sound of the male voice issuing from his wife’s boudoir was the final touch.

Everything had gone crazy, it seemed; there was nothing to do but follow suit.

WITH an oath, Dr. Noodlemayer plunged into his own bedroom and sought the bureau drawer. He emerged in a moment, brandishing a large revolver and sought his wife’s room.

At the sound of his coming, the voices ceased. Without a word, he yanked at the doorknob. It did not yield; the door was locked.

"Sonia!" he cried. "Are you in there?"

"Yes, of course," his wife replied.

"Then open the door and let me in."

"Just a minute," Sonia said. "I'm busy."

"That's what I thought," her husband declared. "I knew I heard a man's voice."

"You heard no such thing," Sonia called. "If that's what you're thinking, you're badly mistaken."

"If that's what I'm thinking, somebody is going to be badly mutilated," her husband told her. "I may as well tell you, I've got a gun here. Are you going to open that door now or do I have to shoot the lock off?"

There was the sound of murmuring from within, and then a heavy thump. After a moment, Sonia unlocked the door. She stood there smiling calmly at her irate spouse.

"Such a fuss!" she said. "Hans, what has gotten into you?"

"I might well ask the same question," her husband declared, stalking into the room and waving his revolver menacingly. He wheeled and faced her. "All right, where is he?"

"Where is who?"

"The man I heard talking to you," Noodlemayer shouted.

"You didn't hear a man," Sonia answered. "And for pity's sake, don't shout at me. You'll wake Aunt Olga."

"Aunt Olga?"

"Shh!" Sonia put her fingers to her lips. "She just arrived this evening, unexpectedly, from Kurdistan. She wanted it to be a surprise."

"It is," Noodlemayer asserted. "I didn't even know you had an Aunt Olga. I thought you told me you were just a poor orphan with nobody in the world except four ex-husbands."

"Aunt Olga is a very distant relative," Sonia explained. "But she's close enough now. In fact, she's right over there in my bed, sleeping. The poor thing was so tired she dozed off the moment she hit the pillow."

Dr. Noodlemayer glanced at the bed and discovered it was indeed occupied; a huge figure curled beneath the covers, which were pulled up over the head.

He approached the bed slowly, flourishing his weapon.

"What are you doing?" Sonia cried. "Don't disturb her!"

"Why not?" her husband demanded. "I don't see why I'm the only one who should be disturbed around here. Besides, I don't believe you. Aunt Olga, indeed!"

Reaching out, he yanked the covers down swiftly, exposing a bulky body clad in one of Sonia's longest kimonas. The head of the reclining figure was swathed in a bonnet—the type women wear when they put their hair up in curlers as an excuse for repulsing husbandly advances.

"You see?" Sonia said, triumphantly. "It's not a man."

DR. Noodlemayer stared into the broad, brutal features, noting the splayed nostrils and jutting jaw. "It doesn't look like a woman, either," he sighed. "In fact, as a qualified anthropologist, I must say your aunt doesn't seem to belong to any racial group I recognize. If her face wasn't hairless, I'd swear she'd resemble that gorilla I saw earlier this evening." Sonia sniffed. "Hans," she murmured. "Have you been drinking, by any chance?"

"Not by any chance," her husband replied. "I was drinking on purpose. You'd drink too if you ran into a talking gorilla."

"Just where did you meet this gorilla, might I ask?"

"You might," he told her, "It was in the Professor's laboratory."

"Aha!" The blonde's eyes narrowed. "Just as I suspected—then he is up to something, after all. What is it?"

"I don't know. I'm terribly confused. After the gorilla escaped, they insisted that I drink with them. I forgot all about calling the police." Dr.

Noodlemayer brightened. “Perhaps I had better do so now. Send out a general alarm.”

Abruptly, the figure on the bed stirred and sat up.

Elmer had been lying there quietly, hoping that a glimpse of “Aunt Olga” might serve to satisfy the man. But now, at the mention of the word “police” he could contain himself no longer.

Striving to pitch his voice in a high falsetto, he blinked his eyes and said “Sonia, my pet—who is this man?”

The blonde took the cue gracefully. “Why, Auntie, this is my husband, Dr. Noodlemayer.”

Elmer extended a shaven paw. “Ah, this is indeed a great pleasure. Sonia has told me as much about you.”

Noodlemayer took the paw and examined it with ill-concealed distaste. “I wish I could say the same,” he replied. “She never told me a thing concerning you. You’re here from Kurdistan, is that right?”

“Why, yes.”

“Funny, you have no accent. Most Arabs find difficulty in mastering English.”

“I’m not Arabian,” Elmer explained, quickly.

“But the Kurds are an Arabic tribe.”

“Perhaps Sonia should have explained to you that I’m not a true Kurd. I’m more of a Whey.”

“Whey? I never heard of them. Yezidees, perhaps?”

“I really couldn’t say,” Elmer floundered. “I just got here tonight.”

“That’s so.” Noodlemayer’s gaze shifted around the room. “By the way, I don’t see any bags.”

“Why should you? I’ll have you know I’m a highly moral woman. I wouldn’t travel with any—”

“Luggage,” Noodlemayer interjected, hastily. “Where is your luggage?”

“Down at the station,” Sonia said, shooting Elmer a warning glance. “I thought we could pick it up in the morning. That’s why Aunt Olga is wearing my clothes.”

"I see." Dr. Noodlemayer, in the course of his inspection, encountered a glimpse of the broken glass strewn on the floor beside the shattered window.

"What's this?" he snapped.

"Oh." Sonia hesitated. "I wasn't going to tell you, because I knew you'd just be upset. We had intruders this evening."

"Intruders?" Noodlemayer gripped his revolver. "Perhaps it was the gorilla on the prowl. Let me ring up the police—"

"No!" Elmer clambered out of bed. "They were harmless. Just a couple of travelling salesmen."

"Travelling salesmen?" Again Noodlemayer's gaze was suspicious. "How come you know so much about these things if you've just arrived from Kurdistan?"

"Well—"

"I don't mean to appear offensive, but might I look at your visa?"

"My what?" Elmer drew himself erect. "What a thing to ask a lady!"

"Your passport, I mean." Despite himself, Noodlemayer blushed.

"It's down at the station," Elmer explained. "But don't you want to hear about those salesmen? Like I say, they were really harmless. When we got tired of listening to them talk, I just threw them out of the window."

"You—threw them out—bodily?"

"How else?" Elmer pointed at the broken glass. "Then we locked the door, of course. A woman can't get her beauty sleep if a bunch of travelling salesmen keep wandering into the bedroom at all hours. Isn't that so, Sonia?"

"That's so," the blonde admitted. "My second husband was a—" Abruptly she bit her lip and fell silent.

NOODLEMAYER turned and confronted Elmer. "Excuse me," he said. "But did either of these travelling salesmen happen to wear a beard?"

"They both did," Elmer replied. "Great big bushy beards. Claimed to be selling cough-drops. Claimed to be brothers, said their name was Smith, something like that."

"Then you are telling the truth," Noodlemayer said, shaking his head in bewilderment. "I saw two men answering to that description, running along the campus as I came by."

"You see?" Elmer gave Sonia a triumphant grin. "That explains everything doesn't it?"

"I guess so." Noodlemayer took his wife's arm.

"Come along, then," she said. "Let's not disturb poor Aunt Olga any longer." She winked at Elmer out of the corner of her eye. "Maybe I'll slip back for a moment later," she murmured. "Just to tuck you in."

"That will be, as you Americans say, just ginger-peachy," Elmer replied. "Good night, Dr. Noodlemayer."

"Good night," he answered. And then, "Good grief!"

"Now what's the matter?" Sonia asked.

"Explains everything, eh?" Noodlemayer muttered. "Aunt Olga from Kurdistan, is that it?" He pointed the revolver at the floor.

There, in a telltale heap, lay Elmer's discarded clothing.

Noodlemayer turned and confronted the former occupant of his wife's bed. "So you didn't want me to call the police," he grated. "Well, I can understand that, now. You're the one I've been looking for."

"Hans, what do you mean?" Sonia was genuinely puzzled.

"Mean?" Noodlemayer raised the revolver. "My dear, this is what I've been telling you about—the talking gorilla!"

Without a word, Elmer turned and sprinted across the room.

Noodlemayer raced after him, his foot coming down on the kimona. It ripped and gave—dropping to the floor and exposing the hairy, simian body.

Sonia screamed, Noodlemayer fired, and Elmer Klopp jumped out of the window.

CHAPTER IX

FORTUNATELY for Elmer the indignant husband’s shot missed its mark. Also fortunately for Elmer, he was able to swing his way through the trees without detection or interception until he arrived at his boarding-house.

Everyone had long since retired, and he managed to sneak up to his room without incident. There he collapsed in bed. He was glad to be there, even though Sonia wouldn’t show up to tuck him in.

A part of him regretted this fact greatly. Another part speculated on the possibilities of the same performance by Ada. Despite the obvious attractions of the blonde, there was something about the Professor’s niece that caused Elmer to stir restlessly. He remembered her impudent face—and other things—issuing from the scanty protection of his coat after the wild ride on the pink pachyderm.

Good heavens, had all this really happened to him this evening? Or was it all a product of alcoholic fancy? Perhaps he was still in the Professor’s laboratory, imprisoned in that machine. Yes, that part might be true; Professor Noid could have invented this Psychopathfinder, or whatever he called it. And in subjecting himself to it. Elmer was merely experiencing a seemingly lengthy and involved dream. Surely that was the sensible answer. All of the rest, including undraped females, bearded males, and his present state of apprehensive apedom, were figments of fancy. The pink pachyderm itself was just another example of the impossible—an elephantasy.

Yes, that must be the answer, Elmer decided. This was just a post-hypnotic stage of suggestibility. In the morning he’d wake up and find everything back to normal. Once more he’d be a nonentity m a drab but familiar world.

He sighed, sinking into slumber. For a moment he felt a curious twinge of regret. Crazy as it all seemed, the events of the evening had been oddly fascinating, in a way. It was going to be difficult being just plain Elmer Klopp again . . .

Difficult?

It was going to be impossible.

Elmer found that out when he opened his eyes the next morning. His first gesture was to run his hands down his body. What he encountered sent him staggering from the bed to the mirror. He gazed at himself with horrified dismay.

He was still an ape. And, at the moment, only a half-shaven ape, at that. The face that leered back at him from the glass was already covered with bristles.

Moving almost automatically, Elmer secured a razor. He shaved himself with the dubious aid of trembling fingers. Then he dressed, slowly and carefully.

Something, he told himself, had to be done. Today was Saturday. He suddenly remembered his duties: Hardnox was playing Pyro Tech this afternoon in the homecoming game, and it behooved Elmer to show up on the third-string bench. Elmer, however, didn’t feel very well behooved at the moment. He felt bewitched, bothered, and quite logically, be-furred.

No, he decided, he could never present himself to Coach Buster Gutz in his present guise, or disguise. For that matter, the police might even now be searching for someone answering to his description. And since nobody else in his right mind would answer to such a description, Elmer was in danger.

The thing to do was to seek out Professor Noid immediately and take another treatment. No matter what it turned him into, anything would be better than existence in this anthropoid state.

So Elmer Klopp dressed very carefully indeed, and saw to it that he wore both a hat and a scarf before venturing out into the street.

The day was bright and sunny, and the late morning air stimulated his appetite. Well, no harm in that; he’d better pick up a bite before seeking out the Professor.

But no more contretemps with countermen, he resolved. Elmer entered a cafeteria, filled his tray, and shambled into a quiet corner. He ate hastily, but without attracting undue attention. Satisfied at the success of his performance and disguise, Elmer paid his check and hastened down the street leading to Professor Noid's home.

He was scarcely a block away when a large red limousine pulled up to the curb and somebody waved a beard at him.

"Come here," said a voice.

ELMER recognized the beard and was not impressed. He started to pass on, then thought the better of it. For something else was waving at him now—not a beard, but the muzzle of what looked very much like a Thompson sub-machine gun.

"Please come here," said the voice.

"Well, if you're going to be polite about it, yes," Elmer said. He walked over to the car, knuckles dragging.

"Kindly step inside," the voice urged.

Elmer hesitated, eyeing the machine gun.

"Yes, do," urged a second voice. "Have you no civic pride? It wouldn't be nice to spatter a lot of messy blood all over the sidewalk."

This appeal moved Elmer strangely. It moved him right into the back seat of the red limousine, which promptly pulled away from the curb.

Elmer found himself staring at beard number two. Beard number one was driving.

"You're the two guys I ran into up in Sonia's room!" he exclaimed.

"Ran into? That's hardly the phrase," said beard number two, rubbing a bandaged head ruefully. "However, don't be alarmed, comrade. As you can see, I bear no malice."

"You bear a machine-gun, and that's just as bad," Elmer told him. "Would you mind telling me what this is all about?"

Beard number one replied. "There's nothing to it, really. We just have a little job for you to do."

"A second-storey job," added his companion, shifting the machine-gun in his lap.

"But why me?"

Beard number two eyed Elmer's body and shrugged. "You're good at climbing," he observed. "Besides, there won't be any fuss if the Professor or his niece notice you come in."

"Professor Noid?" Elmer asked.

"He's the one with the machine, isn't he? Well, that's what we're after. Or what you're going to be after."

"Do you think I'd steal the Professor's machine for you?"

"I'm sure you will." Beard number two patted his weapon. "Our orders are to get that device any way we can."

"Orders? Who gave them to you?"

"Our leader, of course." Beard number two writhed into a smile, or a hirsuteable facsimile of same. "But that doesn't concern you. What concerns you is this machine gun."

"You can say that again," Elmer murmured, feelingly.

"Why should I? Once is enough." Beard number two nodded. "We'll park outside and you can climb up to the laboratory. There is reason to believe the Professor is not at home, so you probably won't be disturbed. You have just three minutes to bring us that machine. If not, we come in after it ourselves."

"And don't get any ideas about calling the police," cautioned the beard in the driver's seat. "If you do, you'll never live to give testimony."

The red limousine pulled up to the curb before Professor Noid's house. "Here you go," said the second beard. "With all those trees, you won't be noticed from the street. But hurry up—three minutes is all you have."

Reluctantly, Elmer left the car. For a moment he considered trying to make a run for it. But the machine-gun was trained on his back. Besides, if he did escape, no telling what the bearded men might do. He quite believed that they'd blast their way into the house and take the Professor's Psychopathfinder by force, if necessary.

So Elmer made his way over to the trellis at the corner of the building and climbed it, hand over hand—or paw over paw. Halfway up, he shed his shoes for greater convenience. Looking back over his shoulder he noted the two beards wagging at him approvingly.

Then he reached the window of the laboratory and slid it open. A moment later he landed with a thump on the polished floor.

THE lights were on, and Elmer noted that the Psychopathfinder stood in its accustomed place, wires connected to the control panel against the wall.

He moved towards it, wondering vaguely if there was anything he could do; any way of removing himself safely from his entanglement with the two beards. But nothing occurred to him. If they had been unarmed, he could easily have used his physical strength on them as he had last night, and broken their heads. However, now they had the machine-gun—and this was obviously no time to split hairs.

No, he had to steal the Psychopathfinder. The first step was to loosen the control panel from the wall—

He turned his head quickly as the door opened and Ada stepped into the room. The darkhaired girl was wearing a most becoming pair of lounging pajamas and a most unbecoming look of consternation.

“Who are you?” she gasped. “What are you doing here?”

Elmer spread his palms outward.

“Don’t you recognize me?” he asked. “I’m Elmer Klopp.”

The girl shook her head dubiously. “Impossible,” she declared. “Elmer Klopp has a face like a rolled-up fur coat, and little piggish red eyes, and nasty long yellow fangs.”

“But I do have little piggish red eyes, and nasty long yellow fangs,” the young man protested. “The only thing is, I got a shave.” He stepped closer. “Take a good look,” he urged. “Notice how bestial I am.” Acting on sudden inspiration, he wiggled his toes at her.

“You’re right,” the girl smiled. “I’ve never seen anything quite so bestial and revolting. Oh, Elmer, darling—you’re back.” And she threw herself into his astonished arms.

“I’ve been so worried about you,” She declared. “If you only knew! Thank heavens you’re here—now you can wait for my uncle and take another treatment.”

“Where is your uncle?” Elmer demanded.

“At a faculty meeting,” the girl explained. “But he should return within an hour. Meanwhile, you and I can make ourselves comfortable.” And she grabbed him in an embrace that made him extremely uncomfortable.

“Sorry,” Elmer sighed. “I can’t wait.”

“But you have to wait—the treatment—”

“I’m not here for a treatment,” he explained. “As a matter of fact, I can only stay long enough to steal your uncle’s machine.”

“Elmer, have you lost your mind?”

“I’ll lose more than my mind if I don’t obey orders,” he muttered. Quickly, he outlined his encounter with the bearded men. Drawing her over to the window, he indicated the parked car below. She nodded in comprehension.

“Let me call the police right he could do; any way of removing himself safely from his entanglement with the two beards. But nothing occurred to him. If they had been unarmed, he could easily have used his physical strength on them as he had last night, and broken their heads. However, now they had the machine-gun—and this was obviously no time to split hairs.

No, he had to steal the Psychopathfinder. The first step was to loosen the control panel from the wall—

He turned his head quickly as the door opened and Ada stepped into the room. The darkhaired girl was wearing a most becoming pair of lounging pajamas and a most unbecoming look of consternation.

“Who are you?” she gasped. “What are you doing here?”

Elmer spread his palms outward.

“Don’t you recognize me?” he asked. “I’m Elmer Klopp.”

The girl shook her head dubiously. “Impossible,” she declared. “Elmer Klopp has a face like a rolled-up fur coat, and little piggish red eyes, and nasty long yellow fangs.”

“But I do have little piggish red eyes, and nasty long yellow fangs,” the young man protested. “The only thing is, I got a shave.” He stepped closer. “Take a good look,” he urged. “Notice how bestial I am.” Acting on sudden inspiration, he wiggled his toes at her.

“Let me call the police right posit two patrolmen on the curb, then continued up the street, giving chase to the other car.

Elmer stopped his descent, permitting his paws to pause. A shout from the street assailed him.

“Hey, you!” barked one of the patrolmen, menacing. “Come on down offa there. You’re under arrest!”

"But I can explain," Elmer called. "I'm really not stealing anything. It's all part of the act—just you ask the lady inside the house about it and she'll tell you."

"Ain't interested," the patrolman grunted. "Burglary's not my department. I'm in Traffic."

"What's that got to do with me?" Elmer asked.

"Wasn't you with those guys in the red limousine?"

"Yes, but—"

"Then come along without making no trouble. Mebbe next time you won't make the mistake of trying to pull a robbery when you're parked next to a fire hydrant."

CHAPTER X

JUDGE Spleen was in an ugly mood. It fitted him like a glove, for the little magistrate generally enveloped himself in an aura of incipient anger.

But this noon the Judge was even more enraged than usual. It was almost one o'clock and the day was Saturday. He had planned on attending the homecoming game between Hardnox and Pyro Tech, and was the proud possessor of two seats on the fifty-yard line.

Instead he found himself occupying a single seat on the bench—and the judicial bench, at that. A steady stream of traffic violators had been flowing through his courtroom all morning, and the end was not yet. Judge Spleen was hungry, and he was confused. For hours now he had been dealing with freak accidents resulting from last night's homecoming parade and rally. The stories he had heard upset him greatly—weird accounts of pink elephants, and people losing their clothing; with resultant loss of control at the wheel.

For the twelfth time a prisoner was telling him the same absurd tale. "I was just driving along doing thirty, your honor, when I look up and I see this big pink elephant crossing the street in the parade ahead of me. I started to slam on the brakes when all of a sudden it disappears. And then, believe it or not, my clothes drop off—"

"I don't believe it!" snapped Judge Spleen, banging down his gavel. "Thirty dollars or thirty days."

"Give me the thirty dollars," said the prisoner, hopefully. "I can use the dough."

"Lock him up!" grated the Judge. "This is the last straw."

But his statement was unduly optimistic. For at that moment, the two partolmen ushered Elmer down the aisle.

The young man was not struggling. He had gone through that particular stage several minutes ago, to no avail; at the moment he was merely resigned.

Apparently the red limousine had eluded the pursuing squadcar; eventually the latter had returned to transport Elmer and the cylinder to court. All the way down Elmer had protested, urging the patrolmen to contact Ada and trying to explain the circumstances. His only response had taken the usual form—"Tell it to the Judge."

Gazing up at the little magistrate's rubicund countenance, Elmer wondered if it would do any good to tell this man anything. He glared down over the rostrum and transfixed Elmer with an envenomed stare.

"What have we here?" Judge Spleen demanded.

"Traffic violation, your honor," said the first patrolman. "Parking in front of a fire hydrant."

Judge Spleen's face relaxed into a snarl of relief. "Thank goodness!" he breathed. "For a moment I was afraid it might be another one of those affairs involving pink elephants and naked women. I've been listening to those stories all day, and I'm sick of naked women and their tales."

"Beggin' your pardon," said the second patrolman; a rookie new to the force and to the Judge's chambers. "But naked women don't have tails—at least not the ones I've seen. Maybe you're thinking of monkeys."

“I was not thinking of monkeys,” Judge Spleen observed. “I was thinking of having you suspended from the Force. For your information, I hate all animals, including pink elephants. And monkeys most of all.”

ELMER listened to this tirade and any expectations of mercy faded. Judge Spleen appeared to be in no mood to listen to reason, let alone anything else.

“Now let’s have the facts,” growled the magistrate. “And only the facts. Where did this violation occur?”

“Over on main Street, just a few minutes ago. In front of Professor Noid’s house, it was.”

“What was?”

Judge Spleen relaxed. This looked like a cut-and-dried case. He gazed at Elmer and muttered, “Very well, then. What do you plead—guilty or not guilty?”

“Not guilty, your honor.” Elmer faced his two captors. “You know very well I wasn’t in the car while it was parked.”

“Weren’t you the driver?” the Judge demanded.

“Matter of fact, he wasn’t,” admitted the first patrolman. “Two other fellas were in the car.”

“Then why didn’t you bring them in?”

“Because they got away,” the patrolman explained. “But don’t worry, that red limousine ought to be easy to spot—on account of it’s got a machine-gun sticking outta the rear window.”

“Machine-gun?” Judge Spleen wasn’t relaxed any more. “What in heaven’s name—?”

“I suppose they was coverin’ this guy,” the patrolman continued. “Seein’ as how we caught him climbin’ down the trellis of the house.”

“What were you doing on the trellis?” Judge Spleen wanted to know.

“I was stealing this.” Elmer indicated the bulky cylinder which had been wheeled into the courtroom by two more of the squadcar’s crew.

Judge Spleen looked at Elmer, and then at the cylinder.

“Go on,”-he said, in a subdued voice. “Tell me what it is. I want to know what you and your machine-gunner friends were after.”

“Why, it’s really nothing at all,” Elmer said. “Just a little old hi-fi low pass vacuum-precipitated ten-lamination acetate bonded orthoflow telekinesis booster tank circuit. That’s all.”

“That’s quite enough,” the Judge murmured. “Might I ask what it’s good for?”

“Nothing,” Elmer explained. “You see, those men in the car were really after the Psychopathfinder. They kidnapped me at gun point and made me steal it. I was going to fool them. No sense in letting them have the real Psychopathfinder—no telling what they might do with it. Already caused enough trouble dreaming up a pink elephant and undressing all those women.”

The moment he uttered this last remark, Elmer was sorry. For Judge Spleen let out a strangled gasp.

“No!” he said. “Not that again! Are you trying to tell me there actually was such a creature, and that these women were stripped by mechanical means?” He peered over the bench. “Just who are you, anyway?”

“You were,” the Judge agreed. “But if this theft charge isn’t cleared up, there’ll be a lapse of several years before you ever manage to become a junior.”

Judge Spleen stared hard at Elmer. “Are you quite certain you’re just a college student?” he asked. “Your face is anything but youthful.”

“I worry a lot,” Elmer explained.

“You should.” Judge Spleen watched the young man as he stood scratching diligently. “Must you do that?” he asked.

“I’ve got to,” Elmer told him. “Nobody else will do it for me.”

“Can’t blame them. I’d hate to get within ten feet of you.” Judge Spleen wrinkled his nose. “I’m inclined to believe you’re in with that gang of thieves, whoever they are. There’s a hard look about you—I can recognize a criminal when I see one.” Again the Judge stared, then flinched. “You’re barefooted!” he cried. “What is the meaning of coming into this courtroom in your bare feet?”

“Left my shoes back at the house,” Elmer said, truthfully. “Easier to climb without them.”

JUDGE Spleen gazed at the anthropoid toes. “How horrid,” he murmured. “How extremely horrid! Climbing with your toes, like a monkey. Let’s dispense with all this nonsense about a trial—I couldn’t stand listening to your testimony, if this is any sample. Tell you what; why don’t you just throw yourself on the mercy of the court and let me give you ten years at hard labor?”

Elmer took a deep breath. “You can’t sentence me at all,” he declared. “It’s illegal.”

“How do you arrive at that conclusion?”

Because I’m not a human being,” Elmer announced, triumphantly. “I’m a monkey.” He pointed. “Look at my toes.”

Judge Spleen sputtered, like a fuse reaching the point of explosion. “I don’t want to look at your loathsome toes,” he choked. “And I don’t want to hear any more of your disgusting lies.”

“All right,” Elmer said. “If you won’t believe me, what about this?” Dramatically, he ripped open his shirt and exhibited his hairy torso.

It had been his desperate intention to divert the Judge from passing immediate sentence, and in this he succeeded. At the sight of his chest, Judge Spleen became incapable of passing anything—except, perhaps, out.

He stared at Elmer and uttered little strangled gasps. The two patrolmen and the clerk of the court likewise goggled.

“Holy homicide!” gasped one of the policemen to his companion. “Did you ever see the like? Only two in the afternoon, and he’s got five o’clock shadow all over!”

“Sure looks like an ape,” the other agreed. “Unless he’s been taking baths in hair-restorer.”

“Well?” Elmer demanded, looking up at the maddened magistrate. “Now do you believe me, or shall I take off my trousers, too?”

“No—not that!” Judge Spleen held up both hands. “In all my years on the bench I’ve never seen anything like this before; I only pray that I never will again. Did I understand you to say that you are some sort of simian?”

“A gorilla,” Elmer answered. “Listen!” He proceeded to beat on his chest and roar.

“Stop that!” screamed Judge Spleen, bringing the gavel down on the desk, and one of his thumbs. “This puts us in a pretty pickle. I don’t know whether to sentence you to jail or to twenty years in the local zoo. Perhaps I’d better call upon competent authority to assist me. Dr. Noodlemayer, up at the University, could assist me. He’s an anthropologist.”

“I know,” Elmer said. “I was in bed with his wife last night.” He blushed hastily and added, “Oh, it’s not what you’re thinking. I was disguised as a woman at the time.”

“This gets worse and worse,” one of the patrolmen muttered. “From that last remark, the ape ain’t even normal.”

“Maybe it’s a chimpansy,” said the other patrolman, unhelpfully.

“Quiet!” cried the Judge. “Let me call Noodlemayer.”

“Why don’t you call Professor Noid?” Elmer asked. “He’s the one who knows all about this affair. He can restore me to my normal shape—”

“What is that?” Judge Spleen asked, sarcastically. “A pink elephant?”

“I can explain that to you, too, if you’d only listen,” Elmer protested. “I’d be glad to tell you about undressing all those women, too.”

Judge Spleen held his head in his hands. “One more word,” he announced, “and I’ll clear this courtroom. I only wish I had that machine-gun here to do it with!”

As if in answer to his prayer, the door at the far end of the court flew open. Down the aisle came the two bearded men; the taller one carrying the sub-machine gun.

“Don’t anybody move!” he shouted. “Up with your hands, all of you!”

His companion observed the frozen tableau, then noted the bulky cylinder resting on a table near the front of the room.

“There it is,” he said. “I’ve got it.”

He ran over and lifted the huge tanklike apparatus. Slowly, the two bearded men retreated up the aisle.

“Robbed in my own courtroom!” the Judge sobbed. “Isn’t anybody going to do something?”

One of the patrolmen reached for his holster. Immediately the machine-gun chattered. So did the Judge’s teeth, as he dived under the bench. The clerk and the second patrolman scrambled frantically for positions of safety on the floor as the shots sprayed the ceiling above.

Elmer sprinted for the side of the room. His first thought was to take cover; then he realized that the bearded men were hastening out of the courtroom.

At the same time he noted his own proximity to an open window. For the second time in less than twenty-four hours he prepared to jump to the ground below. Closing his eyes, he leaped, bracing himself against the moment when his feet would strike the hard pavement.

It was not the hard pavement he struck, however, but something quite a bit softer.

Opening his eyes, he gazed down in surprise. “Ada!” he exclaimed.

“That’s right,” said the girl calmly. “Would you mind taking your toes out of my midriff?”

CHAPTER XI

ELMER obliged and assisted the young woman to her feet. "What are you doing here?" he asked.

"Listening to you and that old paranoic through the window," she explained. "He's somewhat of a manic-depressive, you know."

"He sure depressed hell out of me," Elmer replied. "But why didn't you come in?"

"I intended to. Then I saw those two thugs drive up and climb out with their machine-gun, and thought the better of it. You see, the Professor is with me, too; around the corner in our car. He has the Psycopathfinder and the panel control board equipment with him."

"How come?" Elmer wanted to know.

"Well, when he came home, I told him what had happened. Naturally, our first thought was to come down and rescue you. But in view of the circumstances, my uncle didn't think it safe to leave the Psychopathfinder behind and unguarded. So he dismantled it and took it along in the car." Ada smiled. "Setting it up again is no problem," she explained. "All you really need is a wall-plug."

"Well get me to one, quick," Elmer said. "I'm tired of monkeying around."

Ada led him across the lawn to the parked automobile. Professor Perry Noid saluted him from the front seat. In a few words his niece explained the happenings in the courtroom.

The Professor hastily applied his foot to the starter. "Better get out of here before they start looking for our friend," he said.

"You mean the police or those thugs?" Elmer asked. "I don't seem to be popular with either."

"The thugs won't bother you, I guess," Ada remarked. "Not as long as they think that cylinder is the machine they're looking for."

"But where did they hear about it?" Elmer wanted to know. "And what on earth do they want with it?"

"We'll find that out in due time," the Professor suggested. "Meanwhile, where's a safe place for us to go and administer another Psychopathfinder treatment?"

"What about my room at the boarding house?" Elmer suggested.

Ada shook her head. "That's the first place they'll go to look for you," she reminded him. "Our place isn't safe, either."

"Well, there's nowhere else—" the young man began. Then he glanced at his companion's wrist-watch and brightened. "Of course, there is!" he exclaimed. "The stadium!"

"Stadium?"

"I was supposed to be there two hours ago. Don't you remember the homecoming game? It's going on right now, and I'm on the third team!"

"You mean we should set up our apparatus on the field?" inquired Professor Noid, doubtfully. "Wouldn't that interfere with the other players?"

"Certainly not," Elmer told him. "We can do it in the dressing-room. Plenty of electrical outlets there, and we won't be disturbed." "Come on, then," Ada urged. "Let's get going before something else goes haywire." Her uncle obediently headed the car in the direction of the stadium on the outskirts of town, while Elmer adjusted his clothing and recited his recent adventures. He told of encountering the bearded men in Sonia Noodlemayer's bedroom and went on from there; discreetly omitting the blonde's amorous advances from the narrative.

"But what puzzles me," Elmer concluded, "is what those two men want with your machine. Who are they, and why were they threatening Mrs. Noodlemayer?"

"I don't understand," the Professor sighed. "Ever since you came into my life, things have been very confusing for me."

"Ever since I came into your life?" Elmer retorted. "That's a fine way to put it! I didn't come into your life to begin with—I was dragged into it by this scheming hussy, here."

"Who's a hussy?" Ada demanded.

"You are," Elmer said, kissing her. "And between you and your uncle, I'm the one who's really confused. Sometimes I think it's all more than I can handle; I feel like I'm about ready to fly off into a dozen directions at once."

THE Professor eyed him sharply.

"Watch that, young man," he said. "I warn you that a split personality is a very difficult condition to deal with."

"It can't be worse than being a gorilla," Elmer insisted.

"Well, cheer up, you won't be a gorilla much longer," Ada comforted. "And I, for one, will be very happy to see you change. Right now, hugging you is like trying to make love to an animated fur coat."

"Don't talk about it," Elmer begged. "Now that I stop and look back at what I've been through, I feel as if I'm going to pieces."

"Get hold of yourself," the girl said. "Everything's going to be fine. You'll see."

Everything, however, was far from fine at the stadium. As they passed the structure they listened in vain for sounds of cheers from the Hardnox half of the audience. All of the yelling seemed to be coming from the Pyro Tech rooters.

Craning her neck, Ada caught a glimpse of the scoreboard as they circled around to the dressing-room entrances.

"Almost half-time," she announced. "Two minutes to go."

"And the score?" Elmer inquired.

"20 to 0, in favor of Pyro Tech."

The young man groaned.

"Cheer up," Ada said. "If you take your treatment, maybe the coach will let you play in the second half."

"He wouldn't let me play anything but tic-tac-toe on the bench," Elmer grumbled. "I'm on the third team. That's one step below being water-boy. Besides, you don't know Buster Gutz. Even though I don't get a chance to play, he's liable to kill me for not showing up on schedule." Again he sighed. "Is it my fault I can't be in two places at once?" he asked.

“Don’t bother your head about it,” the Professor soothed. “All you need is a treatment. Here, I’ll park and you can help me carry the equipment in. Ada, grab those rheostats.”

The apparatus-laden trio staggered into the Hardnox locker rooms and deposited their burdens. Swiftly, the Professor set up the panel control, plugging in and adjusting his wiring. He placed the Psychopathfinder on a bench around the corner near the showers and tested various dials and levers.

“Seems to be working,” he said. “It’s drawing power properly.”

“Good!” Ada said. “Now, Elmer, if you want to step over there—”

“I do,” he answered, emphatically.

“Then what’s keeping you?”

The young man glanced at the door. “Can’t you hear?” he whispered. “The team’s coming in. The half must be over.”

Sure enough, footsteps sounded outside.

“Now what do we do?” the girl asked.

“Duck into the showers here,” Elmer suggested. “They won’t come around the corner. Chances are they’ll never notice the machine, either, here in the shadows. Half-time is just fifteen minutes; then they’ll go out again and we can continue.”

Quickly they sought the shower-stalls and huddled silently as Buster Gutz led his weary warriors in from the fray.

He was asking questions.

“#%&’()*!?” he inquired. “What the c@¼6%!!! is the matter with you $“&!½@???” he demanded. “Can’t any of you—%&”-)c!!! tell your $#(/!!! from a “?:) (%!???”

Elmer blushed. “Pep-talk,” he explained to Ada, in a whisper. “He’s famous for them.”

“He should be,” replied the girl, emphatically.

BUT there was not much pep in Buster Gutz' talk this afternoon. Reverting to the English language for a time, he spoke in tones of mournful discouragement Elmer had never heard before. The first team, apparently, had suffered heavy casualties during the first two quarters of the game. Seven of the regulars were out of the line and into the infirmary. Half of the second team had been tossed, trampled and trodden upon, and the coach was rapidly running out of his third-string reserves. Pyro Tech had outpassed, outpunted, outblocked, outrun, and outraged Hardnox, and with a full half of the game yet to play the prospects were grim.

"I'm not asking you guys to win," the coach concluded, wearily. "All I want now is you should try and protect yourselves. It would be one #$%*('c!!! of a note if we ended up the game without having eleven men left to stagger around on the field." He sighed. "/?&!!!" he remarked. "The way things are, I'd even put in Elmer Klopp if he was here!"

At this indication of their coach's total despair, the team groaned in unison.

Not so Elmer. Hearing his name mentioned in connection with playing was too much for the young man to bear. Momentarily forgetting his condition, he started out of the showers and rounded the corner.

"Here I am, coach," he said, brightly. "Did you say you wanted to put me in?"

"Who the $—#!)&!!! are you?" Buster Gutz demanded, eyeing the shaven anthropoid with singular distaste. "Not that I care. I wouldn't want to put you into anything but a cage."

"I'm Elmer Klopp," the youth announced, brightly.

"A likely story." Buster Gutz gazed wonderingly over the bulky body with its dangling arms. "You sure don't look like him."

"But I am, really." Elmer halted, conscious that the other was scrutinizing his obviously altered appearance. "I see you can notice the difference. That's the reason I'm late, you know," he improvised. "I was trying to build myself up, improve my physique."

"How?" asked the coach, skeptically.

“I was taking a muscle course.”

“Well, send the muscles back and get them to refund your money,” Buster Gutz advised. “You look terrible. What makes your arms so long?”

“Maybe I overdid it a little,” Elmer hazarded. “I took all fifteen of the lessons in one day.”

“&”}4c /;!!!” declared the coach. “You’re not Elmer Klopp. You can’t fool me. I’d recognize his face anywhere. Yours is different—all ape-like and coarse—featured. Klopp’s face isn’t like that.”

“Thanks,” said Elmer.

“No,” the coach continued. “Klopp’s face isn’t like that at all. He looks more like an anemic jackass with the heaves.” Buster Gutz turned his back. “Probably those ¼!!! from Pyro Tech planted you here, hoping I’d put you in and get the team disqualified. Well, go back and tell ’em it didn’t work.”

“But I’m Elmer,” the young man protested. “And if you’ll just wait here, I can fix it so that I won’t look different any more. Will you put me in, then?”

“I’ll put you in a straight jacket if you don’t stop bothering me,” Buster Gutz promised, rejoining his battered gridders.

Elmer hurried back to the showers.

“Come on,” he murmured to the Professor. “Never mind waiting. Give me a treatment now. I want to play the next half.”

“But Elmer, that’s dangerous—”

“I don’t care,” he said. “You don’t understand what this means to me. I’ve been a nobody all season long. This is probably the only chance I’ll ever get. If you’re so interested in improving my personality, you’ll realize how important the game is.”

“He’s right,” Ada added, unexpectedly.

“I don’t like it,” the Professor demurred. “For one thing, he’s too upset right now for a treatment. The subject should be calm, relaxed—”

“I am calm!” Elmer gibbered. “If I was any more relaxed, I’d explode in a million pieces! Hurry up before I come apart at the seams! Don’t you see, my whole self is wrapped up in playing this game? If you won’t treat me, I’ll crack up!”

“All this talk of split personalities is dangerous.” The Professor twiddled his goatee, then rubbed his hands together insipidly. “Very well,” he sighed. “Step over to the machine here. But I won’t answer for the consequences.”

COACH Buster Gutz was trying to make up for lost time. In the ten minutes remaining during the half-period, he decided to crowd a full hour of inspirational profanity. His voice rose from the huddle near the door, effectively drowning out all sounds of the Psychopathfinder’s drone. It muffled the continuing noises, too—the sudden gasps of surprise from Ada and the Professor, and the gasps from Elmer, too. These gasps—and further drones—continued for quite a time.

Finally there was silence.

Elmer Klopp ran across the room and tapped Coach Gutz on the shoulder.

“Here I am,” he said. “Just as I promised. Now can I play?”

The coach wheeled abruptly. “Well I’ll be—” He paused. “Yeah, it’s you, all right. If I had time, I’d ask you to explain this nutty business, but I haven’t. Maybe you can tell me when you’re sitting on the bench out there.”

“But you said I could play—”

“Hah!” Buster Gutz pointed the finger of scorn. “And just what position do you think you could fill?”

“All of them,” Elmer said. “All of them?”

“Quarterback, halfback, fullback, guard—the works!”

“Oh, fine! Now my troubles are over!” The coach exercised the muscles in his jowls. “I suppose I can just tell everybody else to go home and let you take over the job for the whole team.”

“Exactly,” Elmer beamed. “I’ve subdivided.”

“Subdivided?”

"Split my personality. The Professor was worried about it. Apparently the last conscious wish before the treatment influences the results. I wanted to be a lot of people, see? That's the way it is with a schizoid sometimes. Very simple."

"You certainly are," Buster Gutz commented. "Now get out of here with your crazy double-talk and let me alone."

"But you need me," Elmer said. "I'm your team. Or rather, we are." He turned his head in the direction of the showers and called, "Come on, boys."

Ten more figures sprinted from the shower stalls and lined up next to Elmer.

"No!" groaned Buster Gutz.

"Why not?" asked Elmer. Or one of the Elmers, rather—for there were now eleven unreasonable facsimiles of same.

The team gazed at this astonishing assortment in a sort of bruised bewilderment. As for their coach, he clutched his head in dismay.

"Which one of you guys is the real Elmer?" he wheezed.

"All of us," they chorused. "We're like the Three Musketeers, remember? All for one and one for all. Or was it the Four Horsemen? Or Seven Brides for Seven Brothers?"

"Shut up, the lot of you!" Buster Gutz stormed, recovering his customary lack of poise. "And get out of here!"

"Only five minutes to go," said one of the Elmers. "We'll have to put on our uniforms."

"You can't play," the coach wailed. "It's—it's illegal!"

"Why?" asked an Elmer on the far end. "We're all the same person, actually. A collective entity. Professor Noid says he wants to write us up."

"Let him write you up if he likes," said the coach. "I don't care if he blows you up, for that matter. But you can't play. When you were one man, you were no good. What makes you think eleven of you will be anything but eleven times worse?"

"Because we'll confuse hell out of the other team," the Elmers chorused. "Besides, we won't have to call signals, since each of us knows what the others are thinking. It’s all one big thought, really.”

“And a damned screwy one,” the coach added, emphatically. He paused and scratched his head. “Still, I dunno. You got a point there, about confusing the other team. Sure confused this team, I’ll say that for you.” He pointed at his warriors. The Hardnox eleven, known for some strange reason as the Irate Irish, had finally comprehended that this was not a hoax. They were indeed staring at an eleventuplet Elmer—and none of them liked it. Several of the more game-weary members of the squad had fainted as realization dawned on them, and the rest were pitifully unnerved at the spectacle.

Buster Gutz grimaced grimly. “Well, all right,” he said. “You can call your own plays. Anything goes, now. At least the longer you’re on the field, the less time the opposition will spend in crippling my regular players. Get yourself into uniforms and decide which part of you plays which position. Only three minutes until the slaughter—I mean, until the second half.”

“Thanks,” said the all-male chorus.

ELMER went into action. Twenty-two arms and twenty-two legs flashed and flickered. It was bewildering to control all of this movement simultaneously; all the more bewildering because he was controlling it. For the first time, Elmer realized something of the sense of alienation which accompanies true aberration; seeing out of twenty-two eyes at once, from every angle, gave him a fresh and distorted perspective.

When he had come out of the machine—in sections—he’d been first frightened, then puzzled, then astounded. He’d stood there watching a duplicate of himself emerge; then the duplicate added to his identity and the two of them had watched a third come forth, and then the trio had watched a fourth, and so on.

But fright, puzzlement and astonishment gave way to purpose; Elmer elevenfold had that much more confidence and power. He, in his multiple manifestations, kept dressing his various bodies—while in the background

Professor Noid numbled vague references to multi-levelled perception, and repeated over and over again a meaningless phrase which sounded like, “Baby is Eleven.”

As for Ada, she rapidly became rapt at the spectacle of her multiplied man. When the Elmers finally lined up for a last-minute inspection, the girl moved forward and hurled herself into the nearest pair of arms.

“I’m so proud of you, darling,” she whispered. “Take care of yourself.”

Elmer Number One kissed her fervently.”

“Hey, what about me?” demanded his nearest counterpart.

“I’m just as much Elmer as he is.”

Elmer Number Two now bussed her soundly, and in a moment she was being omnibussed.

“Whooey!” gasped the brunette, reeling from the end of the line. “I’d hate to imagine what it would be like to be married to you guys.”

“Might be fun,” the Elmers ventured.

“Not for me,” the girl declared. “I’m thinking of all that cooking.”

“Break it up!” commanded the coach. “Save your tackling for the other team.”

“Wait for me,” Elmer urged.

The girl nodded. “We’ll be here,” she promised. “You’ll have to pop right back into the machine, all of you, once the game is over. The Professor says he’s worried about the effect of all this multiple sensation on you.”

Elmer was not worried in the least. Any effect of multiple sensation on him was nothing compared to the effect of him on the waiting crowd in the stadium.

As he trotted out on his twenty-two legs, a roar went up from the crowd. At a distance, his facial similarities weren’t noticed at first, but his height was uniform and there was something oddly disconcerting about the single rhythm of his almost centipedal walk.

Then, as a bewildered announcer read the hastily-scribbled lineup of substitutions, there was multiple sensation indeed.

“For the Irate Irish,” that worthy began. “Klopp for Wiznezovitch at right tackle. . . Klopp for Bolesoupsky at left guard . . . Klopp for Stankopolitz at center . . . Klopp for Yifnifowskows at quarterback . . . Klopp for heaven’s sake, what is this anyway?”

And that’s what they all wanted to know . . . the crowd, the members and coaching staff of the Pyro Tech team, and the field officials.

THERE was a hurried hassle down at the fifty-yard line, but Coach Gutz and eleven arm-waving Elmers prevailed. “One man.” Buster Gutz insisted. “Regular member of the third-string team. Sure, it’s a trick, but you can let the doc check him; take his fingerprints if you like. You’ll see it’s the same guy . . . no, I don’t know how he did it . . . none of your business, anyway . . . whaddya mean I’m crazy? . . . all right, then, just show me a rule that says the same man can’t play all the positions—if he isn’t in one body, that is . . . show me the rule or shuddup . . .”

In the end, Elmer took the field.

Amidst a howl from the crowd on both sides, the game started. And the howling never ceased.

Elmer Klopp in the singular was never a good football player. But Elmer Klopp in the plural, although unimproved, was now more singular than ever in his special way. His prediction had proved to be correct; the Pyro Tech players couldn’t get used to the idea of seeing his face and body multiplied elevenfold. Everywhere they turned, there was the selfsame Elmer Klopp, grinning amiably at them.

Elmer Klopp kicked off. A Pyro-Tech man caught the ball on his own twenty-seven yard line, only to be tackled by Elmer Klopp, while two more Elmer Klopps piled on top with lusty enthusiasm. On the second play, Pyro Tech fumbled, and Elmer Klopp waltzed down the field while Elmer Klopp ran interference for him and another trio of Elmer Klopps took out the opposition. When Elmer Klopp was about to be tackled after a gain of thirty yards, he merely threw the ball to himself and continued romping for a touchdown. Then he held the ball and kicked the extra point, while nine more of him cheered lustily.

And so it went. By the end of the third quarter the score was 37-20 in Hardnox’s favor. By the time the final whistle blew, Elmer Klopp had singlehandedly, eleven-handedly, or underhandedly—whichever way one cared to look at it—run up a score of 58 points.

He had never enjoyed himself so much in all his lives.

While reporters raced for phones and photographers pleaded for group photos; while Coach Gutz and the faculty tugged at his arms and pounded him on the backs (quarter-, half-, and full-) Elmer headed for the showers.

Ada and the Professor were waiting for him, as they had promised.

“Well?” he chorused. “How did you like me—I mean, us? Think we’re going to make the All-American?”

“You were wonderful,” Ada breathed. “Every one of you.”

“Great game,” the Professor conceded. “You’ve got good heads on your shoulders.” He rubbed his hands together brusquely. “But now, let’s get started with the Psychopathfinder. Which one of you wants to go first?”

ELMER Klopp halted, all twenty-two feet coming to a full stop.

“Not me,” said his first eleventh.

“Me neither,” said his second fraction.

“Well don’t expect me to go,” said his third aspect. “I like it just the way I am. Or the way we are.”

“Why should we bother to take a treatment?” Elmer Number Four asked. “Look what we can do if we all stick together this way.”

“Sure,” said Elmer Five. “United we stand, divided we fall.”

“But look, you can’t go on being eleven people at once,” argued the Professor. “I assure you, the strain is too great for any psyche to bear. You will fall, all of you, if you remain divided this way.”

“All right,” said Elmer Number Six. “Then just tell us this. Which one of us will be left? Number One? Number Eleven? Me? Myself? Or I?”

“I don’t know,” the Professor hedged.

“Well, you’d better find out,” Elmer Seven asserted. “Because I don’t intend to take the rap for the rest of myself.”

“Me neither,” Elmer the Eighth chimed in. “This is one case where the parts are greater than the whole.”

“I’m with you,” said Elmer Nine. “Think I want to become extinct and let one of you other guys play around with my girl?”

“Your girl?” snapped Elmer Number Ten. “She’s my girl.”

“You’re both wrong,” yelled the eleventh Elmer. “I saw her first. Anyways, not more than fifth, maybe.”

“We’ll all have her,” declared Number Four. “Let the best men win, I say. Nothing can stand between us and the girl we love. And if she isn’t faithful to the eleven of us—”

Professor Noid raised his goatee for silence, but the Elmers overruled him.

“Great idea!” yelled Elmer the Third. “Why don’t the twelve of us get married and set up housekeeping together?”

“In a big house,” added Elmer Six. “With lots of twin beds.”

“One bed,” insisted Elmer Number Nine. “Thirty feet wide.”

Ada stepped into the center of the circle. “Now listen, boys,” she said. “Much as I love all of you, this will never do. Marriage isn’t a football game, and I’m not going to be tossed around between the eleven of you. One Elmer is enough.”

“Who do you think you are?” demanded Elmer Two. “Trying to tell us, your fiancé, what to do?” The girl stamped her foot. “I won’t marry the whole eleven,” she declared. “That would be bigamy.”

“Damned big of you,” Elmer Ten agreed. “But that’s the way it’s going to be. All or nothing.”

“Nothing, then!” Cheeks flaming and eyes blinking, Ada rushed from the circle and the sound of her receding footsteps raised a clattering echo in the dressing-room. The door slammed.

“Now see what you’ve done!” accused Professor Noid.

Elmer hung his heads.

"I told you this multiple-split would be too much for a single personality to handle," he went on. "And you realize now that I'm correct. You've started fighting among yourself."

"Yourselves," corrected Elmer Seven.

"Yourself," repeated the Professor. "You're one person, despite the physical demarcation. So this squabbling was meaningless. No matter how your physical forms disappear, you're still the same person; you still could have had Ada. Now you've lost her."

"She'll be back," said Elmer Eight. "She loves us."

THE Professor shrugged. "My niece, despite her training, is still a stubborn girl. Once she makes up her mind, she seldom changes it. No, I think you'll find she won't be back."

"Don't say that," said the Elmers, in unison once more.

"Let's drop the subject," suggested Professor Noid, "and get down to cases. Your cases. I'm anxious to see you undergo an immediate series of treatments. The drain on psychic energy and physical energy—dispersed over eleven forms—must be terrific. I'd hate to see it injure you permanently."

"Who cares?" moaned the Elmers. "I am tired, but that doesn't matter. I hate to think what the machine might change me into next, but that doesn't matter, either. Ada's gone. I wish I was dead."

"Don't talk about such things," The Professor warned. "Just line up now and let's start the treatments. You first."

Elmer One shambled forward listlessly. "I hope my part vanishes," he announced. "Without Ada, what's there to live for?"

The machine droned. The ten remaining Elmers watched their counterpart jiggle and twitch; his head invisible within the aperture of the machine. Abruptly, his body became invisible, too.

"Next," called the Professor. The performance was repeated, but the spectator Elmers showed no emotion. They were sagging with weariness and revulsion.

Three, four, five, six, seven of the Elmers disappeared. Still the remainder contemplated their counterparts' vanishing without a sign of life.

Eight, nine, ten.

The eleventh Elmer stepped forward. "Maybe I'll disappear too," he said, hopefully. "That would be nice. End it all. Peaceful in the grave, for ever and ever."

"Stop that!" pleaded the Professor. "You know how this instrument operates by this time. Your immediate thought-pattern exerts a definite influence on the results of a given treatment. And we're getting deeper and deeper into your basic personality with every subsequent probing. You'll be rid of schizoid traits from now on, so cheer up. Don't allow the thanatos—the Death-Wish—to take hold."

"Peaceful and quiet," droned Elmer. "Just sleep, sleep, sleep, with no alarm-clock."

"I beg of you!" the Professor groaned. He silenced Elmer by thrusting his head into the aperture of the Psychopathfinder. Once more the machine hummed and the body jiggled. Jiggled, but did not disappear.

Professor Perry Noid breathed a sigh of relief. He switched off the machine and pulled Elmer's limp form forward. "You all right?" he murmured.

Elmer didn't answer. He didn't breathe a sigh of relief, either. In fact, the Professor realized with a thrill of horror, Elmer wasn't breathing at all.

Professor Noid stared down at the waxen face and glassy eyes of Elmer Klopp. "Hes—he's dead!" the Professor gasped. "The urge was too strong, after all."

A logical explanation, he realized, but not the kind that is likely to influence a jury. The psychiatrist glanced around nervously, congratulating himself only on insisting that the team members must wait outside until he had finished his work on Elmer. The door was locked—but a restless pounding proclaimed that team, coach, reporters and students were getting impatient.

Well, let them. Professor Noid was impatient, too. Hastily, he unhooked and disconnected his apparatus. Might as well take it along while he still had the chance. Once Elmer's body was discovered, neither the apparatus nor his own life would be worth a plugged nickel.

Wondering idly just what a plugged nickel was worth these days, the little Professor staggered out the back entrance, grunting under a load of equipment.

And on the floor, Elmer slept the sleep of one to whom alarm-clocks have forever lost their meaning . . .

CHAPTER XII

IT was not an alarm-clock's ringing that eventually awoke Elmer Klopp, but a much more subtle noise—the fall of night.

Actually, his first thought upon opening his eyes was that the clamor of the team and students from beyond the door had aroused him.

He blinked, sat up stiffly, and rose slowly. The voices and poundings seemed very far away and unimportant.

With languid curiosity he gazed around the locker-room, looking for the Professor. He didn't seem to be there any more, and the equipment was gone.

Elmer shrugged listlessly. It didn't really matter. He was going to change into his street-clothes now, but that didn't really matter, either.

It was night, and time to go. This alone seemed important.

Elmer doffed, donned, and departed through the small exit door at the rear. The parking-space at this side of the stadium was long-since deserted, and he moved out upon the street without encountering opposition.

His feet plodded leadenly. He was very tired; he wanted to go home.

Rounding the corner, he came upon a newsstand. The proprietor sat upon an upturned orange-crate, apparently reading a blatant sex-magazine, beneath which he shamefacedly concealed the science-fiction magazine he was actually perusing.

Scarcely knowing what he did, Elmer approached him and tapped the news vendor on the shoulder.

“Pardon me,” he said politely, “but could you direct me to the nearest cemetery?”

“Huh?” queried the man. “Cemetery,” Elmer repeated patiently. “You know, where they bury you.”

“Not me they don’t,” the news vendor declared. “I’d rather die than be buried in one.”

“I’m not trying to bury you,” Elmer said. “I merely want to get to a cemetery. I’ve got to go there, in the worst way.”

“That would be in a hearse,” the news vendor mused, thoughtfully.

“I’ll attend to the transportation,” Elmer assured him. “If you’ll just give me directions.”

“Well, there’s Belleigh Acres,” the man offered. “Right down the street here, about half a mile.”

“What kind of a place is it?” Elmer asked. “Quiet?”

“I never heard any sounds coming out of it,” said his informant, piously. “Not that I’d hang around and listen if I did.” He stared curiously at Elmer’s face. “Whatchoo want in a cemetery at this time of night?” he demanded.

“I’m a bit tired,” Elmer told him. “I was thinking of finding a spot where I could retire.”

“If you’re tired already, why do you want to retire?” asked the news vendor. “Seems to me when you retire in a cemetery, it’s kinda permanent, like.”

“Exactly what I had in mind,” Elmer assured him. “Think of the joy of it, the peace! Freedom from daily cares—no more fret or worries—no more income taxes—no more TV commercials—no more Liberacejokes—”

"Cut it out!" pleaded the newsstand proprietor, feelingly. "A little more of that kind of talk and you'll sell me on the idea of committing suicide."

"Why don't you?" Elmer urged, eagerly. "Then we could go together. Maybe we could rent a crypt or a sarcophagus."

"How did you know my name was Gus?" demanded the news vendor, in agitation. "Who are you anyway? Coming around here with a lot of crazy talk about cemeteries. Suppose you expect me to believe you're dead yourself, is that it?" The vendor laughed sarcastically. "Well, I don't go for that fantasy stuff, see? I'm strictly what you call scientific-minded, get me? Now run along and let me peddle my papers."

With that the little man returned to his science-fiction. He was reading a story about an aristocratic gentleman on Mars, who employed one of the livid-skinned natives as his butler. The tale was called How Green Was My Valet, and it was ever so much more scientific than the puerile fantasy the vendor so rightly despised.

ELMER moved slowly up the street in the direction of Belleigh Acres.

Approaching the darkened, tree-guarded area, he noted with approval the high walls and the sharp spikes surmounting them. The cemetery beyond seemed very remote and secluded indeed.

He turned up the pathway to the entrance gate, which was closed and locked. However, he discovered, a light shone from the window of the small building just beside the gate. Elmer found the door and knocked.

"Come in," called a voice.

He entered the gatekeeper's quarters. An elderly gentleman in the uniform of a guard or watchman sat at a table, ostensibly paging through a sex-magazine, inside of which he had concealed a copy of Gory Stories—an alleged comic-book dealing with the supernatural.

"Yes?" said the watchman.

"Pardon me," Elmer said. "But can you tell me what I have to do to get into the cemetery?"

"Drop dead," the watchman muttered.

"I'm serious," Elmer countered.

"So am I," the watchman assured him.

"Isn't there another way?" Elmer asked. "I'm looking for a plot."

"Author?" asked the watchman. "Every once in a while, one of them writers shows up, asks me a lot of crazy questions about my job. Do I ever see any ghosts, and stuff like that."

"Well, do you?"

"Certainly not!" the watchman retorted. "Think I'm nuts? The minute I so much as hear a ghost, I right away close my eyes until it goes away."

"Then you're superstitious, is that it?"

"Nonsense," snapped the watchman. "Only superstition I believe in is the one about how, it's bad luck to walk under a black cat."

"Well, I'm no author," Elmer maintained. "I'm here because I want to rent a plot. Or maybe a small vault or mausoleum."

The watchman put down his magazine. "What's all this about?" he demanded.

"It's very simple," Elmer insisted. "This is a cemetery, isn't it? And a cemetery is a place where you rent a, grave. Very well—I want to rent a grave. Not just any old grave, either, but a good one. The kind of a grave that will last me a lifetime."

"This grave is for yourself?" the watchman demanded.

"Of course, who else? Besides, what difference does it make? I was under the impression they all came in a standard size."

"What on earth would you be wanting with a grave?" the watchman persisted.

"Very little," Elmer admitted. "It's under the earth that you need one. I feel as if I'd like to curl up in this nice little cemetery of yours and quit the mad rush and turmoil of the outside world. Who wants all this hustle and bustle, this constant striving for success? Let the early bird get the worm, I say."

"You curl up in a grave," said the watchman, sourly, "and you're liable to get a few worms yourself."

"Wouldn't want that," Elmer decided. "Maybe a vault would be best. Though I had sort of counted on a headstone or some kind of marker. You know, with just my name on it, and maybe a friendly warning to people—I was thinking it could say, Do not Disturb "

"Nobody disturbs our graves," the watchman told him. "That's what I'm here for."

"Excellent!" Elmer gave him an ingratiating smile. "Now, could you possibly show me something in a vault?"

"What would you like to see in one?" inquired the watchman. "A floor show?"

"Let's not be facetious, now," Elmer cautioned. "I'm here to rent and I'm willing to pay good money. But I'm entitled to take a look at the property in advance; isn't that fair?"

"It's fair all right, in a foul sort of way," the watchman said. "Look here, mister—I think you're just trying to talk your way into this cemetery here."

"Of course I am," Elmer replied. "I'm dead set on getting in.

"Dead set isn't enough," the watchman told him. "You've got to be embalmed. And have a death-certificate, and a regular funeral."

"Isn't it enough that I'm dead?" asked the young man, in a pained voice.

"You're—what?"

"DEAD," Elmer repeated.

"Take a good look at me. I'm not breathing, am I? I belong in this cemetery. I stand upon my rights as a citizen and a corpse."

"Bah!" said the watchman. "Don't you believe me?" Elmer persisted. "Look at how pale I am. Feel my clammy hands—I should think you'd be scared, at least."

"Stiffs don't frighten me," sneered the watchman.

"How do you know I'm not a ghost?" Elmer hazarded.

"Too solid. No ectoplasm."

"But if I'm not dead, and no ghost, then what would I be trying to get into your cemetery for?"

"Damned if I can figure that out," the watchman admitted. All at once he squinted at Elmer's face and cringed. "Now I see what this is," he panted. "I know what you want to get in for, and why you've been handing me this line of crazy talk. I know what you are!"

"You do?" Elmer blinked. "What am I?"

"A body-snatcher!" The watchman's lower lip trembled. "Sure, I might of guessed it. You're a body-snatcher, all right, one of them ghouls what steals cadavers for the medical students." He retreated around the table slowly. "You should of told me to begin with," he whined.

"Why?"

"Because I'm scared to death of body-snatchers." The watchman trembled and edged towards the door. "Well, this is one body you aren't gonna snatch, let me tell you!" Seizing his opportunity, and the doorknob, the watchman took to his heels.

Elmer waited until he had disappeared beyond the view from the window, then picked up the gate-keys from their rack on the wall and let himself into the cemetery.

It was dark and dismal and altogether delightful in there. He wandered down the tomb-bordered pathways, into a maze of statuary, cenotaphs and markers. A chill wind whispered in the trees.

Elmer walked along, looking for either an untenanted crypt or a suitable spot in which to dig in. His throat was dry, and he suddenly realized that he was quite hungry.

He reminded himself that the dead have no appetite, and moved along. Enough of this windowshopping; he would have to pick himself out a permanent parking space.

Suddenly he whirled, startled by a sound.

"Psssst!" hissed a voice.

"What's that?" he quavered.

"I said 'Psssst!'," the voice told him "Can't you even understand English?"

"Are you English?" Elmer wanted to know.

"Pennsylvania Dutch," the voice hissed. "But what's that got to do with it?"

"Do with what?"

"Come here and find out," the voice urged.

"Where are you?"

"Inside this vault, of course. Where else would I be?"

Elmer approached a large tomb off to the left. "Are you looking for a spot to rent too?" he asked.

The voice chuckled. "Not me, brother. I own this little piece of property. All bought and paid for. Got it for a song, years ago. Almost doubled in value—bet I could make 100% profit on it, if I wanted to sell."

"Why don't you, then?" Elmer suggested. "Can't tell when the market might drop again. Now's the time to get out from under."

"I get out from under every night," the voice replied "Same as you do, friend. Funny I never bumped into you before."

"I'm new here," Elmer explained. "Just got in tonight."

"I see." The voice sounded sympathetic. "Trying to walk the stiffness off, eh? Damned embalming fluid."

ELMER approached the black, bleak entrance to the tomb. "Well, don't just stand there," the voice continued. "Come right in, make yourself at home. Pull up a slab and sit down. Sorry I can't offer you something to eat, but there isn't a bite left in the house. And I'm afraid I'm badly overdrawn at the blood-bank. My last check spattered."

Laughter curdled out of the darkness. Elmer stepped back. "Who are you?" he, murmured. "Kemia is the name, buddy," the voice told him. "Luke Kemia. Isn't that a hell of a name for a vampire?"

“It certainly is,” agreed Elmer, with feeling. He retreated a step, but the voice called after him.

“And who might you he?”

“I’m Elmer Klopp,” said the young man. “I was formerly a member of the student body at the University.”

“Student body, eh?” The voice was wistful. “How I’d like to get my teeth into a good student body right about now! I’m so hungry I could eat fingernails.”

“Not mine,” Elmer cautioned.

“Of course not. Don’t be afraid! Besides, in a couple of minutes we ought to have some action around here.”

“Action?”

“Sure. The car is due any minute.”

“What car?”

“The dining-car, I call it.” Again the voice chuckled. “You’ll see!”

And Elmer did. Even as the voice spoke, Elmer noted the sweep of headlights moving along the road from the unbarred gate. A large car—a strangely familiar car—rolled into the cemetery and halted in the roadway beside the tomb.

Elmer gasped. It was the red limousine!

He turned-, half-expecting to see the two beards emerge. But instead a feminine voice called, “Luke!”

“Coming!”

A spidery-limbed, cloaked figure emerged from the tomb and Elmer caught a glimpse of a gaunt visage with an anvil-shaped chin. It moved towards the red car as the door swung open.

“What’s on the menu tonight?” the voice hissed.

“You’ll see,” the feminine voice replied.

Elmer listened intently. This voice, as well as this car, was familiar to him. Suddenly he placed it.

“Sonia,” he called. “Sonia Noodlemayer!”

“Who’s there?”

"It's Elmer Klopp," he said. "Or rather, the late Elmer Klopp. You see, I got in that machine again and almost disappeared—but instead I came out dead. Still, better late than never, I always say."

"Klopp? Machine?" The feminine voice grew shrill. Elmer approached the car.

"Sure. Remember last night, when I was in the ape's body? That was the machine's work. I got back today and took another treatment and it turned me into a football team. Didn't you see me play this afternoon?"

"I was sleeping," Sonia said. "But tell me more."

"Well, like I said, then I took another treatment and I think I died. Because all I wanted to do was come here and find a grave. The Professor thinks it's the death-instinct, or something like that, but I couldn't talk to him about it because he went away before I woke up."

"Let's find him and ask him," Sonia suggested. "Climb in the front seat here with me."

"But you've got a vampire in the car."

"Oh, don't mind him," Sonia laughed. "He's a little crazy but perfectly harmless. Sometimes he thinks he's a vampire and then again he thinks he's Napoleon. We call him the Little Corpuscle."

"Now I understand," Elmer said, sliding into the front seat as Sonia leaned over, closed the door, and started the car rolling swiftly around the path to the gateway once more. "You just came here to pick him up and take him back home, is that it?"

"This is his home," Sonia purred. "And he is a vampire, just as he said—but harmless. Too old to hurt anybody, really. I have to get all his meals for him."

"You?"

"Of course." She laughed again. "It's we young ones who do all the work."

Elmer suddenly remembered her remarks about sleeping by day. And he remembered, last night, during their embrace, how she had started to reach for his neck.

"Y-you're a vampire, too?" he whispered.

The car picked up speed.

"Certainly." Sonia licked her red lips. "And don't look so horrified. After all, if what you tell me is true—you're a vampire yourself, now!"

CHAPTER XIII

DEAD or alive, nobody jumps out of a car speeding at sixty miles an hour.

Elmer didn't try it. He merely huddled in his seat and tried to reason out what Sonia Noodlemayer had told him. The more he thought about it, the more sense it made in a grisly sort of way.

He'd wished he was dead, but the Psycopathfinder couldn't exterminate him. Instead, it had given him a half life; that of the Undead. No wonder he had revived at the coming of darkness and sought a cemetery. No wonder he felt hungry, thirsty—Elmer shuddered.

All at once he didn't want to be dead any more. He wanted to find the Professor and use the machine. Anything would be preferable to his present lack of existence.

Sonia was still staring at him and giggling, and Elmer realized he'd better maintain his composure. He was too close to being decomposed as it was.

"What's the matter?" the blonde asked.

"Nothing, really. It's just that it's a bit hard for me to get used to the idea," Elmer replied. "I never dreamed you were a vampire."

"Neither does anyone else," Sonia purred. "When Hans met me in Kirghiz, he didn't have the faintest notion. To him I was just an innocent young widow who had the misfortune of losing four previous husbands—something that could happen to anybody."

"Why did he marry you?" Elmer asked.

"He didn't. I married him," Sonia corrected. "Because I wanted to leave the country and come to America, the land of progress, opportunity, new ideas, and—"

"Fresh blood," supplied Luke Kemia, from the back seat.

"Well, that too," Sonia admitted. "Anyway, I married him and when he finished his field trip we came here. He still doesn't suspect a thing, you know. I've gotten him used to the idea that I prefer to sleep by day. He leaves me alone."

"But don't vampires have to sleep in grave-earth?" Elmer asked.

"I always wear a mud-pack to bed," Sonia explained. "Hans thinks it's a beauty-treatment, but he can't understand why I don't bother with mirrors when I make up my face." She giggled again. "In many ways, he's the ideal husband; he's so naive. He doesn't even mind all the students who come around to visit—he thinks I like to talk to them because I have an appetite for knowledge."

"We know what kind of an appetite you have," Luke Kemia chuckled. "No wonder so many of those poor kids drop out of circulation after a few visits to you. With some of them, I hear, their circulation stops entirely."

"Don't believe Luke," Sonia told Elmer. "He's always full of those underground rumors of his. Actually, most of them just think they're developing anemia and leave school. There have been only one or two—accidents."

Elmer shivered.

"Relax," the blonde urged, clawing his shoulder. "You must learn to be philosophical about these things. After all, that's the way life is. Somebody is bound to get it in the neck."

"Particularily if they hang around you," Luke supplied.

Elmer forced a smile. "I suppose I'll get used to the idea, in time," he said. "Right now it all seems a bit strange. I'll have to accustom myself to being a vampire; there's so much I don't know. I'll have to learn the ropes."

"To say nothing of the veins and arteries," Luke Kemia added. "They're more important."

Sonia nodded. “Don’t you worry about a thing,” she reassured him. “It’s really very simple. Sleep by day, walk by night. Avoid mirrors, running water, crucifixes, and the touch of silver. Get plenty of stale air and stick to a well-balanced diet. Don’t worry, you’ll soon get your teeth into it.”

ELMER’S teeth did a little quiet chattering. As soon as he could immobilize his molars, he said, “But might I ask what you were doing in the cemetery? And where did you get this car? What about those two men with beards—are they vampires, too?”

“Of course not!” Sonia rounded a corner and turned down a side-street. “Boris and Morris don’t even know I’m one. Didn’t you see them threaten me with a knife the other evening?”

“I did, and that’s what I can’t understand.”

“Just a little argument over politics,” Sonia explained. “You see, they think I’m just a regular agent.”

“Agent?”

“They’re Communist spies, of course,” Sonia said. “They came to Hardnox on the strength of a rumor that your friend Professor Noid had invented some new kind of gadget. Their instructions are to capture it and smuggle it out of the country—so that the Soviets can take credit for inventing it. You know the Communist line; they like to claim they invented everything from space-ships to sex. So I agreed to help them steal it. I sent Hans over to make friends with the Professor and investigate. I gave Boris and Morris my car today and let them go after the Psychopathfinder.”

“But why are you working with them?” Elmer asked.

“Because I’m a Communist myself.”

“A Communist vampire?”

“There’s a law against it, maybe?” Sonia retorted. “What makes you think all vampires have to vote Republican?”

“I see. No wonder you were anxious to get into this country.” Elmer mused. “But what’s your connection with Luke, here?”

“That’s different,” Sonia continued. “When I arrived in Hardnox, I didn’t know anyone but my husband. So naturally, I started looking around to see if I could dig up a few friends.”

“You sure picked a place for it,” Elmer admitted. “In a cemetery.”

“Where else?” Sonia demanded. “Anyway, Luke here was the only vampire I could find. We spent a great deal of time together during those first few months, and became well-acquainted. I must say for him that he seems grateful.”

“You know how it is,” Luke said. “Nobody likes to eat alone.”

“But even if you are a vampire,” Elmer ventured, “I can’t understand how you, as a 100% native, red-blooded American, would associate with a Communist.”

“Oh, I don’t know.” Luke shrugged. “I’ve got nothing against red-blooded Americans—in fact, they’re the kind I like best. But Sonia has converted me. She says things are better for us vampires under the Communist system. The Soviets are against capitalism, you know; they don’t let people spend a lot of money on embalming, and sealed metal coffins. A Soviet vampire would never have to leave his graveyard to search for nourishment. Makes sense to me. So I decided to help her. After all, one gets tired of just dabbling in blood. Now I also dabble in politics.”

Sonia put her arm on Elmer’s shoulder. “And you’re going to help me, too,” she said. “Aren’t you?”

“Well—”

“What else is there left for you to do?” she asked. “Oh, I know all about you and that little snip of an Ada Noid. But she’s not for you now. You’re one of us. Think it over, and you’ll see. What would you do if you married her—take a honeymoon trip in a hearse?”

“But the Professor’s machine could change me back—”

“Ah, yes,” Sonia smiled. “Only you forget the Professor doesn’t have his machine any more. Boris and Morris stole it from Judge Spleen’s courtroom this noon, remember? I’m going to their hideout now and look it over.”

ELMER remembered the cylinder he had substituted for the Psychopathfinder. Apparently the Soviet agents didn't realize it was a phoney. Well at least that was something.

"We'll smuggle it onto a plane tomorrow," Sonia explained. "And fly it across the border. There's another plane waiting for us in Mexico. We can take it directly to the Kremlin. What a triumph! Elmer, you'll be hailed as a hero!"

"Lucky you ran into him," Luke commented. "Seeing as how he must know the way to operate the machine."

"That's right," Sonia agreed. "I hadn't counted on it, either. I thought I might have to kidnap Ada and the Professor. Now, of course, that will be unnecessary." Elmer was thinking fast, and this last remark decided him. As long as nobody knew the machine was a fake, as long as he pretended to fall in with their plans, the girl and her uncle would be safe. And so would the real Psychopathfinder.

It might mean sacrificing himself, but? it was the only way. After all, what else had he to live for? If being a vampire was living, that is?

So he turned to Sonia and grinned. "Good enough," he said. "I'm with you."

"Then follow me," she said.

"Here we are."

The red limousine had turned into an alley just in back of Main Street and nosed into a parking-space between two buildings.

Sonia opened the door and Elmer got out, followed by Luke. "Can't we pick up a snack somewhere before we go in?" he grumbled. "I'm starved."

She shook her head. "Business comes first," the blonde reminded him.

"Maybe just a small child?" Luke pleaded wistfully. "Something to nibble on between meals?"

"Later."

She picked her way through the yard until she reached a cellar door.

"Down here," she directed.

"Boris and Morris rented the basement from some fool on Main Street. He doesn't even suspect what they're up to—thinks they're using the cellar to grow mushrooms in."

The trio descended into darkness. Elmer tripped over something that tinkled and broke.

"Bottle," Sonia said. "The owner's a tavern-keeper, I guess. Stacks his empties down here."

She groped for a door, opened it. Light flooded the corridor from the room beyond.

The two beards—Boris and Morris—rose from behind a table in the cellarway.

"Everything all right?" whispered Sonia.

Boris nodded. His smaller companion eyed Elmer suspiciously. "Who's he?"

"My name's Elmer Klopp," the young man offered. "The last time you saw me I was just an ignorant gorilla. But I have seen the light. I am now a sworn follower of the Party Line, and full of dialectical materialism."

"You vouch for him?" Morris asked.

The blonde nodded. "Completely. He's a sort of bloodbrother of mine." She paused. "Besides, he knows how to work that machine you stole. Where is it?"

"Right over here."

DORIS indicated the bulky structure of the hi-fi low pass vacuum-precipitated ten-lamination acetate bonded orthoflow telekinesis booster tank circuit.

"Funny thing," he said. "Morris and I have been fiddling around with it for hours, and we can't get the hang of how it works. We plug it in, but nothing happens."

"Don't worry," Sonia said. "That's why I brought Elmer along. He understands all about it, don't you, Elmer?"

"Sure I do." Elmer smiled. "The minute we get to Moscow, I'll give you a demonstration."

"No." Boris shook his beard. "We can't afford to take chances, comrade. Suppose something happened to you before then—who would know how to operate this device?"

"But nothing will happen," Elmer told him.

"One never knows." Boris smiled and patted his hip, which bulged ominously. "I think it would be better if you gave us all a demonstration right now."

"But—" Elmer hesitated. "You understand what this machine does, don't you? It's a Psychopathfinder. It gives a sort of mechanical psychiatric treatment, but it alters the whole person; physically and metabolically, as well as mentally. Anyone who uses it may experience a radical change."

"Well, we're all radicals," Morris beamed.

"No, I'm not making myself clear. This machine turned me Into a gorilla. Do any of you want to take such a risk?"

"Of course not. There would be no place for a gorilla in Russia, except maybe in the secret police."

"Well, then." Elmer shrugged. "No subject—no demonstration.

"Wait a minute!" Boris said. "I can get you a subject."

"You can? How?"

Boris stabbed his finger at the ceiling. "Upstairs," he said. "That tavern-keeper. He always closes up on Saturday night so he can go out and get drunk. I know his habits; he must be dressing right now."

"But that's dangerous—"

"Poof, begging your pardon." He turned to Sonia and bowed graciously. "It doesn't matter. We leave here on the plane at midnight. So what if we leave a gorilla behind? Or a dead body."

"Don't leave it," Luke begged. "Somebody might get hungry on the trip."

Sonia flashed him a warning glance, and the elderly vampire subsided sullenly.

“Very well,” she said. “Let’s get him.”

Smiling, Boris slipped out of the room.

“Go ahead and make your preparations,” the blonde commanded. “We haven’t any time to waste.” Elmer stepped up to the cylinder and examined it. This was not turning out the way he had hoped or expected. The heavy tank had wires extending to a plug, and he fitted the plug into a socket, whereupon nothing happened. A valve-cock on the side seemed to govern a spigot. Elmer tilted the cylinder and heard a squishing sound.

There was no hope here—nothing he could possibly utilize to fake a demonstration with. He stood silent, praying that the tavern-keeper would have left before Boris could find him.

BUT luck was not with him. Instead, Boris was. And with Boris came the tavern-keeper. The Soviet agent dragged him into the room at revolver-point, and the redheaded man goggled incredulously until his eyes found Elmer’s. Then he goggled credulously and said, “What are you doing here?”

“You stole my line,” Elmer accused. “I didn’t know this cellar was under your tavern.”

“Where else could it be?” demanded Michael Finn, surlily. “You never heard of a cellar being over a tavern, did you?” He ran a hand over his toupee.

“Now what kind of crazy business are you mixed up in?” he asked, wearily. “Last night it was pink elephants.”

“Tonight it’s Reds,” Elmer told him. “We’re all Communist agents.” The bartender turned to Boris. “Then you’re not just raising mushrooms down here,” he murmured. “Kind of suspected that, the minute you stuck a gun in my ribs.” He pouted. “I knew I should have asked for references before I let you move in. And to think I passed up a chance to rent this here cellar to a nice, respectable bunch of dope-smugglers.”

“Shuddup!” snapped Boris, reverting momentarily to his native tongue. “All right, here’s your subject. Now what do we do?”

Elmer wished he knew. Stalling desperately he said. “Well, the first thing is for all of you to line up over there against the wall.”

“Why?” Morris wanted to know.

“I’ve got to warm up the machine,” Elmer said. “And the vibrations are lethal, in a deadly sort of way. Scientific tests have proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that fatal vibrations can sometimes kill you, especially if they exterminate your life.”

“Jeez, I never knew you was a scientist,” marvelled Michael Finn. “Say, mebbe you could tell me which brand of cigarette I should smoke, huh?”

“Later,” Elmer agreed. “Now, everybody line up against the wall. And perhaps it would be better if you all closed your eyes.”

“Not me!” Morris snapped. “I don’t trust you. I want to see what goes on.”

“Very well.” It wasn’t, but what else could Elmer say? He stepped over to the cylinder and twisted the faucet control for want of something better to do.

A spray of something very much like water shot from the faucet on the upper sides of the cylinder. As a matter of fact, it was water. It spurted over the table and ran along the floor.

“Yi!” screeched Luke Kemia, suddenly. “Water—don’t let it touch me!”

Sonia cowered back. Elmer remembered that she had warned him against running water—vampires couldn’t cross it. Gaily, he increased the flow.

“What the—?” Boris inquired, stepping forward. Elmer twisted the faucet and a stream spattered Boris in the eyes. He staggered back, and Morris was drenched. The two vampires clawed the wall.

Without waiting for any further effects, Elmer turned and ran out of the room. He pounded up the stairs, threw open the door and hurtled into the red limousine.

The car careened up the alley and down the street. Elmer ground to a halt before Professor Noid’s tree-bordered home and in a moment he was pounding on the front door, gratifed to see that a light shone from within the house.

Then the door opened and Ada held out her arms.

“Elmer! I thought you were dead!”

The young man recoiled. “Don’t touch me,” he said huskily. “I am!”

“W-what—?”

“Where’s the Professor?”

“Upstairs, in the laboratory.”

“Come on, then.”

THEY hastened, two steps at a time. As the laboratory door swung back, Professor Noid looked up, his goatee bristling with apprehension.

“Oh, my! I was afraid it might be the police!”

“We’ll need them, soon,” Elmer said. “But not while I’m in my present condition. Get me into that headshrinking machine of yours, right away.”

“Aren’t you going to tell us what happened?”

“I will,” Elmer sighed. “But I don’t like it.” Swiftly he filled the Professor and the girl in on the events of the past few hours.

“And it’s all my fault,” he con eluded, mournfully. “What a fool I was to get mixed up with that Sonia woman in the first place!”

Ada shook her head in violent agreement and Elmer cringed.

“Don’t look at me like that,” he begged. “You make me feel as if I was about a foot high. I’d like to crawl in a hole someplace and die.”

“You nearly did,” the Professor reminded him. “So don’t go getting any more ideas. Let the Psychopathfinder conquer your death-wish, and that’s enough.”

“But I feel so helpless about all this, so insignificant,” Elmer protested. “If I’d only known—”

“The Psychopathfinder is ready,” Professor Noid interrupted, rubbing his hands lackadaisically. “Hurry and let’s get started. The minute you’re finished we can alert the police.”

"Just don't think about anything except returning to normal," Ada cautioned.

Elmer shook his head, then placed it in the aperture. The Professor operated the panel. The spirals revolved, the droning rose, the shaking increased.

And something happened to Elmer.

"Stop the machine!" Ada cried.

"He's—he's shrinking!"

The Professor looked up. It was true. The young man appeared to be dwindling before their very eyes. He grew smaller, and smaller, and smaller —

"Turn it off!" Ada screamed. As her uncle threw the switch, the girl ran forward and caught Elmer's body before it fell.

It wasn't really a strenuous accomplishment, for the young man had dwindled away inside his clothing to the size of a rather small doll. To be exact, he was now about a foot high.

"Back to the womb," the Professor murmured. "The basic feeling of insecurity at last. He felt small, inadequate, unable to cope with the problems of—"

"Me too," Ada exclaimed, eyeing the diminutive figure in her arms. "How can we call the police now, when he's like this?"

"Something tells me we won't have to worry about that," the Professor sighed. "Unless I'm wrong about those footsteps outside, we have company."

"Dear Lord in heaven," Ada murmured, as Elmer's oversize clothing dropped unheeded to the floor. "Now what happens?"

"Plenty," announced a voice from the doorway.

Boris and Morris entered the room.

CHAPTER XIV

AS they entered, the Professor threw up his hands in despair, an emotional prompting automatically reinforced by the sight of Boris’s automatic.

Ada turned away and hastily wrapped Elmer’s naked form in a laboratory rag.

“Come back here,” Morris called. “You put up your hands, too, lady.”

“Please,” Ada sniffed. “Is that any way to talk to a mother?”

“Mother?”

“Yes.” Ada held out Elmer, who now stirred and opened his eyes. As comprehension of his situation dawned, he started to speak, but the girl quickly clapped her hand over his tiny mouth.

Boris stepped forward. “How come?” he demanded. “You didn’t have a baby with you this morning.”

“I know.” Ada’s eyes were downcast. “I’m as surprised as you are. But that’s the price a girl pays for living in one of these college towns and listening to the blandishments of the students. I ought to have known what would happen when I accepted his maternity pin.”

“Fraternity, isn’t it?”

Ada held up the small figure in her arms. “Maternity,” she insisted. “I ought to know.”

“Born today, eh?”

“This very evening.”

“You seem to have recovered quickly, lady.”

“Now wait a minute,” Morris interrupted his companion. “This isn’t a clinic, you know. What are you going to do, give the baby a blue ribbon? Remember, we came here on a mission.”

Boris scowled and lifted his automatic. “That is right,” he intoned. “So let’s get going. Professor, unhook that machine of yours. Morris will help you carry it downstairs to the car. By the way, Morris—you can dismiss our taxi. We will return in the red limousine which our young friend parked out in front so conveniently.”

He gazed around the room. “By the way,” he said. “Where is Elmer?”

“Don’t mention his name to me,” Ada muttered. “He’s the scoundrel who’s responsible for my condition.”

The infantile figure squirmed in her arms at this, but she kept her hand tightly over its mouth.

“But where is he now?”

Ada cocked her head at the machine. “My uncle put him in there for a treatment and that’s the last we saw of him.”

“You mean, he disappeared?”

“Right.” The girl nodded.

“I don’t believe you.”

“Search if you like.”

“We haven’t time.” Boris waved his gun. “Hurry up, you two.” He motioned the girl forward. “Come along.”

“Me? But I’ve got to take care of the baby. He must have his bottle—”

“Plenty of bottles where we’re going,” Boris assured her. “And I’ll be glad to get back. I could use a drink.”

The Professor worked silently, his shoulders sagging. They sagged even more as he began carting the Psychopathfinder down the stairs. Morris walked behind him, lugging the panel control board and auxiliary wires. Boris herded them forward, watching Ada and her tiny burden preceding him.

INNOTICED and unimpeded they entered the red limousine and in a few moments the car parked once more in the alley area behind Ye Olde Gin Mill.

Morris got out first.

“The rest of you stay here,” Boris commanded. “Until he takes a look to see if the coast is clear. I don’t trust your story about Elmer. He might have gotten away and called the police.”

Morris descended into the cellar. He was gone quite a while. When he reemerged, Boris said, “Well?”

“They’re not there,” the second beard told him.

“Aha, just as I suspected—”

“No, it’s all right,” Morris broke in, hastily. “They just moved upstairs to the tavern. Sonia and Luke didn’t like the water, I guess. But the place is closed, the shades are drawn, and we can go right in. That bartender has been mixing them a few drinks to calm their nerves.”

“He can mix me one,” Boris said. “Let’s go.”

They went.

Entering the tavern through the rear door, they greeted Sonia and Luke, who stared at them in glassy-eyed silence from their seats at the bar. Michael Finn nodded glumly at them across the counter.

“Your friends don’t like water, it seems,” he explained. “So I been mixing them something a little stronger.”

“So I see.” Boris eyed the vampires, who sat rigid on their stools. “What are you drinking?”

“I don’t know,” Luke said, faintly. “It’s awfully strong.”

“Very,” Sonia agreed. “I feel quite numb.”

“You look it,” Boris told her. “What’s the name of that stuff, bartender?”

“Why, it’s a Silver Fizz.”

“Silver?”

Luke tried to move from his stool but couldn’t make it.

“That’s right,” Michael Finn said. “Made according to my own secret formula. Just a wee drop of silver nitrate in it, too.”

“Silver nitrate?” Sonia uttered a faint gasp. “I’ve been poisoned—let me out of here—”

She wobbled, then fell back. Clawing at the bar, she tried to stand up, but it was too late. She opened her mouth to scream, but all that came out was a puff of smoke. And then she fell to the floor with a clatter. The clatter was understandable enough, for by the time she landed, her body was gone; only a pile of bones remained.

Luke peered down with glassy eyes. “Help me, somebody,” he croaked. “Get a doctor—call Alcoholics Anonymous—”

Then he too was gone.

Michael Finn grinned. "Minute I saw how scared they was of water, I knew what they were," he said. "I heard all about vampires in the Old Country, from my mother-in-law. She used to read up on such things; anyway she was an expert." He scratched his toupee thoughtfully. "Come to think of it, my mother-in-law was quite an old bat. I wonder if—"

"Stop wondering!" Regaining his composure, Boris stepped forward. "Maybe those two were vampires, but we're not. And you won't get rid of us with any silver nitrate. Just keep quiet now, or you'll be quiet permanently."

Michael Finn gazed at the gun and subsided.

Boris turned to his partner. "All right—tell the Professor to set up the machine. We're still going to have our demonstration before we leave."

OBEDIENTLY, Morris and Professor Noid set to work at the end of the bar. Disconnecting the juke-box, the Professor plugged in the panel control-board.

"Where's Elmer?" Michael Finn asked.

"Disappeared," Ada told him, shortly.

"I see you've got a bundle from heaven," the bartender observed. "Congratulations. I didn't know you were expecting."

"Frankly, neither did I," the girl answered. "The stork brought this particular bundle in a hurry."

"Special delivery, maybe?"

"Just the ordinary kind," Ada said.

"Ugly little thing," Michael Finn commented, peering over the bar. "Excuse me for saying so, lady, but it almost looks as if your baby needed a shave."

"I do," Elmer piped up.

"It talks!" the bartender gasped.

"It wasn't talking ten minutes ago." Boris muttered, giving Ada a frown. "You said it had just been born."

"Can I help it if I'm precocious?" Elmer lisped. "It's not my fault that I'm brilliant—any more than it's yours that you're subnormal."

"Why, you—"

"You wouldn't strike a helpless infant, would you?" Elmer cooed, spitting in the bearded man's eye.

"Lady—either you shut that brat up or I'll—" Boris peered down at Elmer and recognition dawned. "You lied to me," he declared. "I know who that is. It's Elmer Klopp."

"All right." Ada sighed. "I may as well admit it. Nothing matters any more."

Elmer struggled in her arms. "Put me down," he muttered. "Put me down and I'll beat hell out of him. He can't talk to you like that!"

"Dry up!" Boris commanded. "Or I'll strangle you in your own diapers."

Morris tapped him on the shoulder. "The Professor says we're all ready," he said.

"Excellent."

"Do you want the bartender to undergo a demonstration treatment?"

Boris hesitated. He eyed the tiny figure in Ada's arms. "No," he said. "Let's use Elmer, here. The bartender is of some use to us—he can help transport this equipment to the plane before we kill him. But this insignificant little thing—who cares what becomes of him?"

"I do," Ada volunteered.

"Me too!" Elmer added.

"Never mind. Into the machine you go!" Boris grabbed the squirming form from Ada's arms and carried it over to the Psychopathfinder. Despite the Professor's horrified protests, he stuffed the foot-long figure into the aperture usually reserved for a human head.

"All right," he said. "Commence the demonstration!"

Ada ran forward and tugged at her uncle's arm. "You can't," she cried. "Maybe he'll disappear entirely this time!"

"You'll all disappear entirely if you don't do what I say," Boris reminded her. "Now stand back!"

"Get me out of here!" Elmer wailed, in a shrill falsetto. "If I was only myself, I'd—"

"Start the machine!" Boris waved his gun.

The Professor pulled the switch. Spiral—drone—shake—shudder—and the tiny figure, squirming in the aperture.

And then the figure wasn't so tiny any more.

"Thank God!" Ada breathed. "He's growing again!"

IT was true. Before their eyes Elmer was elongating, emerging from the machine until his feet touched the floor and his nude, quivering body resumed its normal proportions.

"That's enough—shut it off!" Boris called.

The Professor obeyed. Ada ran forward as Elmer slumped from the Psychopathfinder and fell into her arms. He opened his eyes and she stared into them, then recoiled with dismay.

"H-he's gone back!" she whispered to the Professor. "Look at him—he's the way he was before—a vampire!"

And it was true. Elmer rose to his feet, eyes set in a somnambulistic stare.

Then they blurred. Everything blurred. Elmer's outline wavered dimly, coalesced, and suddenly expanded.

"He's still going," Ada marvelled.

"Repeating the cycle in reverse!" Professor Noid nodded. "Now, the next step."

"What's all this?" Boris demanded.

Nobody answered him. Everyone watched Elmer.

Everyone watched Elmers.

For all at once there were two Elmers, then three, then four, five, six—

“Where did they come from?” Morris chattered. “Hey, stop,” this joint is getting too crowded!”

It was more than crowded. Boris tried to train his gun on eleven Elmers, but even a well-trained gun cannot cover eleven naked men.

Instead, they covered Boris; and Morris, too. The Soviet agents went down in a tangle of writhing bodies. Abruptly, the tangle diminished. Now there were only three on the tavern floor—Boris, Morris, and the huge gorilla that banged their skulls together.

And then there was only Elmer, holding them erect. Boris managed to open one eye. His hand reached feebly for the fallen weapon, raised it.

“Look out!” screamed Ada.

But Elmer didn’t notice the gun. Instead he ducked, as the pink elephant materialized, swaying above them. Its right forefoot came down on Boris’s hand, and the gun dropped.

“Yeow!” Boris cried. The elephant disappeared. Morris broke free, and pulling his battered partner to his feet, tried to make a run for it. Elmer sat on the floor, looking at them. Their pants fell down. Their clothes fell off. He tackled them and tied their beards together.

Then he stood up and draped a bar-rag over his nudity.

“That’s that,” he declared. “I think I’m myself again.”

“So do I,” breathed the girl. “Oh, thank goodness!” She swayed into his arms. They kissed. Suddenly she drew back. “Something new has been added,” she declared. “You still kiss like that football team.”

Professor Noid rubbed his hands together weakly. “A triumph for the Psychopathfinder,” he commented. “A complete demonstration of its practicality. You have undergone a complete psychotherapy, rooted out all inhibitions, compulsions, delusions, phobias; the death-wish, the desire to return to the womb—congratulations are in order for all of us.”

“You mean this calls for a drink?” Michael Finn asked, eagerly.

“Why not? We’ve proved our theory, Elmer is a new man, the Soviets are thwarted, we’ve gotten rid of the vampires—” The Professor paused, eyeing the bones on the floor dubiously. “Er—what do we do about these?” he asked.

“Send them to Noodlemayer,” Ada suggested. “After all, he’s an anthropologist. Vampire-bones might be something new in his line. We did promise him something for Christmas you know.”

“I’ll have them boxed,” the Professor agreed. “Handsomely.” Michael Finn stirred, shook and poured briskly.

“Here you are,” he announced. “How about a couple of grasshoppers?”

“Oh!” Elmer looked at Ada and groaned. “This is where I came in. Once you drink one of these things, anything can happen.”

“And probably will,” Ada told him. “But don’t worry. Something tells me that from now on you’re going to enjoy it.”

Together, they lifted their glasses and drank.

Where the Buffalo Roam

Many and vitriolic have been the editorial denouncements of the "transplanted western" science-fiction story; in a like manner, both editors and readers are apt to cast a bored and disdainful eye on the "after the atomic war" story. This, apparently, was all that was needed to send Robert Bloch rushing to his typewriter to turn out a post-atomic-war story with a wild-and-woolly-western setting—a story guaranteed to make the above-mentioned editors and readers retract their harsh words—in reference to this story, at least.

MAY have been two seasons ago, may have been three. This child don't shine at figures much. Doc, now—he's got a passel of books up to his lodge, and even Iron Head keeps a few in his tipi. But I never did hold with booktalk, not even for a white, let alone Injuns.

This jigger's happy and sassy as long as he's got his hide in one piece, with plenty of fleece fat to fill it, and a good gun and a few traps to set for the getting of plews. A rifle's all the company you need beyond the Platte. Come winter, of course, I push back to the river with my catch, and then I allow it's slick to hole up in a lodge of my own with a squaw for the fixing and the making of robes. But there's always a might to do, and no need for books even then—spite of all Doc's talk.

Book's won't skin a painter for you, or cure you of the flux. And books weren't handy agin them either. It was books caused all the misery in the first place, I figger. They have books aplenty.

But it was them I aimed to tell about, to begin with. Like I say, might have been two, could be three seasons back. It was fixing summer anyways, that I know. That's when they come.

I recollect the night it happened. Doc and Iron Head and I had headed back to the river to see if the team had come with the new guns and the ammunition. It was in, all right, and I got me a brand new rifle—along with a lot of blankets and such, and even some fancy folderol for Taffy. Taffy was my squaw; still would be, but she died birthing. Taffy had yellow hair, same as me. I guess she was more white than Injun, but they're all squaws.

Anyways, we'd had a regular powwow for a couple days after the team pulled in, like always, and Jed and Huck did a heap of bragging, about the trip. They always fetch some tall stories about the places back Across the River. Doc holds the yarns are true, but I figger they stretch a mite.

Then we set out again, four party of us. Two headed upriver for the traps, one hit downriver with the team—to trade extry guns and shot with the next camp. Me and Doc and Iron Head struck out west to buffalo country. The grass was in now, and we figgered they'd be ranging this way. We aimed to strike a big herd and drive it back to the river. Then the hull camp'd come out—'boys and squaws and old folk alike—and just blaze away until we snagged a smart passel, enough for meat and skinning and curing to hold us through winter.

That was the scheme of it, and we reckoned on working our way for maybe two, three days.

But we struck it pretty the afternoon of the first day out. Coming up over a rise, just up from the plains, with the sun scorching our eyeballs fit to fry, and we looked down onto the level with the tall grass stretching for a hundred miles off.

But we didn't see any grass. Everything was black. Black and moving.

"Huh!" Iron Head let out a grunt. "Buffler!"

"Buffalo?" said Doc, squinting through those spectacles he wears. "Sure enough. But look at the size of that herd! You ever see so many, Jake?"

I had to allow as I hadn't. In all my born days, and I knowed this country ever since I was big enough to tote a rifle, I never did see a sight to match this one.

There was buffalo as far as sight would stretch, like a big black cloud settled over the land. Cows and calves and yearlings, young bulls with their horns still black and old bulls just lording it over the harems.

"Reckon we better circle behind?" I asked.

But Iron Head grinned. "Walk along," he said. "Take us two days to go around."

"What if they get riled up?" Doc said.

"Make noise," Iron Head told him.

I allowed as he was right—buffalo always scatter if you fetch them a start. That's how we aimed to stampede them to the river, by shooting guns. But right now we wanted to get on the other side of the herd, so as to drive them in the right direction.

So we walked down, moving dose together, and headed straight for the herd. And Doc told us to sing.

That's what we did. We traipsed along, singing fit to bust—the old songs, anything that come into our head. Tunes like TEA FOR TWO and ROLL OUT THE BARREL and THE SWEETHEART OF SIGMA CHI; all them songs with the crazy words. Made a powerful ruckus, too.

And you know, it worked. It got us into the herd all right, but come a time when this child wondered if we'd ever get out again. Wondered if there was an end to it, or if we'd just go wandering and singing along until our voice-boxes plumb wore out.

Because it was a herd the likes of which a hump-hungry feller dreams about. Doc's the head for figures, so I asked him. "How many you reckon? A million head?"

"Easy," Doc said. "We been walking close to three hours now. Seems to be no end to it."

"Strikes me mighty odd," I told him. "I don't allow as I ever saw more'n two-three thousand at a crack before."

“The herds grow every year,” Dog come back. “It’s like the old days. Remind me tonight and I’ll tell you about it. But something must have happened to force them together this way.”

“Dry,” said Iron Head. “Powerful dry ahead. Dust storm, so they move. Buffler heap migratory ruminant.”

He was right. Way off to the west the sun was going down and from the clouds I reckoned haze. The plains were dry, so the herds come together and move east to graze. Now, hoofing it through the center, this child could see that it wasn’t one big herd at all—instead it was thousands of little herds, each one ranging from twenty to two-three hundred head.

Old bulls heading their cows and the calves. Young bulls bunched together, hanging on at the fringes and waiting for a chance. And here and there, the strays and the cripples.

We didn’t dast break off singing to talk much—I tell you it gave me a mighty crawly feeling to scrunch along through that grass, with hundreds of thousands of sharp-horned critters less than a holler away from us. They was making their own racket, too—calves a-bawling and them bulls roaring and tossing horn at any cow out of line. We spotted a few fights, too, and every once in a while a bull’d rear up for a mount. They smelled powerful strong that day, but the flies wasn’t so bad around, account of the wind. That was a fancy fix, because at times you can’t nigh breath for the clouds of flies pestering a herd.

We kept moving and singing and staring.

“Look at those spike-bulls,” Doc said. “They get bigger every year.”

It was true. Some of the young ones were crowding six feet, maybe ten, long. And I spotted some whopping big full-grown critters with a spread of maybe three feet; them horns run a good two feet long, and I allow as a couple topped a ton weight. That’s more’n two thousand pounds.

Close up this way I made notice of the robes—regular brown a-plenty, with here and there a blade, a beaver, a buckskin and even a blue. Iron Head squinted too; I knew what he was fixing for. He wanted a whitey if he could find one. Them whiteys are the rarest; you can fetch most anything you want with a white, from stale firewater to a fresh squaw.

But he wouldn't snag one even if he saw it, because a shot might set the whole passel off. It was best we just keep on a-singing and a-walking, and so we did until it was raising a powerful dark.

Finally we got through, and oozed out the other side, onto a little dried-over crick bed. We didn't figger the herd'd move in the night, and come morning we could start the drive back. So we bedded down.

But first we made us a fire and broke out the supplies.

Iron Head stuck a pipe in his craw and curled up in his bag closing his eyes and looking like a boss gone under for sure—it was always his way, come night at a camp.

Me and Doc just set there for a spell.

"I can't shake it," I said "All them critters, more than this child could count."

"Nature is fecund," Doc said.

"Wouldn't know about that," I told him. "But there's a powerful lot of breeding. Beaver, deer, elk, fish. And the flies and skeeters, and chiggers, too. Even up there." I pointed at the sky. "Look at that big white herd, forever roaming and twinkling down. Doc, do you reckon stars mate, too?"

"I wouldn't know," Doc mumbled. "And I don't want to find out."

"One thing's mighty dark to this child," I said. "And I been meaning to ask. Seeing that we're animals too, in a way—how is it that we never breed strong?"

"There's fifty-five of us on the Platte," Doc said. "And forty downriver, and another forty beyond. It's that way all over, Jake. Thousands of us, really."

But that's just a smidgin compared to the others," I said.

"You'd figger maybe there'd be millions."

Doc sort of sighed. "There were, once."

"You mean like in the book-stories? About the cities and all?" I let out a bark. "Don't tell me you put stock in that talk, too.

“It’s true, Jake. Where do you think the books came from? And don’t Jed and the others take the team back to the ruins to get us guns and ammunition from the arsenals? You heard him tell about it with his own lips.”

“I just can’t swaller,” I said. “I always figgered he aimed to stuff us with his talk. Thousands of stone tipis in one place, wagons that used to run without a team—it don’t hold with Nature.”

“That’s why everything turned out this way,” Doc told me. “Men didn’t hold with Nature. Jake, I’ve read it in the books. And my father told me what his father told him—he was alive and saw it when he was a boy. Once there were cities and towns and villages everywhere.”

“What happened?” I asked. “What became of the people, and why?”

Iron Head opened his eyes for a spell. “People go under,” he grunted. “Heap bad medicine called nuclear fission.”

“That’s right,” Doc said. “They got to fighting, and they had weapons. Atomic bombs, nerve-gas. The cities were razed, the survivors scattered. And most of them didn’t last long. They couldn’t live in the open, they couldn’t cope with the wilderness. They died of disease and plague, they froze in the winter, and they starved—”

“I don’t rightly make out the meaning of the words,” I told him. “But I’ll allow you’re talking straight about the fighting and maybe rough ways of killing. Only that part about the starving, now—how could they starve, with all this game here for the taking?” Doc smiled. “You’d find it all in the books if you’d only be willing to learn,” he said. “Iron Head knows the story, don’t you?”

The Injun opened his eyes again. “No story,” he said. “Only biological inevitability to restore the balance of nature.”

Sometimes that Injun-talk, or book-talk, whichever it is, gets me down. But Doc set up a hoot and a holler.

“Probably right at that,” he said. “Here’s the way it was, Jake. Originally, all this land was much the way you see it now. Then men came and settled. They killed the beaver, they fished the streams, they hunted buffalo and game until many animals were almost extinct. That means there were hardly any left.

"When the last wars were fought, there were only a few deer, a few buffalo, a few bear left roaming out here in the wilderness. There wasn't a wild creature east of the Big River at all. And the gas and the bombs and the plague killed off most of the domestic animals in the east—cows and sheep and pigs and horses. We've got a few horses here, but we're lucky; and you know we're trying to breed more, because we need them. Some day we might try plowing."

"Plowing for squaw men," Iron Head muttered. "Agricultural perversion."

"Don't worry," Doc said. "It wouldn't be for a long time yet—and then, only if we have to." He turned to me again. "But I was telling you about what happened. There was no game, and people died. Only a few of us managed to survive, out here in the open. A few hunters, trappers, Indians."

Doc always talked like that—he never did learn how to say "Injun" rightly, but stuck to book-talk. Only I knew what he palavered anyhow.

"Gradually they came together, in little groups, for protection. The old crafts came into their own, the old speech-ways and folks-ways that had somehow survived through two centuries of so-called civilization."

"You mean city life?" I asked.

"City death," Iron Head said. And Doc nodded again.

"We managed. We survived. And the remaining animals bred again, unrestricted and unmolested. They multiplied quickly, so that for the past generation it's been like old times once more. Plenty of game, and the timber's come back up north, too. There's nothing left of the cities but ruins, and not even ruins where most of the villages and homesteads were. Life is simple again. Crude, perhaps, but—peaceful."

Sometimes I get the savvy of what Doc says, even if I can't understand the foferaw lingo. I knew what he meant now when I lay back and looked up at all the stars, blazing away.

Doc lay back, too. It was quiet and easy, ’cept for a kayote howling off on the ridge.

“You never did say about the stars, Doc,” I told him. “Reckon they mate? Reckon anybody’s ever hit out to take a look?”

Doc frowned. “What made you say that?”

“Nothing. Only I was figgering maybe if they had some of them contraptions you showed me once in the books—what they call them, rackets?”

“Rockets,” Doc said. “No, men didn’t reach the stars. But there at the last, they were to try for the moon. Some said that when war began, they actually took off and—”

He closed lip, fast. Then he sat up.

I sat up too. Iron Head was already standing, with his rifle cocked at the ready.

So it was no mistake. We’d all seen it and heard it at the same time.

It was like a big orange flash in the sky, over to the east. And like a big thunder. Only it wasn’t lightning and it wasn’t a storm. Something had hit, back there, near the river.

“Meteor!” Doc muttered.

“What’s that?” I asked.

“I can’t tell you now. Come on.”

“Where you aiming to sashay to?”

“I want to see if I can find it.” He was folding his pack. Iron Head stamped out the fire.

“All right,” I said. “Reckon this child’s not bent on rumping it far behind. But that thunder’s getting nigher.”

“Wait.” Doc held up his hand.

“He’s correct!”

“Correct, hell,” I said. “I’m right! Just you clean the grubs out of your ears.”

We could all hear it then, roaring closer and closer. And now Iron Head was squinting off a ways, and he turned back and yelled, “Buffler! The noise—they're stampeding this way!"

No mistake the herd was pounding prairie. I could see them plain now, black moving on black, in a crazy wave.

Nobody had to tell this boss what to do, or the others, either. We spread out and dropped to our knees. Then we started pumping lead.

"Fire together!" Doc hollered. "Else they can't hear you!" So we fired together, or tried to. And the wave come on, faster and faster, and I could see horns tossing in the starlight, and I could hear the bawling and panting and the drumming, and it did something to me inside so that I sort of tight-ended up all over because I knowed for a fact now that we were going under. Unless they heard, and stopped.

They did, and not a mite too soon, either. The lead bulls reared up, and then they crashed back against the cows, and for a minute they was milling around, raising dust. Then it was like a wave dying off into ripples that stretched way back, far as eye could see. And then they quieted down again, ready to graze.

Doc stood up, rubbing his knees. "That was close," he said. "Think we're safe to walk through?"

Iron Head nodded. "Come," he said. "We sing ONWARD CHRISTIAN SOLDIERS."

So we walked back through the herd, and we sang ONWARD CHRISTIAN SOLDIERS and ROLL ME OVER IN THE CLOVER and NO BUSINESS LIKE SHOW BUSINESS and everything Doc could remember teaching us from the books at the rendezvous-sings at springtime.

It was even worse, in the dark, with the eyes and horns sort of glittering and skittering all around us, but we went on. And on. And on.

Until we got back to the top of the ridge, where we'd come over in the afternoon, and looked down and saw it.

"God!" said Doc.

"The devil!" said Iron Head.

"What is it?" I asked.

But neither answered me, they just stared. I stared, too. This child has seen a heap of sights, but never nothing like this. Never nothing like this big shiny shape setting there on the prairie, bigger'n all the lodges and tipis put together.

We stared, and that's how it happened—how he fixed it so's he snuck up behind us. And we not noticing until the light come.

It like to of blinded me, at first, and I could scarce make out to aim. Then the voice come, and I knowed it was a man.

"Don't shoot," he said. "We're friends."

Iron Head was drawing a bead too; he's got Injun-eyes.

"Put it down," said the man. "We're friends, don't you understand?" He sort of jerked his head away, and it come over me he was talking to other men behind him. "Maybe they don't understand English."

All at once I could see. The light was coming from a little stick he held in his hand. It wasn't a torch, and it wasn't any kind of oil lamp I ever heard tell of. But the light was bright as day, and he stood there with three others behind him, all alike as chips under a buffalo. Wearing floppy duds all of one piece, but with bare heads; the hair cut short the way tads wear it, and not a beard to be seen. That's the truth of it—four overgrown nippers is what they shined up to be.

This child's not one to run from tads, and neither is Iron Head. We dropped our guns.

"That's better," said the one with the light. "Maybe they do understand, after all."

"Of course we understand," Doc told him. "It's just that you startled us."

"We startled you?" The man grinned. "That's a good one. But look, this Is no way to meet. After all, it's a historic occasion. The very least it rates is a 'Doctor Livingstone, I presume', or something similar."

"Then you say it," Doc told him. "My name happens to be Doctor Livingstone."

It was book-talk, but I got the hang of it; enough to remember every word, even what I couldn't rightly reckon out. Because it was strange, I set store by it.

Doc pointed to us. “This is Iron Head,” he said. “And that’s Jake.”

“I’m Captain Buckton,” the big tad told us. “And this is Lieutenant Thorne, Ensign Winters, Ensign Taylor.” He nodded our way. “These Indians understand English?”

“Dry your gap,” I spoke up. “I ain’t no Injun. Iron Head here’s a true Cree, but I allow as he can palaver better’n you hosses.”

“No offense,” Captain Buckton said. He took Doc by the arm. “It’s wonderful to find you here. We didn’t know what to expect—whether there’d be any life at all, for that matter. I presume you realize we’ve just landed. You can see the rocket down there.”

Doc nodded. “We noticed it. But I could scarcely believe my eyes—there are still rumors preserved, of course, yet I never knew if anyone had succeeded in taking off.”

“Tell you anything you want to know,” Buckton said. “But come on, let’s go down to the ship and make ourselves comfortable.”

I looked at Doc and he nodded, so we trailed along. We let him and this Captain Buckton do all the jawing.

Now here’s the meat, without hide or fat or guts or lights—according to the way Buckton skinned it. What Doc used to tell about was gospel-true, about the war and all. Seems there had been men that were set on hitting the sky trail, and they’d built these rockets out in the desert. When things got bad, they decided it was time to get shut of earth, and the whole kit and kaboodle took off for the moon.

Some made her, some went under. According to this Buckton—and Doc, he didn’t make him out a liar—things on the moon ain’t natural-like. He allowed as how your weight changes, and it’s hard to breath, and there’s no critters up there. But the ships that landed brought means of making air which I don’t rightly comprend, and they dug lodges underground. From the talk, I figger they made regular cities like the old ones down here, only all underneath, living like prairie-dogs. For a while it was all leather and no fleece for them, until they got the hang of how to live that way. Then they got so's they could mine metals and make things and set up a way of making their air. and raised a bellyfull by some means—the word for it is "hydroponics", whatever that is. They knew how to get water too; Doc asked a powerful lot of questions, but it's of no nevermind to me. Main thing is, they done it.

All this time they figgered earth for a goner. But they were breeding up again, and wanted to fan out, and for some seasons there was a heap of talk about coming back.

It weren't easy to ready a rocket for the trip, from all Buckton said, and they only hoped to make do with it once they got her.

Doc asked aplenty about that part, but I got lost in the brush right off—anyhow, they pieced it out and took off for earth. Buckton and six others, there were, come to scout and see what had happened back here. They was a longspell on the way, and here they were.

"But where are we?" Buckton asked.

"Just west of the Platte," Doc told him. "Our group is located across the river, to the east of here."

And he told him how many we were, and about the other lodges we knew or reckoned tell of, and how we made out. And about the game, and how we lived; the hunting and fishing and trapping and trading and all.

Buckton kept asking the questions now, and no matter what Doc told him, he said, "Incredible," which means, near as I can figger from the way he used it, "Well, I'll be goddamned."

Then it was our turn to say it, because we come to the rocket ship. Called it a ship, but it was no more proper boat than it was anything else. Didn't even look like the pictures of ships in Doc's books. More like a big bullet with fins on, stood up on end with a metal door to it that opened up so's you could mosey into a lodge. No sense fixing to tell what was inside—reckon nobody'd believe it anyway. But this child saw it, and he's not making brag.

Anyways, we met up with the other three in the rocket and all of us settled down for a palaver.

They didn't squat rightly; had some metal contraptions to ease their rumps into. Didn't talk rightly, either, and as for chawing! They passed out what they called coffee and I couldn't go it. Had the taste of hot painter-water, and even Doc set it aside.

But Doc seemed to know about most of this doing, and so did Iron Head, even if he froze over. I kept waiting for the game to flush, and it did.

Buckton said, "This is wonderful! From what you tell us, we'll have no trouble at all. We've got light cruising gear, and of course we intend to survey as much of the area as we can. But if things are as you say, that's almost unnecessary. We can return, make a report, and implement other ships for a full-scale landing."

"Don't know as I follow you," Doc said.

"Isn't it obvious? We're coming back! Look—according to the latest survey, we number in excess of forty thousand. We've got technicians, and can train more. Excellent data on microfilm covering the field. All we need to do is go into the ruins and rebuild. We can set up the factories again, get transportation in order—communications, too. We'll use your group, every group we can find; we need plenty of manpower. Of course, we're prepared to set up a fiscal system and restore governmental control. I presume there are other men like yourself scattered around the country; men who have sufficient intelligence and elementary education to assist us. You'll be a great help."

"Will we?" Doc asked.

"Why not? Surely you can see the advantages. It's going to be like pioneering days all over again for a while, but modern technology is on our side. In a generation or so we should be able to restore the world to where it was before the war."

"Suppose our people don't want it that way?" Doc spoke out. "Suppose they like things this fashion?"

"Don't worry, we'll educate them to the advantages," Buckton said. "And there's more than one way of dealing with savages. We've no atomic weapons, of course, but we're well armed. And the next ships can bring the necessary bacterial cultures—just in case of emergency, you understand."

"I understand," Doc said. And he fetched a sigh.

"Well, don't look so down in the mouth about it," Buckton told him. "This is a great day. It's the beginning of a fresh start for earth. You should be proud, as I am proud, of an opportunity to participate."

The book-talk made my skull-bones ache, and Doc wasn't looking sassy, either. "Only a generation or so until we're back to where we were before the war," he muttered. "But what assurance have you we can just stop there? This country's rich again—rich in natural resources. Timber, game, minerals. There'll be trouble." Lieutenant Thorne laughed. "Not under proper control," he said. "We won't repeat our mistakes. We've learned the errors of democracy. Men have become civilized at last."

"Strange." Buckton shook his head. "We've gone so far in three generations on the moon. And you have relapsed into such barbarism. Living like mountain men and Indians." He cocked an eye at Iron Head. "I mean—"

"You mean no races," Iron Head said. "No creeds. No money. No taxes. No war. No economic problems. No greed, no intolerance, no worship of dollars or machines. Just freedom and plenty for all. That's barbarism. Also happiness."

"He talks!" Lieutenant Thorne said.

"Sure, I talk. I talk book-English and I talk heap plenty pidgin, too. I live in one world, but I've read about the other. Enough to be sure that I prefer the world I live in."

Buckton nodded at me. "And you?" he asked. "What do you think? Remember, you're a white man—not a savage."

I scratched my thatch. "Ain't much difference atween the two, I figger. Anyways, Iron Head's right. We got all we can ever use. No ruckus, nothing this child's agin."

Buckton shrugged. "I can't understand it," he said. He looked at Doc. "How could you permit such a state to exist? You say there are others like you in settlements scattered all over. Men with books, men with background and comprehension. Surely you could have done something to keep things going. Education, reclamation. What became of the railroads, the telegraph, telephone, radio? Why haven't you gone down into the cities, rebuilt? Why this—this—"

He got so red, looked as if he'd swallered a hornet. Doc sort of grinned.

"I talk to other men from other settlements," he said. "Iron Head and Jake don't know this, but we get together for meetings regularly, once a season or so. And we've considered a lot of possibilities. The railroad tracks are still here, but they're overgrown. Telegraph and telephone poles went down a generation ago. The cities are ruins. We send in to the arsenals from time to time for ammunition and that's about all."

"Now I understand," Buckton said. "You lack the equipment, the engineering facilities. Well, we'll provide that. You'll be surprised how quickly we can get things running again."

"But the education," Lieutenant Thorne busted in. "Why didn't you combat this savagery?"

"Because it survived," Doc told him. "When the educated men took the world into war, they died. The strays, the outcasts, the remnants of atavistic social orders proved their fitness then. They lived in harmony with Nature. We've encouraged that, since then. If a man like Jake prefers illiteracy, that's his business. The important thing is that Iron Head and Jake and I, and all those like us or unlike us. have managed to exist in peace together. To me, that's true progress."

"Buckton stood up. "Then I take it you're not in sympathy with our plans? You have no intention of collaborating in reclaiming the world?"

"Nobody reclaims the world," Doc said. "Because nobody had a right to claim it in the first place. Not governments or priests or money-lenders or scientists or engineers. It belongs to everyone. That's the way I think, and Iron Head and Jake and all of us. And so do others in our settlement, and all the settlements. You'll find that out."

"We intend to." Buckton nodded at Lieutenant Thorne and the others. "Tomorrow we'll cross the river and talk to your people. Then we'll head on and visit elsewhere. We'll survey the cities, go east. Maybe we'll find sentiment as you say it is. But it doesn't matter. Because we'll come back. We'll come back with the right men and the right weapons.

"You can't turn back the clock, you know. Once before this was a wild frontier until progress came. You know what happened then."

"Yes." Iron Head stood up, too. "Buffler died. My people died. Everything died but white men. So they ended up killing each other. Progress stinks!"

Buckton got riled, then. "All right. I guess we know where we stand, then. And under the circumstances, you'll realize it will be necessary for me to detain you here until we've investigated your settlement—"

Doc shrugged. "I expected as much."

"What does he mean, Doc?" I asked.

"He means we're prisoners," Doc told me.

Then I got the drift of it. Buckton gave a signal and the men eased around behind us, two to each. They all had these pesky little guns out.

Doc looked at me and I looked at Iron Head, and he said, "Let's raise hair."

So I tromped out and caught the nearest tad on the shinbone and then I twisted the gun up and like to blast his head off. Other one let fire but only singed me, and I took and threw him up agin Lieutenant Thorne. Doc was clubbing with his rifle when Buckton come nigh, but he didn't have to stop—Iron Head broke him in half over one of them metal rump-holders. That left two, and we just took aim and let the rifles chaw guts.

It was powerful smokey in there when we finished, and Iron Head didn't really get riled when Doc stopped him from counting coup.

So we left them with hair after all and just hightailed it out of there.

The ship, or rocket, or whatever it was, looked mighty peaceful in the moonlight. I squinted up.

"Reckon they really come from there?" I asked Doc.

"That's right, Jake."

"Allow as they'll ever send another ship down!"

"Doubt it, if this one doesn't come back."

"Wonder what them bosses from across river will say when they set eyes on this contraption. Figger any of them will get ornery on account of thinking we did wrong?"

Iron Head grunted. "Maybe they no see it."

Doc and I looked at each other. That was Injun-talk, for fair, and straight talk, too.

We knew what to do.

We headed west again and come to the buffalo herd. It was a long hike back, singing all the way. Songs like WHEN IRISH EYES ARE SMILING and ALEXANDER'S RAGTIME BAND and the only one that ever makes sense to me, the one with the words a man can understand—HOME ON THE RANGE. I guess we sang that one pretty near all the way.

Then we got through the herd, rumbling and restless-like in the dark, and come out the other side.

We fanned.

Then we let fly. We loaded and reloaded, and we kept it up until they were on the run. All of them, a million of them, heading east away from the guns and the noise.

We run after.

But you couldn't keep up, not with a million buffalo, a million of them roaring and charging and pouring over the ridge and down into the valley. Into the valley where the rocket pointed at the sky.

All we could do was to get to the top of the ridge in time to see it happen. They didn't stop for the rocket, of course. They kept on going. The moon was bright now, and this child could see everything plain. This child saw them hit the rocket.

Their hoofs made powerful thunder, and then there was a crash when a thousand hit the side of the rocket and a hundred thousand came on behind, driving them through.

One minute the rocket stood there, like a big bullet—and the next minute, the bullet exploded. This child's never seen sight or heard sound to match. It was something to shake the sky.

Doc and Iron Head and me, we dropped in our tracks and closed our eyes agin the light. It rained buffalo meat and hunks of metal.

"They brought explosives," Doc said.

"Sure," Iron Head grunted. "That white man's burden."

I stood up again, watching the critters wheel and fan out for the river.

"Come on," I hollered. "They'll make for the river from the lodges to get meat, now. We better hump along and help.

So we did, and that was the end of it.

Doc and Iron Head and this child let on that it was one of them meteors that fell and exploded, and there weren't a contrariwise notion, ever. Because the rocket was gone. Nothing but a big burned-out hole in the prairie.

Like I say that was two-three seasons back. I been across just lately, and I see the grass is coming in again. It'll be right pretty in another season or so.

Meantimes, the buffalo are grazing over the plain, like they used to do in the old days.

It's a mighty peaceful sight.

DEAR WALLIE:

I suppose you caught my ad In Variety by this time. Well, it's strictly legit.

I'm really on Mars-time now!

Bet you couldn't believe it when you read it, huh? Seeing as how you know I been turning down big deals to play Luna Circuit for years—everybody in the biz after me, you know. Could of named my own price, but I told you how I felt. You don't catch Bobby Baxter wasting the old personality on a bunch of space-happy colonials with crater-dust in their ears. Let 'em drool over me on feelio if they got the urge.

Which reminds me, before I forget it. Caught your act from Las Vegas on feelio the other night. You still haven't got the angle, kid. Stinx. Flash, but oldstyle. Cut out the monolog intro. Build up the tap routine. Hell, if I had the time I could teach you the ropes. Book you into 4D—I got a lot of contacts, you know.

But I can't. The rocket leaves tomorrow. They'll be rolling out the red carpet for yours truly. If they got any red carpets up there.

Well, kid, I suppose you're wondering what made me do it. You say to yourself, here's this Baxter character, got all the personality in the world, hottest comic working today. What's he mean by jetting off to a place where they never even heard of feelio, still goof around with oldfashioned live acts?

That's the answer, sweetheart. Live acts. I've never worked with a real audience: I guess nobody has in the last 50 years. Get some kicks out of the idea—like in tire old days, comics all wanted to play Hamlet. By the way, some day I may get around to that little thing just for the hell of it. I never scanned any Shakespeer but the old creep must of had something or you wouldn't hear all this talk. Of course, I figure I'd have to rewrite, on account of from what they tell me this Shakespeer was pretty sad when it comes to gags. But I could make a real Bobby Baxter Production out of it. Kill the people.

But I was telling you how I come to take this Mars deal. Sam Fogle put me up to it. He books the Luna Circuit, you know, and he bumped into me the other day in NY and started to bend my ear about this new outfit of his he's setting up on Mars. Calls it Space Operas, Inc.

Seems he was up there a couple years back, looking over the situation, and he says the Martians are just ape for human shows. Of course, they never see anything except those old Cinerama movies the museum boys took along years ago. But he talked around, and he found out they got their own entertainment. Just like a hundred, two hundred years ago here on earth. Traveling performances, even circuses. And all of it from poverty. Give you some idea of what goes over big with the Martians, they like carneys the best. Oldstyle carneys, under canvas, like they used to have here back in the live days. Sideshows with all native talent of course. Fogle says they're pretty sad. Not a jet character in the biz. And their musicians are even worse. Don't know their ASCAP from a hole in a piccolo.

Just to show you how bad it is, they still have geeks. You know that old carney pitch they tell about—some guy with a fright-wig down in a pit, gnawing the head off a chicken. Of course, they don't call them geeks up there, and they don't have any chickens. Fogle said they're called porlce.s and the thing they use in the act is a sort of bird like a chicken, a gotch. But it's the same deal.

DON'T SOUND like much, does it, kid? But you know old Fogle. He kept telling me about the big new theater they got at Inport. Says there's fifty showhouses all over, the Martians built themselves. And he went and took an option on all of them—the works. Rebuilt the stage of the Inport house, too. That's how much he thinks of the possibilities up there.

Fogle told me he figured he could start something just like regular old earthstyle vaudeville with live acts. Turn that Inport house into the big deal. You ever hear about the Palace, kid? Jettest thing in the biz a hundred years ago. In NY, when they had the old Keith-Orpheum time or whatever they called it, the thing was to play the Palace. If you went over there, you were in for life.

Well, that's Fogle's deal. He's going to bring show biz to Mars, with live acts. Got to be live, because even if he could get a feelio transmitter up there, or a 4D setup, the natives couldn't see it. On account of the three eyes, you know. They don't get the pictures right. Cinerama works, but not very well. Live stuff is what they really go ape for.

Fogle says it's a gamble, but he stuck plenty into it and thinks whoever gets there first will make millions.

Naturally, when it come to digging up the right talent, he thought of me. That's why he cornered me in his office.

So I told him absolutely no dice, did he think I was going to give up a sweet setup here to go running off on a 9G rocket and do my stuff for a bunch of yokels with three eyes? If they go for porlees nibbling a gotch, how're they gonna appreciate real Bobby Baxter material?

And so forth and so on. Then this Maxine Miller toddled in. I don't know if you ever caught her or not, she's done some stuff on feelio out east but not much on account of her material being a little bit on the blue side. But believe me, kid, she is pure hydrazine. Racked, stacked and shellacked. With the slickest figure I ever laid hands—I mean eyes on. If you know what I mean, kid.

Up to that time I wasn't what you'd call sold on the deal. Until I find out this Maxine Miller is signed with Fogle to open at Inport.

Of course she was just about crazy when she found out who I was. I don't blame the kid, and I got to hand it to her for covering up the way she did. But anybody could see she was dying to work with a name like me.

So I told Fogle yes, I could make it. And when was he planning to take off?

I flipped when he said next Tuesday—that's tomorrow, kid. I asked him what about the rest of the lineup? And he said he was going to book whatever he could pick up on short notice.

Well, you don't catch Bobby Baxter with his socks down, not me. I smelled a right angle here, and I pitched it. Told Fogle he was in for a lot of trouble, booking blind. And if he figured on opening at Inport soon as he arrived, he wouldn't have any time for rehearsals. Guess the poor guy was so excited he'd forgotten all about that: seeing as how he'd already gone ahead and started to beat the drums up there about the first night performance.

I told him why not leave the whole deal to me? For a couple of extra bills a week, I'd take charge of the works—book some flash to pad out, make it a regular Bobby Baxter Production. Of course, the idea would be to build the show around me, and maybe spot this Maxine Miller. But you got to have at least four other acts to warm up a house.

Well, Fogle was so happy to get me he said okay, anything I wanted. But not over three yards for the talent budget until we see how the thing goes. Maybe we'll find out they just like acrobats or something. Got to sort of feel our way.

Which I am now doing. With the acts all this afternoon, at auditions. And which I plan to do tonight, when I have dinner with this Maxine Miller. If you get what I mean.

So that’s the pitch. I figured you’d like to know. Will drop you another line when I get a chance. Right now I got to do an off to Buffalo.

Your ever-loving

Bobby

In Free Fall

August 6, 2042

DEAR WALLIE:

Catch this flash stationary! Really class, yes? I never knew they had this space-travel duked out so much. Why this ship is just like a fancy hotel, good as anything in Las Vegas or Miami B. And this artifical gravity or whatever they call it works perfect. Never know you were in free fall at all.

I got the best cabin on board, even better than Fogle’s. Spend a lot of time here, too, with Maxine. Sweetheart, I’m really in, let me give you the word on that!

Whole deal is jet. Couple floops, but they don’t amount to much. You know how it is, everything at the last minute—had a little trouble picking up any acts. Seems like I couldn’t dig up enough singles who were at liberty, ready to take off on a route like this without any advance notice.

And I was spotting singles, on account of the budget. Only about eight showed up for the audition, and they were mostly dogs. Some kind of singer—grand opera, I guess she called it—old fatso with a set of pipes like the whole Rocketeer Chorus Line going at once. Out, of course. Told her this was Space Opera, not grand opera or whatever.

Got a pretty good juggler—name of Martini, he does some trick stuff with cocktail glasses, bottles. Ends up balancing a bottle on his head and a glass on his nose; pours from the bottle into the glass, then flips an olive into it.

You happen to know a hoofer named Terry King? He’s along. Does that trick dance on stilts. Strictly a filler, but he works cheap. Also a fellow name of Murphy, he has a flash balancing act, slack wire with a bicycle. Juggles indian clubs with his feet. Reason I picked him is to give those three-eyed rubes something to talk about. Figure they never saw any faster action than a porlees chasing a gotch. This is the kind of stuff that will panic the house.

Had a little trouble getting Murphy's equipment through. Seems they're pretty fussy about weight on these flights, and his rig and bike and clubs are pretty heavy.

They told me okay, they'd take it, but couldn't I leave out one of my trunks? I raised plenty hell about that', believe me—if you think I'm going to open on Mars without a decent wardrobe, you're space-happy, I told the guy. Why, this is practicly what you might say a historical ocassion and all. Besides, I got to have at least six changes because the way I got it figured I'm m.c.-ing the show and filling in all down the line.

That's on account of getting stuck with Mary and Jim.

THEY'RE THE floops I was going to tell you about. Like I say, there was this trouble picking up acts at liberty on such short notice. Tell the truth, by the time I run through the audition the afternoon before we took off I was getting kind of desparate, if you know what I mean. Because it looked like I would not be able to put on a real Bobby Baxter Production.

Just at the last minute these two kids show up—this Mary and Jim. Mary Connor and Jim Hastings. Team, but I never heard of them. She sings and he does instrumental solos, I asked where they'd been booking and they told me radio. Radio, for crying out loud, did you ever hear of such a thing? I didn't even know they still had radio. But I guess, out in the mountains or wherever they run a couple stations or whatever they're called. And these two kids do some kind of act.

Well, like I said, I was strickly on the ropes, no more time for auditions, and a hole in the show to fill. I looked them over. Young stuff, and they were just about frantic to get a chance like this. Matter of fact, the guy—Hastings—said he'd go along just for the ride and the billing. The girl was willing to take peanuts. Not much on looks, no wardrobe, and on top of it she wears glasses, yet. You know what I mean, spectacels, the real oldstyle deal, not even contact lenses.

Maxine was sitting next to me when this pair come up and it was all she could do to keep from going into histerics over the getup. I wanted to turn thumbs down, of course, but Maxine gave me the word. Pointed out the bill was weak on music and maybe this guy Jim Hastings could accompany her. She asked him and he said sure, he thought so.

So I said what about the girl, and Maxine said she did not think there was any comparison between their styles. It might make a good contrast. What she was really thinking, of course, was how she'd look compared to this Mary creep—I know how these babes figure.

But anything to keep Maxine happy. I wound up telling Mary and Jim okay, and we'd put together a show and rehearse it on the flight out.

That's what we did.

And that's why I got fill-ins to worry about.

Held a rehearsal the first day. Martini's great. So is the hoofer, and so is Murphy—the slack-wire guy. All novelty acts, but with my line of chatter for a buildup, I'll make those triple-eyed yahoos think they're seeing the greatest show on earth. You know that old Bobby Baxter charm, sweetheart. I can really pour it on.

But even I couldn't save Mary and Jim.

Here's the payoff.

Mary's a singer, all right. And what do you suppose she sings? Ballads. That's it, brother. Ballads, yet. Oldies. Stuff you never even heard of, from before feelio. Moon in My Heart. Crater of Love. Thunder and Roses, I ask you. And talk about projection—there ain't. She just stands there and sings.

You ought to see Maxine move into one of her specialties to get the difference. She does this material of hers, something called Air on a G-String, a strip, but very refined like. And believe me, brother, she projects.

Even though I don't know what in hell we'll do about an accompanist, unless I double in brass for her.

Because the rest of the payoff is this guy Jim Hastings. The musician. He says. Know what kind of a musician he is? Turns out he plays a mouth-organ! That's a harmonicker, son. Bet you never even heard of it. Oldfangled dingus you play by putting in your mouth and blowing on it. Not a horn. Hell, I can't describe it to you. And the sounds it makes you wouldn't want to know about. What a floop!

This is what I got to work with. On a Bobby Baxter Production! Well, not me. Minute I got a squint at their act, I yanked it. Maxine or no Maxine, nobody's going to louse me up on a historical ocassion. Not this Thespeean.

I told Fogle, I said, "By Xst, I'll do the whole show myself before I let them get out there. If I got to drag out every routine in the book!"

And it looks like I'm doing just about that. Carrying the whole performance on my back. But I promised Maxine she could have at least four numbers, and that makes her happy.

One thing I will say, she sure warmed up to me in a hurry. Once she got a chance to know me.

I been seeing she gets plenty chances, too. Last night for the gag of it I turned off the artificial gravity in my cabin. You wouldn't believe what happened unless you tried it yourself sometime. Which I advise you to do. If you can ever latch onto something like this Maxine, it's worth the trip.

Well, I got to go offbeam now. She just rapped on the door and it looks like we're going into free fall again.

Your ever-loving

Bobby

Still in Free Fall
August 9, 2042

DEAR WALLIE:

This is a quickie.

We land tomorrow and Fogle's as itchy as grandpa's underwear. I don't blame the guy, he's got all this dough tied up. But there's nothing to worry about. I keep telling him everything's ready to jet.

Lined up a pretty good little show, if I do say so myself. Rehearsing every day in the lounge, and last night we let the rest of the passengers in for a sort of preview. They went absolutely ape over the whole deal.

Of course, I was in top form. I'm doing my horse act—you know the routine, where I come out in this half of a horse costume. The rear half. Like I'd been going to a masquerade party only my partner stood me up. Very funny, special material stuff. Blue, but sutle. You know how sutle I can get.

Well, it murdered the people. Then I got another bit, the psichytrist bit. This one plays with a stooge, see, and I got Maxine up in the part to help me out. Can't take the time to run through it, but this ought to give you a rough idea of what it's like.

Maxine comes out on the stage and she says to me, "Hi, Bobby, what you doing these days?"

And I say, "I'm a psichytrist, see?"

Then she feeds me, "A psichytrist? That's a soft racket. All you guys do is sit around in your office waiting for patients to come in. Then you throw them on the couch, ask a lot of stupid questions, and charge a big price."

So I say, "Just a minute, now. First of all, you gotta understand we go to school for seven years. Then we gotta be inturns. Then we specialise. And those questions aren't stupid, either.

"For instance, I might ask a patient, what is it that a dog does in the back yard that you wouldn't want to step in? The answer is, he digs a hole.

"Or I ask, what does a woman have two of that a cow has four of? The answer is, feet.

"Or I ask, what does a man do standing, a woman sitting, and a clog on three legs? The answer is, shakes hands.

"But believe me—you'd be surprised at some of the crazy answers I get to those questions!"

That's only a part of it, I cleaned it up a lot, because if there's one thing I'm aiming at it's class. Class all the way—that's a Bobby Baxter trademark you might say.

And I just fractured the passengers. Shows it pays to be sutle.

That’s what I was telling this Mary Connor fluff. She’s been hanging around a lot lately, ever since I gave her and Jim the sad word about their act. Says she’s awful sorry, and maybe I could sort of give her a couple pointers. They’ll be going right back to earth on the next flight out when we land, and I guess this is her only chance to see a real Big Timer operate.

Also—this is rich, son—the poor creep is gone on me. You never saw anything like it, the way she’s got it. Can’t leave me alone. I have a helluva time shaking her when Maxine and I want to be together, which is usually.

She even tried to fix her hair, and the other day she come around without her glasses on. So nearsighted she kept bumping into stuff. I had to laugh. Of course, I just give her the old freeze routine, but she keeps coming back.

Her partner, this Jim Hastings, he don’t know what to make of it all. He went and got himself engaged to Mary or something awful like that, and now he’s from nowdiere and besides he’s burned because I tossed the act out.

The little rat even went to Sam Fogle behind my back the other day and put up a beef, claims he’s got a contract and he wants to show.

Naturally Sam told me about it, and I gave him the third word on it—nobody plays without my say-so. I want this deal to be perfect.

Understand Variety and Billboard will both be covering die opening, and I got my deputation. No floops for Bobby Baxter.

I never even let on to Jim that I knew he squawked. But just to teach him a lesson, I leen forceing myself to play ip to this Mary a little. Not nuch, because I can’t stand he creep, but enough so as to jive him a hard time.

You know me, kid, I’m too soft-hearted to really pull any tough stuff. Besides, Maxine’s all the time watching me these days.

Well, I got no more timet;o write now. Tomorrow we and and tomorrow night is he historical moment when show biz really comes to Mars.

I know you’ll be waiting to catch those writeups in Vanity and Billboard. But don’t jo green over them, kid, who mows, someday you may be ip there yourself. If you ever earn the secret like I did, vhich is to develop that old oveable personality.

Your ever-loving

Bobby

Inport Mars
August 11, 2042

DEAR WALLIE:

Well, I suppose the reviews are out.

Of course I havn't seen them up here, but before you or anybody else gets funny ideas, let me give you the real inside story of what happened.

If you think I'm taking this lying down, you're crazy. When I get through with this double-crossing rat of a Sam Fogle he won't be able to book a stag smoker date in the crater of Abulfeda or wherever.

I knew the whole setup was a phoney from the word go. That's what I wrote you, remember? If it wasn't I'm so much of a idealis, I never would of listened to that lieing dog. Sneaking around and appealling to my better nature about how I owe it to the biz to pioneer and bring high class entertainment to Mars! And all the while giving me that pitch about how they were ape for real talent. Why, those three-eyed apes would not recognise real talent if it come up and did a bump-and-grind right under their noses. If they had noses, that is.

Noses they ain't. Also all of them are about seven feet tall, or did you know that? And they smell funny. They eat funny food, too, and none of them smoke or drink or weed, either—bunch of creeps, if you ask me. Even if you don't ask me, I'm telling you. No wonder they got such lousy taste! It's pitiful, kid, believe me.

Well, I don't see the sense of giving you a long song and dance about what's wrong with the Martians—you ought to be able to figure for yourself when you read the reviews. (Hell, they're so dumb they don't even know they're Martians. Really! They call themselves be some damned thing. I'm surprised those foureigners even had even sense to learn English, the way they talk.) Everything they do is crazy.

I was so excited about landing and all that I didn't notice much at first. They had a big reception arranged for us when we come off, and Sam Fogle sure had lined up some sweet publicity. The house was a sellout three hours after the box office opened, at noon. Some of these three-eyed goops had stood in line since the night before to get tickets.

Sam was plenty enthused when he found that it. Two carneys playing in town at the same time, and they were dying, absolutely. No biz at all. Everybody wanted to see Bobby Baxter.

"This is it," he told me. "Your gonna roll 'em in the aisles tonight."

Roll 'em in the aisles. That's a hot one! One account of this big showhouse he was talking about, the best spot in Inport, doesn't even have any aisles. Or seats, either. So help me, it's that way all over this damned planet. Martians never sit down, it turns out—and they watch their shows standing up!

Ever try to play to a standing house? You know it's murder. I told Fogle that, but he said it didn't matter, we had to make allowances for strange customs. When in Rome, do the Romans before they do you, or however it is.

Mostly he was worried about the gravity. Maybe you never heard of it, but another thing on this dizzy planet, they got the wrong kind of gravity. I can't explain it, not being what you call technicle-minded, but up here I only weigh 60 pounds.

So help me, that's right! 60 pounds I weigh, on account of their lousy gravity. Bounce right up in the air when I walk fast if I'm not careful.

Fogle told me we better have a rehearsal before showtime, to get used to the difference. Which was a good idea, except that the local press wanted interviews all afternoon. Catch me lousing up a million dollars worth of free publicity. Not on your life, kid. So I did the sensible thing and got buddy with the press. So the first show might be a little ragged, I figured these yahoos would never notice. Just so we got the press on our side.

Get that. I sacerficed a chance to rehearse, just to make sure Fogle got the breaks on publicity. I gave up a run-through only because I wanted to see that everybody in Inport knew about our show. I spent right up until supper time telling these three-eyed reporters all about the performance—where I used to play on earth, what I did in feelio, how I socked ’em in 4D, anything they wanted to know. Even what I liked to eat, intimate stuff, just to make friends you might say.

I did all that. Then I went backstage and set the cues, and saw to it that all the props were there, and I even had to tell the stoop stagehands how to handle the lights. Troubles? You got no idea what troubles. I never had no love for the Union before, but when I see what these threeeyed foureigners call a lighting setup, it’s murder.

Anyhow, I got it all set, just knocked myself out for Fogle’s sake—and all the time he’s interfering, keeps telling me what about giving Martini and the other a chance to practise with their props, nagging at me like I could do eight things at once when I’m trying to help Maxine zip into her breakaway dress. Anybody with sense would of walked out on him right then and there.

But you know me, kid, always good-natured. So I just kept on working and politely told him he should keep his goddam yap shut and let me run this show. Because it was my show, and he’d better not forget it, or he’d end up going out there all by himself and doing a two-hour single.

After that he calmed down, and I managed to line things up. I had this Jim and Mary working carrying props and stuff, and I put Jim in charge of the dumb juicers—at least he knew enough to handle lighting cues, I figured. Mary was hanging around, so I made her unpack my stuff and line it up and sew up my horse costume which got kind of tore in the trunk.

Then it was time, and the house was packed—one thing I got to say about this business of no seats, you can sure jam in a crowd that way.

So we opened.

I SUPPOSE you figure I’m going to hand you a lot of excuses now, because of the writeups. But why should I? You know me, kid. You’ve caught me enough times to realize Bobby Baxter never gave a bad performance in his life. The show must go on, that's my motto.

And you can tell anyone who asks you that you got it straight from me—Bobby Bakter did a great show that night. I was never better, believe me.

Can I help it if I was working the lousiest audience in the world? (World? In the universe, yet!)

Can I help it if this jerk juggler of a Martini uses liquor props in front of a crowd that never heard of drinking and don't know what he's doing? Is it my headache if his olive keeps floating around in the air on account of this crazy Martian gravity business?

Am I to blame for gravity, already? I ask you, I? So when Terry King does his tap-dance on the stilts and he can't keep them on the ground, what am I supposed to do—run out there and tie weights to the things?

Is it my fault if Murphy's indian clubs sail forty feet in the air when he tries to juggle them, and his bike falls off the slack wire and hits him on the head just when he's got his neck twisted in the rope?

He didn't even get hurt bad, and the way he looked would get a yak out of any audience—except these three-eyed schmoes. They don't even think a pratt-fall is funny.

On top of it, Maxine Miller has to rope me into, accompanying her on a midget piano when she goes on for her first strip. You think gravity can louse up a juggler—let me tell you, kid, just watch a peeler work with a breakaway costume that usually doesn't unzip unless you tug three times harder than you need to up here. She just gave one little yank and the whole damn outfit come off her. Like somebody unveiling a statue. Had to finish up her first number behind the piano, and like I say, it was only a midget piano. That sure gave those three-eyed characters a triple eyeful, but do you think they appreciated it? Not them, brother! They couldn't dig her songs at all.

Ignorant, that's the trouble with them. Just plain ignorant. I kept trying to hoke it up. Like I said, I never did a better job—I was out there myself most of the time, just knocking myself out with routines. Gave ’em everything in the old book.

Talk about a cold house! They just plain didn’t it. The hind end of a horse routine, for instance. I guess none of them had ever seen a horse. Just couldn’t figure out what the gags were about. And that psichytrist bit, they could not catch that one either.

Right in the middle of it, they sat down. That’s right, they all started to sit down!

I nearly flipped, and when I come off there was Fogle busting a gut in the wings. “You’re dead!” he kept yelling. “Know what that means? When they sit down on you up here, it’s like they walked out on you back on earth.”

I said, “Who told you that malar-key?” and he said, “Jim Hastings. He’s been talking to some of the natives on the stage crew. They all say your show stinx.”

Then he started to go into a heavy routine, but I shut him up in a hurry. I told him I was sick and tired of beating my brains out for an unapprecaitive audience, and if he knew anybody who could do a better job, he’d better start looking them up in a hurry. Because as far as I was concerned, he could take his show and shove it into the next rocket leaving for earth.

That scared hell out of him, believe me. He kept moaning.

“What can we do? Got an hour to go and nothing left. You got to save this turkey.”

I told him it was all his fault, which it was, and the best thing I could think of was for him to go out there and tell his three-eyed vaudeville lovers they could get their money back.

WELL, you know Sam Fogle, how he is when it comes to facing an audience. Full of big talk about how everybody else should go out and knock ’em dead, but when it comes to him, he’s scared to blow his nose in a public phone-booth.

So he begged me, I should go make the announcement. Of course I just laughed at him.

Then this Jim Hastings comes up and says he’ll do it. Which is okay by Fogle.

And out he goes, only he double-crosses me. Flo doesn’t make any announcement. Instead, he starts going into his act. Of all the hammy tricks you ever heard of, this is the worst! Goes right out there with this harmoniker of his and cuts loose. You never heard such a blat in your life.

Before I know it, he’s done two numbers and those creeps are beginning to stand up again. Then he waves into the wings and out comes Mary, of course, wearing her glasses yet because she’s in such a hurry she forgot to take them off.

Know what she looked like, she looked like one of those Martians with an eye missing. On account of the glasses frames giving her that big, frog-eyed look they all have. Maybe they thought she was a Martian, because they started to hiss.

Did I tell you hissing is the way they applaud up here? Well, it is. Talk about crazy!

What’s the sense of trying to explain it? Right away they go into one of their own routines. Never heard anything like it, never. Joe Miller stuff, with Martian switcheroos, yet.

Like, “Why does a cross a canal?” And “Why do mortcogleps wear red suspenders?”

Brother! I ask you!

And then Mary starts to sing, all that corny ballad stuff, and Jim slobbers into his mouth-organ or whatever, and they have to keep coming back for encores. Never heard such hissing. The crowd ends up by throwing vegetables at them—which is something almost never heard of, because vegetables are so hard to get up here. Like showering them with diamonds, yet. . . .

One hour and forty minutes they improvise out there, and when we ring down the curtain it's a madhouse. Fogle wants to go on tour right away, but he can't, because the show is sold out three months in advance, including sitting-room only. (That's right, kid, when they can't get standing room, some of them are willing to sit on the railings of the balcony.)

Martini, Terry King and Murphy are going back on the next flight. I guess Maxine is going, too—let me tell you one thing, kid, a dame has no gratitude, and listening to her talk you'd think I had personally loused up her act. So let her go.

Not me, though. If Sam Fogle thinks he can get away with this, he's space-happy. Nobody's putting on a Bobby Baxter Production without Bobby Baxter. He's not going to run a full show featuring just that broken-down harmoniker player and a corny girl singer. Even if I did say I was quitting, I got a contract.

So no matter what the papers say, don't you worry, kid. He can't do this to me. I'll sue!

Your ever-loving

DEAR WALLIE:

Just time for a line between shows.

That's right, I'm working again—you never thought they could kick Bobby Baxter out of show business, did you?

Of course you know they tried. It must of been in the papers. These damn space-lawyers are no good, wouldn't even issue an injunktion—or anything. So Fogle's going bigger than ever here.

Last I heard, he's sending-back to earth for a whole flock of radio performers, got agents out scouring the woods for these kind of acts—calls them "hill billys" or something. Bringing up an all girl accordion band yet, and something called Uncle Hezzy's Barn Dance, which you can imagine.

This dame Mary won't even give me a tumble any more. When I found out the score on trying to collect my back pay from Fogle, I went around to see her and turned on the old charm a little. But like I said before, dames are ungrateful. What a freeze I got! She's so stuck-up, ever since the Martian females started this fad of imitating her, wearing copies of her spectacels with three lenses yet.

All right, let them have their fun. It won't last. It'll be just like on earth—once you get a hick audience started, they get educated up to better things. In a year or two this corny stuff will be dead, and they'll be crying for real class. Which I can give them.

Believe me, I didn't have any trouble getting a job. All I had to do was shine around to one of the carnivals and they grabbed me.

It's nothing fancy, but I got to make enough for my return fare, and I've never been afraid of trouping, you know that kid. Outfit I'm with plays a lot of burgs out in the sticks, but that's good experience. Only this business of eight performances a day sure can get you down when you're not used to it.

If I can just stick it out for a year or so, like I said, I'll really show them a few things—Fogle, those smart guys on Variety, everybody!

Your ever-loving

Bobby

P.S.: I BEEN thinking it over. I just come from doing another performance, and maybe I better not plan on any year up here.

Look, kid, if you could send me the dough for my return fare, that's all I need. Once I get back to earth there's no problem—you know me, hottest act in the biz. I'll see that you get your money back right away. Just send it c/o General Delivery at lnport, because I'm heading out of this lousy carney tonight.

Between the two of us, I just can't take it any longer. Eight shows daily, yet! If you had to eat eight gotch a day, you'd know what I mean.

I Like Blondes

*of course, it’s all a matter of taste,*nothing more. It’s a weakness with me, I suppose. My friends have their own opinions: some are partial to brunettes or redheads, and I suppose that’s all right. I certainly don’t criticize them in the least.

But blondes are my favorites. Tall ones, short ones, fat ones, thin ones, brilliant ones, dumb ones—all sorts, sizes, shapes and nationalities. Oh, I’ve heard all the objections: their skin ages faster, they have peculiar personalities, they’re giddy and mercenary and conceited. None of which bothers me a bit, even if it’s true. I like blondes for their special qualities and I’m not alone in my weakness. I notice Marilyn Monroe hasn’t done too badly in general favor. Nor Grace Kelly.

Enough of this; after all, I’m not apologizing. What I do is my own business. And if I wanted to stand on the corner of Reed and Temple at 8 o’clock at night and pick up a blonde, I owed no apologies to anyone.

Perhaps I was a bit obvious and over dressed for the occasion. Perhaps I shouldn’t have winked, either. But that’s a matter of opinion, too, isn’t it?

I have mine. Other people have theirs. And if the tall girl with the page-boy cut chose to give me a dirty look and murmur, “Disgusting old man,” that was her affair. I’m used to such reactions, and it didn’t bother me a bit.

A couple of cute young things in blue-jeans came sauntering along. Both of them had hair like Minnesota wheat, and I judged they were sisters. Not for me, though. Too young. You get into trouble that way, and I didn’t want trouble.

It was a nice, warm late spring evening. Lots of couples out walking. I noticed one blonde in particular—she was with a sailor, I recall—and I remember thinking to myself that she had the most luscious calves I've ever seen. But she was with a sailor. And there was one with a child and one with a party of stenographers out on the town for a night, and one I almost spoke to, until her boyfriend came up suddenly after parking the car.

Oh, it was exasperating, I can tell you! It was beginning to seem as though everybody had his blonde but me. Sometimes it's like that for weeks, bill I'm philosophical about such things.

I glanced up at the clock, around nine, and concluded that I'd best be on my way. I might be a "disgusting old man" but I know a trick or two. Blondes are where you find them.

Right now, I knew, the best place to find them would be over at Dreamway. Sure, it's a clime-a-dance hall. But there's no law against that.

There was no law against my walking in and standing there at the back before I bought tickets. There was no law to prevent me from looking, from sorting out and selecting.

Ordinarily, I didn't much care for these public dance halls. The so-called "music" hurts my ears, and my sensibilities are apt to be offended by the spectacle of dancing itself. There is a vulgar sexual connotation which dismays me, but I suppose it's all a part of the game.

Dreamway was crowded tonight. The "operators" were out in force; filling-station attendants with long sideburns, middle-aged dandies incongruous in youthfully-styled "sharp" suits, wistful little Filipinos and lonesome servicemen on leave. And mixing and mingling with them, the girls.

Those girls, those hostesses! Where did they get their dresses—the crimson dayglow gowns, the orange and cerise abominations, the lowcut black atrocities, the fuchsia horrors? And who did their hair—poodle-cuts and pony-cuts and tight ringlets and loose Maenad swirls? The garish, slashing red-and-white makeup, the dangling, bangling cheap jewelry gave the effect of pink ribbons tied to the horns of a prize heifer.

And yet, there were some prize heifers here. I don’t mean to be crude in the least; merely honest. Here in the reeking cheap-perfume-deodorant-cigarette-smoke-talcum scented mist of music and minglement, strange beauty blossomed.

Poor poetry? Rich truth! I saw a tall girl with the body of a queen, whose eyes held true to a faroff dream. She was only a brunette, of course, but I’m not one to adhere to blind prejudice. There was a redhead whose dancing was stiff and stately; she held her body like a white candle surmounted by a scarlet flame. And there was a blonde.

Yes, there was a blonde! Quite young, a bit too babyishly plump, and obviously a prey to fatigue, but she had what I was looking for. The true, fairhaired type, bred blondely to the bone. If there’s one thing I can’t stand, it’s a fake blonde. Dyed hair, or the partial blonde who becomes a “brownette” in her late twenties. I’ve been fooled by them before, and I know.

But this was a real blonde, a harvest goddess. I watched her as she swept, in unutterable boredom, around the floor. Her dancing-partner was a clod; visiting rancher, I’d guess. Expensively dressed, but with that telltale red neck rising out of the white collar of his shirt. Yes—and unless my eyes deceived me, he was chewing on a toothpick as he danced!

I made my decision. This was it. I went up and bought myself three dollars’ worth of tickets. Then I waited for the number to end.

They play short numbers at Dreamway. of course. In about a minute the clamor ceased. My blonde was standing on the edge of the floor. The rancher broke away, apparently determined to buy more tickets.

I walked over to her, displayed my handful. “Dance?” I asked. She nodded, scarcely looking at me. She was tired. She wore an emerald green gown, low-cut and sleeveless. There were freckles on her plump arms and —intriguingly enough—on her shoulders and down the neckline to the V. Her eyes seemed green, but that was probably the dress. No doubt they were actually gray.

The music started. Now I may have given the impression that, since I dislike dance halls and dancing, I am not particularly adept at the ballet of the ballroom. In all modesty, this is far from the case. I have made it my business to become an expert dancer. I find it inevitably to be of help to me in establishing contacts.

Tonight was no exception.

We weren't out on the floor thirty seconds before she glanced up and looked at me—really looked at me, for the first time.

"Gee. you're a good dancer!"

That "Gee" was all I needed. Together with her rather naive tone of voice, it gave me an immediate insight into her character and background. Small-town girl, probably, who quit school and came to the city. Perhaps she came with some man. If not, she met one shortly after her arrival. It ended badly, of course. Maybe she took a job in a restaurant or a store. And then she met another man, and the dance-hall seemed easier. So here she was.

Quite a lot to adduce from a single exclamation? Yes. but then I've met so many blondes in similar situations, and the story is always the same: that is, if they're the "Gee!" type. And I'm not deprecatory in the least. I happen to like the "Gee!" type best of all.

She could tell that I liked her, of course, from the way I danced. I almost anticipated her next remark. "There's life in the old boy yet."

I smiled, not at all resentful. "I'm younger than I look." I winked. "You know, I could dance with you all night—and something tells me that's not a bad idea."

"You flatter me." But she looked worried. That was the whole idea. She believed me.

I gave her just under a minute for the thought to take hold. Then I pulled the switch. "I wouldn't fool you," I told her. "I'm like all the other men you meet—just lonely. I'm not going to ask if we couldn't go somewhere and talk, because I know the answer. You're paid to dance. But I happen to know that if I buy, say, ten dollars' more worth of tickets, you can get off. And we can sneak off for a few drinks." I winked again. "Sitting down."

"Well, I don't know——"

"Of course you don't. But I do. Look, if you have any worries about me pulling a fast one, I'm old enough to be your grandfather."

It was obvious, and she considered it. She also considered the delightful prospect of sitting down. "I guess it's OK." she murmured. "Shall we go, Mr.——?"

"Beers." I said.

"What?" She checked a giggle. "Not really."

"Really. Beers is the name. Not the drink. You can drink anything you like, Miss——"

"Shirley Collins." Now the giggle came out. "Sort of a coincidence, don't you think? Beers and Collins."

"Come on. what are we waiting for?"

I steered her over to the edge of the floor, went to buy my tickets and made the necessary arrangements with the manager while she got her coat. It cost me an extra five for his tip. but I didn't begrudge hi in the money. We all have to eat, you know.

She didn't look bad at all, once she had some of that mascara washed off. Her eyes were gray, I discovered. And her arms were soft and rounded. I escorted her quite gallantly to the bar down the street and hung up her coat when we found a nice, quiet back booth.

The waitress was one of those scrawny, sallow-laced brunettes. She wore slacks and chewed gum: I'd never consider her for a moment. But she served her purpose—drinks, rather. I ordered rye on the rocks and she brought the two glasses.

I paid her, not forgetting to tip, because I'd be wanting prompt service. She snapped her gum in friendly acknowledgement and left us alone. I pushed my drink over to Shirley.

"What's the matter?" she said.

"Nothing. It's just that I don't indulge."

"Now, wait a minute, Mr. Beers. You aren't trying to get a girl loaded, are you?"

"My dear young lady—please!" I sounded for all the world like an elderly college professor admonishing his class. "You don't have to drink if you don't want to."

"Oh. that's OK. Only you know, a girl has to be careful." The way she downed the first rye belied her words. She toyed with the second glass. "Say, this can't be much fun for you, sitting and watching me drink."

"If you only knew," I said. "Didn't I tell you I was lonely? And wanted someone to talk to?"

"A girl hears some funny lines, but I guess you're on the level. What'll we talk about?"

That was an easy one. "You." From now on I didn't even need to think about what I was saying. Everything proceeded automatically. My mind was free to consider her blondeness, her ripe and ample richness. Why should anyone insist on the presence of a brain in a body like that?

I certainly didn't. I was content to let her ramble on, ordering drinks for her whenever the glass was empty. "And honest, you have no idea what that grind does to your feet——"

"Excuse me a moment," I said. "I must say hello to an old friend."

I walked down to the other end of the bar. He had just come in and was standing there with a lovely Negro girl. Ordinarily I wouldn't have known him, but something about the way he kept staring at her tipped me off.

"Hello," I said, softly. "See you're up to your old tricks."

"Look here!" He tried to appear arrogant, but he couldn't hide the fright. "I don't know you."

"Yes you do," I told him. "Yes you do." I pulled him away and put my mouth to his ear. When he heard what I had to say he laughed.

"Dirty trick, trying to scare me, but I forgive you. It's just that I didn't expect to see you here. Where you located?"

"Something called the Shane Apartments. And you?"

"Oh, I'm way outside town. How do you like her?" He nudged me and indicated his girl.

"Nice. But you know my weakness." We both laughed.

"Well," I concluded, "I won't disturb you any longer. I just wondered if you were making out all right."

"Perfectly. No trouble at all."

"Good," I said. "We've got to be extra careful these days, with all that cheap publicity going around."

"I know." He waved me along. "Best of luck."

"Same to you." I said, and walked back to the booth. I felt fine.

Shirley Collins felt fine, too. She'd ordered another drink during my absence. I paid and tipped the waitress.

"My, my!" the blonde gushed. "You certainly do throw your dough around."

"Money means nothing to me," I said. I fanned five twenties from the roll. "Here—have some."

"Why, Mr. Beers! I couldn't, really." She was positively drooling. "Go ahead," I urged. "Plenty more where that came from. I like to see you happy." So she took the money. They always do. And, if they're as high as Shirley was, their reactions are always the same.

"Gee, you're a nice old guy." She reached for my hand. "I've never met anyone quite like you. You know, kind and generous. And no passes, either."

"That's right." I drew my hand away. "No passes."

This really puzzled her. "I dunno, I can't figure you out, Mr. Beers. Say, by the way, where'd you get all this money?"

"Picked it up," I told her. "It's easy if you know how."

"Now you're kidding me. No fooling, what do you do for a living?"

"You'd be surprised." I smiled. "Actually, you might say I'm retired. I devote all my time to my hobbies."

"You mean, like books or paintings or something? Are you a collector?"

“That’s right. Come to think of it. maybe you’d like to get acquainted with my collection.”

She giggled. “Are you inviting me up to see your etchings?”

I went right along with the gag. “Certainly. You aren’t going to pretend that you won’t come, are you?”

“No. I’ll be glad to come.”

She put the five twenty-dollar bills in her purse and rose. “Let’s go, Pappy.”

I didn’t care for that “Pappy” stuff at all—hut she was such a luscious blonde. Even now, slightly tipsy, she was wholly delectable. What the young folks call “a real dish.”

A half-dozen stares knifed my back as we walked past the bar on our way outside. I knew what they were thinking. “Old dried-up fossil like that with a young girl. What’s the world coming to nowadays?”

Then, of course, they turned back to their drinks, because they really didn’t want to know what the world was coming to nowadays. Bombs can drop, saucers can fly, and still people will sit at bars and pass judgements between drinks. All of which suits me perfectly.

Shirley Collins suited me perfectly, too. at the moment. I had no difficulty finding a cab. or bundling her inside. “Shane Apartments,” I told the driver. Shirley snuggled up close to me.

I pulled away.

“What’s the matter. Pappy—don’t you like me?”

“Of course I do.”

“Then don’t act as if I was gonna bite you.”

“It’s not that. But I meant it when I said I had no—er—intentions along such lines.”

“Sure, I know.” She relaxed, perfectly content. “So I’ll settle for your etchings.”

We pulled up and I recognized the building. I gave the driver a ten-dollar bill and told him to keep the change.

“I can’t figure you out, Mr. Beers,” Shirley said—and meant it. “Way you toss that moola around.”

“Call it one last fling. I’m leaving town shortly.” I took her arm and we stepped into the lobby. The self-service elevator was empty. I pressed the button for the top floor. We rose slowly.

On the way up, Shirley sobered suddenly. She faced me and put her arms on my shoulders. “Look here, Mr. Beers. I just got to thinking. I saw a movie once anti—say, what I mean is, way you hand out dough and talking about leaving town and all—you aren’t sick, are you? I mean, you haven’t just come from the doctor and heard you’re gonna die front some disease?”

Her solicitude was touching, and I didn’t laugh. “Really,” I said, “I can assure you that your fears are groundless. I’m very much alive and expect to stay that way for a long time to come.”

“Good. Now I feel better. I like you, Mr. Beers.”

“I like you. too. Shirley.” I stepped back just in time to avoid a hug. The elevator halted and we got out. I led her down the hallway to the stairs.

“Oh, you have the penthouse!” she squealed. Now she was really excited.

“You go first.” I murmured.

She went first. At the top of the stairs she halted, puzzled. “But there’s a door here—it’s the roof or something.”

“Keep going,” I directed.

She stepped out on the rooftop and I followed. The door closed behind us, and everything was still.

Everything was still, with a midnight stillness. Everything was beautiful, with a midnight beauty. The dark body of the city stretched below us, wearing its neon necklaces, its bracelets and rings of incandescence. I’ve seen it many times from the air, many times from rooftops, and it’s always a thrilling spectacle to me. Where I come from things are different. Not that I’d ever care to trade—the city’s a nice place to visit but I wouldn’t want to live there.

I stared, and the blonde stared. But she wasn't staring at the streets below.

I followed her gaze to the shadow of the building abutment, to the deep shadows where something shimmered roundly and iridescently in the darkness. It was completely out of sight from the surrounding buildings, and it couldn't be seen at first glance from the doorway here on the roof. But she saw it now, and she said, "Gee!"

She said, "Gee! Mr. Beers—look at that!"

I looked.

"What is it, a plane? Or—could it be one of those saucer things?"

I looked.

"Mr. Beers, what's the matter, you aren't even surprised."

I looked.

"You—you knew about this?"

"Yes. It's mine."

"Yours? A saucer? But it can't be, you're a man and——"

I shook my head slowly. "Not exactly, Shirley. I don't really look like this, you know. Not where I came from." I gestured down toward the tired flesh. "I borrowed this from Ril."

"Ril?"

"Yes. He's one of my friends. He collects, too. We all collect, you know. It's our hobby. We come to Earth and collect."

I couldn't read her face, because its I came close she drew away.

"Ril has a rather curious hobby, in a way. He collects nothing but *D'*s. You should see his trophy room! He has a Bronson, three Bakers and a Beers—that's the body I'm using now. Its name was Ambrose Beers, I believe; he picked it up in Mexico a long time ago."

"You're crazy!" Shirley whispered, but she listened as I went on. Listened, and drew away.

"My friend Kor has a collection of people of all nations. Mar you saw in the tavern a while ago—Melanesian types are his hobby. Many of us come here quite often, you know, and in spite of the recent publicity and the danger, it’s an exhilarating pastime.” I was quite close to her now, and she didn’t step back any further. She couldn’t—she stood on the edge of the roof.

“Now, take Vis,” I said. “Vis collects redheads, nothing but redheads. He has a magnificent grouping, all of them stuffed. Ril doesn’t stuff his specimens at all—that’s why we can use them for our trips. Oh. it’s a fascinating business, I can tell you! Ril keeps them in preservative tanks and Vis stuffs them—his redheads. I mean. Now as for me, I collect blondes.”

Her eyes were wide, and she could scarcely get the words out for panting. “You’re—going to—stuff me?”

I had to chuckle. “Not at all, dear. Set your mind at rest. I neither stuff nor preserve. I collect for different reasons entirely.” She edged sideways, toward the iridescent bubble. There was nowhere else to go, and I followed closely, closely.

“You’re—fooling me——” she gasped.

“No. Oh. my friends think I have peculiar ideas, but I enjoy it this way. There’s nothing like a blonde, as far as I’m concerned. And I ought to know. I’ve collected over a hundred, so far, since I started. You are number one hundred and three.”

I didn’t have to do anything. She fainted, and I caught her, and that made things just perfect—no need to make a mess on the roof. I merely carried her right into the ship and we were off in a moment.

Of course people would remember the old man who picked up Shirley Collins in the dance hall, and I’d left a trail of money all over town. There’d be an investigation and all that. There almost always was an investigation.

Hut that didn’t bother me. Ril has many bodies for use besides old Beers, whoever he might have been. Next time I’d try a younger man. Variety is the spice of life.

Yes. it was a very pleasant evening. I sang to myself almost all the way back. It had been good sport, and the best was yet to come.

Hut then, I like blondes. They can laugh at me all they please—I'll take a blonde any time. As I say, it's a matter of taste.

And blondes are simply delicious.

You Got To Have Brains

The mysterious Mr. Goofy was building something. An A-bomb? A spaceship? Stakowsky knew—and he hadn't a brain in his head.

Few indeed are the science fantasy writers who can swing on a golden trapeze—and with miraculous ease—from the Pleiades and the blue infinite to flop-houses and murder in a gin mill setting. When the amazing Robert Bloch is determined to terrify us as he did in THE SCARF and YOURS TRULY, JACK THE RIPPER we can only lean back in awe and let his incredible brilliance speak for itself. A fantasy chiller this, by a top-echelon craftsman in the genre.

MUST HAVE been about a year ago, give or take a month, when Mr. Goofy first showed up here on the street.

We get all kinds here, you know—thousands of bums and winos floating in and out every day of the year. Nobody knows where they come from and nobody cares where they go. They sleep in flophouses, sleep in bars, and in doorways—sleep right out in the gutter if you let 'em. Just so's they get their kicks. Wine jags, shot-an'-beers, canned heat, reefers—there was one guy, he used to go around and bust up thermometers and drink the juice, so help me!

When you work behind the bar, like me, you get so you hardly notice people any more. But this Mr. Goofy was different.

He come in one night in winter, and the joint was almost empty. Most of the regulars, right after New Year's, they get themselves jugged and do ninety. Keeps 'em out of the cold.

So it was quiet when Mr. Goofy showed up, around supper time. He didn't come to the bar, even though he was all alone. He headed straight for a back booth, plunks down, and asks Ferd for a couple of hamburgers. That's when I noticed him.

What's so screwy about that? Well, it's because he was lugging about ten or fifteen pounds of scrap metal with him, that's why. He banged it down in the booth alongside him and sat there with his hands held over it like he was one of them guards at Fort Knock or wherever.

I mean, he had all this here dirty scrap metal—tin and steel and twisted old engine parts covered with mud. He must have dug it out of the dumps around Canal Street, someplace like that. So when I got a chance I come down to this end of the bar and looked this character over. He sure was a sad one.

He was only about five feet high and weighed about a hunnerd pounds, just a little dried-up futz of a guy. He had a kind of a bald head and he wore old twisted-up glasses with the earpieces all bent, and he had trouble with the hamburgers on account of his false choppers. He was dressed in them War Surplus things—leftovers from World War I, yet. And a cap.

Go out on the street right now and you'll see plenty more just like him, but Mr. Goofy was different. Because he was clean. Sure, he looked beat-up, but even his old duds was neat.

Another thing. While he waited for the hamburgers he kept writing stuff. He had this here pencil and notebook out and he was scribbling away for dear life. I got the idea he was figuring out some kind of arithametics.

Well, I was all set to ask him the score when somebody come in and I got busy. It happens that way; next thing I know the whole place was crowded and I forgot all about Mr. Goofy for maybe two hours. Then I happen to look over and by gawd if he ain't still sitting there, with that pencil going like crazy!

Only by this time the old juke is blasting, and he kind of frowns and takes his time like he didn't care for music but was, you know, concentrated on his figures, like.

He sees me watching him and wiggles his fingers like so, and I went over there and he says, "Pardon me—but could you lower the volume of that instrument?"

Just like that he says it, with a kind of funny accent I can't place. But real polite and fancy for a foreigner.

So I says, "Sure, I'll switch it down a little." I went over and fiddled with the control to cut it down, like we do late at night.

But just then Stakowsky come up to me. This Stakowsky used to be a wheel on the street—owned two-three flophouses and fleabag hotels, and be comes in regular to get loaded. He was kind of mean, but a good spender.

Well, Stakowsky come up and he stuck his big red face over the bar and yelled. "Whassa big idea, Jack? I puts in my nickel, I wanna hear my piece. You wanna busted nose or something?"

Like I say, he was a mean type.

I didn't know right off what to tell him, but it turned out I didn't have to tell him nothing. Because the little guy in the booth stood up and he tapped Stakowsky on the shoulder and said, real quiet, "Pardon me, but it was I who requested that the music be made softer."

Stakowsky turned around and he said, "Yeah? And who in hell you think you are—somebody?"

The little guy said, "You know me. I rented the top of the loft from you yesterday."

Stakowsky looks at him again and then he says, "Awright. So you rent. So you pay a month advance. Awright. But that ain't got to do with how I play music. I want it should be turned up, so me and my friends can hear it good."

By this time the number is over and half the bar has come down to get in on the deal. They was all standing around waiting for the next pitch.

The little guy says, “You don’t understand, Mr. Stakowsky. It happens I am doing some very important work and require freedom from distraction.”

I bet Stakowsky never heard no two-dollar words before. He got redder and redder and at last he says, “You don’t understand so good, neither. You wanna figure, go by your loft. Now I turn up the music. Are you gonna try and stop me?” And he takes a swipe at the little futz with his fist.

Little guy never batted an eye. He just sort of ducked, and when he come up again he had a shiv in his hand. But it wasn’t no regular shiv, and it wasn’t nothing he found in no junk-heap.

This one was about a foot long, and sharp. The blade was sharp and the tip was sharp, and the little guy didn’t look like he was just gonna give Stakowsky a shave with it.

Stakowsky, he didn’t think so either. He whitened up fast and backed away to the bar and he says, “All right, all right,” over and over again.

It happened all in a minute, and then the knife was gone and the little guy picked up his scrap metal and walked out without even looking back once.

Then everybody was hollering, and I poured Stakowsky a fast double, and then another. Of course he made off like he hadn’t been scared and he talked plenty loud—but we all knew.

“Goofy,” he says. “That’s who he is. Mister Goofy. Sure, he rents from me. You know, by the Palace Rooms, where I live. He rents the top—a great big loft up there. Comes yesterday, a month rent in advance he pays too. I tell him, ’Mister, you’re goofy. What do you want with such a big empty loft? A loft ain’t no good in winter, unless you want to freeze. Why you don’t take a nice warm room downstairs by the steam heat?’ But no, he wants the loft, and I should put up a cot for him. So I do, and he moves in last night.”

Stakowsky got red in the face. “All day today that Mr. Goofy, he’s bringing up his crazy outfits. Iron and busted machinery, stuff like that. I ask him what he’s doing and he says he’s building. I ask him what he’s building and he says—well, he just don’t say. You saw how he acted tonight? Now you know. He’s goofy in the head. I ain’t afraid of no guys, but those crazy ones you got to watch out for. Lofts and machinery and knives—you ever hear anything like that Mr. Goofy?"

So that's how he got his name. And I remembered him. One of the reasons was, I was staying at the Palace Rooms myself. Not in the flops, but a nice place on the third floor, right next to Stakowsky's room. And right upstairs from us was this loft. An attic, like. I never went up there, but there was a stairs in back.

The next couple of days I kept my eyes open, figuring on seeing Mr. Goofy again. But I didn't. All I did was hear him. Nights, he kept banging and pounding away, him and his scrap metal or whatever it was, and he moved stuff across the floor. Me, I'm a pretty sound sleeper and Stakowsky was always loaded when he turned in, so it didn't bother him neither. But Mr. Goofy never seemed to sleep. He was always working up there. And on what?

I couldn't figure it out. Day after day he'd come in and out with some more metal. I don't know where he got it all, but he must have lugged up a couple of thousand pounds, ten or fifteen each trip. It got to bothering me because it was the sort of a mystery you feel you've got to know more about.

Next time I saw him was when he started coming into the place regular, to eat. And always he had the pencil and notebook with him. He took the same booth every night—and nobody bothered him with loud music after the story got around about him and his shiv.

He'd just sit there and figure and mumble to himself and walk out again, and pretty soon they were making up all kinds of stories about the guy.

Some said he was a Red on account of that accent, you know, and he was building one of them there atomic bombs. One of the winos says no, he passed the place one night about four ayem and he heard a big clank like machinery working. He figured Mr. Goofy was a counterfitter. Which was the kind of crazy idea you'd expect from a wino.

Anyways, the closest anybody come was Manny Schreiber from the hock shop, and lie guessed Goofy was a inventor and maybe he was building a rowbot. You know, a rowbot, like in these scientist magazines. Mechanical men, they run by machinery.

One day, about an hour before I went on shift, I was sitting in my room when Stakowsky knocked on the door. “Come on,” he says. “Mr. Goofy just went out. I’m gonna take a look around up there.”

Well, I didn’t care one way or the other. Stakowsky, he was the landlord, and I figured he had a right. So we sneaked up and he used his key and we went inside the loft.

It was a big barn of a place with a cot in the comer. Next to the cot was a table with a lot of notes piled up, and maybe twenty-five or thirty books. Foreign books they were, and I couldn’t make out the names. In the other corners there were piles of scrap metal and what looked like a bunch of old radio sets from a repair shop.

And in the center of the room was this machine. At least, it looked like a machine, even though it must have been thirty feet long. It was higher than my head, too. And there was a door in it, and you could get inside the machinery that was all tangled up on the sides and sit down in a chair. In front of the chair was a big board with a lot of switches on it.

And everywhere was gears and pistons and coils and even glass tubes. Where he picked up all that stuff, I dunno. But he’d patched it all together somehow and when you looked at it—it made sense.

I mean, you could tell the machine would do something, if you could only figure out what.

Stakowsky looked at me and I looked at him and we both looked at the machine.

“That Mr. Goofy!” says Stakowsky. “He does all this in a month. You know something, Jack?”

“What?” I says.

“You tell anybody else and I’ll kill you. But I’m scared to even come near Mr. Goofy. This machine of his, I don’t like it. Tomorrow his month is up. I’m going to tell him he should move. Get out. I don’t want crazy people around here.”

"But how'll he move this thing out?"

"I don't care how. Tomorrow he gets the word. And I'm going to have Lippy and Stan and the boys here. He don't pull no knife on me again. Out he goes."

We went downstairs and I went to work. All night long I tried to figure that machine of his. There wasn't much else to do, because there was a real blizzard going and nobody came in.

I kept remembering the way the machine looked. It had a sort of framework running around the outside, and if it got covered over with some metal it would be like a submarine or one of them rockets. And there was a part inside, where a big glass globe connected up to some wires leading to the switchboard, or whatever it was.

And a guy could sit in there. It all made some kind of crazy sense.

I sat there, thinking it over, until along about midnight. Then Mr. Goofy came in.

This time he didn't head for his booth. He come right up to the bar and sat down on a stool. His face was red, and he brushed snow off his coat. But he looked happy.

"Do you have any decent brandy?" he asked.

"I think so," I told him. I found a bottle and opened it up.

"Will you be good enough to have a drink with me?"

"Sure, thanks." I looked at him. "Celebrating?"

"That's right," says Mr. Goofy. "This is a great occasion. My work is finished. Tonight I put on the sheaths. Now I am almost ready to demonstrate."

"Demonstrate what?"

Well, he dummied up on me right away. I poured him another drink and another, and he just sat there grinning. Then he sort of loosened up. That brandy was plenty powerful.

"Look," he says. "I will tell you all about it. You have been kind to me, and I can trust you. Besides, k is good to share a moment of triumph."

He says, “So long I have worked, but soon they will not laugh at me any more. Soon the smart Americans, the men over here who call themselves Professors, will take note of my work. They did not believe me when I offered to show them my plans. They would not accept my basic theory. But I knew I was right. I knew I could do it. Part of it must be mechanical, yes. But the most important part is the mind itself. You know what I told them? To do this, and to do it right, you’ve got to have brains.”

He sort of chuckled, and poured another drink. “Yes. That is the whole secret. More than anything else, you need brains. Not mechanical formula alone. But when I spoke of harnessing the mind, powering it with mental energy rather than physical, they laughed. Now we’ll see.”

I bought myself a drink, and I guess he realized I wasn’t in on the pitch, because he says, “You don’t understand, do you?”

I shook my head.

“What would you say, my friend, if I told you I have just successfully completed the construction of the first practical spaceship?”

Oh-oh, I thought to myself. Mr. Goofy!

“But not a model, not a theory in metal—an actual, practical machine for travel to the moon?”

Mr. Goofy and his knife, I thought. Making a crazy thing out of old scrap iron. Mr. Goofy!

“If I wish, I can go tonight,” he said. “Or tomorrow. Any time. No astronomy. No calculus. Mental energy is the secret. Harness the machinery to a human brain and it will be guided automatically to its destination in a moment, if properly controlled. That’s all it takes—a single instant. Long enough to direct the potential energy of the cortex.”

Maybe you think it’s funny the way I can remember all those big words, but I’ll never forget anything Mr. Goofy said.

And he told me, “Who has ever estimated the power of the human brain—its unexploited capacity for performance? Using the machine for autohypnosis, the brain is capable of tremendous effort. The electrical impulses can be stepped up, magnified ten millionfold. Atomic energy is insignificant in comparison. Now do you see what I have achieved?"

I thought about it for a minute or so—him sitting there all steamed up over his dizzy junk-heap. Then I remembered what was happening to him tomorrow.

I just didn't have the heart to let him go on and on about how his life-work was realized, and how he'd be famous in Europe and America and he'd reach the moon and all that crud. I didn't have the heart. He was so little and so whacky. Mr. Goofy!

So I says, "Look, I got to tell you something. Stakowsky, he's bouncing you out tomorrow. That's right. He's gonna kick you and your machine into the street. He says he can't stand it around."

"Machine?" says Mr. Goofy. "What does he know of my machine?"

Well, I had to tell him then.

I had to. About how we went upstairs and looked.

"Before the sheath was on, you saw?" he asked.

"That's the way it was," I told him. "I saw it, and so did Stakowsky. And he'll kick you out."

"But he cannot! I mean, I chose this spot carefully, so I could work unobserved. I need privacy. And I cannot move the ship now. I must bring people to see it when I make the announcement. I must make the special arrangements for the tests. It is a very delicate matter. Doesn't he understand? He'll be famous, too, because of what happened in his miserable hole of a place—"

"He's probably famous tonight," I said. "I'll bet he's down the street somewheres right now, blabbing about you and your machine, and how he's gonna toss you out." Mr. Goofy looked so sad I tried to make a joke. "What's the matter with you? You say yourself it works by brain-power. So use your brain and move it someplace else. Huh?"

He looked even sadder. "Don't you realize it is designed only for space-travel? And properly, my brain must be free to act as the control agent. Still, you are right about that man. He is a wicked person, and he hates me. I must do something. I wonder if—" Then you know what he does, this Mr. Goofy? He whips out his pencil and notebook and starts figuring. Just sits there and scribbles away. And he says, "Yes, it is possible. Change the wires leading to the controls. It is only a matter of a few moments. And what better proof could I ask than an actual demonstration? Yes. It is fated to be this way. Good."

Then he stood up and stuck out his mitt. "Goodbye, Jack," he says. "And thank you for your suggestion."

"What suggestion?"

But he doesn't answer me, and then he's out the door and gone.

I closed up the joint about one-thirty. The boss wasn't around and I figured what the hell, it was a blizzard.

There was nobody out on the street this time of night, not with that wind off the lake and the snow coming down about a foot a minute. I couldn't see in front of my face.

I crossed the street in front of the Palace Rooms—it must have been quarter to two or thereabouts—and all of a sudden it happened.

Whoom!

Like that it goes, a big loud blast you can hear even over the wind and the blizzard. On account of the snow being so thick I couldn't see nothing. But let me tell you, I sure heard it.

At first I thought maybe it was some kind of explosion, so I quick-run across to the Palace and up the stairs. All the winos in the flops was asleep—those guys, they get a jag on and they'll sleep even if you set fire to the mattress. But I had to find out if anything was wrong.

I didn't smell no smoke and my room was okay, and it was all quiet in the hall. Except that the back door leading to the attic was open, and the air was cold.

Right away I figured maybe Mr. Goofy had pulled something off, so I run up the stairs. And I saw it.

Mr. Goofy was gone. The junk was still scattered all over the room, but he'd burned all his notes and he was gone. The great big machine, or space-ship, or whatever it was—that was gone, too.

How'd he get it out of the room and where did he take it? You can search me, brother.

All I know is there was a big charred spot burned away in the center of the floor where the machine had stood. And right above there was a big round hole punched smack through the roof of the loft.

So help me, I just stood there. What else could I do? Mr. Goofy said he built a space-ship that could take him to the moon. He said he could go there in a flash, just like that. He said all it took was brains.

And what do I know about this here auto-hypnosis deal, or whatever he called it, and about electricity-energy, and force-fields, and all that stuff?

He was gone. The machine or ship was gone. And there was this awful hole in the roof. That's all I knew.

Maybe Stakowsky would know the rest. It was worth a try, anyhow. So I run down to Stakowsky's room.

After that, things didn't go so good.

The cops started to push me around when they got there, and if it hadn't been for my boss putting the old pressure on, they'd have given me a real rough time. But they could see I was sorta like out of my head—and I was, too, for about a week.

I kept yelling about this Mr. Goofy and his crazy invention and his big knife and his trip to the moon, and it didn't make no sense to the cops. Of course, nothing ever made any sense to them, and they had to drop the whole case—hush it up. The whole thing was too screwy to ever let leak out.

Anyhow, I felt rugged until I moved out of the Palace Rooms and got back to work. Now I scarcely ever think about Mr. Goofy any more, or Stakowsky—or the whole cockeyed mess.

I don't like to think about the mess.

The mess was when I ran down the stairs that night and looked for Stakowsky in his room. He was there all right but he didn't care about Goofy or the trip to the moon or the hole in his loft roof, either.

Because he was very, very dead.

And Mr. Goofy's foot-long knife was laying right next to him on the bed. So that part was easy to figure out. Mr. Goofy come right back there from the tavern, and he killed him.

But after that?

After that, your guess is as good as mine. The cops never found out a bit —not even Mr. Goofy's real name, or where he come from, or where he got this here theory about space-ships and power to run them.

Did he really have a invention that would take him to the moon? Could he change some wires and controls and just scoot off through the roof with his mental energy hooked up?

Nobody knows. Nobody ever will know. But I can tell you this.

There was a mess, one awful mess, in Stakowsky's room. Mr. Goofy must have taken his knife and gone to work on Stakowsky's head. There was nothing left on top but a big round hole, and it was empty.

Stakowsky's head was empty.

Mr. Goofy took out what was inside and fixed his machine and went to the moon.

That's all.

Like Mr. Goofy says, you got to have brains . . .

Dead-End Doctor

It’s all really very simple—if you cannot change with the times, just change the times!

THE LAST psychiatrist on Earth sat alone in a room. There was a knock on the door.

“Come in,” he said.

A tall robot entered, the electronic beam of its single eye piercing the gloom and focusing on the psychiatrist’s face.

“Dr. Anson,” the robot said, “the rent is due today. Pay me.” Dr. Howard Anson blinked. He did not like the harsh light, nor the harsh voice, nor the harsh meaning of the message. As he rose, he attempted to conceal his inner reactions with a bland smile, then remembered that his facial expression meant nothing to the robot.

That was precisely the trouble with the damned things, he told himself; you couldn’t use psychology on them.

“Sixty tokens,” the robot chanted, and rolled across the room toward him.

“But—” Dr. Hanson hesitated, then took the plunge. “But I haven’t got sixty tokens at the moment. I told the manager yesterday. If you’ll only give me a little time, a slight extension of credit—”

“Sixty tokens,” the robot repeated, as if totally unmindful of I lie interruption, which, Dr. Anson assured himself, was exactly the case. The robot was unmindful. It did not react to unpredictable factors; that was not its function. The robot didn’t set the rental figures in this office building and had no power to make decisions regarding credit. It was built to collect the rent, nothing more.

But that was enough. More than enough.

THE ROBOT rolled closer. Its arms rose and the hooklike terminals slid back the panels in its chest to reveal a row of pushbuttons and a thin, narrow slot.

“The rent is due,” repeated the robot. “Please deposit the tokens in the slot.”

Anson sighed. “Very well,” he said. He walked over to his desk, opened a drawer and scooped out half a dozen shiny disks.

He slipped the disks into the slot. They landed inside the robot’s cylindrical belly with a series of dull plops. Evidently the robot had been making the rounds of the building all day; it sounded more than half full.

For a wild moment, Dr. Anson wondered what would happen if he kidnaped the robot and emptied its cashbox. His own medical specialty was psychiatry and neuro-surgery, and he was none too certain of a robot’s anatomical structure, but he felt sure he could fool around until he located the jackpot. He visualized himself standing before the operating table, under the bright lights. “Scalpel. . . . forceps . . . blowtorch . . .”

But that was unthinkable. Nobody had ever dared to rob a robot. Nobody ever robbed anything or anyone today, which was part of the reason Dr. Anson couldn’t pay his rent on time.

Still, he had paid it. The robot’s terminals were punching pushbuttons in its chest and now its mouth opened. “Here is your receipt,” it said and a pink slip slid out from its mouth like a paper tongue.

Anson accepted the slip and the mouth said, “Thank you.”

The terminals closed the chest-panels, the electronic beam swept the corners as the wheels turned, and the robot rolled out of the room and down the corridor.

Anson closed the door and mopped his brow.

So far, so good. But what would happen when the robot reached the manager? He'd open his walking cash register and discover Anson's six ten-token disks. Being human, he'd recognize them for what they were—counterfeit.

Dr. Anson shuddered. To think that it had come to this, a reputable psychiatrist committing a crime!

He considered the irony. In a world totally devoid of anti-social activity, there were no anti-social tendencies which required the services of psychiatry. And that was why he, as the last living psychiatrist, had to resort to antisocial activity in order to survive.

Probably it was only his knowledge of anti-social behavior, in the abstract, which enabled him to depart from the norm and indulge in such actions in the concrete.

Well, he was in the concrete now and it would harden fast—unless something happened. At best, his deception would give him a few days' grace. After that, he could face only disgrace.

ANSON shook his head and sat down behind the desk. Maybe this was the beginning, he told himself. First counterfeiting and fraud, then robbery and embezzlement, then rape and murder. Who could say where it would all end?

"Physician, heal thyself," he 32 murmured and glanced with distaste at the dust-covered couch, where no patient reposed; where, indeed, no patient had ever reposed since he'd opened his office almost a year ago.

It had been a mistake, he realized. A big mistake ever to listen to his father and—

The visio lit up and the audio hummed. Anson turned and confronted a gigantic face. The gigantic face let out a gigantic roar, almost shattering the screen.

"I'm on my way up, Doctor!" the face bellowed. "Don't try to sneak out! I'm going to break your neck with my bare hands!"

For a few seconds Anson sat there in his chair, too numb to move. Then the full import of what he had seen and heard reached him. The manager was coming to kill him!

"Hooray!" he said under his breath and smiled. It was almost too good to be true. After all this time, at last, somebody was breaking loose. A badly disturbed personality, a potential killer, was on his way up—he was finally going to get himself a patient. If he could treat him before being murdered, that is.

Tingling with excitement, Anson fumbled around in his files. Now where in thunder was that equipment for the Rorschach Test? Yes, and the Porteus Maze and—

The manager strode into the room without knocking. Anson looked up, ready to counter the first blast of aggression with a steely professional stare.

But the manager was smiling.

"Sorry I blew up that way," he said. "Guess I owe you an apology."

"What?"

"When I found those counterfeit tokens, something just seemed to snap for a moment," the manager explained. "You know how it is."

"Yes, I do," said Anson eagerly. "I understand quite well. And it's nothing to be ashamed of. I'm sure that with your cooperation, we can get to the roots of the trauma. Now if you'll just relax on the couch over there —"

THE RED-FACED little man continued to smile, but his voice was brusque. "Nonsense! I don't need any of that. Before I came up here, I stopped in at Dr. Peabody's office, down on the sixth floor. Great little endocrinologist, that guy. Gave me some kind of a shot that fixed me up in a trice. That's three times faster than a jiffy, you know."

"I don't know," Anson answered vaguely. "Endocrinology isn't my field."

"Well, it should be. It's the only field in medicine that really amounts to anything nowadays.

Except for diagnosis and surgery, of course. Those gland-handers can do anything. Shots for when you feel depressed, shots for when you're afraid, shots for when you get excited, or mad, the way I was. Boy, I feel great now. At peace with the world!"

"But it won't last. Sooner or later, you'll get angry again."

"So I'll get another shot," the manager replied. "Everybody does."

"That's not a solution. You're merely treating the symptom, not the basic cause." Anson rose and stepped forward. "You're under a great deal of tension. I suspect it goes back to early childhood. Did you ever suffer from enuresis?"

"It's my turn to ask questions. What about those fake tokens you tried to palm off on me?"

"Why, it was all a joke. I thought if you could give me a few more days to dig up—"

"I'm giving you just five minutes to dig down," the manager said, smiling pleasantly but firmly. "You ought to know that you can't pull a trick like that with a cash collector; these new models have automatic tabulators and detectors. The moment that robot came back to my office, it spat up the counterfeits. It couldn't stomach them. And neither can I."

"Stomach?" asked Anson hopefully. "Are you ever troubled with gastric disturbances? Ulcers? Psychosomatic pain in the—"

The manager thrust out his jaw. "Look here, Anson, you're not a bad sort, really. It's just that you're confused. Why don't you clever up and look at the big picture? This witch-doctor racket of yours, it's atomized. Nobody's got any use for it today. You're like the guys who used to manufacture buggy whips; they sat around telling themselves that the automobile would never replace the horse, when any streetcleaner could see what was happening to business.

“Why don’t you admit you’re licked? The gland-handers have taken over. Why, a man would have to be crazy to go to a psychiatrist nowadays and you know there aren’t any crazy people any more. So forget about all this. Take a course or something. You can be an End-Doc yourself. Then open up a real office and make yourself some big tokens.”

Anson shook his head. “Sorry,” he said. “Not interested.”

The manager spread his hands. “All right. I gave you a chance. Now there’s nothing left to do but call in the ejectors.”

HE WALKED over and opened the door. Apparently he had been prepared for Anson’s decision, because two ejectors were waiting. They rolled into the room and, without bothering to focus their beams on Anson, commenced to scoop books from the shelves and deposit them in their big open belly-hampers.

“Wait!” Anson cried, but the ejector robots continued inexorably and alphabetically: there went Adler, Brill, Carmichael, Dunbar, Ellis, Freud, Gesell, Korney, Isaacs, Jung, Kardiner, Lindner, Moll—

“Darling, what’s the matter?”

Sue Porter was in the room. Then she was in his arms and Dr. Anson had a difficult time remembering what the matter was. The girl affected him that way.

But a look at the manager’s drugged smile served as a reminder. Anson’s face reddened, due to a combination of embarrassment and lipstick smudges, as he told Sue what had happened.

Sue laughed. “Well, if that’s all it is, what are you so upset about?” Without waiting for a reply, she advanced upon the manager, her hand digging into her middle bra-cup. “Here’s your tokens,” she said. “Now call off the ejectors.”

The manager accepted the disks with a smile of pure euphoria, then strode over to the robots and punched buttons. The ejectors halted their labors between Reich and Stekel, then reversed operations. Quickly and efficiently, they replaced all the books on the shelves.

In less than a minute, Anson faced the girl in privacy. “You shouldn’t have done that,” he said severely.

“But, darling, I wanted to. After all, what are a few tokens more or less?”

“A few tokens?” Anson scowled. “In the past year, I’ve borrowed over two thousand from you. This can’t go on.”

“Of course not,” the girl agreed. “That’s what I’ve been telling you. Let’s get a Permanent and then Daddy will give you a nice fat job and—”

“There you go again! How often must I warn you about the Elektra situation? This unnatural dependency on the Father Image is dangerous. If only you’d let me get you down on the couch—”

“Why, of course, darling!”

“No, no!” Anson cried. “I want to analyze you!”

“Not now,” Sue answered. “We’ll be late for dinner. Daddy expects you.”

“Damn dinner and damn Daddy, too,” Anson said. But he took the girl’s arm and left the office, contenting himself by slamming the door.

“Aren’t you going to put up that Doctor Will Return in Two Hours sign?” the girl asked, glancing back at the door.

“No,” Anson told her. “I’m not coming back in two hours. Or ever.”

Sue gave him a puzzled look, but her eyes were smiling.

DR. HOWARD ANSON’S eyes weren’t smiling as he and Sue took off from the roof. He kept them closed, so that he didn’t have to watch the launching robots, or note the ’copter’s progress as it soared above the city. He didn’t want to gaze down at the metallic tangle of conveyors moving between the factories or the stiffly striding figures which supervised their progress on the ramps and loading platforms. The air about them was filled with ’copters, homeward bound from offices and recreation areas, but no human figures moved in the streets. Ground-level was almost entirely mechanized.

"What's the matter now?" Sue's voice made him look at her. Her eyes held genuine concern.

"The sins of the fathers," Anson said. "Yours and mine." He watched the girl as she set the 'copter on auto-pilot for the journey across the river. "Of course it really wasn't my father's fault that he steered me into psychiatry. After all, it's been a family tradition for a hundred and fifty years. All my paternal ancestors were psychiatrists, with the exception of one or two renegade Behaviorists. When he encouraged my interest in the profession, I never stopped to question him.

He trained me—and I was the last student to take up the specialty at medical school. The last, mind you!

"I should have known then that it was useless. But he kept insisting this state of affairs couldn't last, that things were sure to change. 'Cheer up,' he used to tell me, whenever I got discouraged. 'The pendulum is bound to swing in the other direction. And then he'd tell me about the good old days when he was a boy and the world was still full of fetichism and hebephrenia and pyromania and mixoscopic zoophilia. 'It will come again,' he kept telling me. 'Just you wait and see! We'll have frottage and nympholepsy and compulsive exhibitionism—everything your little heart desires.'

"Well, he was wrong. He died knowing that he had set me up in a dead-end profession. I'm an anachronism, like the factory worker or the farmer or the miner or the soldier. We don't have any need for them in our society any more; robots have replaced them all. And the End-Docs have replaced the psychiatrists and neuro-surgeons. With robots to ease the physical and economic burden and gland-handers to relieve mental tension, there's nothing left for me. The last psychiatrist should have disappeared along with the last advertising man. Come to think of it, they probably belong together. My father was wrong, Sue. I know that now. But most of the real blame belongs to your father."

"Daddy?" she exclaimed. "How can you possibly blame him?"

A NSON laughed shortly. "Your family has been pioneering in robotics almost as long as mine has worked in psychiatry. One of your ancestors took out the first basic patent. If it weren't for him and those endocrine shots, everything would still be normal—lots of incest and scoptophilia, plenty of voyeurism for everybody—"

"Why, darling, what a thing to say! You know as well as I do what robots have done for the world. You said it yourself. We don't have any more manual or menial labor. There's no war, plenty of everything for everybody. And Daddy isn't stopping there."

"I suppose not," Anson said bitterly. "What is the old devil dreaming up now?"

Sue flushed. "You wouldn't talk like that if you knew just how hard he's been working. He and Mr. Mullet, the engineering chief. They're just about ready to bring out the new pilot models they've developed for space travel."

"I've heard that one before. They've been announcing those models for ten years."

"They keep running into bugs, I guess. But sooner or later, they'll find a way to handle things. Nothing is perfect, you know. Every once in a while, there's still some trouble with the more complicated models."

"But they keep trying for perfection. Don't you see where all this leads to, Sue? Human beings will become obsolescent. First the workers, now the psychiatrists and other professions. But it won't end there. Inside of another generation or two, we won't need anyone any more. Your father, or somebody like him, will produce the ultimate robot—the robot that's capable of building other robots and directing them. Come to think of it, he's already done the first job; your factories are self-perpetuating. All we need now is a robot that can take the place of a few key figures like your father. Then that's the end of the human race. Oh, maybe they'll keep a few men and women around for pets, but that's all. And thank God I won't be here to see it."

"So why worry?" Sue replied. "Enjoy yourself while you can. We'll apply for a Permanent and Daddy will give you a job like he promised me —"

"Job? What kind of job?"

“Oh, maybe he’ll make you a vice-president or something. They don’t have to do anything.”

“Fine! A wonderful future!”

“I don’t see anything wrong with it. You ought to consider yourself lucky.”

“Listen, Sue.” He turned to her earnestly. “You just don’t understand the way I feel. I’ve spent eighteen years of my life in school, six of it in training for my profession. That’s all I know and I know it well. And what have I to show for it? I’m a psychiatrist who’s never had a patient, a neuro-surgeon who’s never performed anything but an experimental topectomy or lobotomy. That’s my work, my life, and I want a chance to function. I don’t intend to sit around on a fat sinecure, raising children whose only future is oblivion. I don’t want a Permanent with you under those conditions.”

SUE SNIFFED petulantly. “A Permanent with me isn’t good enough, is that it? I suppose you’d rather have a lot of repression and guilt complexes and all that other stuff you’re always talking about.”

“It isn’t that,” Anson insisted. “I don’t really want the world to revert to neurotic or psychotic behavior just so I can have a practice. But damn it, I can’t stand to see the way things are going. We’ve done away with stress and privation and tension and superstition and intolerance, and that’s great. But we’ve also done away with ourselves in the process. We’re getting to the point where we, as human beings, no longer have a function to perform. We’re not needed.”

The girl gave him an angry glance. “What you’re trying to say is that you don’t need me, is that it?”

“I do need you. But not on these terms. I’m not going to lead a useless existence, or bring children into a world where they’ll be useless. And if your father brings up that vice-president deal at dinner tonight, I’m going to tell him to take his job and—”

“Never mind!” Sue flipped the switch from auto-pilot back to manual and the ’copter turned. “You needn’t bother about dinner. I’ll take you back to your office now. You can put yourself down on the couch and do a little practicing on your own mind. You need it! Of all the stupid, pigheaded—”

The sound of the crash reached them even at flying level. Sue Porter broke off abruptly and glanced down at the river front below. Anson stared with her.

“What was that?” he asked.

“I don’t know—can’t make it out from here.” She spun the controls, guiding the ’copter down until it hovered over a scene of accelerating confusion.

A huge loading barge was moored against one of the docks. Had been moored, rather; as they watched, it swung erratically into the current, then banged back against the pier. Huge piles of machinery, only partially lashed to the deck, now tumbled and broke free. Some of the cranes splashed into the water and others rolled across the flat surface of the barge.

“Accident,” Sue gasped. “The cable must have broken.”

ANSON’S eyes focused on the metallic figures which dotted the deck and stood stolidly on the dock. “Look at the robots!”

“What about them?” asked Sue. “Aren’t they supposed to be doing something? That one with the antenna—isn’t it designed to send out a warning signal when something goes wrong?”

“You’re right. They beam Emergency in a case like this. The expediters should be out by now.”

“Some of them look as if they’re paralyzed,” Anson noted, observing a half dozen of the metallic figures aboard the barge. They were rigid, unmoving. Even as he watched, a round steel bell bowled across the deck. None of the robots moved—the sphere struck them like a ball hitting the pins and hurtled them into the water.

On the pier, the immobilized watchers gave no indication of reaction.

“Paralyzed,” Anson repeated. “Not that one!”

Sue pointed excitedly as the ’copter hovered over the deck. Anson looked and found the cause of her consternation.

A large, fully articulated robot with the humanoid face of a controller clattered along in a silvery blur of motion. From one of its four upper appendages dangled a broad-bladed axe.

It bumped against an armless receptacle-type robot and the axe descended, striking the robot squarely in its loading compartment. There was a crash as the victim collapsed.

And the controller robot sped on, striking at random, in a series of sped-up motions almost impossible to follow—but not impossible to understand.

“That’s the answer!” said Anson. “It must have cut the cable with the axe. And attacked the others, to immobilize them. Come on, let’s land this thing.”

“But we can’t go down there! It’s dangerous! Somebody will send out the alarm. The expediters will handle it—”

“Land!” Anson commanded. He began to rummage around in the rear compartment of the ’copter.

“What are you looking for?” Sue asked as she maneuvered the machine to a clear space alongside a shed next to the dock. “The rope ladder.”

“But we won’t need it. We’re on the ground.”

“I need it.” He produced the tangled length and began to uncoil it. “You stay here,” he said. “This is my job.”

“What are you going to do?”

“Yes, what are you going to do?” The deep voice came from the side of the ’copter. Anson and Sue looked up at the face of Eldon Porter.

“Daddy! How did you get here?”

“Alarm came through.”

THE BIG, gray-haired man scowled at the dock beyond, where the expediter robots were already mopping up with flamethrowers.

"You've got no business here," Eldon Porter said harshly. "This area's off-limits until everything's under control." He turned to Anson. "And I'll have to ask you to forget everything you've seen here. We don't want word of accidents like these to leak out—just get people needlessly upset."

"Then this isn't the first time?" asked Anson.

"Of course not. Mullet's had a lot of experience; he knows how to handle this."

"Right, Chief." Anson recognized the thin, bespectacled engineer at Eldon Porter's side. "Every time we test out one of these advanced models, something goes haywire. Shock, overload, some damned thing. Only thing we can do is scrap it and try again. So you folks keep out of the way. We're going to corner it with the flame-throwers and—"

"No!"

Anson opened the door and climbed out, dragging the long rope ladder behind him.

"Where in hell do you think you're going?" demanded Eldon Porter.

"I'm after that robot," Anson said. "Give me two of your men to hold the ends of this ladder. We can use it like a net and capture the thing without destroying it. That is, put it in restraint."

"Restraint?"

"Technical term we psychiatrists use." Anson smiled at the two men and then at the girl. "Don't worry," he said. "I know what I'm doing. I've got a case at last. Your robot is psychotic."

"Psychotic?" grumbled Eldon Porter, watching the young man move away. "What's that mean?"

"Nuts," said Sue sweetly. "A technical term."

SEVERAL weeks passed before Sue saw Dr. Howard Anson again.

She waited anxiously outside in the corridor with her father until the young man emerged. He peeled off his gloves, smiling. "Well?" rumbled Eldon Porter. "Ask Mullet," Anson suggested. "He did it!" the thin engineer exulted. “It works, just like he said it would! Now we can use the technique whenever there’s a breakdown. But I don’t think we’ll have any more. Not if we incorporate his suggestions in the new designs. We can use them on the new space pilot models, too.”

“Wonderful!” Eldon Porter said. He put his hand on Anson’s shoulder. “We owe you a lot.”

“Mullet deserves the credit,” Anson replied. “If not for him and his schematics, I’d never have made it. He worked with me night and day, feeding me the information. We correlated everything—you know, I’d never realized how closely your engineers had followed the human motor-reaction patterns.”

Eldon Porter cleared his throat. “About that job,” he began. “That vice-presidency—”

“Of course,” Anson said. “I’ll take it. There’s going to be a lot of work to do. I want to train at least a dozen men to handle emergencies until the new models take over. I understand you’ve had plenty of cases like this in the past.”

“Right. And we’ve always ended up by junking the robots that went haywire. Hushed it up, of course, so people wouldn’t worry. Now we’re all set. We can duplicate the electronic patterns of the human brain without worrying about breakdowns due to speedup or overload. Why didn’t we think of the psychiatric approach ourselves?”

“Leave that to me,” Anson said. And as the two men moved off, he made a psychiatric approach toward the girl.

She finally stepped back out of his arms. “You owe me an explanation. What’s the big idea? You’re taking the job, after all!”

“I’ve found I can be useful,” Anson told her. “There is a place for my profession—a big one. Human beings no longer go berserk, but robots do.”

“Is that what this is all about? Have you been psychoanalyzing that robot you caught?”

NSON smiled. “I’m afraid psychoanalysis isn’t suitable for robots. The trouble is purely mechanical. But the brain is a mechanism, too. The more I worked with Mullet, the more I learned about the similarities." other."

"You cured that robot in there?" she asked incredulously.

"That's right." Anson slipped out of his white gown. "It's as good as new, ready to go back on the job at once. Of course it will have slower, less intense reactions, but its judgment hasn't been impaired. Neuro-surgery did the trick. That's the answer, Sue. Once you open them up, you can see the cure's the same."

"So that's why you were wearing a surgical gown," she said. "You were operating on that robot."

Anson grinned triumphantly. "The robot was excited, in a state of hysteria. I merely applied my knowledge and skill to the problem."

"But what kind of an operation?"

"I opened up the skull and eased the pressure on the overload wires. There used to be a name for it, but now there's a new one." Anson took her back into his arms. "Darling, congratulate me! I've just successfully performed the first prefrontal robotomy!"

A Good Imagination

I may have my faults, but lack of imagination isn't one of them.

Take this matter of George Parker, for example. It finally came to a head today, and I flatter myself that I handled it very well. That's where imagination counts.

If it hadn't been for my imagination I probably never would have noticed George in the first place. And I certainly wouldn't have been prepared to deal with him properly. But as it was, I had everything worked out.

He showed up, right on schedule, just after lunch. I was down in the basement, mixing cement, when I heard him rap on the back door.

"Anybody home?" he called.

"Down here," I said. "All ready to go."

So he walked through the kitchen and came down the cellar stairs, clumping. George, the eternal clumper, banging his way through life; about as subtle as a steamroller. And with a steamroller's smug belief in its own power, in its ability to crush anything that didn't get out of its way.

He had to stoop a bit here in the basement because he was so tall. Tall and heavyset, with the thick neck and broad shoulders that are the common endowment of outdoor men, movie stars, and adult male gorillas.

Of course I'm being a bit uncharitable. George Parker couldn't be compared to a gorilla. Not with that boyish haircut and amiable grin of his. No self-respecting gorilla would affect either.

"All alone?" he asked. "Where's Mrs. Logan?"

"Louise?" I shrugged. "She's gone over to Dalton to close up the bank account."

The grin vanished. “Oh. I was sort of hoping I’d get a chance to say goodbye to her.”

I’ll bet he was. It almost killed him, realizing that he wasn’t going to see her again. I knew. I knew why he’d come scratching on the door with his “Anybody home?” routine. What he really meant was, “Is the coast clear, darling?”

How many times had he come creeping around this summer? I wondered. How many times had he called her “darling” ? How many times during the long weekdays when I wasn’t home—when I was slaving away in town, and she was alone up here at the summer house?

Alone with George Parker. The steamroller. The gorilla. The ape in the t-shirt.

In June, when we first came up, I had thought we were lucky to find somebody like George to fix things around the place. The house needed repairs and carpentry work, and a fresh coat of paint. The lawn and garden demanded attention, too. And since I could only get away on weekends, I congratulated myself on finding a willing worker like George.

Louise had congratulated me too. “It was wonderful of you to discover such a jewel. This place needs a handyman.”

Well, George must have been handy. All summer long, Louise kept finding new things for him to do. Putting in a walk to the pier. Setting up trellises. The neighbors got used to seeing him come in three or four days a week. I got used to it, too. For better than two months, you’d have thought I didn’t have any imagination at all. Then I began to put two and two together. Or one and one, rather. George and Louise. Together up here, day after day. And night after night?

Even then, I couldn’t be sure. It took a great deal of imagination to conceive of any woman allowing herself to become enamored of such an obvious ape. But then, perhaps some women like apes. Perhaps they have a secret craving for hairy bodies and crushing weight and panting animalism. Louise always told me she hated that sort of thing. She respected me because I was gentle and understanding and controlled myself. At least, that’s what she said.

But I saw the way she looked at George. And I saw the way he looked at her. And I saw the way they both looked at me, when they thought I wasn’t aware.

I was aware, of course. Increasingly aware, as the weeks went by. At first I contemplated getting rid of George, but that would have been too obvious. Firing him in midsummer, with work to be done, didn’t make sense. Unless I wanted to force a showdown with Louise.

That wasn’t the answer, either. All I’d have gotten from her would’ve been a tearful denial. And before she was through, she’d have twisted things around so that I was to blame. I’d be the brute who penned her up here in the country all summer long and left her alone to suffer. After all, I couldn’t really prove anything.

So then I decided to sell. It wasn’t difficult. Getting the place fixed up was a good idea; it added a couple of thousand to the value of the property. All I had to do was pass the word around to the realtor over at Dalton, and he did the rest. By the end of August there were three offers. I chose the best one, and it gave me a tidy profit.

Of course, Louise was heartbroken when she heard about the deal. She loved it here, she was just getting settled, she looked forward to coming back next year—why, she had even meant to talk to me about having a furnace put in so we could stay the year round.

She played the scene well, and I enjoyed it. All except the part about staying up here permanently. Did the little fool really think I was stupid enough to go for that? Staying in town alone all week, slaving away at the business, and then dragging up here weekends in the dead of winter to hear her excuses? “No, really, I’m just too bushed, honey. If you only knew how much work I’ve been doing around the place! I just want to sleep forever.”

I wanted to shout at her, then. I wanted to curse her. I wanted to spit it all out, tell her that I knew, then take her in my arms and shake her until her silly head spun. But I couldn’t. Louise was too delicate for such brutality.

Or so she had always intimated to me. She demanded gentle treatment. Gentle George, the gorilla.

So I was gentle with her. I told her that selling the place was merely a matter of good business. We had a chance to realize a handsome profit. And next year we'd buy another. In fact, I had already arranged a little surprise for her. After Labor Day, on our way back to town, I'd show it to her, even though it was a day or so out of our way.

"Out of our way?" She gave me that wide-eyed stare. "You mean you've got another place picked out, not around here?"

"That's right."

"Where? Tell me. Is it far?"

I smiled. "Quite far."

"But I—I'd like to stay here, on the river."

"Wait until you see it before you decide," I said. "Let's not talk about it any more now. I imagine you're tired."

"Yes. I think I'll sleep on the day bed, if you don't mind."

I didn't mind. And we didn't talk about it any more. I just completed the sale and got Louise to start packing. There wasn't much to pack, because I'd sold the furniture, too.

Then I waited. Waited and watched. Louise didn't know about the watching, of course. Neither did George.

And now it was the last day, and George stood in the cellar with me and looked at the mixing trough.

"Say, you do a pretty good job," he said. "Never knew you was so handy."

"I can do anything if I set my mind to it." I gave him back his grin.

"Is this the hole you want me to plug up?" he asked. He pointed to the opening underneath the cellar steps. It was a black shelf about two feet high and three feet wide, between the top of the basement blocks and the ceiling beams.

"That's it," I told him. "Goes clear back to the shed, I think. Always bothered me to see it, and I'd like to cement it up for the new owners before

I go."

"Keep the mice out, eh?"

And the rats," I said.

"Not many rats around here," George muttered.

"You're wrong, George." I stared at him. "There are rats everywhere. They creep in when you're not around to see them. They destroy your property. If you're not careful, they'll eat you out of house and home. And they're cunning. They try to work silently, unobserved. But a smart man knows when they're present. He can detect the signs of their handiwork. And a smart man gets rid of them. I wouldn't want to leave any opening for rats here, George. I'd hate to think of the new owner going through the same experience I did."

"You never told me about the rats," George said, looking at the hole in the wall. "Neither did Lou—Mrs. Logan."

"Perhaps she didn't know about them," I answered. "Maybe I should have warned her."

"Yeah."

"Well, it doesn't matter now. The cement will take care of them." I stepped back. "By the way, George, this is some new stuff that I got in town. I don't know if you've ever worked with it before. It's called Fast-seal. Understand it dries hard in less than an hour."

"You got the instructions?" George stared at the coagulating mass.

"Nothing to it. You use it the same way as the regular cement." I handed him the trowel and the boards. "Here, might as well get started. I'm going to dismantle this target range."

He went to work then and I stepped over to the other side of the basement and took down my targets. Then I got the pistols out of their case and packed them. After that I took up the revolvers. I did a little cleaning before I laid them away.

George worked fast. He had the energy for tasks like this; energy, coupled with lack of imagination. Physical labor never troubles people like George, because they're not plagued by thoughts while they work. They live almost entirely in the world of sensation, responding aggressively to every challenge. Show them a hole in the wall and they'll cement it, show them a woman and they'll—

I steered my thoughts away from that and concentrated on oiling the last revolver. It was a big Colt, one I'd never used down here. Odd, that I collected weapons and used them so seldom. I liked to handle them, handle them and speculate upon their potential power. See, here in this tiny hole lurks death; from this minute opening comes a force big enough to burst the brain of idiot and emperor alike, to shatter the skull of sinner and of saint. With such a weapon one could even kill a gorilla at close range.

I held the revolver and stared at George's broad back. He was working swiftly with the trowel, closing off the opening entirely and smoothing it over.

I loaded the revolver, cocked it, and stared again. Ten feet away from me was a perfect target. It was an easy shot. The fool would never know what hit him.

That was the whole trouble, of course. He'd never know what hit him.

And I wanted him to know. Somewhere, deep down inside, even an ape like George had the ability to think, to realize. The trick lay in finding a method that would stimulate his imagination.

So I put down the revolver and walked over to him.

"Looks like you're finished," I said.

He nodded and wiped the perspiration from his forehead. An animal odor came from his armpits.

"Yeah. This stuff sure does a swell job. It's getting hard already. I just got to smooth it off a little more."

"Never mind." I stepped back. "You look as if you could use a beer."

He grinned and followed me over to the portable refrigerator in the corner. I took out a bottle of beer and opened it for him. He gulped gratefully. The bottle was empty before he bothered to look up and remark, "Aren't you drinking?"

I shook my head.

"Not around firearms, George." I pointed to the cases on the table. "Say, Mr. Logan, I always meant to ask you something. How come a fella like you collects guns?"

"Why not? It's a fairly common hobby."

"But I never seen you shoot one."

I walked over and fished out another beer, uncapped it and handed it to him.

"Perhaps I don't collect them to shoot, George," I told him. "Perhaps I just collect them as symbols. Take this Colt, for example." I held it up. "My admiration for the black barrel has nothing to do with ballistics. When I look at it, I see a thousand stories. A story for every bullet fired. Scenes of violence and danger, of high drama and low melodrama."

"Sort of appeals to your imagination, is that it?"

"Precisely." I handed him another beer. "Go ahead, George," I said. "I've got to clean out the refrigerator anyway. This is our last day, you know. Might as well celebrate."

He nodded. But he didn't look as though he was in a mood for celebrating our departure. The ice-cold beer, downed rapidly, was beginning to take effect. Just a few bottles on a hot day will do the trick—particularly after violent exertion. I saw to it that another was ready before he had finished this one. He drank quickly, noisily, his neck bulging, his thick lips greedily encircling the mouth of the bottle. On his face was the absorbed look of an animal oblivious to everything except the immediate satisfaction of his appetite.

I picked up the Colt again and walked over to the cemented portion of the wall. With my left hand I rubbed the solidifying surface. "Marvelous stuff," I said. "Why, it's hard already. And perfectly dry."

He grunted. He put down the empty bottle and reached for the full one, his fifth. I waited until he had taken a healthy swig. Then I bent down and put my head next to the wall.

"What's that sound?" I asked.

He looked up. "I don't hear no sound."

"Mice," I said. "Back in there."

"Or rats, like you told me." He nodded.

"No, I rather think this is a mouse. The squeaking is so shrill Can't you hear it?"

"I don't hear nothing."

He came over and stooped. His hand brushed the Colt and I drew it away. "I still can't hear nothing."

"Well, it doesn't matter. This job is airtight, isn't it?"

"Sure."

"Then whatever's inside will suffocate in a few minutes or so." I smiled at him. "You must be deaf to the high tones, George. I heard that sound all during the time you were cementing the wall."

"What's the matter, it bother you, thinking about the mouse?"

"Not particularly, George."

"Anyways, there won't be no more getting through. This wall is really solid, now."

He thumped it with his fist. "I done a pretty good job."

"Yes, you certainly did. And it's your last one, too." I went over to the refrigerator. "Which reminds me, it's time we settled up. But first, let's have another drink."

George glanced at his wristwatch. "Well, I dunno, Mr. Logan. Maybe I better be running along. I got some business over to Dalton. . . ."

Yes, he had business in Dalton, all right. He wanted to run over and see Louise. Maybe they'd have time to say goodbye again, the way they had last night before I'd arrived. Or before they knew I had arrived. But I saw them then, and I could see them now in my imagination.

It took a lot of effort for me to shut out the picture of what I had seen, but I did it. I even grinned back at George. And I held out the bottle and said, "Just one more, for old times' sake. And if you don't mind, I'll join you."

I took out a bottle for myself, opened it, raised it. With my left hand I picked up the Colt again.

He lifted his beer and belched. The sound echoed through the cellar like a revolver shot.

“A little toast might be in order,” I said.

“Go ahead.”

I smiled. “Here’s to freedom.”

He started to drink, then pulled the bottle away from his lips. I watched the crease form in his sweating forehead. “Freedom?”

I shrugged. “There’s no sense trying to keep any secrets,” I said. “After all, you’re almost like one of the family, in a way.”

“I don’t get it.”

“You will.”

“What’s this business about freedom?”

“Mrs. Logan,” I said. “Louise.”

He put the beer down on the table. “Yeah?”

“We’ve separated.”

“Sep—”

“That’s right, George.” I turned my head. “Do you hear anything from behind the wall?”

“No. But what’s all this about separating? You have a fight or something?”

“Nothing like that. It was all very sudden. You might say it was completely unexpected, at least as far as she was concerned. But I thought you might like to know.”

“Isn’t she over to Dalton, then?”

“I’m afraid not.”

“You mean she went away already today?”

“You might say that.”

“Look here, Logan, just what are you driving at? What’s the big idea of —”

I cocked my head toward the wall. “Are you sure you don’t hear anything, George?”

“What’s there to hear?”

“I thought she might be telling you goodbye.”

He got it, then.

“Jesus, no! Logan, you’re kidding me!” I smiled.

His eyes began to bulge. I watched his hand curl around the mouth of the beer bottle. And I brought the muzzle of the Colt up until he could see it.

“Put it down, George. It won’t do you any good. I’ve killed a mouse. What makes you think I’d be afraid to kill a rat?”

He put the bottle down. The minute he let go, his hands started to tremble. “Logan, you couldn’t’ve done it, not you. You wouldn’t—”

I inched the revolver up higher, and he flinched back. “That’s right,” I said. “I couldn’t have. You and Louise were so certain about me, weren’t you? You decided I couldn’t do anything. I couldn’t suspect, couldn’t see what was going on right under my eyes. And if I did find out, I couldn’t do anything about it, because I’m a poor weak fool. Well, you were wrong, George. And Louise was wrong. I wonder if she can hear me now, eh?” I raised my voice. “Are you listening, Louise?”

George moved back against the wall, his mouth twitching. “You’re lying,” he said. “You didn’t kill her.”

“That’s right. I didn’t kill her. She was quite alive when I was finished. I merely saw to it that her arms and legs were bound tightly, so that she couldn’t thresh around, and that the gag was firmly in place. Then I lifted her up into the hole and waited for you to come.”

His face was whiter than the wall.

“You can understand why, can’t you, George? Even an ape has enough imagination to appreciate the situation. Quite a joke, isn’t it? You cementing up the wall, and all the while I knew you were killing her. And to make it even funnier, she knew it too, of course. She lay in that black hole, trying to cry out to you, while you sealed her up in a airless tomb, in a darkness that is worse than night, in the darkness of death—”

"You're crazy!"

I saw his muscles flex, his neck tighten. "Take one step," I said, "and I'll blow your face off."

He moved then, but away from me. He went to the wall and he began to pound on it. The cement held.

"No use," I said. "It's solid. You did a good job, George. Your last job, and your best. Besides, it wouldn't be any use now. The air couldn't have lasted this long. She's gone."

He turned, panting. He held up his hands, and they were red. "Crazy!" he gasped. "No wonder she was scared of you, hated you. No human being could think of a thing like that."

I smiled. "Yes they could, George. Haven't you ever read any books? Did you ever hear of Edgar Allan Poe? The Black Cat, or Cask of Amontillado? I guess not, George. You've always been too busy living, haven't you? And Louise was the same way. You believe in action, and you despise people like me. You say we've always got our noses buried in a book, while you're the practical ones, the go-getters. You're proud because you take what you want from life. And you laugh at us. I'll bet you and Louise laughed at me a lot. Now it's my turn."

"You—you can't get away with it!"

"Why not?"

I'll tell. I'll get the sheriff on you!"

"No you won't. You're an accessory, George. Don't forget, you walled her up. And if you go to the sheriff I'll have my story. I'll tell him we were both in on it together, that I'd promised you half of her insurance. She has quite a lot of insurance, George. I'll tell the sheriff how you walled her up alive, while she writhed and kicked and tried to scream, knowing you were killing her. Not me, George. You!"

He almost rushed me, then. I took the first step forward and at the sight of the Colt he wilted. When I laughed, he put his hands over his ears.

"A pity she didn't listen to you last night, George, when you kept urging her not to wait until I came. You wanted her to drop everything and run away right then and there. You could get a ranger's job in Montana, wasn't that it? And nobody would ever know. Only she had to be practical. She wanted to stick around and draw the money out of the bank first. Wasn't that it?"

"You heard us?"

"Of course. I parked down the road and came up under the window. Then I went back and drove in, the way I always do. You didn't even have time to plan how you two would meet and arrange for your getaway, did you, George? You couldn't even say goodbye properly. Well, do it now. There's a chance in a thousand that she can still hear you."

His eyes were glassy. It wasn't the heat and it wasn't the beer. He was shaking, whimpering.

"Hurry up, George. Tell the lady goodbye. Tell the lovely lady goodbye before she takes her last breath, before she gasps the last gulp of air into her lungs and feels them burn and shrivel. She'll die fast, George, if she isn't dead already. And then she'll crumble. She won't rot, because it's dry in there. There'll be no odor. She'll just mummify. Her limbs will turn to brown leather, and her hair will become brittle and drop out, and her skin will flake and her eyes will finally coagulate in their sockets. But on what's left of her face you'll still be able to see an expression. You'll be able to see how she was at the moment when she died with that last silent scream for mercy. She's screaming at you now. Can't you hear her? She's screaming, 'George, help me! Get me out of here, get me out of here, get me out—' "

George made a sound deep in his chest. Then he blinked and ran for the stairs. I didn't try to stop him. I let him thud up the steps, listened as he thundered through the kitchen, slammed the door.

It was very quiet in the cellar after that. I put the Colt away in its case, but first I took the precaution of unloading it and wiping off the barrel and the butt.

Then I took the empty bottles and stacked them neatly in the corner.

I finished George's beer and drank my own. And after that, I went upstairs.

There was nothing left to do now but wait.

I must have had two or three more beers while I was waiting. I got them from the big refrigerator in the kitchen and carried them into the front room so that they'd be handy while I read. I picked up my copy of Poe, and not by accident. I wondered if his treatment of the situation was as melodramatic as mine had been. Perhaps not, but then, I had my reasons. In retrospect, what I had said to George seemed a bit silly and overdrawn, but it served a purpose.

After a while, I got absorbed in my reading. Say what you will, Poe had a wonderful imagination, and I can appreciate that.

It was almost dusk when I heard a tapping on the door. I thought of Poe's raven, and put the book aside.

"Come in," I said.

It wasn't Poe's raven, of course.

"Hello, Louise." I smiled up at her. "Did you get everything accomplished?"

"Yes, darling." She sat down, and I noticed just the hint of a frown on her face.

"What's wrong?"

"Nothing. But something odd happened to me on the way back."

"So?"

"I was coming along the County Trunk, just about opposite the Beedsley place, when a state trooper pulled up alongside me."

"Speeding?"

"Of course not, silly. You know I never do over fifty. But he asked for my driver's license, and then he did a funny thing. He made me get out of the car and come over to the motorcycle. And he had me talk into the squawk-box. I think that's what he called it, anyway."

"What on earth for?"

"He didn't tell me. All I know is I had to give my name to the sheriff. And then he said he was sorry to trouble me, but I'd saved him a trip out here for nothing. And he let me go. I asked him what this was all about, and he just shrugged and said there'd been a little misunderstanding but this cleared everything up. Can you figure it out, darling?"

I smiled. "Perhaps," I said. "But maybe we'd better talk about it some other time. I don't want you getting all upset over nothing on our last night here."

"Darling, tell me. I insist!"

"Well, we had a little excitement around here, too," I told her. "Remember George Parker was supposed to come over and put in that cement?"

"Yes, that's right." She hesitated. I watched her. It was pleasant to watch her, to sense the way she was waiting for what I'd say next. If I could have, I'd been willing to prolong that particular moment forever. But finally I let it go.

"Well, he never showed up," I said. I could almost feel the way she sighed with relief. "So finally I went ahead and did it myself."

"Poor dear. You must be tired."

"You don't understand. That isn't the excitement I was talking about."

"N-no?"

Again I let her wait, savoring the moment. Then I went on, knowing there was a better moment to come. "But along about four, Sheriff Taylor called up, wanting to know where you were. Of course I told him, and I imagine that's why the troopers were out trying to locate you."

"But whatever for?"

"Are you sure you want to hear the rest?"

"Please."

"It's a rather unpleasant situation, apparently. It seems our friend George has suffered some sort of nervous breakdown."

"George?"

"Rather incredible, isn't it? Always seemed like such a stolid, unimaginative fellow, too. You've seen a bit more of him than I did, and I'm sure you wouldn't say he was the sensitive type, would you?"

"Tell me what's wrong, what's happened—"

"If you wish. As I get it, friend George came bursting into the sheriff's office with an utterly fantastic story. At first they thought he'd been drinking, but apparently he was in a state of actual hysteria. It seems he was accusing me of murdering you and walling your body up in the cellar."

"You're joking!"

"That's what the sheriff told George, at first. Until he realized the poor fellow was almost out of his head with fear. Naturally, the sheriff called me and I told him to try and locate you. I'm glad he did. I'd hate to have us involved in any trouble just as we're ready to leave."

I couldn't see her face in the dusk, so I got up and went over to her. She tried to turn away, but I held her and patted her shoulder. "There, there," I murmured. "I didn't want to upset you. Nothing to worry about. It's all over."

"George!" Her voice started to break, but she controlled it. "How is he?"

I sighed. "Stark staring, according to the sheriff. They called Doc Silvers right away. Unless he snaps out of it, he'll be committed. A pity, too—somebody said he was planning to take a ranger's job in Montana."

Louise was shaking, but her voice was firm. "Did he say anything else?"

"No. What more is there to say?"

"Why did he think you'd try to kill me?"

"I haven't the faintest idea. Funny about these strong, silent types. Once their imagination runs away with them, they can't seem to control it. They get keyed up to a certain pitch and then snap, all at once. I'm just glad it didn't happen when he was out here with you. There's no telling what he might have attempted." I laughed. "It may sound far-fetched to you, darling, but he could even have tried to assault you. Can you imagine being made love to by a lunatic?"

She shuddered and buried her head against me.

"Let's talk about something more cheerful," I said. "Here, have a beer." I could feel her sob.

"Don't cry," I told her. "We're going away tomorrow, remember? Back to town. Just you and I. You needn't worry about George—they'll take care of him. You'll never have to see him again. Why, in a little while you'll forget all about him."

"Y-yes. . ."

"We're going to have a lot of fun together," I murmured. "That's a promise. I've got it all planned."

And I have, of course. I wasn't lying to her.

I intend to have quite a lot of fun with Louise, tonight. She's in the bedroom right now as I write this, sleeping. I gave her quite a strong sedative, but it will wear off in another half hour or so. Then she'll be wide awake again. And I want her to be wide awake.

I want her to be wide awake when I take her in my arms, and I want her to be wide awake afterwards, when I hold her ever so gently, but ever so firmly, and tell her just what really happened. I want her to know how clever I am, and how strong, and how wise. I want her to know that I'm stronger and wiser than George could ever be.

She must realize the cleverness that brought everything to perfection. She must come to appreciate that I'm the better man after all. And of course I am.

It would have been stupid to confront them both with their guilt; what could I possibly have gained? And it would have been equally stupid for me to kill George and run the risk of discovery. As things worked out, as I planned them to work out, George is disposed of forever. I've sealed him up behind the walls of a madhouse for life. He'll live on and suffer, thinking Louise is dead and that he killed her. And of course the sheriff and the folks around here know differently. They know she's alive, and that there's nothing behind the cement wall. They'll remember talking to her and to me, and that she was to go away with me. Neither the new owners nor anyone else will ever tear down that wall.

I'm going to make all this very plain to Louise. I'm going to tell her exactly what happened. In fact, that's why I'm writing this. I don't trust myself to find the exact word to convey the meaning of the moment.

I'll let her read what I've written. Have you read this far, Louise?

Do you understand now? Do you understand what I've done?

And do you understand what I'm going to do, in just another moment?

That's right, Louise.

I'm going to bind and gag you. And I'm going to carry you down into the cellar, and tear the wall open once again. I'm going to thrust you into the darkness and let you scream away your life and your sanity while I wall you up again with fresh cement—wall you up forever, until your body rots to match your rotten soul.

I'll be standing right behind you when you've read this far, so you won't have a chance to scream. And you won't have a chance to beg, or plead, or try any of your stupid feminine tricks with me. Not that they would do any good. No use telling me I'll be caught, either. You know better than that.

The alibi is already set. I'll leave here alone in the morning. And you'll stay here forever.

That's because everything was planned, Louise. Because, you see, I am a better man than George. He was only an animal, really. And the difference between an animal and a man is really very simple.

It's all a matter of knowing how to use your imagination.

Terror In the Night

IT MUST HAVE BEEN ABOUT two o’clock when Barbara started shaking me.

She kept saying “Wake up!” over and over again, and tugging at my shoulder. Since I’m generally a pretty sound sleeper, it took me almost a minute to come to.

Then I noticed she had the lights on and she was sitting up in her bed.

“What’s the matter?” I asked.

“There’s somebody downstairs, pounding on the door. Can’t you hear?” I listened and I heard. It certainly sounded like the door was getting a workout.

“Who the devil would be showing up here at this hour?” I asked. “Get up and find out,” Barbara told me. Which was a sensible suggestion.

So I walked over to the window and looked down. Sure enough, I could see someone standing down there, but in the shadows it was hard to make out any details. I got the funniest notion that whoever it was, was wearing a white sheet.

Now the doorbell began to ring, insistently.

Barbara said, “Well?”

“I don’t know,” I told her. “Can’t make out anything from up here. You stay where you are. I’ll go down and see.”

I went out of the bedroom and almost tripped on the stairs, because I forgot about turning on the light. I still wasn’t used to staying here in the summer place.

Of course I remembered where the hall light was, and when I got down there I switched it on. All the while the doorbell kept ringing. Then I opened the door.

There was a woman standing on the porch. She wasn't wearing a sheet, but she had on the next thing to it—some kind of long white nightgown. Not lingerie, but a real old-fashioned nightgown that came way down to her ankles. Or used to. Now it was torn and there were stains on it; dirt or grease. Her hair hung down over her eyes and she was crying or panting, or both. For a minute I didn't recognize her, and then she said, "Bob!"

"Marjorie! Come in."

I turned my head and called up to Barbara, "Come on down, honey. It's Marjorie Kingston."

There wasn't time to say anything more. Marjorie was off the porch in nothing flat, and she hung onto me as if she were afraid of drowning. Her head was right against my chest, so that I could feel her shaking, and all the while she kept mumbling something I couldn't make out. At last I got it.

She was saying, "Shut the door, please. Shut the door!"

I closed the door and steered her into the front room. I turned on one of the lamps, and she looked at me and said, "Pull the shades, Bob."

She'd stopped crying and her breathing was a little more relaxed by the time Barbara came downstairs.

Barbara didn't say anything. She just walked over to Marjorie and put her arms around her, and that was the signal for her to really let go.

I finished pulling the shades and then ducked out to the kitchen. I couldn't find any soda, but when I came back I had three glasses and the bottle of Scotch I'd bought when I went into town on Monday.

The two of them were sitting on the sofa now, and Marjorie had calmed down a little. I didn't ask if anyone wanted a drink, just poured three stiff slugs. I gave Marjorie her glass first, and she put the shot down like water.

Barbara took a sip as I sat down in the armchair, and then she looked at Marjorie and said, "What happened?"

"I ran away."

"Ran away?"

Marjorie brushed the hair out of her eyes and looked straight at her. "Oh, you needn't worry about pretending. You must have heard where I've been. At the asylum."

Barbara gave me a look but I didn't say anything. I remembered the day I bumped into Freddie Kingston at lunch in town and he told me about Marjorie. Said she'd had a nervous breakdown at school and they were sending her up to this private sanatorium at Elkdale. That must have been about three months ago. I hadn't see him since to get any further details.

I stood up. Marjorie sucked in her breath. "What's the matter?" I asked.

"Don't go," she said. "Don't call anyone. Please, Bob. I'm begging you."

"How about Freddie? Shouldn't he know?"

"Not Freddie. Not anybody, but most of all not Freddie. You don't understand, do you?"

"Suppose you tell us," Barbara suggested.

"All right." Marjorie held out her glass. "Can I have another drink, first?"

I poured for her. When she lifted the glass up I could see her fingers. The nails had been bitten all the way down.

She drank, and then all at once she was talking, even before she took the glass away from her lips.

"You see, it wouldn't do any good to tell Freddie, because he sent me there in the first place and he must have known what it was like. He has this Mona Lester, and he thought they'd kill me and then he'd be free. I had plenty of time to figure things out and I can see that now. I mean, it makes sense, doesn't it?"

I tried to catch Barbara's eye but she wasn't looking at me. She kept staring at Marjorie. And then she said, very softly, "We heard you had a nervous breakdown, dear."

Marjorie nodded. "Oh, that part's true enough. It's been coming on for a long time, only nobody knew it. That's my fault, really. I was too proud to tell anyone. About Freddie, I mean."

"What about Freddie?"

"Freddie and this Mona Lester. She's a model. He met her last year, down at the studio. They've been living together ever since. When I found out, he just laughed. He said he wanted a divorce and he'd furnish me with all the evidence I needed. Glad to. But of course I don't believe in divorce. I tried everything—I argued with him, I pleaded with him, I went down on my hands and knees to him. Nothing did any good.

"He started to stay away night after night, and weekends, too. Then he'd come back and tell me about what he'd been doing with Mona, in detail, everything. You can't imagine the things he said, and the way he'd watch me while he told me. And he used to watch me at parties, too, when we had to go out together. He said he got a kick out of seeing me pretend that everything was all right. Because nobody knew about Mona. You didn't, did you? Freddie was too smart for that. Even then he must have been planning the whole thing. Yes, I know he must, because I remember now what he said that one time—if I didn't divorce him he'd keep on until I went crazy and then he could do what he pleased." She paused for breath.

Barbara bit her lip. "Are you sure you want to talk about this?" she asked. "You mustn't get excited. . . ."

Marjorie made a sound. It took me a second to realize she was laughing, or trying to laugh. "Quit talking like a doctor," she said. "You don't have to humor me. I'm not crazy and I'm not psychotic. That's the word the doctors use, you know. Psychotic. Or when they talk to the relatives they say, 'mentally disturbed.' It isn't that way with me at all. When I broke down in class that day—English IV, my last afternoon class—it was just nerves. I had hysterics. God knows what the pupils thought. The principal had to come in and quiet me down. They sent me home and gave me a sedative, and the doctor came and he left some pills. Then Freddie came. He doped me up. I mean it. I was supposed to take two pills at the most. He gave me six. He kept on feeding me the stuff, all through the next week. When the other doctor came, and when he took me to see Corbel, and when we went to court. I was shot. By the time I came to, I was committed. He'd gotten the papers signed and everything. And I woke up in Corbels little private asylum."

I didn't look at her. I couldn't. She went on talking, louder and louder.

"That was three months ago. I've kept track of the days. The hours, even. What else was there to do? Freddie has never come to see me. And nobody else has come, either. He has it fixed with Corbel not to let them. I tried to write, until I realized the letters weren't being mailed. And if I got any letters, Corbel saw to it they weren't allowed to reach me. That's the way he runs the place. That's why they pay him so much—to keep anyone from getting in, to keep anyone from getting out. It must be costing Freddie a fortune to have me there, but it's worth it to him. And to the others."

"What others?" Barbara asked.

"The other relatives. Of the other patients, I mean. Most of them are wealthy, you know. We've got some alcoholics and some drug addicts out there, but I wouldn't say any of them were really mental cases. At least they weren't when they arrived. But Corbel does his best to drive them crazy. You can have all the liquor and shots you want. He calls it therapy. What he's really trying to do is kill them off as fast as he can. Maybe he gets an extra fee that way. He must. Particularly with the old people. The sooner they die, the sooner the relatives inherit."

"This Corbel," I said. "He's a psychiatrist?"

"He's a murderer!" Marjorie leaned forward. "Go ahead, laugh at me—it's true! I can hear. I stay awake all night and listen. I heard him and Leo beating old Mr. Scheinfarber to death two weeks ago in the hydrotherapy room. They never use it for hydrotherapy at all, you know. But when he was done screaming they dumped his body in the water and left him there. The next morning they said he'd been taking a treatment and slipped under—committed suicide. Corbel signed the certificate. I know what's going on! Poor old Mr. Scheinfarber, who only wanted to be left alone. . . . And now that sneaky son and daughter-in-law of his get all the money. Leo almost admitted as much to me."

"Who is Leo?" Barbara asked.

"One of the orderlies. Leo and Hugo. Leo's the worst; he's on night duty. He was after me from the beginning."

"What for?"

"Can't you guess?" Marjorie made that laughing sound again. "He's after most of the women patients there. Once he locked Mrs. Matthews in isolation and stayed with her for two days. She couldn't dare do anything about it; he said he'd see to it she starved to death if she wouldn't let him."

"I see," I said.

Marjorie looked at me. "You don't see. You think I'm lying to you. I can tell. But it's all true. I can prove it. That's why I ran away—to prove it. I want to get to the police. Not the sheriff or anyone around here; I think they're in cahoots with Corbel. Otherwise, how would he be able to fix things with the coroner and everyone so there isn't any fuss? But when I get to town maybe somebody will listen. We could force an investigation. That's all I want, Bob. Really it is. I don't even want to punish Freddie. I'm past that stage. I just want to help those people, those poor, hopeless people stuck away to rot and die. . . ."

Barbara reached over and patted her on the shoulder. "It's all right," she said. "It's all right. We believe you, don't we, Bob?"

"I know what it sounds like," Marjorie said, and she was calmer now. "You tell yourself such things can't happen in this day and age. And you see Doctor Corbel in town and he's such a kind, brilliant man. You go for a drive past the sanatorium and look at the building up on the hill, in among all those trees—you think it's a beautiful place, a wonderful rest home for those who can afford it. You don't notice the bars, and you never get inside the soundproof part where you could hear the screams and the moans, or see the stains on the floor in isolation. The stains that won't wash off, the stains that never wash off—"

"Another drink?" I interrupted. I didn't want to give her another drink, but I had to stop her someway.

"No thanks. I'm all right now, really I am. You'll see. It's just all this running—"

“You need rest,” Barbara nodded. “A good nights sleep before we decide anything.”

“There’s nothing to decide,” Marjorie said. “I’ve made up my mind. I want you to drive me into the city tonight so that I can make a statement right away. I don’t care if they believe me or not, just so they come out and investigate. Once they get inside, they’ll find proof. I’ll show them. All I’m asking you to do is drive me.”

“I can’t,” I said. “The car’s in the garage but the battery’s out of whack. I’m having the garage man out to fix it in the morning.”

“It may be too late then,” Marjorie said. “They’ll cover things up once they realize I’m liable to go to the authorities.”

I took a deep breath. “How did you manage to get away?” I asked her.

Marjorie put her hands down in her lap and looked at them. Her voice was very low.

“For a long while I didn’t even think about escaping. Everyone said it was impossible, and besides, even if I did, where could I go? Certainly not to Freddie or the local police. And how could I get to town safely without any money? Then I happened to remember that you folks had this summer place, and you’d be up here. It isn’t too far from Elkdale. All I needed was a good start. So I knew the thing to do, then.

“I told you about this Leo, the night orderly—the one who was always after me? I kept fighting him off all the time; I’d never take sleeping pills or even doze off while he was on duty.

“Well, tonight Leo was drinking a little. I heard him coming around in the hall, and I asked him in. I even took a drink from him, just to get him started again. He had quite a few. And then . . . I let him.”

She didn’t say anything for almost a minute. Barbara and I waited.

“After he fell asleep, I got his keys. The rest was easy. At first I couldn’t get my bearings, but then I remembered the creek running next to the highway. I kept close to the creek and waded in it at first. That was to throw them off the scent.”

“Throw who off the scent?” Barbara asked.

Marjorie's eyes widened. "The bloodhounds."

"What?"

"Didn't you know? Corbel keeps bloodhounds out there. To track down the patients, in case they ever escape." I stood up.

"Where are you going?"

"To fix your bed," I said.

"I won't sleep," Marjorie told me. "I can't. What if Leo woke up? What if he got Corbel and they called out the bloodhounds to look for me?"

"Don't you worry about a thing," I answered. "No bloodhounds can get in here. We won't let anyone harm you, Marjorie. You're overtired. You've got to rest and forget about—"

"The asylum! You're going to call Corbel!"

"Marjorie, please try—"

"I knew it! I knew it when you stood up, from the look on your face! You're going to send me back; you're going to let them kill me!"

She jumped up. Barbara reached for her and I started forward, but not in time. She hit Barbara in the face and ran. I tried to head her off from the hall, but she got there first and tugged the front door open. Then she was running, jumping off the porch and circling through the trees in back. I could see her white nightgown waving behind her. I called, but she didn't answer.

If the car had been working, I would have tried to follow her. But even so, there wouldn't have been much chance of catching up, because she wouldn't stick to the roads.

After a couple of minutes, I went back into the house and closed the door. Barbara took the glasses into the kitchen, but she didn't say anything, not even when we went upstairs. It wasn't until we switched off the light and settled down in bed that she spoke to me.

"Poor Marjorie," Barbara said. "I felt so sorry for her."

"Me, too."

"You know, for a while she almost had me believing her. Sometimes those crazy stories turn out to be true after all."

I grunted. “I know. But all that medieval stuff about killing patients in asylums—that’s just delusions of persecution.”

“Are you sure, Bob?”

“Of course I’m sure. I admit I had my doubts for a while, too. But you know what tipped the scales?”

“What?”

“When she got to that part about the bloodhounds. That did it for me. Only a nut would dream up an idea like that.”

“It bothers me, though. Don’t you think we ought to call the sheriff after all? Or this Doctor Corbel, or Freddie?”

“Why get mixed up in it?” I asked. “I mean, look at the mess we’d get into.”

“But the poor girl, running around out there all alone . . .”

“Don’t worry, they’ll get her. And she’ll be taken care of.”

“I can’t help thinking about what she said, though. Do you think the part about this Leo was true?”

“I told you, it’s delusions of persecution, Barbara. The whole works; about Freddie and his woman, about the killings—everything. Now just forget it.”

She was quiet for a minute and I was quiet for a minute, and then we heard the noise. Faint and far away it was, but I recognized it. “What’s that?” Barbara asked.

I sat up in bed, listening to it, listening to it get closer and closer. I was still listening to it when it faded off in the distance again. “What’s that?” Barbara asked, again.

“Oh, just some damned dogs on the loose,” I told her. “Lots of strays out here, you know.” But I was lying.

I’m a Southerner, born and bred, and if there’s one thing I can recognize, it’s the sound of bloodhounds. Bloodhounds, unleashed and on the scent.

I Kiss Your Shadow

Bob Bloch is himself the most urbane and charming of men, with as ready a flow of wit—pointed, yet kindly—as I have ever heard. But though (like the Mikado's) his nature is love and light, he rarely lets these elements filter into his fiction. This humorous and gentle man has written some of the ghastliest chillers of our day, such as the classic Yours Truly, Jack the Ripper or this latest tale, which opens with such deceptive quiet.

JOE ELLIOT SAT DOWN IN MY FAVorite chair, helped himself to a drink of my best whisky, and lighted one, of my special cigarettes.

I didn't object.

But when he said, "I saw your sister last night," I was ready to protest. After all, a man can only take so much.

So I opened my mouth and then realized I had nothing to say. What could I say to a statement like that? I'd heard it from his lips possibly a hundred times before, during the months of their engagement, and it sounded perfectly natural then.

It would sound perfectly natural now, except for one thing: my sister had been dead for three weeks.

Joe Elliot smiled, or tried to. The result wasn't altogether successful. "I suppose you think I'm crazy," he said. "But it's the truth. I saw Donna. Or at least, her shadow."

He still wasn't providing me with the opportunity for a sensible answer: the only thing I could do was remain silent and listen:

"She came into the bedroom and leaned over me. I've been having trouble getting to sleep, ever since the accident, but I guess you know that. Anyway, I was lying there looking up at the ceiling and trying to decide if I should get up and pull down the shade, because the moonlight was so bright. Then I turned on my side and got ready to swing my legs out of bed, and there she was. Just standing there, bending over me and holding her arms out." Elliot leaned forward. "Sure, I know what you're thinking. The moonlight was deflected by something in the room and made a shadow, and I made the rest of it myself. Or I really was asleep and didn't know it. But I know what I saw. It was Donna, all right—I'd recognize her anywhere, from the shape."

I found my voice, or a reasonable facsimile. "What did she do?" I asked.

"Do? She didn't do anything. Just stood there, holding her arms out as if she were waiting for something."

"What was she waiting for?"

Elliot stared at the floor. "This is really the hard part," he murmured. "It sounds so—well, the hell with how it sounds. When Donna and I were engaged, she had this trick of hers. We'd be talking, or perhaps getting ready to do the dishes when I ate over at her place, some ordinary thing like that. And then, all at once she'd hold out her arms. I got so I recognized the gesture. It meant she wanted to be kissed. So I'd kiss her. And—go ahead, laugh!—that's what I did last night. I got up out of bed and kissed her shadow."

I didn't laugh. I didn't do anything. I just sat there and waited for him to continue. When he showed no signs of saying anything further, I had to fill the gap. "You kissed her. And then what happened?"

"Why, nothing. She just went away."

"Disappeared?"

"No. She went away. The shadow released me and then turned around and walked through the door."

“The shadow released you,” I said. “Does that mean you—?”

He nodded. I’m not a nod-interpreter, but it was obvious that there was no defiance in his movement; only a sort of resignation. “That’s right. When I kissed her she put her arms around me. I—I saw it. And I felt it. I felt her kiss, too. Funny sensation, kissing a shadow. Real, and yet not all there.” He glanced down at the glass in his hand. “Like a watered drink.”

There was something wrong with his comparison, but then there was something wrong with the whole story. I suppose the main trouble lay in mere chronology—he’d come to me with it just about 50 years too late.

Fifty years ago, it might not have sounded quite so odd. Not in the days when people still believed in ghosts, by and large; the days when even so eminent and hardheaded a psychologist as William James was active in the Society for Psychical Research. There was a certain receptivity then to the sentimental approach—undying love, capable of reaching beyond the grave, and all that sort of thing. But to hear it now was wrong.

The only thing that kept me from coming right out and saying so was the realization that there was another aspect to the business even wronger than the rest. Joe Elliot himself. He was the professional skeptic, the confirmed scoffer.

Of course, maybe the shock of Donna’s death . . .

“Don’t say it,” he sighed. “I know how cockeyed and corny it all sounds, and I know what you’re thinking. I won’t argue with you. The accident did hit me pretty hard, you understand that. And I admit I was in some kind of shock-state when they pulled me out of the car down there in the ravine. But I snapped out of it before the funeral. You know that, too. And if you don’t believe it, just check with Doc Foster.”

My turn to nod.

“I was all right at the funeral and after,” he continued. “You’ve seen me almost every day since then. Have you noticed anything . . . offbeat?”

“No.”

“So it wasn’t just imagination. It couldn’t be.”

“Then what’s your answer?”

He stood up. “I have no answer. I just wanted to tell you what happened. Because it’s one of those things where you must tell someone, and you’re the logical person. I can trust you not to go around repeating it. Besides, you’re her brother, and there’s a chance that she might—come to you.”

Joe Elliot moved to the door. “Leaving so soon?” I asked. “Tired,” he said. “I didn’t sleep very much last night, afterwards.”

“Look,” I said. “How about a sedative? I’ve got some stuff here that—”

“Thanks, but I’d rather not.” He opened the door. “I’ll call you in a day or so. We can have lunch together.”

“You’re sure you’re—”

“Yes, I’m all right.” He smiled and went out.

I frowned and stayed in. I was still frowning as I got ready for bed. Something was definitely wrong with Elliot’s story and that meant something was definitely wrong with Elliot. I wished I knew the answer.

“There’s a chance that she might—come to you.”

I crawled between the sheets and noted that the moonlight was bright on my ceiling tonight, too. But I didn’t look at the moonlight very long. I closed my eyes and contemplated the chance. It seemed to be a very slim one, as chances go.

My sister Donna was dead and in her grave. I hadn’t seen her die, but I was the first one summoned right after the accident, as soon as the police arrived on the scene. I saw them lift her out of the crumpled car, and she was dead, no doubt about it. I didn’t like to think about seeing her. I didn’t like to think about seeing Joe Elliot, either, shaking in shock; unconscious of my presence, unconscious of the gash in his forehead, unconscious even of the fact that Donna was dead. He’d kept talking to her while they carried her to the ambulance, trying to make her understand that it was an accident, there was oil-slick on the road, the car had skidded. But Donna never heard him because she was already dead. She had died when her head went through the windshield.

That’s what they thought at the inquest, too. Verdict of accidental death. And surely the morticians who embalmed her had no doubts, nor did the minister who preached the sermon over her casket, the workmen who lowered her body into the grave out there at Forest Hills. Donna was dead.

And now, three weeks later, Joe Elliot came to me and said, "I saw your sister. Or at least, her shadow." Hardheaded Joe, a rewrite man on the desk and cynical as they come, kissing a shadow. He had said she stood there with her arms extended and he recognized her.

Well, I hadn't seen fit to mention it, but I recognized that particular gesture from his description. Because it so happens I'd seen it myself, long before Joe Elliot came into the picture. Way back when Donna was engaged to Frankie Hankins, she used to pull the same trick with him. I wondered if Frankie had heard the news yet, over there in Japan. He'd enlisted and that broke the affair up.

Come to remember, there was another time Donna used the open-arms technique. With Gil Turner. Of course, that hadn't lasted, it was obvious from the start: Turner was just a namby-pamby. Surprised everybody to see a wishy-washy character like him pull up stakes and leave town in such a hurry.

It must have surprised Donna, too, but not for long. Because just about that time I introduced her to Joe Elliot and the heat was on.

There was no question about this being the big thing for both of them. They were engaged inside of a month, and planning to be married before the summer was out. Donna just took over, lock, stock and barrel.

Of course I'd always known my sister was a determined woman (let's face it, she made a habit of getting her own way, and she was a hellcat if you crossed her) but it was interesting to watch how she worked on Joe Elliot. Talk about Pygmalion—here was one case where Galatea reversed the play. Before anyone knew it, Joe Elliot was out of his sloppy sports jacket and into gray tweeds, out of smelly cigars and into briar pipes, out of cuppa-cawfee-'n-a-hamburger and into Donna's comfortable little apartment for regular evening meals.

Oh, she made a lot of changes in that boy! Got so that he was shaving twice a day, and he trotted around the corner to the bank with his paycheck instead of over to Smitty’s Tap.

I had to give Donna credit. She knew what she wanted, and she knew just how to get it. Maybe she was ruthless, but she was feminine-ruthless. She remade Joe Elliot, but she also made him like it. He certainly didn’t seem to object. I got so used to the new Elliot that I virtually forgot about the old one—the old one who used to sit in Smitty’s and swear a mighty oath that the girl didn’t breathe who could ensnare him into unholy dreadlock.

By the time the wedding drew near, Donna was already openly talking about their plans for buying a house—“You can’t raise a family in an apartment”—and Elliot would listen and actually grin.

(“And another thing,” he used to say, shaking his finger at Smitty in solemn warning, “I may be a poor downtrodden wage-slave, but you’ll never catch me being a house-slave. Or turning into that typical figure of fun—the American Father. Dear Old Dad, the butt of every family radio and TV show in the country! Not for me. I believe in the old saying: children should be seen and not had.”)

But this was before Donna. Before, I suppose, he found out how nice it is to have a woman around who lights your pipe, and straightens your tie, and fixes the fried potatoes at just the right time so they won’t get soggy when the steak is served. Before he found out what it is to have somebody who holds out her arms and doesn’t say anything, except with her eyes.

This much I was sure of: Donna wasn’t playing any trick. She loved the guy. She died loving him, the night they were driving back from my party. That part was real.

Everything was real, up to now. Now, and Joe Elliot’s story of the shadow.

I looked up at the shimmering ceiling. Somehow, here in the dark, with its mingling of moonlight, I could almost begin to believe.

Maybe we’re not quite so sophisticated as we like to think we are; ghosts happen to be unfashionable, and the concept of love conquering the grave went out with Outward Bound. But set a sophisticate down in the pitch-black bowels of a haunted house, bar the exit, and leave him there for the night. Maybe his hair won't turn white by morning; still, there'll be some reaction. Intellectually, we reject. Emotionally, we're not so sure. Not when the chips are down and the lights are low.

Well, the lights were low and I kept waiting for Donna to come. I waited and waited, and finally I guess I just fell asleep.

I told Joe Elliot about it at lunch two days later. "She never showed." He cocked his head at me. "Of course not," he answered. "She couldn't. She was at my place."

I finally managed to speak. "Again?"

"Two nights ago, and last night."

"Same thing?"

"Same thing." He hesitated. "Only—she stayed longer."

"How much longer?"

More than hesitation now; a lasting silence. Until he brushed his napkin from his lap, stooped down to pick it up, and barely whispered, "All night."

I didn't ask the next question. I didn't have to. One look at his face was enough.

"She's real," Elliot said. "Donna. The shadow. You remember what I said the first time? About the watered whisky?" He leaned forward. "It's not like that now. Maybe they get stronger once they break through. Do you think that's it? They learn the way, and then they get stronger."

He was close enough so that I could smell his breath, and he hadn't been drinking—any more than he'd been drinking the night of the accident. I'd testified to that, and it helped seal the verdict.

No, Elliot wasn't drunk. I wished to heaven he was, so I wouldn't have to say what I was going to say. But I had to.

"Why don't you take a run up to see Doc Foster?" I asked him.

Joe Elliot spread his palms on the table. "I knew you'd say that," he grinned. "So I already called him this morning, for an appointment."

I managed to withhold the sigh of relief, but it was there, and I could feel it. For a minute I'd been afraid of an argument—not because I dreaded arguments, but because of what it would imply about Elliot. I was glad to see he hadn't gone completely overboard.

"You needn't worry," he assured me. "I know what Doc will tell me. Sedatives, relaxation, and if that doesn't work, see a head-shrinker. And if he does, I'll follow orders."

"Promise?"

"Sure." He gave me the grin again, but this time it was a little twisted. "Want to know something funny? I'm beginning to be a bit scared of that sister of yours—even if she is only a shadow."

I put a large No Comment sign on my face and we went out together in silence. We separated in the street—I went back to the office and Elliot went over to Doc Foster's.

I didn't learn about his visit for several days. Because when I got back to the office they had a surprise for me.

The same newspaper employing Joe Elliot on the rewrite desk sees fit to retain me in the capacity of roving correspondent. And the M.E. was waiting for me with a suggestion that I rove in the direction of IndoChina. As of two days from now, with all watches synchronized.

I got busy. So busy that I never managed to call Joe Elliot. So busy that if he called me, I wasn't around to get the message.

He finally reached me at the airport, actually, just before I took off for the west coast and the first leg of the flight.

"Sorry I couldn't be on hand," he said. "Bon voyage and all that."

"You sound pretty happy."

"Why not?"

"Doc's sedatives do the trick?" He chuckled. "Not exactly. When I told him, he didn't even bother with the first part of the routine. Sent me packing right away to the you-know-who. Name of Partridge. Heard of him?"

I had. "Good man," I said.

"The best." He paused. "Well, I mustn't keep you . . ."

"You're all right?" My voice was insistent.

"Sure. I'm fine. I sailed for the works. Some of the things the guy told me make sense. I guess I'm more tangled up than I thought—oh, not just what I told you about, but there are other angles. Anyway, I'm going in to him twice a week for I don't know how long. And it's not as phony as I thought it might be, either. None of this couch business. He really gets results." Another pause. "I mean, I've been there just twice, and she's gone."

"The shadow, you mean?"

"The guilt-fantasy." He chuckled again. "See, I'm picking up the lingo already. Time you come back, I'll be ready to hang out my shingle. Well, lots of luck, kid. And keep in touch."

"Will do," I said. And hung up, listening to them announce my flight. And took the flight, and made my transfer in Frisco, and went to Manila, and went from there to Singapore, and from there to hell.

It was hot as hell in hell, and although I managed to get enough dispatches back to satisfy my M.E., I had no opportunity to keep in touch.

You know what happened in Indo-China, and when they opened a branch hell in Formosa, my M.E. sent me over there, and when hell got too hot for even a roving correspondent I was based in Manila and then Japan. I'm not trying to make a production out of it; just explaining why it turned out that I was gone for eight months instead of eight weeks.

When I got back they gave me a leave, and some information. Not much, but just enough to send me scurrying around to Joe Elliot's apartment the first opportunity I got.

I didn't waste any time on hello-how-are-you. "What's this I hear about your leaving the paper?" I began.

He shrugged. "I didn't leave. I got canned."

"Why?"

"Hitting the sauce."

He looked it, too. The sports jacket was back, and it was dirty. He wasn't bothering to shave once a day, either, let alone twice. He was thin, and twitchy.

"Let's have it," I said. "What happened with you?"

"Nothing."

"Quit stalling. What does Partridge say?"

He gave me a grin, and to say it was twisted doesn't even begin to describe it. They could have made a cast and used it to cut pretzels with.

"Partridge," he echoed. "Sit down. Have a drink."

"All right, but keep talking. I asked you a question. What does Partridge say?"

He poured for me. I was a guest; I got a glass. He gulped out of the bottle. Then he put it down. "Partridge doesn't say anything any more," he told me. "Partridge is dead."

"No."

"Yes."

"When did this happen?"

"Month or so back."

"Why didn't you go to another hea—psychiatrist?"

"What? And have him jump out of the window, too?"

"What's all this about jumping out of a window?"

He picked up the bottle. "That's what I'd like to know." Gulp. "Personally, I'm not even sure he jumped. Maybe he was pushed."

"Are you trying to tell me—?"

"No. I'm not trying to tell you anything. Any more than I'd try to tell Doc Foster or the boys down at the office. You can't tell anyone a story like that. Just got to keep it to yourself. Yourself and the little old bottle." Gulp.

"But you said—I mean, you sounded as if everything was going so well."

"That's right. And it went fine. Up to a point."

"What point?"

"The point where I found out why she wasn't coming back any more." He stared out of the window, and then he went a million miles away and only his voice remained. I could hear what he said, plainly enough. Too plainly.

“She wasn’t coming back to me because she was going to him. Night after night after night. Not with her arms out—not the way she’d come to me, in love. She went to him out of hate. Because she knew he was trying to drive her away. Don’t you see, when he worked on me it was like . . . like exorcism. You know what exorcism is, don’t you? Casting out demons. Ghosts. A succubus.”

“Joe, you’ve got to stop this. Get hold of yourself.”

He laughed. “All I can get hold of is this.” And reached for the bottle, as he spoke. “You’re asking me to stop this? But I didn’t start it. I didn’t make it up. Partridge told me himself. Finally he broke down and he had to tell me. Do you get the picture now?—he came to me for help. And I couldn’t help him. I was getting well, there’s a laugh for you, I was getting over my delusions. I talked to him the way you’re trying to talk to me, real Dutch uncle stuff.

“And I went out of his office, and the next morning I read where he jumped. Only he didn’t jump—she must have pushed him—he was afraid of her, she kept getting stronger and stronger, just as I thought she would. They found him spattered all over the sidewalk—”

This time I reached for the bottle. “So you quit your job and started drinking, just because a psychiatrist cracked up and committed suicide,” I said. “Because one poor overworked guy went to pieces, you had to do likewise. I thought you were smarter than that, Joe.”

“So did I.” He took the bottle away from me. “You heard what I told you. I thought I was completely well. Even when he died, I still wasn’t sure about some things. Until that night, when she came back.”

I watched him drink and waited.

“Sure. She came back. And she’s been coming back, every night, since then. I can’t fight it off, I can’t fight her off, she keeps clinging and clinging to me. But why try to explain? You don’t believe me anyway. I saw the look on your face when I mentioned the part about a succubus.”

“Please,” I said. “I want to hear the rest. I’ve read about those things, you know. A succubus takes the form of a woman and comes to men at night—”

He was nodding and then he cut in. “So that explains it, don’t you see? What she was whispering to me. I guess I didn’t tell you, but she talks now. She talks to me, she tells me things. She says she’s glad, and it won’t be long now, then she’ll have everything she wanted—”

His voice trailed off, and I stood up just in time to catch him as he slumped. He was out cold; his body was limp and light in my arms. Too light. He must have lost a lot of weight. I guess Joe Elliot had lost a lot of things.

I suppose I could have tried to bring him around, but I didn’t make the effort. It seemed kinder just to carry him over to the bed, take off his things and let him rest. I found pajamas in one of the bureau drawers, got them on him—it was like dressing a rag doll instead of a man—and covered him up. Then I left him. He’d sleep now, sleep without shadows.

And while he slept, I’d figure out something. There had to be an answer. Because Donna was my sister and I’d loved her, and because Joe Elliot was my friend, there had to be an answer.

If Partridge were only alive. If I could just talk to him and find out what he’d really learned about this delusion! He must have learned something, in eight months. Even if Elliot deliberately tried to hold back, in eight months a man like Partridge would learn—

The thought hit me then; a stinging blow. I tried to duck. But it hit harder and this time there was a numbing reaction.

“No,” I told myself. “No.”

I kept telling myself no, but I was telling the cab-driver to take me down to the office again. I told myself no, but I told the M.E. I wanted all the stuff in the house on Partridge’s suicide.

Then I was reading it, and then I was over at the Coroner’s office, checking the report of the inquest.

I didn’t ask any fancy questions, and I didn’t do any fancy detective work. That’s out of my line. I won’t pretend to have done anything more except to jump at a wild conclusion. That’s all the records showed—

Partridge had jumped to a wild conclusion.

But knowing what I did, I was more inclined to agree with Joe Elliot. Partridge hadn't jumped; he'd been pushed.

There wasn't a single solitary thing I could hang onto as tangible evidence; nothing to build a case around. But I checked and rechecked, and I fitted the pieces together and then everything shattered apart when I recognized the picture.

I left the Coroner's office and went over to Smitty's Tap and drank a very late supper, not talking to anyone. I didn't know who to talk to now—surely not the Coroner, or the D.A., or the cops. They couldn't help, because I had no evidence. Besides, I owed Joe Elliot a chance.

There was still the shadow of a doubt. A shadow named Donna, who'd come back. Maybe she'd be coming back tonight, but I wasn't going to wait.

After a while it was quite late, but I was on my way, back to Elliot's apartment. Chances were that he was still sleeping, and I hoped so in a way. Then again, I knew I had to see him now.

I went up the stairs slowly, one voice saying let him sleep and the other voice saying let him sleep and the two of them fighting together, let him sleep—knock—let him sleep—knock—

It turned out that neither voice won, because when I got to the door, Joe Elliot opened it and looked out.

He was awake all right, and maybe he'd been back to the bottle again and maybe he hadn't: he looked as if he'd swallowed strychnine. And his voice was the voice of a man with a burned throat.

"Come in," he said. "I was just going out."

"In your pajamas?"

"I had an errand—"

"It can wait," I told him.

"Yes. It can wait." He led me inside, closed the door. "Sit down," he murmured. "I'm glad you're here."

I sat down, but I kept a grip on the arms of the chair, ready to move in a hurry if necessary. And I waited very carefully until he sat down, too, before I spoke.

“Maybe you won’t be so glad when I speak my piece,” I said.

“Go ahead. It doesn’t matter what you say now.”

“Yes it does, Joe. I want you to listen carefully. This is important.”

“Nothing’s important.”

“We’ll see. After I left you this afternoon, I did a little investigating. I went to the Coroner’s office, among other things. And I agree with you now. Partridge was pushed out of the window.”

For the first time his face showed interest. “Then I was right, wasn’t I?” he began. “She did push him, you found some evidence—”

I shook my head. “I didn’t find any evidence. Not any new evidence.

I just began to check the facts and see if they fitted in with a theory of my own. They did.” I spoke very slowly, very deliberately. “I checked on one particular phase of the report, Joe. The account you gave of your own movements after leaving Partridge’s office the day he jumped. The whole story about not taking the elevator down because it was crowded and you were in a hurry to get to the office. And the part about not going to the office after all because you remembered you’d forgotten your hat and went back upstairs to get it. And how you came in just as they were looking out the window where Partridge had jumped.

“I read it all, Joe. I read your account of the last meeting with Partridge, how upset he seemed. Only I was a special reader.”

He was more than interested now; he was alert.

“They tried pretty hard to break down your story, didn’t they, Joe? Only they couldn’t, because there was no evidence to the contrary, and what you said made sense. About how Partridge was fidgeting and nervous and kept looking out the window. About how jumpy he’d been the past few weeks. Good word, that jumpy. Good enough for the coroner’s jury, anyway. But not good enough for me.

“Because you didn’t mention anything about the shadow in your story to the jury. You told something entirely different.”

He hit the arm of his chair hard. “Of course I did, man I I couldn’t tell them what I told you, they’d think I was crazy.”

“But you were crazy, Joe. Crazy enough so that your story to me makes sense. Partridge didn’t jump, he was pushed—and you pushed him.”

Joe Elliot made a noise in his chest. Something came out of his mouth that sounded like, “Why?”

“I wish I knew the answer to that. The real answer. All I can do is guess. And my guess is that there wasn’t anything to this story of yours about Partridge being afraid of a shadow. My guess is that you were the one who was afraid—because in session after session, Partridge kept getting nearer and nearer to something you didn’t want him to find. Something you tried to hide, but couldn’t. Something he, as a trained analyst, found anyway. Or was on the very verge of finding. When you realized that, you panicked—and destroyed him.”

“Rave on,” he said.

“All right, I will. Joe, you’re not crazy. You never were. I think this is all an act. You wouldn’t murder a man except for a very important reason. Whatever Partridge found out, or was about to find out, was something vitally necessary for you to conceal.”

“Such as?”

“Such as the fact that you killed my sister.”

The words hit the wall and bounced. The words hit his face and twisted it up into the gargoyle grin, the spasmodic twitch.

“All right. So you know.”

“Then it’s true,” I said.

“Of course it’s true. But what you don’t know is why. You wouldn’t know, and you’re her own brother. How could I expect anyone else to understand if you never saw it? What Donna was really like, I mean. The way she tried to fasten her claws into me, pulling me down, trying to possess me, never letting go for an instant. Sure I loved her, she knew how to make a man love her, she had a thousand tricks to drive you mad with wanting her, holding out her arms was just the beginning. But that wasn’t enough, to possess me that way. She had to have everything, she wanted every minute, every movement, every thought. She was making me over and trying to turn me into all the things I always hated. I could see it, I knew what lay ahead, a life of slavery to her house and her kids and her future."

He stopped because he had to, and I said, "Why didn't you get out, then? Break the engagement?"

"I tried. Don't you think I tried? But she wouldn't let go. Not her, not Donna. Even then she was a succubus. She had her claws in me and she wanted to drain me. I can't help it; there was something about her, and when she came into my arms I couldn't break free because then I didn't want to any more.

"But when I was alone again, I wanted to. You never heard about this part, but just before your party, I tried to sneak out of town. She caught me. There was a scene—or there would have been, except that Donna never made scenes. She made love. Do you understand?"

I nodded.

"And after that I was sick. Not physically sick, but worse than that. Because I knew it would always be this way: me trying to get free and her clawing me back. There'd always be a succubus. Unless I got rid of her."

Another pause, another breath, and then he rushed on. "It wasn't difficult. I knew the spot on the road where the rail hung over the edge of the ravine. I had a wrench in the car. You remember we left late, and the road was deserted. When we got to the ravine I suggested we park and look at the moon. Donna liked that kind of suggestion. So then I—I hit her. And sent the car over. And went down myself, and finished cracking the windshield and gave myself a gash in the forehead and crawled into the car. I didn't have to do much pretending about the shock. Only it was a shock of relief, because I knew now she was really dead."

I put my hands in my lap. "And that's what Partridge was on the verge of finding out, isn't it?" I asked. "All this business about the shadow was just what he told you it was—a guilt fantasy. You felt compelled to spring it on me first because of the guilt-feeling, and you didn’t want to tell Partridge anything about the possible cause of the delusion. Only he kept probing until he was too close for safety. If our safety, and his. So you killed again.”

“No.”

“Why bother to deny it? You’ve already confessed to one murder, so—”

“Killing Donna wasn’t murder,” he said. “It was self-defense. And that’s the end of it. I didn’t kill Partridge, no matter what you think. She did.

“I told you how she went to him night after night, torturing him, breaking him down, trying to get him to the point where he was ready to jump.

“And when he told me, that day in his office, I couldn’t stand it. So I got ready to explain, I was going to tell him the truth about the shadow and what I’d done.

“I remember he was bending over me, asking me about the accident, and then he straightened up and looked surprised and I saw that she was there. A shadow, but not a shadow on the wall. A shadow in the room, right beside us, tugging at his arm. And he tried to scream but there was this blackness over his mouth, her hand, and she was pulling him over to the window, and his feet made little scuffing noises sliding along the carpet, and he tried to grab the window frame, but the shadow is strong and the shadow laughed so you could hear it above the scream when he went down and down and down—”

He snapped out of it suddenly, “Too bad you weren’t here earlier tonight. You’d have believed me then, because you would have seen her. She came a while before you arrived and woke me. Said she wanted me to go out there, because there was a surprise. Something to show me. At first I didn’t know what she was hinting at, but I know now. You see, I counted back, but you’d only laugh. I could take you along to look, too, but you’d laugh and—”

“I’m not laughing, Joe,” I said.

“Well, you’d better not. She wouldn’t like that. She wouldn’t like to have anyone get in her way. And she’s so strong now, stronger than anyone. She’s already proved that. I’m going to do what she says. Now that she has a real claim on me, nothing can stop her.”

I stood up. “But she can be stopped. There’s a way, you know.”

“You mean you believe in exorcism now?”

“Joe,” I said, “you’re partially exorcised already. By confessing to me you’ve rid yourself of a portion of her power. You might have banished her forever if you’d succeeded in telling Partridge the truth, because he represented authority to you. That’s the answer, Joe. You’ve got to tell this to an authority. Then there won’t be any more guilt-feelings or guilt-fantasy, either. You’ll remember what actually happened to Partridge, and once they understand the situation you can put in a plea. I’ll help you all I can. There’s a pretty smart lawyer downtown who—”

Now Elliot stood up. “I get it,” he murmured. “You’re humoring me because I’m a psycho and that’s what you want them all to think. Maybe you’re afraid she’ll be coming after you, too. Well, don’t worry. She won’t, unless you try to stand in her way. I’m the one she really wants, and I’m going to her. I want to see—”

“Listen, Joe,” I began, but he wasn’t listening.

He reached out suddenly and his hand swept across the tabletop, gripped the half-empty bottle, raised it, and smashed it down until it shattered. Then he took a quick step forward, swinging the glittering weapon.

The whole operation from start to finish was almost instantaneous, and it silenced me.

He stood there, holding the jagged length of glass that splintered down from the broken bottletop.

“Sorry to cut you off,” he said. “Now you’d better go. Before I really cut you off.”

I took one step forward. The gargoyle grin returned to his face, and I took two steps backward.

“I’m the one she wants,” he said. “You can’t stop me. And no sense going to the cops. They can’t stop me, either. She won’t let them.”

I should have jumped him then, even though he was a maniac with a broken bottle in his hand for a weapon. I often wonder what would have happened if I had jumped him.

But I didn't.

I turned and ran, ran out of the apartment and down the stairs and through the hall and into the street, and I kept telling myself it wasn't just because I was afraid. I had to find help, this was a job for the police.

There was a call-box two blocks down and around the corner, and I used it. I suppose it didn't take more than five minutes between the time I left the apartment and the time I got back to meet the squad car as it pulled up.

That was enough, however. Joe Elliot had disappeared. They sent out a prowl, and they put it on the police broadcast band, and you'd think a pajama-clad man would be easy to spot on a deserted city street.

But it wasn't until I broke down and told them where I thought Joe Elliot was headed for that we got any action—and then it was because we piled into the squad car and drove all the way out to Forest Hills.

He couldn't have made the trip out there in that time on foot. He must have stolen a car, although they never found one or heard a report of a missing vehicle.

But he was there, of course, lying across her grave. And he'd been digging long enough to claw down a good six inches through the thick turf and solid soil.

That's when the stroke must have hit him. They never did agree as to the exact cause. The point is, he was dead.

And that left me to answer the questions.

I tried.

I tried to answer questions, and at the same time to leave out all the crazy stuff, the unfashionable stuff about ghosts and shadows and a succubus that kept getting stronger and stronger. They brought up the idea of a love reaching past the grave; it was their own idea, only of course they thought he was trying to reach her.

I tried to keep the murder part out of it too—because there was no sense opening that up now.

But they were the ones who finally got around to it, and they opened it up. The case, I mean. And then the grave.

They dug down the rest of the way through the thick turf and solid soil; dug down to what hadn’t been disturbed for ten long months.

And they found her, all right, although there were no marks or anything to prove murder. No proof at all.

And there was no explanation for what else they found, either. The tiny body of a newborn infant in Donna’s intact coffin—lying there just as dead as Donna was.

Or just as alive.

I can’t make up my mind which is which any more. And of course the police keep asking me questions for which there are no answers. None that they’d believe.

I can’t tell them Donna wanted Joe so badly even death couldn’t deny her. I can’t tell them she came to him at the last and summoned him proudly, that he went out to Forest Hills to see their child.

Because there is no such thing as a succubus. And a shadow does not speak, or move, or hold out its arms.

Or does it?

I don’t know. I just lie in bed at night, now, when the bottle is empty, and look up at the ceiling. Waiting. Maybe I’ll see a shadow. Or shadows.

All On A Golden Afternoon

Among the many subjects which Robert Bloch knows well are Hollywood, psychiatry and the works of Lewis Carroll. But all three together, and you have one of the most fascinatingly unclassifiable novelets to reach this editorial desk in a long time. Try a spot of classification yourself when you've finished it. Is it fantasy? Science fiction? Or possibly just a simple truthful explanation of the nature of dreams?

THE UNIFORMED MAN AT THE GATE was very polite, but he didn't seem at all in a hurry to open up. Neither Dr. Prager's new Cadillac nor his old goatee made much of an impression on him.

It wasn't until Dr. Prager snapped, "But I've an appointment—Mr. Dennis said it was urgent!" that the uniformed man turned and went into the little phone booth to call the big house on the hill.

Dr. Saul Prager tried not to betray his impatience, but his right foot pressed down on the accelerator and a surrogate of exhaust did his fuming for him.

Just how far he might have gone in polluting the air of Bel-Air couldn't be determined, for after a moment the man came out of the booth and unlocked the gate. He touched his cap and smiled.

"Sorry to keep you waiting, Doctor," he said. "You're to go right up."

Dr. Prager nodded curtly and the car moved forward.

“I’m new on this job and you got to take precautions, you know,” the man called after him, but Dr. Prager wasn’t listening. His eyes were fixed on the panorama of the hillside ahead. In spite of himself he was mightily impressed.

There was reason to be—almost half a million dollars’ worth of reason. The combined efforts of a dozen architects, topiarists and landscape gardeners had served to create what was popularly known as “the Garden of Eden.” Although the phrase was a complimentary reference to Eve Eden, owner of the estate, there was much to commend it in its literal sense, Dr. Prager decided. That is, if one can picture a Garden of Eden boasting two swimming pools, an eight-car garage, and a corps of resident angels with power mowers, pruning shears, and hoses.

This was by no means Dr. Prager’s first visit, but he never failed to be moved by the spectacle of the palace on the hill. It was a fitting residence for Eve, the First Woman. The First Woman of the Ten Box Office Leaders, that is.

The front door was already open when he parked in the driveway, and the butler smiled and bowed. He was, Dr. Prager knew, a genuine English butler, complete with accent and sideburns. Eve Eden had insisted upon that, and she’d had one devil of a time obtaining an authentic specimen from the employment agencies. Finally she’d managed to locate one—from Central Casting.

“Good afternoon,” the butler greeted him. “Mr. Dennis is in the library, sir. He is expecting you.”

Dr. Prager followed the manservant through the foyer and down the hall. Everything was furnished with magnificent taste—as Mickey Dennis often observed, “Why not? Didn’t we hire the least inferior interior decorator in Beverly Hills?”

The library itself was a remarkable example of calculated decor. Replete with the traditional overstuffed chairs, custom-made by a firm of reliable overstuffers, it boasted paneled walnut walls, polished mahogany floors, and a good quarter-mile of bookshelves rising to the vaulted ceiling. Dr.

Prager's glance swept the shelves, which were badly in need of dusting anyway. He noted a yard of Thackeray in green, two yards of brown Thomas Hardy, complemented by a delicate blue Dostoievsky. Ten feet of Balzac, five feet of Dickens, a section of Shakespeare, a mass of Moliere. Complete works, of course. The booksellers would naturally want to give Eve Eden the works. There must have been two thousand volumes on the shelves.

In the midst of it all sat Mickey Dennis, the agent, reading a smudged and dog-cared copy of Confidential.

As Dr. Prager stood hesitant in the doorway, the little man rose and beckoned to him. "Hey, Doc!" he called. "I been waiting for you!"

"Sorry," Dr. Prager murmured. "There were several appointments I couldn't cancel."

"Never mind the appointments. You're on retainer with us, aincha? Well, sweetheart, this time you're really gonna earn it."

He shook his head as he approached. "Talk about trouble," he muttered —although Dr. Prager had not even mentioned the subject. "Talk about trouble, we got it. I ain't dared call the Studio yet. If I did there'd be wigs floating all over Beverly Hills. Had to see you first. And you got to see her."

Dr. Prager waited. A good fifty per cent of his professional duties consisted of waiting. Meanwhile he indulged in a little private speculation. What would it be this time? Another overdose of sleeping pills—a return to narcotics—an attempt to prove the old maxim that absinthe makes the heart grow fonder? He'd handled Eve Eden before in all these situations, and topped it off with more routine assignments, such as the time she'd wanted to run off with the Mexican chauffeur. Come to think of it, that hadn't been exactly routine. Handling Eve was bad, handling the chauffeur was worse, but handling the chauffeur's wife and seven children was a nightmare. Still, he'd smoothed things over. He always smoothed things over, and that's why he was on a fat yearly retainer.

Dr. Prager, as a physician, generally disapproved of obesity, but when it came to yearly retainers he liked them plump. And this was one of the plumpest. Because of it he was ready for any announcement Mickey Dennis wanted to make.

The agent was clutching his arm now. “Doc, you gotta put the freeze on her, fast! This time it’s murder!”

Despite himself, Dr, Prager blanched. He reached up and tugged reassuringly at his goatee. It was still there, the symbol of his authority. He had mastered the constriction in his vocal chords before he started to speak. “You mean she’s killed someone?”

“No!” Mickey Dennis shook his head in disgust. “That would be bad enough, but we could handle it. I was just using a figger of speech, like. She wants to murder herself, Doc. Murder her career, throw away a brand-new seven-year noncancellable no-option contract with a percentage of the gross. She wants to quit the Industry.”

“Leave pictures?”

“Now you got it, Doc. She’s gonna walk out on four hundred grand a year.”

There was real anguish in the agent’s voice—the anguish of a man who is well aware that ten percent of four hundred thousand can buy a lot of convertibles.

“You gotta see her,” Dennis moaned. “You gotta talk her out of it, fast.”

Dr. Prager nodded. “Why does she want to quit?” he asked.

Mickey Dennis raised his hands. “I don’t know,” he wailed. “She won’t give any reasons. Last night she just up and told me. Said she was through. And when I asked her politely just what the hell’s the big idea, she dummied up. Said I wouldn’t understand.” The little man made a sound like trousers ripping in a tragic spot. “Damned right I wouldn’t understand! But I want to find out.”

Dr. Prager consulted his beard again with careful fingers. “I haven’t seen her for over two months,” he said. “How has she been behaving lately? I mean, otherwise?”

“Like a doll,” the agent declared. “Just a living doll. To look at her, you wouldn’t of thought there was anything in her head but sawdust. Wrapped up the last picture clean, brought it in three days ahead of schedule. No blowups, no goofs, no nothing. She hasn’t been hitting the sauce or anything else. Stays home mostly and goes to bed early. Alone, yet.” Mickey Dennis made the pants-ripping sound again. “I might of figgered it was too good to be true.”

“No financial worries?” Dr. Prager probed.

Dennis swept his arm forward to indicate the library and the expanse beyond. “With this? All clear and paid for. Plus a hunk of real estate in Long Beach and two oil wells gushing like Lolly Parsons over a hot scoop. She’s got more loot than Fort Knox and almost as much as Crosby.”

“Er—how old is Eve, might I ask?”

“You might ask, and you might get some funny answers. But I happen to know. She’s thirty-three. I can guess what you’re thinking, Doc, and it don’t figger. She’s good for another dozen years, maybe more. Hell, all you got to do is look at her.”

“That’s just what I intend to do,” Dr. Prager replied. “Where is she?”

“Upstairs, in her room. Been there all day. Won’t see me.” Mickey Dennis hesitated. “She doesn’t know you’re here, either. I said I was gonna call you and she got kind of upset.”

“Didn’t want to see me, eh?”

“She said if that long-eared nanny-goat got within six miles of this joint she’d—” The agent paused and shifted uncomfortably.

“Like I mentioned, she was upset.”

“I think I can handle the situation,” Dr. Prager decided.

“Want me to come along and maybe try and soften her up a little?”

“That won’t be necessary.” Dr. Prager left the room, walking softly.

Mickey Dennis went back to his chair and picked up the magazine once more. He didn’t read, because he was waiting for the sound of the explosion.

When it came he shuddered and almost gritted his teeth until he remembered how much it would cost to buy a new upper plate. Surprisingly enough, the sound of oaths and shrieks subsided after a time and Dennis breathed a deep sigh of relief.

The Doc was a good headshrinker. He'd handle her. He was handling her. So there was nothing to do now but relax.

"Relax," Dr. Prager said. "You've discharged all your aggression. Now you can stretch out. That's better."

The spectacle of Eve Eden stretched out in relaxation on a chaise longue was indeed better. In the words of many eminent lupine Hollywood authorities, it was the best.

Eve Eden's legs were long and white and her hair was long and blonde; both were now displayed to perfection, together with a whole series of coming attractions screened through her semitransparent lounging pajamas. The face that launched a thousand close-ups was that of a petulant child, well-versed in the more statutory phases of juvenile delinquency.

Dr. Prager could cling to his professional objectivity only by clinging to his goatee. As it was, he dislodged several loose hairs and an equal number of loose impulses before he spoke again.

"Now," he said. "Tell me all about it."

"Why should I?" Eve Eden's eyes and voice were equally candid. "I didn't ask you to come here. I'm not in any jam."

"Mr. Dennis said you're thinking of leaving pictures."

"Mr. Dennis is a cockeyed liar. I'm not thinking of leaving. I've left, period. Didn't he call the lawyers? Hasn't he phoned the studio? I told him to."

"I wouldn't know," Dr. Prager soothed.

"Then he's the one who's in a jam," Eve Eden announced, happily. "Sure, I know why he called you. You're supposed to talk me out of it, right? Well, it's no dice, Doc. I made up my mind."

“Why?”

“None of your business.”

Dr. Prager leaned forward. “But it is my business, Wilma.”

“Wilma?”

Dr. Prager nodded, his voice softening. “Wilma Kozmowski. Little Wilma Kozmowski. Have you forgotten that I know all about her? The little girl whose mother deserted her. Who ran away from home when she was twelve, and lived around. I know about the waitress jobs in Pittsburgh, and the burlesque show, and the B-girl years; Frank, and Eddie, and Nino, and Sid and . . . all the others.” Dr. Prager smiled. “You told me all this yourself, Wilma. And you told me all about what happened after you became Eve Eden. When you met me, you weren’t Eve Eden yet; not entirely. Wilma kept interfering, didn’t she? It was Wilma who drank, took the drugs, got mixed up with the men, tried to kill herself. I helped you fight Wilma, didn’t I, Eve? I helped you become Eve Eden, the movie star. That’s why it’s my business now to see that you stay that way. Beautiful, admired, successful, happy—”

“You’re wrong, Doc. I found that out. If you want me to be happy, forget about Eve Eden. Forget about Wilma, too. From now on I’m going to be somebody else. So please, just go away.”

“Somebody else?” Dr. Prager leaped at the phrase. An instant later he leaped, literally.

“What’s that?” he gasped.

He stared down at the floor, the hairs in his goatee bristling as he caught sight of the small white furry object that scuttled across the carpet.

Eve Eden reached down and scooped up the creature, smiling.

“Just a white rabbit,” she explained. “Cute, isn’t he? I bought him the other day.”

“But—but—”

Dr. Prager goggled. It was indeed a white rabbit which Eve Eden cradled in her arms, but not just a white rabbit. For this rabbit happened to be wearing a vest and a checkered waistcoat, and Dr. Prager could almost swear that the silver chain across the vest terminated in a concealed pocket-watch.

"I bought it after the dream," Eve Eden told him.

"Dream?"

"Oh, what's the use?" she sighed, "I might as well let you hear it. All you headshrinkers are queer for dreams, anyway."

"You had a dream about rabbits?" Dr. Prager began.

"Please, Doc, let's do it my way," she answered. "This time you relax and I'll do the talking. It all started when I fell down this rabbit-hole . . ."

In her dream, Eve Eden said, she was a little girl with long golden curls. She was sitting on a river bank when she saw this white rabbit running close by. It was wearing the waistcoat and a high collar and then it took a watch out of its pocket, muttering, "Oh dear, I shall be too late." She ran across the field after it and when it popped down a large rabbit-hole she followed.

"Oh no!" Dr. Prager muttered. "Not Alice!"

"Alice who?" Eve Eden inquired. "Alice in Wonderland."

"You mean that movie Disney made, the cartoon thing?"

Dr. Prager nodded. "You saw it?"

"No. I never waste time on cartoons."

"But you know what I'm talking about, don't you?"

"Well—" Eve Eden hesitated. Then from the depths of her professional background an answer came. "Wasn't there another movie, 'way back around the beginning of the thirties? Sure, Paramount made it, with Oakie and Gallagher and Horton and Ruggles and Ned Sparks and Fields and Gary Cooper. And let's see now, who played the dame—Charlotte Henry?"

Dr. Prager smiled. Now he was getting somewhere. "So that's the one you saw, eh?"

Eve Eden shook her head. "Never saw that one, either. Couldn't afford movies when I was a brat—remember?"

“Then how do you know the cast, and—”

“Easy. Gal who used to work with Alison Skipworth told me. She was in it, too. And Edna Mae Oliver. I got a good memory, Doc. You know that.”

“Yes.” Dr. Prager breathed softly. “And so you must remember reading the original book, isn’t that it?”

“Was it a book?”

“Now look here, don’t tell me you’ve never read Alice in Wonderland, by Lewis Carroll. It’s a classic.”

“I’m no reader, Doc. You know that, too.”

“But surely, as a child you must have come across it. Or had somebody tell you the story.”

The blonde curls tossed. “Nope. I’d remember if I had. I remember everything I read, that’s why I’m always up on my lines. Best sight-reader in the business. I not only haven’t read Alice in Wonderland, I didn’t even know there was such a story, except in a screenplay.”

Dr. Prager gave an irritable tug at his goatee. “All right. You do have a remarkable memory, I know. So let’s think back now. Let’s think back very carefully to your earliest childhood. Somebody must have taken you on their lap, told you stories.”

The star’s eyes brightened. “Why sure!” she exclaimed. “That’s right! Aunt Emma was always telling me stories.”

“Excellent.” Dr. Prager smiled. “And can you recall now, the first story she ever told you? The very first?”

Eve Eden closed her eyes, concentrating with effort. When her voice came, it was from far away. “Yes,” she whispered. “I remember now. I was only four. Aunt Emma took me on her lap and she told me my first story. It was the one about the drunk who goes in this bar, and he can’t find the john, see, so the bartender tells him to go upstairs and—”

“No,” said Dr. Prager. “No, no! Didn’t she ever tell you any fairy tales?”

“Aunt Emma?” Eve Eden laughed. “I’ll say she didn’t. But stories, she had a million of ’em! Did you ever hear the one about the young married couple who—”

"Never mind." The psychiatrist leaned back. "You are quite positive you have never read or heard or seen Alice in Wonderland?"

"I told you so in the first place, didn't I? Now, do you want to hear my dream or not?"

"I want to very much," Dr. Prager answered, and he did. He took out his notebook and uncapped his fountain pen. In his own mind he was quite certain that she had heard or read Alice, and he was interested in the reasons for the mental bloc which prevented her from recalling the fact. He was also interested in the possible symbolism behind her account. This promised to be quite an enjoyable session. "You went down the rabbit-hole," he prompted.

"Into a tunnel," Eve continued. "I was falling—falling very slowly."

Dr. Prager wrote down tunnel—womb fixation? And he wrote down falling dream,

"I fell into a well," Eve said. "Lined with cupboards and bookshelves. There were maps and pictures on pegs."

Forbidden sex knowledge, Dr, Prager wrote.

"I reached out while I was still falling and took a jar from a shelf. The jar was labeled orange marmalade."

Marmalade—Mama? Dr. Prager wrote.

Eve said something about "Do cats eat bats?" and "Do bats eat cats?" but Dr. Prager missed it. He was too busy writing. It was amazing, now that he thought of it, just how much Freudian symbolism was packed into Alice in Wonderland. Amazing, too, how well her subconscious recalled it.

Eve was telling now how she had landed in the long hall with the doors all around, and how the rabbit disappeared muttering, "Oh my ears and whiskers, how late it's getting." She told about approaching the three-legged solid glass table with the tiny golden key on it and Dr. Prager quickly scribbled phallic symbol. Then she described looking through a fifteen-inch door into a garden beyond and wishing she could get through it by shutting up like a telescope. So Dr. Prager wrote phallic envy.

“Then,” Eve continued, “I saw this bottle on the table, labeled drink me. And so I drank, and do you know something? I did shut up like a telescope. I got smaller and smaller, and if I hadn’t stopped drinking I’d have disappeared! So of course I couldn’t reach the key, but then I saw this glass box under the table labeled eat me and I ate and got bigger right away.”

She paused. “I know it sounds silly, Doc, but it was real interesting.”

“Yes indeed,” Dr. Prager said. “Go on. Tell everything you remember.”

“Then the rabbit came back, mumbling something about a Duchess. And it dropped a pair of white gloves and a fan.”

Fetichism, the psychiatrist noted.

“After that it got real crazy.” Eve giggled. Then she told about the crying and forming a pool on the floor composed of her own tears. And how she held the fan and shrank again, then swam in the pool.

Grief fantasy, Dr. Prager decided.

She went on to describe her meeting with the mouse and with the other animals, and the Caucus-race, and the recital of the curious poem about the cur, Fury, which ended “I’ll be judge, I’ll be jury. . . . I’ll try the whole case and condemn you to death.”

Super-ego, wrote Dr. Prager, and asked, “What are you afraid of, Eve?”

“Nothing,” she answered. “And I wasn’t afraid in the dream, either. I liked it. But I haven’t told you anything yet.”

“Go on.”

She went on, describing her trip to the rabbit’s house to fetch his gloves and fan, and finding the unlabeled bottle in the bedroom. Then followed the episode of growth, and being stuck inside the house (Claustrophobia, the notebook dutifully recorded) and her escape from the animals who pelted her with pebbles as she ran into the forest.

It was Alice, all right, word for word, image for image. Father-image for the caterpillar, who might (Dr. Prager reasoned wisely) stand for himself as the psychiatrist, with his stern approach and enigmatic answers. The “Father William” poem which followed seemed to validate this conclusion.

Then came the episode of eating the side of the mushroom, growing and shrinking. Did this disguise her drug addiction? Perhaps. And there was a moment when she had a long serpentine neck and a pigeon mistook her for a serpent. A viper was a serpent. And weren't drug addicts called "vipers" ? Of course. Dr. Prager was beginning to understand, now. It was all symbolic. She was telling about her own life. Running away, and finding the key to success—alternating between being very "small" and insignificant and trying every method of becoming "big" and important, Until she entered the garden—her Garden of Eden here—and became a star, and consulted him, and took drugs. It all made sense, now.

He could understand as she told of the visit to the house of the Duchess (Mother-image) with her cruel "Chop off her head." He anticipated the baby who turned into a pig and wrote down rejection-fantasy.

Then he listened to the interview with the Cheshire-Cat, inwardly marveling at Eve Eden's perfect memory for dialogue.

" 'But I don't want to go among mad people,' I said. And the crazy cat came back with, 'Oh, you can't help that. We're all mad here. I'm mad. You're mad.' And I said, 'How do you know I'm mad?' and the cat said, 'You must be—or you wouldn't have come here.' Well, I felt plenty crazy when the cat started to vanish. Believe it or not, Doc, there was nothing left but a big grin."

"I believe it," Dr. Prager assured her.

He was hot on the trail of another scent now. The talk of madness had set him off. And sure enough, now came the Tea Party. With the March Hare and the Mad Hatter, of course—the Mad Hatter. Sitting in front of their house (asylum, no doubt) with the sleeping dormouse between them. Dormouse—dormant sanity. She was afraid of going insane, Dr. Prager decided. So much so did he believe it that when she quoted the line, "Why is a raven like a writing-desk?" he found himself writing down, Why is a raving like a Rorschach test?, and had to cross it out.

Then came the sadistic treatment of the poor dormouse, and another drug-fantasy with mushrooms for the symbol, leading her again into a beautiful garden. Dr. Prager heard it all: the story of the playing-card people (club soldiers and diamond courtiers and heart children were perfectly fascinating symbols, too!)

And when Eve said, “Why, they’re only a pack of cards after all—I needn’t be afraid of them,” Dr. Prager triumphantly wrote, paranoid fantasies: people are unreal.

“Now I must tell you about the croquet game,” Eve went on, and so she told him about the croquet game and Dr. Prager filled two whole pages with notes.

He was particularly delighted with Alice-Eve’s account of conversation with the ugly Duchess, who said among other things, “Take care of the sense and the sounds will take care of themselves,” and “Be what you would seem to be—or if you’d like it put more simply, Never imagine yourself not to be otherwise than what it might appear to others that what you were or might have been was not otherwise than what you had been would have appeared to them to be otherwise.”

Eve Eden rattled it off, apparently verbatim. “It didn’t seem to make sense at the time,” she admitted. “But it does now, don’t you think?”

Dr. Prager refused to commit himself. It made sense, all right. A dreadful sort of sense. This poor child was struggling to retain her identity. Everything pointed to that. She was adrift in a sea of illusion, peopled with Mock Turtles—Mock Turtle, very significant, that—and distorted imagery.

Now the story of the Turtle and the Gryphon and the Lobster Quadrille began to take on a dreadful meaning. All the twisted words and phrases symbolized growing mental disturbance. Schools taught “reeling and writhing” and arithmetic consisted of “ambition, distraction, uglification and derision.” Obviously fantasies of inferiority. And Alice-Eve growing more and more confused with twisted, inverted logic in which “blacking” became “whiting”—it was merely an inner cry signifying she could no longer tell the difference between black and white. In other words, she was losing all contact with reality. She was going through an ordeal . . . a trial . . .

Of course it was a trial! Now Eve was telling about the trial of the Knave of Hearts, who stole the tarts. (Hadn't Eve once been a "tart" herself?) And Alice-Eve noted all the animals on the jury (another paranoid delusion: people are animals) and she kept growing (delusions of grandeur) and then came the white rabbit reading the anonymous letter.

Dr. Prager pricked up his own ears, rabbit-fashion, when he heard the contents of the letter:

My notion was that you had been (Before she had this fit)
An obstacle that came between
Him, and ourselves, and it.

Don't let him know she lilted them best,
For this must ever be
A secret kept from all the rest
Between yourself and me.

Of course, A secret, Dr. Prager decided. Eve Eden had been afraid of madness for a long time. That was the root of all her perverse behavior patterns, and he'd never probed sufficiently to uncover it. But the dream, welling up from the subconscious, provided the answer.

"I said I didn't believe there was an atom of meaning in it," Eve told him. And the Queen cried, 'Off with her head,' but I said, 'Who cares for you? You're nothing but a pack of cards.' And they all rose up and flew at me but I beat them off, and then I woke up fighting the covers."

She sat up, "You've been taking an awful lot of notes," she said. "Mind telling me what you think?"

Dr. Prager hesitated. It was a delicate question. Still, the dream-content indicated that she was perfectly well aware of her problem on the subliminal level. A plain exposition of the facts might come as a shock, but not a dangerous one. Actually, a shock could be just the thing now to lead her back and resolve the initial trauma, wherever it was.

"All right," Dr. Prager said, "Here's what I think it means." And in plain language, he explained his interpretation of her dream; pulling no punches, but occasionally his goatee.

"So there you have it," he concluded. "The symbolic story of your life—and the dramatized and disguised conflict over your mental status which you've always tried to hide. But the subconscious is wise, my dear. It always knows, and tries to warn. No wonder you had this dream, at this particular time. There's nothing accidental about it. Freud says—"

But Eve was laughing, "Freud says? What does he know about it? Come to think of it, Doc, what do you know about it, either? You see, I forgot to tell you something when I started. I didn't just have this dream." She stared at him, and her laughter ceased. "I bought it," Eve Eden said. "I bought it for ten thousand dollars."

Dr. Prager wasn't getting anywhere. His fountain pen ceased to function and his goatee wouldn't respond properly to even the most severe tugging. He heard Eve Eden out and waved his arms helplessly, like a bird about to take off. He felt like taking off, but on the other hand he couldn't leave this chick in her nest. Not with a big nest egg involved. But why did it have to be so involved?

"Go over that again," he begged, finally. "Just the highlights. I can't seem to get it."

"But it's really so simple," Eve answered. "Like I already told you. I was getting all restless and keyed-up, you know, like I've been before. Dying for a ball, some new kind of kick. And then I ran into Wally Redmond and he told me about this Professor Laroc."

"The charlatan," Dr. Prager murmured.

"I don't know what nationality he is," Eve answered. "He's just a little old guy who goes around selling these dreams."

"Now wait a minute—"

“Sure, it sounds screwy. I thought so too, when Wally told me. He’d met him at a party somewhere, and got to talking. And pretty soon he was spilling his you’ll pardon the expression guts about the sad story of his life and how fed up he was with everything including his sixth wife. And how he wanted to get away from it all and find a new caper.

“So this Professor Laroc asked him if he’d ever been on the stuff and Wally said no, he had a weak heart. And he asked him if he’d tried psychiatry and Wally said sure, he’d been to Doc Weissnichtwer but it didn’t help him any.”

“Your friend went to the wrong analyst,” Dr. Prager snapped, in some heat. “He should have come to a Freudian. How could he expect to get results from a Jungian—”

“Like you say, Doc, relax. It doesn’t matter. What matters is that Professor Laroc sold him this dream. It was a real scary one, to hear him tell it, all about being a burglar over in England some place and getting into a big estate run by a little dwarf with a head like a baboon. But he liked it, liked it fine. Said he was really relaxed after he had it: made him feel like a different person. And so he bought another, about a guy who was a pawnbroker, only a long time ago in some real gone country. And this pawnbroker ran around having himself all kinds of women who—”

“Jurgen,” Dr. Prager muttered. “And if I’m not mistaken, the other one was from Lutyindoo. I think it was called ‘The Snout.’ ”

“Let’s stick to the point, Doc,” Eve Eden said. “Anyway, Wally was crazy about these dreams. He said the Professor had a lot more to peddle, and even though the price was high, it was worth it. Because in the dream you felt like somebody else; you felt like the character you were dreaming about. And of course, no hangover, no trouble with the law. Wally said if he ever tried some of the stuff he dreamed about on real women they’d clap him in the pokey, even in Hollywood. He planned to get out of pictures and buy more. Wanted to dream all the time. I guess the Professor told him if he paid enough he could even stay in a dream without coming back.”

“Nonsense!”

"That's what I told the man. I know how you feel, Doc. I felt that way myself before I met Professor Laroc. But after that it was different."

"You met this . . . person?"

"He isn't a person, Doc. He's a real nice guy, a sweet character.

You'd like him. I did, when Wally brought him around. We had a long talk together. I opened up to him, even more than I have to you, I guess. Told him all my troubles. And he said, what was wrong with me was I never had any childhood. That somewhere underneath there was a little girl trying to live her life with a full imagination. So he'd sell me a dream for that. And even though it sounded batty, it made sense to me. He really seemed to understand things I didn't understand about myself.

"So I thought here goes, nothing to lose if I try it once, and I bought the dream." She smiled. "And now that I know what it's like, I'm going to buy more. All he can sell me. Because he was right, you know. I don't want the movies. I don't want liquor or sex or H or gambling or anything. I don't want Eve Eden. I want to be a little girl, a little girl like the one in the dream, having adventures and never getting hurt. That's why I made up my mind. I'm quitting, getting out while the getting is good. From now on, me for dreamland."

Dr. Prager was silent for a long time. He kept staring at Eve Eden's smile. It wasn't her smile—he got the strangest notion that it belonged to somebody else. It was too relaxed, too innocent, too utterly seraphic for Eve. It was, he told himself, the smile of a ten-year-old girl on the face of a thirty-three-year-old woman of the world.

And he thought hebephrenia and he thought schizophrenia and he thought incipient catatonia and he said, "You say you met this Professor Laroc through Wally Redmond. Do you know how to reach him?"

"No, he reaches me." Eve Eden giggled. "He sends me, too, Doc." She was really pretty far gone, Dr. Prager decided. But he had to persist. "When you bought this dream, as you say, what happened?"

"Why, nothing. Wally brought the Professor here to the house. Right up to this bedroom, actually. Then he went away and the Professor talked to me and I wrote out the check and he gave me the dream.”

“You keep saying he ‘gave’ you this dream. What does that mean?” Dr. Prager leaned forward. He had a sudden hunch. “Did he ask you to lie down, the way I do?”

“Yes. That’s right.”

“And did he talk to you?”

“Sure. How’d you guess?”

“And did he keep talking until you went to sleep?”

“I—I think so. Anyway, I did go to sleep, and when I woke up he was gone.”

“Aha.”

“What does that mean?”

“It means you were hypnotized, my dear. Hypnotized by a clever charlatan, who sold you a few moments of prepared patter in return for ten thousand dollars.”

“But—but that’s not true!” Eve Eden’s childish smile became a childish pout. “It was real. The dream, I mean. It happened.”

“Happened?”

“Of course. Haven’t I made that clear yet? The dream happened. It wasn’t like other dreams. I mean, I could feel and hear and see and even taste. Only it wasn’t me, it was this little girl. Alice. I was Alice. That’s what makes it worthwhile, can’t you understand? That’s what Wally said, too. The dream-place is real, you go there, and you are somebody else.”

“Hypnotism.”

Eve Eden put down the rabbit. “All right,” she said. “I can prove it.” She marched over to the big bed—the bed large enough to hold six people, according to some very catty but authenticated reports. “I didn’t mean to show you this,” she said, “but maybe I’d better.”

She reached under her pillow and pulled out a small object which glittered beneath the light. “I found this in my hand when I woke up,” she declared. “Look at it.”

Dr. Prager looked at it. It was a small bottle bearing a little white label. He shook it, and discovered that the bottle was half-filled with a colorless transparent liquid. He studied the label and deciphered the hand-lettered inscription which read, simply, drink me.

"Proof, eh?" he mused. "Found in your hand when you woke up?"

"Of course. From the dream."

Dr. Prager smiled. "You were hypnotized. And before Professor Laroc stole away—and stole is singularly appropriate, considering that he had your check for ten thousand dollars—he simply planted this bottle in your hand as you slept. That's my interpretation of your proof." He slipped the little glass container into his pocket. "With your permission, I'd like to take this along," he said. "I'm going to ask you now to bear with me for the next twenty-four hours. Don't make any announcements about leaving the studio until I return. I think I can clear everything up to your satisfaction."

"But I am satisfied," Eve told him. "There's nothing to clear up. I don't want to—"

"Please." Dr. Prager brushed his beard with authority. "All I ask is that you be patient for twenty-four hours. I shall return tomorrow at this same time. And meanwhile, try to forget about all this. Say nothing to anyone."

"Now wait a minute, Doc—"

But Dr. Prager was gone. Eve Eden frowned for a moment, then sank back on the chaise lounge. The rabbit scampered out from behind a chair and she picked it up again. She stroked its long ears gently until the creature fell asleep. Presently Eve's eyes closed and she drifted off to slumber herself. And the child's smile returned to her face.

There was no smile, childish or adult, on Dr. Prager's face when he presented himself again to the gatekeeper on the following day.

His face was stern and set as he drove up to the front door, accepted the butler's greeting, and went down the hall to where Mickey Dennis waited.

"What's up?" the little agent demanded, tossing his copy of Rave to the floor.

"I've been doing a bit of investigating," Dr. Prager told him. "And I'm afraid I have bad news."

"What is it, Doc? I tried to get something out of her after you left yesterday, but she wasn't talking. And today—"

"I know." Dr. Prager sighed. "She wouldn't be likely to tell you, under the circumstances, Apparently she realizes the truth herself but won't admit it. I have good reason to believe Miss Eden is disturbed. Seriously disturbed." Mickey Dennis twirled his forefinger next to his ear. "You mean she's flipping?"

"I disapprove of that term on general principles," Dr. Prager replied, primly. "And in this particular case the tense is wrong. Flipped would be much more correct."

"But I figgered she was all right lately. Outside of this business about quitting, she's been extra happy—happier'n I ever seen her."

"Euphoria," Dr. Prager answered. "Cycloid manifestation."

"You don't say so."

"I just did," the psychiatrist reminded him.

"Level with me," Dennis pleaded. "What's this all about?"

"I can't until after I've talked to her," Dr. Prager told him. "I need more facts. I was hoping to get some essential information from this Wally Redmond, but I can't locate him. Neither his studio nor his home seems to have information as to his whereabouts for the past several days."

"Off on a binge," the agent suggested. "It figgers. Only just what did you want from him?"

"Information concerning Professor Laroc," Dr. Prager answered. "He's a pretty elusive character. His name isn't listed on any academic roster I've consulted, and I couldn't find it in the City Directory of this or other local communities. Nor could the police department aid me with their files. I'm almost afraid my initial theory was wrong and that Professor Laroc himself is only another figment of Eve Eden's imagination."

“Maybe I can help you out, Doc.”

“You mean you met this man, saw him when he came here with Wally Redmond that evening?” Mickey Dennis shook his head. “No. I wasn’t around then. But I been around all afternoon. And just about a half hour ago a character named Professor Laroc showed up at the door. He’s with Eve in her room right now.”

Dr. Prager opened his mouth and expelled a gulp. Then he turned and ran for the stairs.

The agent sought out his over-stuffed chair and riffled the pages of his magazine.

More waiting. Well, he just hoped there wouldn’t be any explosions this afternoon.

There was no explosion when Dr. Prager opened the bedroom door. Eve Eden was sitting quietly on the chaise longue, and the elderly gentleman occupied an armchair.

As Dr. Prager entered, the older man rose with a smile and extended his hand. Dr. Prager felt it wise to ignore the gesture. “Professor Laroc?” he murmured.

“That is correct.” The smile was a bland blend of twinkling blue eyes behind old-fashioned steel-rimmed spectacles, wrinkled creases in white cheeks, and a rictus of a prim, thin-lipped mouth. Whatever else he might be, Professor Laroc aptly fitted Mickey Dennis’s description of a “character.” He appeared to be about sixty-five, and his clothing seemed of the same vintage, as though fashioned in anticipation at the time of his birth.

Eve Eden stood up now. “I’m glad you two are getting together,” she said. “I asked the Professor to come this afternoon so we could straighten everything out.”

Dr. Prager preened his goatee. “I’m very happy that you did so,” he answered. “And I’m sure that matters can be set straight in very short order now that I’m here.”

“The Professor has just been telling me a couple of things,” Eve informed him. “I gave him your pitch about me losing my buttons and he says you’re all wet.”

“A slight misquotation,” Professor Laroc interposed. “I merely observed that an understanding of the true facts might dampen your enthusiasm.”

“I think I have the facts,” Dr. Prager snapped. “And they’re dry enough. Dry, but fascinating.”

“Do go on.”

“I intend to.” Dr. Prager wheeled to confront Eve Eden and spoke directly to the girl. “First of all,” he said, “I must tell you that your friend here is masquerading under a pseudonym. I have been unable to discover a single bit of evidence substantiating the identity of anyone named Professor Laroc.”

“Granted,” the elderly man murmured.

“Secondly,” Dr. Prager continued, “I must warn you that I have been unable to ascertain the whereabouts of your friend, Wally Redmond. His wife doesn’t know where he is, nor his producer. Mickey Dennis thinks he’s off on an alcoholic fugue. I have my own theory. But one fact is certain—he seems to have completely disappeared.”

“Granted,” said Professor Laroc. “Third and last,” Dr. Prager went on. “It is my considered belief that the man calling himself Professor Laroc did indeed subject you to hypnosis and that, once he had managed to place you in deep trance, he deliberately read to you from a copy of Alice in Wonderland and suggested to you that you were experiencing the adventures of the principal character. Whereupon he placed the vial of liquid labeled drink me under your pillow and departed.”

“Granted in part,” Professor Laroc nodded. “It is true that I placed Miss Eden in a receptive state with the aid of what you choose to call hypnosis. And it is true that I suggested to her that she enter into the world of Alice, as Alice. But that is all. It was not necessary to read anything to her, nor did I stoop to deception by supplying a vial of liquid, as you call it. Believe me, I was as astonished as you were, to learn that she had brought back such an interesting souvenir of her little experience."

"Prepare to be astonished again, then," Dr. Prager said, grimly. He pulled the small bottle from his pocket and with it a piece of paper.

"What's that, Doc?" Eve Eden asked.

"A certificate from Haddon and Haddon, industrial chemists," the psychiatrist told her. "I took this interesting souvenir, as your friend calls it, down to their laboratories for analysis." He handed her the report. "Here, read for yourself. If your knowledge of chemistry is insufficient, I can tell you that H_20 means water." He smiled. "Yes, that's right. This bottle contains nothing but half an ounce of water."

Dr. Prager turned and stared at Professor Laroc. "What have you to say now?" he demanded.

"Very little." The old man smiled. "It does not surprise me that you were unable to find my name listed in any registry or directory of activities, legal or illegal. As Miss Eden already knows, I chose to cross over many years ago. Nor was 'Laroc' my actual surname. A moment's reflection will enable you to realize that 'Laroc' is an obvious enough anagram for 'Carroll', give or take a few letters."

"You don't mean to tell me—"

"That I am Lewis Carroll, or rather, Charles Lutwidge Dodgson? Certainly not. I hold the honor of being a fellow-alumnus of his from Oxford, and we did indeed share an acquaintance—"

"But Lewis Carroll died in 1898," Dr. Prager objected.

"Ah, you were interested enough to look up the date," the old man smiled. "I see you're not so skeptical as you pretend to be."

Dr. Prager felt that he was giving ground and remembered that attack is the best defense. "Where is Wally Redmond?" he countered.

"With the Duchess of Towers, I would assume," Professor Laroc answered. "Lie chose to cross over permanently, and I selected Peter lbbetson for him. You see, I'm restricted to literature which was directly inspired by the author's dream, and there's a rather small field available. I still have Cabell's Smirt to sell, and The Brushwood Boy of Kipling, but I don't imagine I shall ever manage to dispose of any Lovecraft—too gruesome, you know." He glanced at Eve Eden. "Fortunately, as I told you, I've reserved something very special for you. And I'm glad you decided to take the step. The moment I saw you, my heart went out to you. I sensed the little girl buried away beneath all the veneer, just as I sensed the small boy in Mr. Redmond. So many of you Hollywood people are frustrated children. You make dreams for others but have none of your own. I am glad to offer my modest philanthropy—"

"At ten thousand dollars a session!" Dr. Prager exploded.

"Now, now," Professor Laroc chided. "That sounds like professional jealousy, sir! And I may as well remind you that a permanent cross-over requires a fee of fifty thousand. Not that I need the money, you understand. It's merely that such a fee helps to establish me as an authority. It brings about the necessary transference-relationship between my clients and myself, to borrow from your own terminology. The effect is purely psychological."

Dr. Prager had heard enough. This, he decided, was definitely the time to call a halt. Even Eve Eden in her present disturbed state should be able to comprehend the utter idiocy of this man's preposterous claims.

He faced the elderly charlatan with a disarming smile. "Let me get this straight," he began, quietly. "Am I to understand that you are actually selling dreams?"

"Let us say, rather, that I sell experiences. And the experiences are every bit as real as anything you know."

"Don't quibble over words." Dr. Prager was annoyed. "You come in and hypnotize patients. During their sleep you suggest they enter a dream world. And then—"

"If you don't mind, let us quibble a bit over words, please," Professor Laroc said. "You're a psychiatrist. Very well; as a psychiatrist, please tell me one thing. Just what is a dream?"

“Why, that’s very simple,” Dr. Prager answered. “According to Freud, the dream-phenomenon can be described as—”

“I didn’t ask for a description, Doctor. Nor for Freud’s opinion. I asked for an exact definition of the dream-state, as you call it. I want to know the etiology and epistemology of dreams. And while you’re at it, how about a definition of the ‘hypnotic state’ and of ‘sleep’ ? And what is ‘suggestion’ ? After you’ve given me precise scientific definitions of these phenomena, as you love to call them, perhaps you can go on and explain to me the nature of ‘reality’ and the exact meaning of the term ‘imagination.’ ”

“But these are only figures of speech,” Dr. Prager objected. “I’ll be honest with you. Perhaps we can’t accurately describe a dream. But we can observe it. It’s like electricity: nobody knows what it is, but it’s a measurable force which can be directed and controlled, subject to certain natural laws.”

“Exactly,” Professor Laroc said. “That’s just what I would have said myself. And dreams are indeed like electrical force: indeed, the human brain gives off electrical charges, and all life—matter—energy—enters into an electrical relationship. But this relationship has never been studied. Only the physical manifestations of electricity have been studied and harnessed, not the psychic. At least, not until Dodgson stumbled on certain basic mathematical principles, which he imparted to me. I developed them, found a practical use. The dream, my dear Doctor, is merely an electrically charged continuum given a reality of its own beyond our own space-time continuum. The individual dream is weak. Set it down on paper, as some dreams have been set down, share it with others, and watch the charge build up. The combined electrical properties tend to create a permanent plane; a dream-continuum, if you please.”

“I don’t please,” answered Dr. Prager.

“That’s because you’re not receptive,” Professor Laroc observed smugly. “Yours is a negative charge rather than a positive one. Dodgson—Lewis Carroll—was positive. So was Lovecraft, and Poe, and Edward Lucas White, and a handful of others. Their dreams live. Others positively charged can live in them, granted the proper method of entry. It's not magic, there's nothing supernatural about it at all, unless you consider mathematics as magic. Dodgson did. He was a professor of mathematics, remember. And so was I. I took his principles and extended them, created a practical methodology. Now I can enter dreamworlds at will, cause others to enter. It's not hypnosis as you understand it. A few words of non-Euclidean formulae will be sufficient—"

"I've heard enough," Dr. Prager broke in. "Much as I hate to employ the phrase, this is sheer lunacy." The Professor shrugged. "Call it what you wish," he said. "You psychiatrists are good at pinning labels on things. But Miss Eden here has had sufficient proof through her own experience. Isn't that so?" Eve Eden nodded, then broke her silence. "I believe you," she said. "Even if Doc here thinks we're both batty. And I'm willing to give you the fifty grand for a permanent trip."

Dr. Prager grabbed for his goatee. He was clutching at straws now. "But you can't," he cried. "This doesn't make sense."

"Maybe not your kind of sense," Eve answered. "But that's just the trouble. You don't seem to understand there's more than one kind. That crazy dream I had, the one you say Lewis Carroll had first and wrote up into a book—it makes sense to you if you really live it. More sense than Hollywood, than this. More sense than a little kid named Wilma Kozmowski growing up to live in a half-million-dollar palace and trying to kill herself because she can't be a little kid any more and never had a chance to be one when she was small. The Professor here, he understands. He knows everybody has a right to dream. For the first time in my life I know what it is to be happy."

"That's right," Professor Laroc added. "I recognized her as a kindred spirit. I saw the child beneath, the child of the pure unclouded brow, as Lewis Carroll put it. She deserved this dream."

"Don't try and stop me," Eve cut in. "You can't, you know. You'll never drag me back to your world, and you've got no reason to try—except that you like the idea of making a steady living off me. And so does Dennis, with his lousy ten per-cent, and so does the studio with its big profits. I never met anyone who really liked me as a person except Professor Laroc here. He's the only one who ever gave me anything worth having. The dream. So quit trying to argue me into it, Doc. I'm not going to be Eve any more, or Wilma either. I'm going to be Alice."

Dr. Prager scowled, then smiled. What was the matter with him? Why was he bothering to argue like this? After all, it was so unnecessary. Let the poor child write out a check for fifty thousand dollars—payment could always be stopped. Just as this charlatan could be stopped if he actually attempted hypnosis. There were laws and regulations. Really, Dr. Prager reminded himself, he was behaving like a child himself: taking part in this silly argument just as if there actually was something to it besides nonsense-words.

What was really at stake, he realized, was professional pride. To think that this old mountebank could actually carry more authority with Eve Eden than he did himself!

And what was the impostor saying now, with that sickening, smile?

"I'm sorry you cannot subscribe to my theories, Doctor. But at least I am grateful for one thing, and that is that you didn't see fit to put them to the test."

"Test? What do you mean?" Professor Laroc pointed his finger at the little bottle labeled drink me which now rested on the table before him. "I'm happy you merely analyzed the contents of that vial without attempting to drink them."

"But it's nothing but water."

"Perhaps. What you forget is that water may have very different properties in other worlds. And this water came from the world of Alice."

"You planted that," Dr. Prager snapped. "Don't deny it."

"I do deny it. Miss Eden knows the truth."

"Oh does she?" Dr. Prager suddenly found his solution. He raised the bottle, turning to Eve with a commanding gesture. "Listen to me, now. Professor Laroc claims, and you believe, that this liquid was somehow transported from the dream-world of Alice in Wonderland. If that is the case, then a drink out of this bottle would cause me either to grow or to shrink. Correct?”

“Yes,” Eve murmured.

“Now wait—” the Professor began, but Dr. Prager shook his head impatiently.

“Let me finish,” he insisted. “All right. By the same token, if I took a drink from this bottle and nothing happened, wouldn’t it prove that the dream-world story is a fake?”

“Yes, but—”

“No buts. I’m asking you a direct question. Would it or wouldn’t it?”

“Y-yes. I guess so. Yes.”

“Very well, then.” Dramatically, Dr. Prager uncorked the little bottle and raised it to his lips. “Watch me,” he said.

Professor Laroc stepped forward. “Please!” he shouted. “I implore you—don’t—”

He made a grab for the bottle, but he was too late.

Dr. Prager downed the half-ounce of colorless fluid.

Mickey Dennis waited and waited until he couldn’t stand it any longer. There hadn’t been any loud sounds from upstairs at all, and this only made it worse.

Finally he got the old urge so bad he just had to go on up there and see for himself what was going on.

As he walked down the hall he could hear them talking inside the bedroom. At least he recognized Professor Laroc’s voice. He was saying something about, “There, there, I know it’s quite a shock. Perhaps you’d feel better if you didn’t wait—do you want to go now?”

That didn’t make too much sense to Mickey, and neither did Eve’s reply. She said, “Yes, but don’t I have, to go to sleep first?”

And then the Professor answered, “No; as I explained to him, it’s just a question of the proper formulae. If I recite them we can go together. Er—you might bring your checkbook along.”

Eve seemed to be giggling. “You too?” she asked.

“Yes. I’ve always loved this dream, my dear It’s a sequel to the first one, as you’ll discover. Now if you’ll just face the mirror with me . . .”

And then the Professor mumbled something in a very low voice, and Mickey bent down with his head close to the door but he couldn’t quite catch it. Instead, his shoulder pushed the door open.

The bedroom was empty.

That’s right, empty.

But he could swear he heard voices just a second ago. What had the Professor said? Something about facing the mirror?

Mickey looked in the mirror, the big mirror above the mantelpiece.

For a moment he got a screwy idea he could see the Professor and Eve Eden reflected in the glass, with the light shining every which way and Eve somehow looking like a little kid with long golden curls. But that was crazy, of course.

Then the dressed-up white rabbit came hopping out from behind the bed and began to scamper around the floor.

Mickey didn’t know how to explain that one, either. There was going to be a lot he couldn’t explain. He’d never find out where Eve and the Professor had gone, because he’d never read Through The Looking-Glass.

And he’d never understand where Doc went, for that matter.

The rabbit began to scamper around the pile of clothing on the floor. Mickey recognized Doc’s coat and trousers and shirt and necktie, but this didn’t tell him anything, either.

Then he stooped and picked up the little bottle lying next to the empty clothes. He stared at the label reading drink me.

Right now he could use a drink, Mickey decided, but this bottle was empty.

Maybe it was just as well.

Founding Fathers

If you're determined to change history nothing can equal a time machine. But he warned! You may prematurely whiten your bones!

We doubt if anyone but Robert Bloch could dissolve what at first appears to be an outrageous distortion of history—the Founding Fathers in gangster roles!—into such a sunburst of dazzling humor that we find ourselves forgiving him almost before we discover that there is nothing to forgive. You see, the opening scene of this hilarious science fantasy isn't really in the least irreverent, for the astounding, turnabout climax sets history by the ears!

EARLY ON THE morning of July 4th, 1776, Thomas Jefferson poked his peruked head into the deserted chamber of what was to be known as Independence Hall and yelled, "Come on, you guys, the coast is clear!"

As he stepped into the big room he was followed by John Hancock, who puffed nervously on a cigarette.

"All right," Jefferson said. "Ditch the butt, will ya? You wanna louse us up, creep?"

"Sorry, boss." Hancock glanced around the place, then addressed a third man who entered behind him. "Dig this," he murmured. "Not an ashtray in the joint. What kind of a setup we got here anyway, Nunzio?"

The third man scowled. "Don't call me Nunzio," he growled. "The name's Charles Thomson, remember?"

“Okay, Chuck.”

“Charles!” The third man dug John Hancock in the ribs. “Straighten that wig of yours. Ya look like somethin’ out of a Boy Scout pageant yet.”

John Hancock shrugged. “Well, whaddya expeck? Guy can’t even smoke, and these here britches are so tight I’m scared to sit down in ’em.”

Thomas Jefferson turned and confronted him. “You ain’t gonna sit down,” he said. “All you gotta do is sign and keep your yap shut. Let Ben do the talking, remember?”

“Ben?”

“Benjamin Franklin, schmoe,” said Thomas Jefferson.

“Somebody mention my name?” The short fat balding man hurried into the room, carefully adjusting square-lensed spectacles to the bridge of his nose.

“What took you so long?” Thomas Jefferson demanded. “You run into trouble back there?”

“No trouble,” Benjamin Franklin replied. “They’re out cold, and the gags are holding. It’s just these glasses—the lenses distort my vision. I’d forgotten I’d have to wear them.”

“Can’t you ditch ’em?”

“No. Somebody might get suspicious.” Franklin peered at his companions over the tops of the spectacles. “They’re likely to get suspicious anyway, if you don’t do what I told you.” He glanced around the room. “What time is it?”

Thomas Jefferson fumbled with the ruffles at his sleeves and gazed down at the face of his wristwatch. “Seven-thirty,” he announced.

“You’re sure?”

“Checked it with Western Union.”

“Never mind that Western Union talk. And take off that thing—put it in your pocket. It’s stuff like that can get us into trouble.”

“Trouble,” John Hancock groaned. “These here shoes are killin’ me. They ain’t nearly my size.”

"Well wear them and be quiet," Benjamin Franklin told him. "I wish to God you'd remembered to shave, too. Fine thing—the President of the Continental Congress on the most important day of our history, coming in without shaving."

"I forgot. Also they was no place to plug in an electric shaver."

"Well, never mind now. The main thing is just to be quiet and remember what you're supposed to do. Mr. Jefferson, do you have the Declaration?"

Nobody answered. Franklin strode up to the tall man in the peruke. "Jefferson, that's you I'm talking to."

"I forgot." The big man smiled sheepishly.

"You'd better not forget. Now, where is it?"

"Right here in my pocket."

"Well, get it out. We've got to sign right away, before anybody else shows up. I expect they'll start drifting in around eight at the latest."

"Eight?" Jefferson sighed. "Do you mean to tell me they go to work that early here?"

"Our friends in the back room looked as if they'd been working all night," Franklin reminded him.

"Ain't they never heard of union hours?"

"No, and don't you mention it, either." Franklin surveyed his companions earnestly. "That goes for all of you. Watch your tongues. We can't afford a slip-up."

"Telling me?" Charles Thomson took the parchment from Thomas Jefferson and unfolded it.

"Careful with that," Franklin warned.

"Pipe down, will ya? I just wanna take a look at it," Thomson replied. "I ain't never seen that there thing." He glanced at the manuscript curiously. "Hey, dig this crazy hanwriting. Its' all lettering, like."

He spread the Declaration on a table and squinted down at it, mumbling aloud.

" 'When inna course a human events, it becomes nessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connecked them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate—hey, what kinda double-talk is this, anyway? Whyn't these guys write English, huh?"

"Never mind." Ben Franklin took the parchment from him and strode to a desk. "I'm going to revise it right now." He rummaged around in the drawer, finding fresh parchment and a quill pen. "I'm not up to copying the lettering style, I'm afraid, tut I can explain that to the Congress easily enough. I'll tell them that Jefferson here made his last-minute changes in a hurry. The hurry part of it is no lie."

He bent over the blank parchment and studied the Declaration as it rested alongside. "Got to keep the style," he said. "Very important. But the main thing is to add the provisions at the end."

"Provisions?" John Hancock brightened. "We gonna have some grub, hey? I'm starved."

"That can wait," Jefferson snapped. "Now keep still and let the guy work. This is the most important part of the whole caper, understand?"

Then there was silence in the room—silence except for the busy scratching of the quill pen as Benjamin Franklin wrote.

Jefferson stood over his shoulder, nodding from time to time. "Don't forget to put in that part about me being temporary boss," he said. "And stick in that we need a treasurer."

Franklin nodded impatiently. "I've got it all down here," he answered. "Nothing to worry about."

"Think they'll sign?"

"Sure they'll sign. It's only logical. Right after the part about being free and independent states there should be a mention of a temporary governing arrangement. They can't object to that. Wonder why it was left out in the first place."

"Search me." Jefferson shrugged. "How would I know?"

"Well, you're supposed to have written it."

"Oh, yeah, that's right."

Franklin finished, sat back, and poked at Jefferson's chest with his quill. "Cough," he said.

Jefferson coughed.

“Again. Louder.”

“What’s the big idea?”

“You’ve got laryngitis,” Franklin told him. “A bad case. That’s why you’re not talking. Anybody asks you any questions, you just cough. Right?”

“Okay. I didn’t want to talk anyway.”

Franklin gazed at Hancock and Thomson. “You two better sign and disappear. When the gang arrives, you go in the back room and keep an eye on our buddies there. I’ll make up some excuse why you’re not around—can’t take the risk of having you cornered and questioned. Got it?”

The two men nodded. Franklin extended the quill pen. “Here. You two are supposed to sign first.” As John Hancock reached for the pen, Franklin chuckled. “Just put your John Hancock right here.”

Hancock signed with a flourish. He gave the pen to Charles Thomson.

“Remember, you’re the secretary,” Franklin said, as Thomson dipped the quill in the inkwell. “What’s the matter, that quill too clumsy for you?”

“Sure it’s clumsy,” Thomson said. “And these clothes are murder. And none of us guys knows how to talk. We can’t get away with this, Thinker. We’re gonna make mistakes.”

Benjamin Franklin stood up. “We’re going to make history,” he declared. “Just follow orders and everything will be all right.” He paused and lifted his hand. “In the immortal words of myself—Benjamin Franklin—we must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately.”

II

THEY HAD HUNG together for a long time in Philly—Sammy, Nunzio, Mush and Thinker Tomaszewski. They shoved a little queer, peddled a few decks, but mostly they made book.

It was a nice setup for all of them, particularly since the Thinker came into the deal. The Thinker was a genuine shyster, with a degree and an office and everything, and he fronted for the outfit. The funny part of it was, Thinker Tomaszewski had a regular law practice too, and he could have made a pretty nice piece of change without cutting corners.

But he worked with them for kicks, at first.

"The only way I can explain it," he told them, "is that I don't seem to have a super-ego." Always with the two-dollar words, that was the Thinker.

And it was his two-dollar words that finally got them into trouble. In the beginning, everything was fine. Using his law office as a front, he had no difficulty in getting acquainted with a better class of mark—not the two-bucks-on-the-nose working stiff, but heavy bettors. He steered them to Sammy or Nunzio or Mush, and they made a big book.

They made a big buck, too. So big that they just had to place a few bets of their own, with some of the top wheels like Mickey Tarantino. Playing it smart, of course, and working only on inside tips, when they were sure of a horse getting the needle.

Came an afternoon when the needle stuck. And they were stuck for twenty grand. Mickey Tarantino held out his hand and smiled. But the smile vanished when Sammy went to him and said he needed time to pay up.

"Whaddya mean?" Mr. Tarantino had inquired. "You guys are loaded. Look at all the rich suckers you make book with."

"All we got to show for it is markers," Sammy confessed. "It's like your old man's delicatessen. The poor guys pay and the high-class trade puts it on the cuff. You know how those big operators work. Well, it's the same in our line. You can't collect from them."

"You damn well better colleck," Mr. Tarantino advised. "Because you got until tomorrow morning. Or elst you wind up in Plotter's Field, or wherever."

So Sammy went away and called a meeting at Thinker Tomaszewski's office and broke the news.

Thinker had news for them too. "Tarantino isn't the only one who thinks we're rolling in the stuff," he announced. "Uncle Sam is looking down our throats for a little matter of back income taxes."

"Great!" Sammy groaned. "Tarantino's hoods in front of us and the Federal finks behind us. Which way do we turn?"

"I suggest you turn to our clients," Thinker answered. "Call on some of our investors and ask them to redeem their markers."

So Sammy and Nunzio and Mush called. And early that evening they assembled and pooled results.

"Three grand!" Sammy snorted. "Three lousy grand!"

"Is that all?" The Thinker was genuinely mystified. "I should have thought you'd get more than that."

"Sure we got more. Excuses we got, promises we got, brush-offs we got. But here's the moola. Three grand, period."

"How about Cobbett?" Thinker asked.

"Professor Cobbett? He's your baby, isn't he?"

The Thinker nodded. Professor Cobbett was indeed his baby. One of the upper crust.

"What's he into us for?" Sammy demanded.

"About eight, I think."

"Eight and three is eleven. Not so hot. But if we could get it fast, maybe Tarantino would hold off for a while."

"Let's get it fast," Mush suggested. "Let's go out and see old Cobbett right now."

So they all piled into Sammy's car and went out to see old Cobbett. The Professor had a country place—a nice layout for a man who lived all alone—and he was cordial and pleasant when he greeted the Thinker on the front porch.

He was not quite so cordial or pleasant when he learned what the Thinker wanted, and he was downright inhospitable when the Thinker beckoned and his three companions appeared out of the darkness.

They had to stick their feet in the door and they had to stick their heaters in his ribs.

“No foolin’,” Nunzio told him. “We want our loot.”

“Oh dear!” said Professor Cobbett, as they marched him backwards into his own parlor. “But I have no money.”

“Don’t con us,” Mush told him. “Look at this joint, all this fancy furniture.”

“Mortgaged,” the Professor sighed. “Mortgaged to the hilt, and past it.”

“What about this here school where you teach at?” Mush asked. “You could maybe brace them for some advance dough on your salary, huh?”

“I am no longer connected with the university.”

“What gives here?” Sammy wanted to know.

“Yes,” Thinker added. “I thought you were a wealthy man.” The Professor shrugged and ran his hand through his graying hair. “Things are not always what they seem,” he said. “For example, I considered you to be a reputable professional man. And when I innocently inquired about the possibilities of placing a small bet on the races, I never dreamed you were associated with these ruffians.”

“Watch that talk,” Sammy warned. “We ain’t no more ruffians than eight grand is a small bet. Now whaddya mean about things ain’t always what they seem?”

“Well, it’s like this,” the Professor answered. “I did have a certain sum of money set aside—yes. And I did have a position of some eminence at the university. The fact that both money and position are gone today can be attributed to one thing—my private research project.

“The cost of experimental models reduced my savings. The revelation of my theories cost me my faculty position. An attempt to raise funds to continue my work led me to the last resort—betting on the races. Now I have nothing.”

“You can say that again,” Sammy told him. “In about three minutes you’re gonna have nothing with lace around it.”

“Wait a moment,” the Thinker interrupted. “Experimental models, you said. What have you been building?”

“I’ll show you, if you like.”

“Come on,” Sammy ordered.

“Boys, keep the heaters warm, in case he pulls a funny.”

But the Professor didn’t pull a funny. He led them downstairs to what had been the basement, and was now an ornate private laboratory. He led them up to the large rectangular metal structures covered with coils and tubing. It had a vague resemblance to an outhouse designed by Frank Lloyd Wright.

“Jeez,” Nunzio commented. “Whatchoo doin’, buildin’ one of them there Frankensteens?”

“I bet it’s a space-ship,” Mush hazarded. “Was you gonna make a getaway to Mars?”

“Please,” the Professor sighed. “You’re making sport of me.”

“We’re making hamburger of you in another minute,” Sammy corrected him. “This doojigger ain’t no use to us. Couldn’t get twenny bucks for it at a junk-yard.”

Thinker Tomaszewski shook his head. “Just what is this object, Professor?”

Professor Cobbett blushed. “I hesitate to designate it as such, after the rebuffs I received at the hands of supposed authorities, but there is no other intelligible term for it. It is a time-machine.”

“Oof!” Sammy put his hand to his forehead. “And this is what we let get into us for eight grand. A nutty scientist, yet!”

The Thinker frowned at him. “A time-machine, you say? An instrument capable of transporting one forward or backwards in time?”

“Backwards only,” the Professor answered. “Forward travel is manifestly impossible, since the future is non-existent. And travel is not the best word. Transit more closely approximates the meaning, insofar as time possesses no material or spatial characteristics, being bound to a three-dimensional universe by the single observable phenomenon which manifests itself as duration. Now if duration is designated as X, and—"

"Shuddup!" Nunzio suggested. "Let's kiss off this joker and scram outta here. We're wastin' time."

"Wasting time." The Thinker nodded. "Professor Cobbett, is this a working model?"

"I'm practically positive. It has never been tested. But I can show you formulae which—"

"Never mind that now. Why haven't you tested it?"

"Because I'm not sure of the past. Or rather, our present relationship to it. If any person or object in present time were sent to the past, alterations would occur. What is here now would be absent, and something added to what was there, then. This addition would alter the past. And if the past were altered, then it would not be the same past we know." He frowned. "It's hard to state without recourse to symbolic logic."

"You mean you're afraid that by time-travel you'd change the past? Or come out in a different past—a past made different because you traveled into it?"

"That's an over-simplification, but you have the general idea."

"Then what good is your work on this?"

"No good, I'm afraid. But I wanted to prove a point. It became an almost monomaniacal obsession. I have no excuses."

"So." Sammy stepped forward. "Thanks for the lecture, but like you say, you got no excuses. And we got no time. This here basement looks like a nice soundproof place for target practice—"

The Thinker grabbed Sammy's arm. "What's the sense?" he asked. "The guy welshed."

"So he welshed. Will murder change that? Will murder help us now?"

"No." Sammy bit his lip. "But what we gonna do? We got no dough. We got Tarantino after us, and also the govmint. We can't go back to town."

The Thinker looked around. "Why not stay here, then? We're safe, isolated, with a nice big roof over our heads. Let's enjoy the Professor's hospitality for a while."

"Yeah," Mush said. "But how long? We're gonna run out of dough, or food, or somethin'. We'd just be stallin' for time."

The Thinker smiled. "Stalling for time." He gazed intently at the complicated structure in the center of the cellar. "But here is the logical vehicle for a getaway."

"You mean jump in that dizzy outfit and beat it?" Sammy demanded. "You're kidding."

"I'm serious," the Thinker replied. "Some time in the near future we'll be safe in the past."

III

It took a lot of figuring. That was the Thinker's job, working with the Professor during the next few days.

"How do you set the controls up? Is this for steering?"

"You do not steer—you press the computers. Here, I'll show you again."

"And you can choose any time in the past, any time at all?" asked the Thinker.

"Theoretically. The main problem is accurate computation. Remember, we and our earth are not static. We do not occupy the same position in space that we did an instant ago, let alone a longer period. We must consider the speed of light, planetary motion, inclination, and—"

"That's going to be your department. But you can establish past position mathematically and set up a guiding-plan for the computers accordingly?"

"I'm reasonably certain of it."

"Then all that remains is to determine where—or rather, when we're going to."

Sammy and Nunzio and Mush tackled that problem on their own.

"Jeez, mebbe alls we gotta do is go back a couple weeks to before when the Professor made his bets. Then we ain't out no dough."

"Yeah? What about them there back taxes?"

"So we go to before when we owed 'em."

"That's when we went into business, stupid. We was broke."

"Well, if we can go anywheres we want in time, how's about way back, to the Egypians, like? I seen one of them there pitchers, they had all these hot broads runnin' around in their unnerwear—"

"You talk Egypian, stupid? Besides, we don't wanna stay back someplace forever. Way I figger, we go to some time where we can lay our mitts on some loot, real fast-like. And then come back."

"Now you got it. That's the angle. Hey, how about that there Gold Rush?"

The Professor interrupted them. "I'm afraid the Gold Rush wouldn't be of much use to you gentlemen. After all, it occurred in the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine."

"But you can send us to eighteen forty-nine, can't you?"

"Conceivably, if my theory is correct. But you would not be in California. You would still be right here in Philadelphia, in the filed which stood here before this house was built."

"Then we gotta find our loot in Philly, huh? Somewheres in the past?"

"I'm afraid so."

"Jeez, And we can't show up in no vacant field with that machine, either."

Then the Thinker took over. "I am beginning to pinpoint our problem," he announced. "Professor, I am going to utilize your library for a day or so. Perhaps I can discover when gold was available in Philadelphia."

"There's always the Mint."

"Too well-guarded. We'd never be able to loot it, any more than it could have been looted by past efforts."

"Banks?" Sammy brightened. "With our heaters, we could knock over one of them big jugs easy—say, a hunnert years ago."

"And come out with what? Old-fashioned greenbacks? We wouldn't be able to use currency of that era today. Arouse suspicion. No, I'm looking for gold.”

Finally, in a copy of Berkeley’s History of the Revolution, the Thinker found it. He broke in upon the others as they sat guarding Professor Cobbett.

“Here’s the answer!” he exulted. “Remember what happened in Philadelphia on July fourth, seventeen seventy-six?”

“That’s a holiday, ain’t it?” Nunzio brightened. “Must be the Phillies took on the Giants in a double-header.”

“Seventeen seventy-six stupid!” Sammy scowled. “Yeah, I remember. They made Washington the President.”

“Nah. It was the Decoration of Indepenence,” Mush corrected.

“Right. The Declaration of Independence was presented to the Continental Congress assembled at what is now Independence Hall. And so forth. But here’s another little-known fact. At the same place, on the same day, the Revolutionary treasury was turned over to a small group for temporary storage. It consisted of upwards of thirty thousand pounds sterling in smelted ingots. That’s about a hundred and fifty thousand dollars in gold.”

“Brother!” Sammy whistled. “What a way to celebrate the Fourth!” Then he frowned. “I’ll bet they had plenny guards around.”

“No, that’s just the point. It was all a secret—few people know of it to this day. Troops brought it in a wagon, around noon. They thought they were hauling documents. It was carted upstairs, and no guards were posted lest suspicion be aroused. Its presence was known only to Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and one or two others—probably John Hancock and maybe Charles Thomson, the Secretary of the Congress. It was to be used to pay troops and buy supplies.”

“It sure could help to pay off old Mickey Tarantino and the Feds. And leave us plenny to spare.”

"That is exactly what I had in mind, gentlemen." The Thinker smiled. "Now all that remains is to work out the details. I shall concentrate on the historical aspect and the Professor here can work out the mathematical computations."

Professor Cobbett blanched. "Mathematical computations? But you're asking the impossible. Why, that was over a hundred and eighty light-years ago; we'll be faced with the problem of billion-fold magnitudes, and the slightest error or variation can have serious consequences."

"Ain't gonna be no errors," Sammy told him. "Or consequences will be really serious. For you." He showed the Professor his heater. "Now get to work. We're going places."

"Going places." Mush looked at him. "All this here stuff was at Indepenence Hall. The machine's here in the cellar. We gonna come out on July fourth inna cow-pasture or somethin' ?"

"That's your job," Sammy decided. "Case this joint. See how it's set up for guards at night. Alarm-system, the works. Look it over like you would a bank job. I think we can take over. Nobody's gonna think a mob would break into a Hysterical Shrine or whatever. We get things set, we hire us a truck and cart the machine right down to the Hall and take off from there some night soon. Right?"

"Hey, that's a tough deal."

"Things are tough all over," Sammy said. "Now get going."

So Mush got going and the Professor got going and the Thinker got going too. And before the first week was up they were organized.

Mush made his report. The invasion of Independence Hall could be made without too much trouble. Of course it would cost money for the truck, and there might be repercussions, but they could try to pull it off.

And in view of their present hopeless situation—and in view of the possible gain—it was worth the gamble, Sammy decided.

The Professor presented them with the working manual, based on his computations.

"Are you sure this gets us there?" Sammy demanded. "And back, too?"

"Look it over," the Professor said. "See for yourself."

"It's all right," the Thinker told him. "I've checked it. See, we have no set time for return. Our plans call for us to get the gold and come back as soon after the noon hour as possible. So the Professor has worked out return-variations based on five-minute intervals throughout the early afternoon. It's as foolproof as we can hope to make it."

"All right, if you say so." Sammy shrugged. "But what I want to know is, what do we do when we get there?"

"I've been working on that angle," the Thinker said. "Checking all the source books and references I could muster. History texts. Biographical data on Franklin and Jefferson in particular. And I've got a plan. Apparently the first ones to arrive that morning were Jefferson and Thomson. Franklin and John Hancock came in early too.

"It's not quite clear whether any of them spent part of the night there. The important thing is that the four men conceivably held an early morning meeting, discussing the Declaration before Congress convened on the fourth. So if we arrive early enough we'll be dealing with just four men. The four men who knew about the gold, by the way."

"Got it," Sammy said. "We come in, flash our heaters, and take over."

"Not quite so simple," the Thinker answered. "Remember, Congress will be gathering that morning. We can't hope to hold our guns on these four key figures from that time until noon. Any more than we can hope to pass unnoticed in the crowd for such a period."

He paused as Sammy started to open his mouth, then hastily continued. "I know what you're thinking, and that won't work either. We can't show up at noon and just hijack the shipment. Not in front of fifty or more men, with troops just outside the door."

"Then what do you figger on us doing?"

The Thinker took a deep breath, and then he told them.

"Oh no!" cried Sammy.

"Me, making like John Hancock?" Mush gasped.

“I should run around in one of them wigs like a big-shot politician?” Nunzio scoffed.

The Thinker was calm. “Don’t you see, it’s the only way? The wigs are perfect disguises. Look, I’ve got pictures of all these men, and we can buy a makeup kit. I’m fortunately bald and approximate Franklin’s build. Physically, we’ll get by. And don’t worry about playing the role of a politician.”

“Yeah.” Mush was thoughtful. “After all, what’s a politician, anyhow? Just a crook that’s learned how to kiss babies.”

“But we won’t be kissing no babies that morning,” Sammy reminded him. “Me, I been reading up a little on that stuff, too. Them four guys did a lot of things on the fourth. Made speeches, tried to get the rest of the Congress to sign, all kinds of stuff. And they knew everybody, everybody knew them. We’d fluff it for sure, trying to do what they did.”

“That’s just the point.” Thinker Tomaszewski was triumphant. “We don’t have to do what they did! Because we’re going back in time, we’re changing what happened. I think I’m familiar enough with Franklin’s personality. I can talk if necessary. Sammy, I’ll coach you. The other two boys can be absent, if need be—and it may well be necessary to guard our machine and our captives in the rear room. We’re not going to merely re-enact history. We’re going to change it, to suit ourselves. Now do you get it?”

They got it, eventually, because the Thinker rammed it down their throats.

And so they got their coaching, got their truck, got their plan, and actually transported the machine bodily into the rear of the vehicle on the evening arranged for departure.

It wasn’t until they stood for the last time in the now open expanse of the cellar that Professor Cobbett voiced a final, timid protest.

“I hesitate to bring this up,” he said, “because you’ll very likely suspect my motives. You’ll think it’s because you’re preempting my property, and because you are unwittingly involving me as an accomplice to your crime, You'll think it's because I have patriotic objections to your plans for desecrating our history."

"Well, haven't you?" Sammy asked.

"Yes, I admit it."

Sammy glanced significantly at Nunzio, then back to the Professor as he continued.

"But what I have to say to you now I say in my capacity as a scientist. In that capacity I warn you, as I did on the first evening here. Time-travel is hazardous. The possibility of alteration of the past due to your invasion cannot be discounted. You may well find yourselves up against unforeseen factors, unexpected problems. That's why I never dared make the attempt myself; not even a journey of one minute, let alone almost two centuries. Should you fail, I must absolve myself of any responsibility. I shall await your return with the utmost trepidation."

"Don't bother," Sammy told him. "We got that all figgered, too. You plan on waiting for our return with a gang of coppers, don't you?"

The Professor turned pale. "Don't tell me you gentlemen expect me to come along?" he murmured. "I couldn't do that. I wouldn't. I'd—I'd be afraid. Frankly, the dangers of dislocation or alteration in the past frighten me worse than the prospect of death itself."

"I'm glad," Sammy said slowly. "On account of it's either—or. And you just made up our minds for us."

The Thinker was already out in the truck, but Mush and Nunzio stood beside Sammy in the cellar.

Nunzio took out his heater and Mush smiled. "Well," he said. "Looks like we're starting off our trip with a bang."

IV

AND A BANG-UP journey it was. There was a route to travel, and guards to knock out and bind, and a heavy machine to cart up into the rear chambers of Independence Hall. Then came the nerve-wracking business of setting it up, and the Thinker's frantic re-scanning of the Professor's charts and directions as he set the computers. By the time they were ready to take off—1:45 a.m. on the dot—the transition itself was almost an anticlimax.

Anti-climax it proved to be. They huddled in the machine, the vacuum-lock set and the vacuum-lined walls enclosing them, and a generator hummed and their fluorescent light above the dials dimmed and the Thinker pressed his finger down after endless adjustment of tab-buttons and then—

Nothing happened.

Or seemed to happen, until the moment—or century, or eternity—of darkness elapsed. None of them were conscious of a change at all. It was when they opened the compartment and stepped out that the change occurred, or they were aware of its prior occurrence.

"Thinker!" Nunzio said, blinking in the bright morning sunlight that streamed through the high windows. "We made it!"

Sammy and the Thinker and Mush didn't even look at him. They were staring at the four men on the other side of the room—four men who stared, in turn, at them.

Then things happened fast. Things happened with orders and heaters and ropes and gags. Things happened with wigs and shoes and clothing.

Four writhing figures squirmed on the floor, then calmed to quiescence as Mush used the butt of his heater.

"Fancy this!" he sighed. "Me knocking out old Ben Franklin hisself!"

"Never mind fancying it now," the Thinker told him. "We've got to get ready for more action."

And so they'd gone into their act.

Altering the text of the Declaration itself was an inspiration on the Thinker's part.

"Give 'em something to argue about all morning," he said. "Keep them talking, then we don't have to. And if they accept the business about temporary governing powers and a treasurer, there'll be no questions asked when the gold arrives and we take charge of it."

He glanced at Mush and Nunzio. "You two go in the back room right now. Watch the machine, keep the Founding Fathers company. And don't forget to watch the windows—maybe the gold will arrive early. Professor Cobbett was no fool. I respect his judgment. If he said things might be a bit different in the past because our coming changed it, maybe he's right."

"Nothing different so far," Sammy said.

"Well, one never knows."

Mush and Nunzio vanished and the Thinker turned to his companion. "Remember your laryngitis. They call it quinsy in these times, and that's how I'll refer to it. And when I do, you cough."

"Got it," Sammy said. "But hey, when's the gang showing up?" He pulled his watch out of his pocket and studied it. "Must be after eight by now." He frowned. "That's funny, it stopped. Still says seven-thirty."

"Let me take a look outside," the Thinker suggested. He strode to the window. "Crowd down there all right. But—wait a minute—" He tugged Sammy's arm. "Look at those soldiers!"

"I see 'em. You mean the ones in the tall hats, with the red uniforms?"

"Red uniforms mean British troops."

"British?"

The Thinker didn't answer. He rushed to the door of the hall, flung it open. Two grenadiers in scarlet coats confronted him. He stared at the white piping on the coats, stared at the silvery steel of their bayonets.

"Halt!" cried the taller of the two. "In the name of His Majesty."

"His Majesty?"

"Yes, His Majesty, you pesky rebel."

"What kind of a gag is this?" Sammy muttered.

"No gag," the Thinker whispered. "Professor Cobbett knew. We changed the past by coming here. The British occupy Philadelphia."

"Enough of your blabbing, sirrah," the soldier shouted. "Save your protests for General Burgoyne. When he enters the city today you and your fellow-traitors can explain at a drum-head court martial."

The Thinker paled. “Changed history,” he whispered. “Burgoyne the victor. The Congress scattered.

The four men we came upon in the back room weren’t waiting for it to meet today. They’ve been trapped here without warning. They’re prisoners. Which means we’re prisoners, too!”

“Oh no we ain’t!” Sammy drew out his heater and pulled the trigger. There was an almost inaudible click. He tried to fire again, but the Thinker slammed the door.

“What good is that?” he murmured. “The place is surrounded.”

“Gun jammed,” Sammy was grumbling. “Can’t figure how—” Then he blinked. “Surrounded. And we’re stuck, huh? Now what?”

“Obviously we get back in the machine and get out of here.”

“But don’t you have to wait until noon, anyway?”

“I’ll worry about that. Let’s get the boys. And hurry. Those soldiers may decide to come in after us at any time.”

So they retreated to the rear room and they got the boys and explained. And in a surprisingly short time they were huddled in the time-machine once more; huddled in the incongruous flummery of their Colonial costumes; huddled and trembling and perspiring as the Thinker hastily checked his data and then reached for the computer levers.

Reached and pressed.

Or tried to press.

“What’s happening?” Sammy shouted, the echo of his voice almost deafening them in the cramped confines of the metal chamber.

“Nothing,” the Thinker groaned. “Nothing’s happening. That’s just the trouble.”

“It don’t work?” Nunzio wailed. “No. And Sammy’s watch doesn’t work, and your guns don’t work, because all of the principles are wrong, altered the way everything is altered.”

“Let me try!” Mush pawed at the levers, the buttons, the dials. Then they were all clawing and scrabbling at once, and still nothing happened.

The Thinker stopped them. “Might as well give up,” he muttered. “Professor Cobbett was right. We’ve changed the past.”

“But even in seventeen seventy-six, guns and watches and machinery worked, didn’t they?” Sammy demanded.

“In our seventeen seventy-six,” the Thinker said. “In our past. But this isn’t our past any more. It’s our present. And by making the past the present we’ve violated a fundamental law. Or tried to. Actually, fundamental laws can’t be violated.”

“But we came here.”

“Yes. Here. But here isn’t our past. It couldn’t be. It would have to be somewhere else.”

“Where else could it be?” Mush wanted to know.

“A place where modern mechanisms don’t work, not having been perfected yet A place where the British defeated the forces of the Revolution and captured the Founding Fathers. And that could only be in—an alternate universe.”

“Alternate universe?”

The Thinker was still trying to explain the concept of an alternate universe to them when the soldiers finally came in to drag them away. He had time only for a final warning as the troops seized them. They were very rough about it.

“Remember, like Franklin said, we must all hang together,” he whispered.

Even there the Thinker was wrong.

They were hanged separately.

Corn-Fed Genius

Thorne brought his new machine to the great industrialist, and everything was fine except nobody could make it work. The answer went beyond mechanics—back into basics—back to an ancient quotation beginning —“Oh, ye of little faith. . . .!

F. DANFORTH GRAHAM sat behind a great mahogany desk in an office panelled with mahogany picwood and methodically stuffed expensive tobacco into the mahogany-colored bowl of a flamegrain briar pipe. He fired up a pipe lighter that looked and behaved like a miniature blowtorch and puffed the tobacco into glowing coals. Then he looked again at the man on the other side of the desk, seeing him through a blue-gray wreath of smoke.

“Do you really consider that a business proposition, Mr. Thorne?” he asked at last.

Peter Thorne was a tall, muscular, taciturn man in his middle thirties. His crew-cut hair was premature salt-and-pepper gray, and his hazel eyes looked out of deep sockets beneath a pronounced supraorbital ridge. He had a habit of rubbing his chin and lower lip with his right forefinger as he spoke.

“I don’t see anything wrong with it, Mr. Graham,” he said. “I’ve got to protect my invention.”

Graham raised one bushy, white eyebrow and smoothed the palm of his hand over his pink, hairless scalp. For a full minute, he said nothing, but there was a look of deep thought in his shrewd blue eyes.

Finally: “Now let’s get this straight. Essentially, you say you’ve designed a new, high-temperature rocket exhaust nozzle liner. You want General Alloys to test your sample to see if it works as you claim it does. You’re willing to put up a five-thousand-dollar bond to guarantee it will be worth our time to run the test. After that, we’ll dicker. Is that it?”

“That’s it, sir,” said Thorne. “You see, I wouldn’t want anyone to steal my invention. That wouldn’t be fair to me.”

“Steal it?” Graham’s other eyebrow went up. “Haven’t you patented it?”

Thorne blinked. “No, sir. I understand you have to prove that something is new and useful in order to patent it, don’t you? Well, I can’t prove it’s useful until it’s been tested, can I? And, you see, I don’t have any way of testing it in my own little shop.” Graham’s eyes grew very thoughtful. “I’ll tell you what I’ll do, Mr. Thorne; I’ll check with the lab and get an estimate on what it will cost to test this liner of yours. We’ll draw up a contract which calls for either payment, at a proper rate, for laboratory service, or an option on your patent, depending on the results of the tests, if you see what I mean.”

Thorne nodded. “If it doesn’t work out, I pay. If it does, you get an option on the patent. And you’ll pay the patent fees—lawyers and so forth?”

“Naturally,” said Graham. “If your invention is worth anything, if it’s patentable, we’ll see that you get full protection.” He looked at his wristwatch. “What say you come back tomorrow at one? We’ll have the papers drawn up then; you can have your attorney look them over.” Thorne rose and extended his hand. “Thanks a lot, Mr. Graham,” he said, smiling—a little bashfully, Graham thought. “My friends in Peoria said I’d never be able to talk to an important man like you, but I told ’em that a good businessman is always open to a good business proposition. And I was right.”

Graham's smile was friendly. "Of course, Mr. Thorne. We'll see you tomorrow, then? Good."

When the door had closed behind Peter Thorne, Graham reached for the phone.

"Give me Dahlquist, in the testing labs."

"Dr. Dahlquist? This is Graham. Can you give me a breakdown of what it costs to test one of those rocket tube liners? What? No, just a regular run. Have Cost and Accounting do a run on it, will you? Fine.

"By the way, any new leads on those liners? Mmmhmm. All right. Good-bye. Thanks." He hung up and shrugged.

F. Danforth Graham knew nothing whatever about metal alloys, but he knew how to handle the money end. The stockholders of General Alloys knew it; in the past ten years, Graham, as President of General Alloys had more than tripled the value of GA stocks, both preferred and common.

Now he was after big money—a Government contract for the newly-born Space Service. Already, the new, ultra-hard, tough, and light titanium-manganese-hydrogen alloys had put GA well into the running for hull construction of space vessels. There was only one fly in the ointment as far as General Alloys was concerned. It doesn't do much good to build spaceship hulls if you can't propel them.

People—the Great General Public—had been inured to $e = Mc^2$ for twenty-odd years, ever since the first A-bomb had gone off, back in '45. Most of them, however, were totally unaware of that famous formula's little brother, $e = Mv^2$. The kinetic energy of a moving body is proportional to its mass multiplied by the square of its velocity.

As far as the rocket is concerned, this simply means that the hotter the exhaust gases, the less reaction mass the ship has to carry.

Working on this sound principle, the AEC and the USAF had come up with the highly efficient, but totally useless Rhodeland-Clevebush Drive, an atomic reactor which squirted water out the tail end of a rocket at something like six thousand degrees Centigrade—a nice, brilliant, white heat.

Why useless? Well, you've got to have something to make the rocket tube out of, and, unfortunately, nothing, but nothing, will stand up to heat like that for very long.

The ceramics boys had been working on it for a long time, but F. Danforth Graham felt that there ought to be something General Alloys could produce that would do the job. So far, the experimental labs had come up with absolutely nothing.

Graham sat in his office and scratched his bushy brows. No good businessman pays any attention to cranks, but this was an unusual case. One: The man was willing to pay. Two: It might—just might—be something. Three: If it was useful, it looked as though GA might get it for a song. And, in the fourth place, GA could make money in the first place.

Two weeks later, to the day, Peter Thorne was back in the sumptuous office of the president of General Alloys. He sat down in the chair in front of the desk and politely refused Graham's offer of a cigarette.

"Cigar, perhaps?" Graham opened a box of fine Panatelas.

Thorne smiled a little and shook his head. "I don't smoke," he said.

Graham began stuffing the flamegrain briar. "I'm a pipe man, myself," he explained. "The other stuff is for visitors." He lit the pipe with his miniature blowtorch and leaned back in his chair. He tapped a sheaf of papers on his desk with a neatly manicured forefinger. "I've read these reports on the test of your tube liner. I'm not a scientist, but they look good to me, and they evidently look good to the lab men. You watched the tests; what did you think?"

"I think they ran very well, sir. They took an oxyacetylene flame at forty-four hundred Centigrade without losing a microgram after twelve hours. That's pretty good."

Graham glanced at the report. “Yes. According to this, the lab men are flabbergasted. They took some turnings from that liner. Seems it’s cast tungsten, alloyed with a small amount of platinum.

That right?”

Thorne nodded, his eyes looking straight into Graham’s. “That’s right. The platinum makes the cast tungsten more machinable and tougher. It cuts down on the brittleness, besides, without changing the hardness much.”

“Mmmhmm.” Graham was still looking at the report. At last, he looked up. “According to Dr. Dahlquist, such an alloy might be a bit difficult—not to say expensive—to produce. What do you think?”

Thorne rubbed his lips with a forefinger and looked apprehensive. “Well—well—uh—

maybe it is rather expensive. I hadn’t thought of that. Platinum runs into money, I know. It sure cost me plenty to make that one liner.”

Graham’s voice didn’t change. “That’s not what we mean,” he said smoothly. “The materials are, in comparison to labor and equipment cost, relatively inexpensive. We’d have to know what sort of machinery is required, what it will take to retool and set up for these liners—that sort of thing.” He took a deep breath and then paused. “And, of course, we’ll have to know what the Space Service thinks of the liner. After all, we don’t have the facilities here at General Alloys to subject this thing to the final test—the actual run in a Rhodeland-Clevebush reactor.”

Thorne nodded. “I see what you mean.” He sat and thought for a long time. Then, he said: “Look. Suppose I do this: Suppose I go back to Peoria on the afternoon plane. I can bring back the equipment by tomorrow morning. Then you can tell how much it would cost you to build similar machines.”

Graham smiled, folding his plump cheeks into wrinkles. “That would be fine; that way, we can—”

“Excuse me, sir,” Thorne said, looking at his wrist-watch, “But if I’m going to catch that plane, I’d better leave now. I’ll see you in the morning.” He grabbed his hat and topcoat and bolted out of the office.

F. Danforth Graham looked blankly at the door for a second, then he grinned, and looked at his office intercom.

"Would you mind coming in here, Dr. Dahlquist?" After a moment, the door opened again, and an impossibly tall, lean man walked in. He stood at least six-three, and looked as though he didn't weigh more than one-fifty with his pockets full of osmium. A strand of blond hair hung limply over his forehead, and his lean, pointed jaw looked as though it hadn't been shaved that morning. But the sparkling blue eyes behind smart gold-rimmed pince-nez were alert and smiling in spite of the unsmiling mouth.

Graham waved him to n chair and said: "Well, how do you size it up?"

Dahlquist pulled a cigarette out of his pocket with bony fingers and lit it. "Screwy," he said.

"How so?" Graham wanted to know.

"Doesn't make sense. First place, I'd've said that alloy was impossible. Can't cast tungsten. Melting point's too high.

"Tungsten has a melting point of around thirty-three eighty Centigrade, higher than damn near anything else. There's nothing you can cast it in. What do you use for a mold?"

Graham scratched his broad, pink scalp. "What does the platinum have to do with it?"

"Can't tell you. Platinum melts at seventeen fifty-five. Shouldn't alloy with tungsten, anyhow. At tungsten's fusion temperature, platinum is vaporizing like hell. It'd be like putting mercury into molten iron." Dahlquist rolled his cigarette between his fingers. "They've both got a cubic crystalline structure, of course. Tungsten's got body-centered cubic crystals, while platinum is face-centered. That wouldn't necessarily make 'em incompatible at room temperature, but I don't see how in hell you'd alloy 'em in the first place."

"How about electrolytically?" Graham asked.

"Nope," the Norseman shook his head. "Crystalline formation—grain structure—indicates cast tungsten. As I said, I'd have claimed it was impossible."

Graham knocked the dottle out of his pipe, tapping it gently against the rubber-padded edge of a huge silver ash tray.

"What would happen," he asked, "if you melted tungsten and platinum together in a pot of some kind?"

Dahlquist grinned one-sidedly. "First place, you couldn't get a pot to melt 'em in. Aside from that, the platinum would be fuming and boiling like hell by the time the tungsten started to melt. You'd have a spongy mess."

"And this stuff isn't spongy?"

Dahlquist ground out a half-smoked cigarette. "Nope. It's cast tungsten. With platinum. And a couple other things."

Graham's face took on a decisive grin. "Fine! Doctor, it doesn't matter how it's done; we know he can do it. And our competitors will go nuts trying to figure out how it's done!" He rubbed vigorously behind his ears with both palms. "We'll have the market cornered on tube linings!"

Dahlquist didn't say anything for a moment; then: "I don't know about that, Mr. Graham; remember what this Thorne said when he left?"

Graham scowled. "Certainly! He said he was going back to Peoria to get his equipment. What's wrong with that?"

The Norseman's bony shoulders went up in a shrug. "I think this country boy's taken you for a ride, Mr. Graham. You don't think you could get the equipment to cast tungsten on a plane, do you? Why, the stuff would weigh tons! I don't know what his game is, but I'll bet you don't see him tomorrow—or for a long time."

It was a good thing that Dr. Dahlquist hadn't offered to bet seriously. If he'd offered to eat his shirt, he might have put himself in the unpleasant position of having to do so. A good chemist can fix up a shirt so that it's edible, but it isn't palatable.

Peter Thorne, his deep-set eyes looking haggard but expectant, arrived at ten the next morning. He spent not more than three minutes cooling his heels in Graham’s outer office before the efficient-looking young lady in the outer office informed him that “Mr. Graham will see you now.”

She looked admiringly at the tall, muscular body and the hard, blocky face as Peter Thorne strode into the inner office.

F. Danforth Graham’s sleek, chubby body was bent over his desk, examining a piece of paper, but as Thorne entered, he stood up, smiling. Thorne could see that there was something behind the smile, but he said nothing.

“How was the trip, Thorne?” Graham asked, whole-heirtedly. “Did you bring your equipment?”

Thorne sat down. “Yes, sir. Two big packing cases. I had them sent air express; they’ll be here in an hour. I sent them collect, of course. I didn’t have the money to pay the charges.”

Only the faintest flicker of a great, white eyebrow indicated any response on Graham’s part. “Of course, Mr. Thorne,” he said smoothly “And you’ll be ready for a demonstration this afternoon?”

“Not immediately, sir,” Thorne said. “It’ll take some time to set up the equipment. I’d like to talk to Dr. Dahlquist again. If I could get him to help me . . .”

“Certainly, Mr. Thorne,” Graham agreed. “However we’d like to know something else. Those test pieces you gave us were cylinders. Now the Space Service insists that test liners sent to them for tryout must conform to a certain geometric shape. I have the specifications here.

“Would it be possible to convert your machine to these specifications within, say, six weeks?”

Thorne grinned. “I’ll make them this evening, for the demonstration, sir. The apparatus is easily adjustable.”

“Fine,” said Graham.

In the other office, Dahlquist’s thin, bony face smiled and frowned at the same time. “Who’s he tryin’ to kid? Or is he?” he asked softly, staring at the intercom speaker. “This is ridiculous!”

“That cable goes there—that is the four-forty line, isn’t it?—that’s it, there. Now, if one of you men will help me . . .”

Peter Thorne was putting the finishing touches on his machine. It was big, to be sure, but it didn’t weigh the tons that Dahlquist had prophesied.

Several yards away, Graham and Dahlquist were talking in low tones. Five or six other executives were lounging around here and there, watching idly, waiting for the fireworks to start.

Graham said: “What do you mean, it won’t work?”

Dahlquist shrugged. “Just what I said. Not enough power going into that thing to melt tungsten. Not in big lots like that. Hell, there’s not enough to melt the platinum. It’s a farce.”

“Have you checked over his machine thoroughly?” Graham asked.

“Don’t need to. Wouldn’t let me anyway. The thing simply can’t do anything like he claims for it. You wouldn’t have to know how a paper punch worked to know it couldn’t turn out a driveshaft forging. Same thing here.”

“We’ll see,” said Graham.

“Okay, throw her now!” Thorne’s voice called from across the room. There was the slap of a heavy-duty relay, and then a slight click as Thorne flipped a switch on his control console. Then he turned to the men assembled around him and smiled rather sheepishly.

“I feel sort of silly, standing here, telling you men how this thing does its job, but that’s what I’m supposed to do. As you can see, there’s two hoppers suspended over the machine. The big one is full of powdered tungsten, and the little one contains granular platinum. They’re carefully measured out through the bottom of the hoppers by an automatic weighing device which is set for the size of the thing we’re going to make. Mr. Graham gave me the specifications for the Space Service test pieces, so we’re going to make six of them for test purposes. Now, the . . .”

“I’ve got it!” whispered Dahlquist. His voice, though low, was excited.

“Got what?” whispered Graham.

"His angle. Kept wondering what he was to gain by this. Now I know. It's the platinum! He figures on getting away with some of that platinum! It'll go into that machine, and that's the last we'll see of it."

"He won't get away with a trick like that," Graham said tightly. "Let's see what he's up to."

". . . and the finished casting will roll down that chute into the tub," Thorne finished. He looked around. "Now, if you're ready, gentlemen."

He turned to the control console and began adjusting dials and rheostat settings. Then, seemingly satisfied, he punched a button. A deep hum, with powerful subsonic undertones, vibrated through the building. Snickerings and clankings sounded within the machine.

Then, suddenly, a dazzling, yellow-white cylinder appeared from a hatch at one end of the machine, slid down a chute, and landed in a steel tub at the bottom. As they appeared he counted.

"One," said Thorne mildly.

"Two," he said, a short time later.

"Three—four—five—six!"

He shut off the machine and smiled. "There you are, gentlemen. Machine them down and send them to the Government. Naturally, I don't know if they'll hold up, but we can hope, can't we?" Then he grinned. "And by the way, save the machining scraps; that stuff is expensive as hell."

Two more weeks passed, with the slow plodding of minutes and hours and days. Then, a board meeting of General Alloys of America, Incorporated, was called. At the head of the long table sat F. Danforth Graham. Before him were several sheaves of paper, divided neatly into piles. One sheaf was in his hand. His droning voice filled the room with dull reverberations as he read the report on the findings of several investigators who had worked on the Thorne Rocket Liner Machine. He came to the final sentence, finished it, and looked up.

"Now," he said, "are there any questions?"

Miss Jerri Satin (37% of the shares, by proxy and otherwise) crushed out a cigarette and said: "The Space Service has accepted the tube liners for an actual rocket test. Is that right?"

Graham nodded. "That's right. Although the liners won't hold up under the direct blast without refrigeration, they do fine with it."

"And this young man's machine makes these liners?" Miss Satin's voice sounded like her name. Thirty years had passed since her voice had been heard on the radios of a nation, but the voice was still there, and a lovely dignity had replaced the passion-stirring beauty in her face.

"Apparently, it does," Graham acknowledged.

"Either it does or it doesn't, Mr. Graham," said Miss Satin, her voice chilly. "If it does, give him a contract; if it doesn't, throw him out."

Lewis Tenwick (12½%) stood up slowly. His nine decades of life weighed on him heavily, but they had not crushed him yet.

"Mr. Graham," he said, in a dry, old voice, "as I understand it, our only objection to giving this Mr. Thorne a contract is the statement by Dr. Dahlquist that there is no physical basis for the machine's operation. Am I correct?"

"Quite correct, Mr. Tenwick."

"Hmmm. Mr. Graham, I'm a good deal older than you—than any of you. I was a young man when this century began. We thought we knew what science was then. We were satisfied that there was nothing left to discover.

"The scientist then could have told you that a great many things were impossible: the airplane, the atomic bomb, travel to the moon, a space station—these were all impossible.

"Frankly, Mr. Graham, I am of the opinion that a scientist. may be able to tell us what we can do, but he's not worth a damn when it comes to telling us what we do." Slowly, and with laborious dignity, he sat down. There were several smiles around the table.

The three-hundred pound bulk of Jeremy Psmith (14%) didn't even attempt to rise. "Let's put it this way, Graham," he said, in a deep, hoarse, rumbling baritone, "if we can make money by making these things, it doesn't matter if they're made by black magic."

"I have often thought," Miss Jerri Satin cut in, "that Mr. Psmith would sell his soul to the Devil if it would net a profit." She smiled then, and it was the same brilliant smile that millions had loved three decades before. "Frankly, I must admit that I'd sell Mr. Psmith's soul to the Devil, too, if it would net a profit."

A chuckle ran around the table, but it was almost drowned out by the booming Haw! Haw! Haw! of Jeremy Psmith.

"However," Miss Satin continued, as soon as the laughter had died down, "we'd ought to cover our own tracks, too. I suggest that the contract stipulate that General Alloys owns, Jock, stock, and transistor, the patent to Mr. Thorne's machine. In addition, there should be a clause which stipulates that Mr. Thorne shall be paid on a—uh—piecework basis. In other words, he only gets his money for every successful liner turned out."

Old Tenwick raised a withered hand. "I'm not sure that would stand up in court, Miss Satin. I suggest that we . . .

The debate went on for nearly two hours, but, at long last, they arrived at a solid decision—depending, of course, on the decision of the lawyers.

There wasn't a one of them that expected Peter Thorne to accept the contract as it stood; they thought the poor yokel had more sense than that, and were ready to bargain.

But Thorne's sole words were: "That sounds fair enough to me." At which point, he'd taken his pen out and signed the contract.

The patent went through without argument, an unusual circumstance in itself. But not even the shrewd lads in the Patent Office could deny that a method of casting tungsten, was a "new and useful discovery." The thing was iron-bound, and it belonged entirely to General Alloys, Incorporated.

The full, entire, and complete diagram, process, and description of Peter Thorne's machine was on file with the United States Government. Complex as it was, Thorne insisted, despite his attorney's protestations, that everything be recorded in detail. By the time the harassed lawyer was through, anyone in the world could, for ten cents, get a diagram of Thorne's machine.

The board of directors of General Alloys worried for a while, until they discovered one vital fact. No one but Peter Thorne could make the machine work.

Exactly what happened in foreign countries which attempted to reproduce the Thorne machine is unknown, but it is highly probable that the events paralleled, roughly, the reports sent in by Dr. Gustav Dahlquist of General Alloys.

F. Danforth Graham looked at Dr. Dahlquist through an effluvium of blue pipe-smoke. "So? What happened?"

The Norseman's figure was even leaner than before; he looked as though he had lost an additional twenty pounds, if that were possible. But a cold, unholy light burned in his blue eyes.

He raised a bandaged hand. "Mr. Graham, I've gone over that machine inch by inch, circuit by circuit, tube by tube. It doesn't work; it can't work. I've rebuilt it. I've constructed an exact duplicate. And—" He weaved the hand, "—this is what I've gotten."

"What happened?" repeated Graham, puffing steadily at his pipe.

"We've taken meter readings of the machine during production," Dahlquist went on. "We have slow motion pictures of exactly what Thorne does. We have duplicated that, too.

"Yesterday evening, we tried our first test run. The damned machine blew up in our faces, practically. There was red-hot metal all over the place. Red-hot! Around a thousand, at most. Not anywhere near enough to melt tungsten or platinum."

Graham was in no mood to sympathize. "Dr. Dahlquist," he said preemptorily, "the United States Government has given us a multi-million dollar contract to supply them with rocket tube liners. The Space Service has sent the first successful robot ship to Venus, landed it, and brought it back. They want a manned ship to go next.

"Within a few years, we'll have to turn those liners out by the hundreds. We'll have to make better ones. And you stand there and tell me it can't be' done!" He punched a button on the intercom. "Ask Mr. Thorne if he'll step in here for a moment."

He looked back up at Dahlquist. "We've tried long enough to duplicate Thorne's work without his advice. I want you to talk to him. Let's see if we can't get something out of this. If he's discovered a new principle—"

"New principle!" Dahlquist interrupted. "Couldn't have! That hick doesn't know the first thing about electronics! His machine isn't even built right! He—"

The door opened, and Peter Thorne came in. "Yes, sir?" he said.

"Sit down, Thorne," Graham said. "We need your advice." Graham's pipe had gone out, so he relit it. "According to your contract, we own the right to build your machine and use it. But we can't make it work. Why?"

"I've told you—or rather I've told Dr. Dahlquist—that I don't know, sir," said Thorne honestly. But there was an odd sparkle in his deep-socketed eyes.

"Haven't you any ideas?" Graham asked.

Peter Thorne leaned back in his chair. "Why, yes, sir, I do. I've told them to Dr. Dahlquist, and he refuses to pay any attention."

Graham speared Dahlquist with a suspicious look as Thorne went blithely on.

"For fifteen years or so," he continued, "it's been known that the human mind had definite control over electromagnetic and gravitic fields. Matter and energy are, under the proper conditions, under the control of the human mind.

"But it's rather like trying to make an automobile go uphill. You can't push it uphill with sheer brute strength, but you can cooperate with it; you can guide it uphill. It's a sort of cooperative thing; you need a machine—a psionic machine—to do the work, and a human mind to guide it.

"These liners are made just that way. With the aid of the machine, I sort of—well, I think the alloy into place.

"The human body is a perfect example of a psionic machine. You don't have to go through a lot of tough rigamarole to make your fingers move; you just move them." He wriggled his fingers to demonstrate. Then he spread his hands.

"It seems simple to me. If the human mind can control as complex a machine as the human body, why can't it control a simple thing like that machine of mine?

"The only reason Dr. Dahlquist won't believe my machine works is that it doesn't fit in with the theories he's already got set in his mind. Even proof won't sway him."

Graham nodded. "Sounds perfectly reasonable to me. I didn't know we'd got that far along with such things." He turned to Dahlquist, and started to say something. But the tall, thin man was ahead of him.

"This is ridiculous," he said, thickly. "There's something wrong with that machine, and I can prove it! It doesn't—I mean, it can't—"

"Dahlquist!" Graham's voice cut across the scientist's own. "Do you or don't you intend to work with Mr. Thorne on this?"

Dahlquist's eyes blazed. "No! You sound like Bridges! Young blockhead from MIT who said that the law of conservation of matter-energy and the second law of thermodynamics weren't necessarily compatible. He—"

"He got fired," said Thorne, his voice cold. "You fired him because he agreed that there might be reason behind a psionic machine."

"Damn it!" Dahlquist shouted. "You can't just throw over physics like it was a silly fairy tale. The observed facts are there!"

"Nobody is trying to say that observed facts are wrong," Thorne said quietly. He suddenly seemed stronger, bigger, and more commanding than even Graham. “It’s just that they aren’t the final and all-inclusive facts. There are others.”

F. Danforth Graham knew nothing of the basic theories of the argument taking place before him. But he did know that one man was right and another wrong. He stood up, pointed a finger at Dahlquist, and said: “Dr. Dahlquist, you’re fired.” His voice was heavy and final. “You will be permitted to resign, and your record will be clean. But I won’t have a man working with me who can’t see his nose in front of his face.”

He looked at Thorne. “Do you have anything to say?”

Thorne couldn’t look at Dahlquist. “I—I’d say you ought to look up young Bridges. He seemed to be interested in learning something new.”

Graham nodded. “Right. That’s what business needs in these times—new blood.”

Thorne said nothing. He wanted to smile, but he couldn’t. THE END

String of Pearls

Jerry Gibson was sitting at the bar when she came in. He turned to stare at her. Five minutes later he was still staring.

“Exquisite, isn’t she?” said Sweet William. “So tall, so slender. She carries herself like a sword sheathed in white silk.”

Sweet William talked like that when he was a little high, and Jerry was used to it. Besides, what he said was true. She was a luxurious hunk of fluff, with black hair and eyes to match, and the kind of figure that made you want to whistle, except that your throat went dry when you looked at her.

Only that wasn’t what made Jerry stare. He was looking at her throat, and what was around it.

It wasn’t exactly a necklace and it wasn’t a pendant, because it was drawn up tightly—just a string of perfectly matched pearls.

But such pearls! Ten of them, almost the size of marbles. They shone brightly under the light, and so did Jerry’s eyes. He did a little quick appraisal job. Say five banners apiece, at least, if they were perfect—and genuine. Nobody could touch them without breaking the string up, so the best he could get might be three for each. But three times ten still added up to thirty—thirty thousand dollars.

And she was wearing other stuff, too: an emerald ring and a fancy gold bracelet with smaller emeralds set in it. No use figuring on them, though. Emeralds were out of style, and you just had to take whatever a fence would cough up for them.

But there was probably more stuff where this came from. Maybe Sweet William would know.

Sweet William knew, all right. He sat down at the bar next to Jerry and nodded. “Just got in yesterday.” he murmured. “The Ranee.”

“The what?”

“Ranee, old boy. Female of the species. Male title, Rajah. Only in this case there is no Rajah. Deceased. Suicide, last year—Rajah of Gwolapur. You must have read about it.”

Jerry shook his head. How could he have read about it? They didn’t print that kind of news in the Racing Form. But trust an operator like Sweet William to be up on such stuff. That was his specialty—moving in on rich widows, and rich women who wished they were widows.

They watched the Ranee of Gwolapur as she settled herself at a table. It was quite an interesting setup, because she had a lot of help. Two little characters in turbans were doing a brother act for her—pulling out the chair, taking the menu from the waiter and holding it so that she could look it over without unladylike haste.

“Her servants, huh?” Jerry asked.

Sweet William nodded. “Loaded,” he said. And then, as his eyes narrowed, “Stacked, too. This might be interesting. I wonder if the oriental taste includes poetry?”

“I saw her first,” Jerry said. “I got a right.”

“The pearls?”

“What else?”

Sweet William put his head down and talked softly, so the bartender wouldn’t hear. “Child’s play,” he said. “Crude, too. This calls for the delicate touch, old boy. Finesse.”

Jerry scowled. “You got a one-track mind. You want to finesse everything in skirts. Me, I’ll settle for the loot.”

“You misunderstand. I’m thinking of the same thing. But we differ on ways and means.”

“I’ll handle the ways and means,” Jerry told him. “I saw her first, remember? I’m gonna case this job good, find out if she keeps the stuff up in her room or puts it in the safe. Then—”

Sweet William dug his fingers into Jerry's arm and the two of them dummied up until the bartender passed down the line. Then he shook his head again.

"It would never do," he said. "Not here, old boy. Too plushy. There'd be a proper row. Suggestions in order? Deal me in. You know how I function. The subtle approach. I'll get the gumdrops for you. May take a bit longer, but no fuss. Clean. And we'll cut the cake two ways."

Jerry thought it over. Sweet William was right. Pulling off a caper in a big resort hotel was enough to make you sweat. With the fix in and the gambling wide open, the management kept its own stable of hoods. And they were on the lookout for loners like Jerry Gibson. They didn't like any funny business because it knocked their good name. So even if he got the pearls his way, he'd be certain to have the hoods on his tail as well as lots of law.

"Rough show, old boy," Sweet William said, like he was reading his mind.

Jerry bit his lip. It added up. Ten to one, the doll kept her ice stashed in the safe anyway, and he'd never get it there. He'd have to jump her or those flunkeys she kept around. Plenty rough, all right. But Sweet William would just move in and take over, without any trouble. He could do it, too; Jerry had seen him operate before. A real pussy-cat.

Jerry swallowed the rest of his drink. "All right," he said. "You got yourself a deal."

Sweet William started to smile, then stopped. Jerry saw that he was looking over at the table again.

"Perhaps not," Sweet William said. "We have company for dinner."

It was true. The Ranee wasn't alone any more. A tall, gray-haired man had just joined her. He was sitting across the table, smiling and talking, and from the way she smiled and talked back it looked as if neither of them worried much about using the same toothbrush.

In a minute the Ranee said something and the two flunkeys bowed and went away.

Jerry decided to do the same thing. He and Sweet William walked outside together.

“How dumb can you get?” Jerry asked. “It’s crazy to figure a queen like that floating around without a jack in the pack. We’ll have to do it my way after all.”

“Cool’s the word, old boy. Let me check on the gentleman first. Tomorrow morning, right off. Now, if you’ll excuse me, I have an engagement.”

Jerry let him go. He knew what Sweet William meant by an engagement. He needed another fix. That was Sweet William’s little problem—he was on the stuff. Once he’d told Jerry that if it wasn’t for the fixes he’d be sitting pretty in Hollywood right now. And Jerry believed him. Sweet William wasn’t a liar—just a hophead blackmail artist who lived off women. Jerry could trust him.

And he would, until tomorrow.

Meanwhile, there might be some action at the tables.

There was, too. Jerry had a good night and he went to bed happy. Funny thing, he kept dreaming about the Ranee. Not about the pearls, but about the dame herself. In the dream she wasn’t even wearing pearls.

It was a good dream, and when Jerry woke up he found himself envying Sweet William. Or the gray-haired gent who had already moved in.

He got up early, before lunch, and was just going to phone Sweet William’s room when the character knocked on the door. He was all togged out in gray flannels and he looked great.

“Good morning, merry sunshine,” he said.

“What’s so good about it?” Jerry wanted to know. “You been checking up on the Ranee’s boyfriend, is that it?”

Sweet William nodded. “Precisely,” he said. “No trouble at all. Sylvan Lemo. Formerly of Athens. Shipping interests. Here on a sabbatical, as it were. As nearly as I can determine, he spent part of it in the Ranee’s suite last night.”

"So what's so good about that you should hold up an applause card?" "Farewell appearance, old boy. The gentleman checked out at midnight. Bag and baggage. In fact, he did a bunk."

"Bunk?"

"Didn't pay his bill."

"Hey!" Jerry stood up. "You think he maybe got to her first? Maybe it was a phony name, and he had the same idea—"

Sweet William put his hand on Jerry's shoulder. "He didn't get the pearls, if that's what's worrying you. She's still wearing them this morning."

"How do you know?"

Sweet William grinned like a skunk eating bumblebees. "I saw them when we had breakfast together."

"Brother! You're not handing me a line—"

"Quite the contrary. She is the recipient. I happened to bump into her in the lobby and strike up an acquaintance. By the way, she speaks English beautifully. Does everything beautifully." Sweet William backed toward the door.

"Hey, where you going?"

"I've a luncheon engagement with the Ranee."

"You sure move fast."

"That's the specialty of the house."

"What do you want me to do?"

"Nothing, old boy. Absolutely nothing." Sweet William was serious now. "You understand the situation. From now on I don't know you. We don't speak to one another, or call one another."

"But—"

"I'll see to it that you get a progress report. And it won't take long. Trust me. This is the best way." Jerry nodded.

But when Sweet William left, he went over and sailed a pillow across the room. Hell of a note. He was going to have to sweat it out alone while Sweet William had all the kicks. Did he understand the situation, like Sweet

William said? Damned right he did—meaning, Sweet William couldn't afford to let a babe like this Ranee think he knew a ratty-faced little scrut like Jerry. It might queer the act.

A beautiful doll like the Ranee didn't have anything to do with ratty-faced little scruts, or even people who associated with them. In her book, he stunk.

"All right," Jerry told himself. "All right. Take it easy."

Or rather, sit tight, and let Sweet William take it easy. And when he took it, they'd cut up the loot and then there'd be plenty of moola. Enough moola so that Jerry could go out and buy himself a doll—a tall, ritzy-looking doll with black hair like the Ranee who would think him the playboy type. Or at least, she'd pretend she thought so, as long as the moola held out.

But damn it—

Jerry got hold of himself and went down to the bar. Two drinks later he was ready for the track. Going out he saw Sweet William coming in, steering the Ranee by the arm. She wasn't wearing the pearls now, but the two stooges were right behind her.

Jerry stared, but nobody stared back. Sweet William didn't even notice him. He was busy talking to the Ranee, and she was looking up at him and smiling and showing her teeth, and they were almost as good as the pearls. Jerry wondered what it would be like to feel those teeth digging into a guy's shoulder and—

The hell with it. He went out to the track.

He stayed in the bar out there after the last beetle crawled in, and met a couple of dealers he knew from K.C. They went out to eat and ended up in a joint on the highway. Highway was right: Jerry was plenty high when they finally poured him into the hotel about two a.m.

He flopped right on the bed without shedding his threads, and sort of passed out. But he dreamed about the Ranee, and her teeth and her eyes and her white arms reaching—

Jerry woke up at noon and it was rugged. A shower helped. He went downstairs, hoping to bump into Sweet William, but no dice.

By the time he finished eating it was too late to go out to the track, and he didn't feel like it anyway. He went into the bar and sobered up on beer.

It must have been almost five when somebody tapped him on the arm, and it was Sweet William. He didn't sit down.

"Only have a minute," he said. "Meeting the dear girl for dinner, you know."

"How's it going?"

"Splendidly, old boy. Couldn't be better. She's crackers over me, absolutely. Last night—"

Jerry didn't want to hear about last night. "What about the deal?" he asked.

Sweet William wasn't even listening to him. "Would you believe it, she's on the stuff, too. The genuine. Yen shee gow. Smokes a pipe. You've never had a bang until you've tried the pure quill. Of course, the orientals were always great ones for opium. How she manages to maintain her supply I don't know, but I'll find out tonight."

"Is that all you're going to find out?" Jerry couldn't help sounding off.

"Of course not. I've been trying to get to you all day, but I couldn't shake off Her Highness. And those two attendants of hers watch me like narks. Bit of a problem, getting her alone. When she's gone they keep their eyes open, let me tell you."

"Bodyguards, huh?"

"In a manner of speaking. But don't worry—I'll get rid of them tonight."

"You got plans?"

"Don't underestimate me, dear boy. Certainly I have plans. The time is ripe for a bit of a rendezvous in her suite. She'll see to it that we're alone, I'm sure. Then we'll pad down a bit, with a pipe or two for company. The pipe sets her off; she's a proper caution, then. And so am I."

Sweet William smiled reminiscently, then sobered. "But tonight I'll indulge in a bit of duplicity. I won't really hit the stuff. When she's out, I'll take up a collection."

"Are you sure the pearls will be there?"

"I'll make sure. Usually she keeps them in the safe—you were right about that. But they'll be around her neck tonight, until I remove them. By the way, there happen to be eleven of them, not ten. You miscounted, old boy. But I forgive you since it's in our favor."

Jerry frowned. "Okay, then what?"

"Then we travel. In your car, naturally. We throw them off the scent. Nothing could be simpler. I'll check out now. You check out before midnight. Drive around to the parking lot of the Golden Wheel. Look out for me about two at the latest. I'll have a cab drop my luggage in the lobby checkroom and you can pick it up. No sense chancing someone seeing the baggage going into your car. Right?"

"Right."

Jerry wanted to say more, but Sweet William was gone. And now there was nothing to do but wait. Wait and sweat.

He waited and he sweated through supper. Then he went out and took a walk around. No sense drinking—not if he was going to drive tonight. They'd have to at least clear the state line by morning before holing up in a motel.

He walked around until eleven or so, then went back to the hotel and checked out. He got the car and took it to the parking lot and sat there. Just sat there, waiting and sweating.

Waiting and sweating was bad enough, but thinking was worse. Funny thing, he wasn't thinking about what might go wrong with the deal. Sweet William could swing it all right, and there was no sense in getting antsy over something he couldn't help either way.

What bothered him was thinking about the Ranee. The Ranee and Sweet William together, alone up in her suite. He wondered what they were doing and then he knew what they were doing and that was the worst part of it.

So he tried thinking about something else. He tried wondering what went with a dame like that. Husband committed suicide last year—was that the story? Guy must be nuts, killing himself when he had a dame like that.

Maybe she hit the pipe too hard, though. Maybe she was too much for him to handle. Maybe that's why she went around now, alone, moving from Miami to Vegas to Reno to Colorado Springs—the Big Circuit—picking up guys and getting her kicks on the way. Funny she hadn't been taken before. Asking for it, really. Unless those two stooges of hers protected her.

If that was the way it worked, then perhaps Sweet William would run into trouble. But no, no use figuring like that. Got to trust Sweet William. He'd get the pearls.

Wait and sweat.

Jerry glanced at his watch. Holy hellsmoke, two-thirty! And where was the joker?

He tried to hold it down, tried to bury it in his mind, but it kept popping up in other places—his stomach, for instance. His stomach began to jump up and down. At three o'clock he was ready to flip.

Maybe the two little guys, those servants, were knife artists. Sweet William might be up there with a shiv in his back. You couldn't trust foreigners anyhow. He'd wait another half hour, and then—

And then it was three-thirty, and no Sweet William. So what could he do? He could barge up to the Ranee's suite and knock on the door. But maybe he'd better go back to the hotel and check.

So he went back, and he checked.

The clerk on the desk was very polite. Yes, Mr. Henderson had left, about ten o'clock.

It was funny to think of Sweet William as "Mr. Henderson," but the rest wasn't so funny. Because while the clerk was explaining that no, Mr. Henderson hadn't left a message, somebody bumped into Jerry at the desk.

He looked around and there was one of the little guys—one of the Ranee's servants.

"You wish news of Mr. Henderson, sir?" he asked.

Jerry could hardly understand him, but he understood enough to nod and listen close.

"It is as the dark says. You friend go away, in his car."

"His car?"

"I know. I assist him with his bags."

Jerry nodded again. There was nothing else to say to the little character. He went away, and Jerry walked over to the lounge and sat down.

Sweet William was gone. Sweet William the joker, the guy who was so sure he'd get the pearls. Well, that's exactly what he'd done—and how easy it had been! Set Jerry up to wait for him, then skip out with a good four or five hours' start.

Almost six hours now, and no telling which direction he'd taken off in. There'd be no way of catching up with him. It was a clean getaway. So clean the Ranee probably didn't even know about it yet; the little guy in the turban didn't sound upset. Hell, the trick was so slick Sweet William even had him carry out his bags!

Jerry had to hand it to the joker. He wished he could hand him something, right now. Playing the Ranee for a mark was one thing—but playing him, too!

But there wasn't a damned thing he could do about it. Not a damned thing to do, now. Except to get his own bags, check in again, and try to figure out what could be done tomorrow.

All at once Jerry was very bushed. He needed a drink, and remembered the pint in his bag.

So he went up to the clerk, got himself a room again, let the bellboy haul in his stuff, and then he was set. The pint helped. He sat on the bed and drank it straight, drank it fast. Every time he felt like cursing Sweet William he shoved the old bottle into his mouth. It was almost light when he fell back across the bed and passed out.

It was almost dark when he woke up again. No hangover, but then he'd slept the clock around.

Jerry got up, shaved, dressed, and went downstairs. He was hungry, but the rage in his stomach kept him from eating. A drink would be better. Damn it, there must be something he could do to copper his bets. He'd counted on those pearls. He'd counted on a lot of things, including that lousy, double-crossing—

He was just walking into the bar when she stopped him.

"I beg your pardon," she said.

He'd never heard her voice before, and it did something to him. It made his stomach churn faster, but not with rage, not with hunger, not with thirst.

The Ranee was standing there in the corridor leading from the bar, and she was smiling at him.

"Aren't you the gentleman who was asking for Mr. Henderson last night? Ghopal spoke to me about it."

Jerry didn't know what to say. If she was trying to get a lead on her missing ice, he'd better dummy up fast.

Then he blinked. He'd been so busy watching her smile he'd never looked at her throat.

And she was still wearing the pearls. There they were! She had on the ring and the bracelet, too. And matching earrings. So Sweet William hadn't snatched the loot after all.

Jerry smiled. "Why, yes," he said. "We had a business matter to discuss."

"I happen to know where Mr. Henderson is," the Ranee told him. "He had an urgent call yesterday evening—something about an appointment in the city. But he told me he expected to be back before six. In fact, we had a dinner engagement."

It sounded phony as hell. But there was just an off-chance it might be true. Sweet Wiiliam was a smoothie; he always had a couple of deals cooking. Could he have gotten a fast blast from town and scooted off to take care of it? There was no way he could have gotten in touch with Jerry beforehand, and maybe he was too smart to leave a note that would tie them together later.

So he'd checked out and planned to come back tonight. It was worth thinking about, anyway. And meanwhile, the Ranee was still here. The Ranee and that necklace, or whatever it was, with the big pearls. Big pearls, big eyes, big—

“I was on my way in to dinner,” the Ranee was saying, “in hopes that your friend might join me later.”

“Good idea,” Jerry said. “How’s about us waiting together?”

It was crude, and he could have kicked himself, but she didn’t seem to mind. That smile of hers hit him hard. Maybe he’d been underestimating himself. She didn’t seem to object when he introduced himself, and then they were sitting together and the two stooges were going through their routine with the chairs and the menu.

They poured the champagne, too, and it was easy to talk, and pretty soon Jerry didn’t give a damn whether Sweet William showed or not.

What the hell, he could handle this. Sweet William wasn’t the only one who could work the rich-bitch racket. Just because he was a smoothie, and easy on the eyes, that didn’t mean guys like Jerry Gibson were good for nothing but that wait and sweat routine. Come to think of it, worse-looking guys than him managed to get places with the broads.

And he was certainly getting places with this one. The way the champagne hit on an empty stomach, he was talking a blue streak. And here it was—must have been—nine o’clock already, and they were still sitting here, eating and living it up. She was telling him all about Gwolapur, and how she and the Rajah used to go on shoots—which meant tiger-hunting, with elephants, just like in those movies—and about how she missed all that.

Then they talked about traveling and about how beautiful she was and what a shame it was that Sweet William had stood her up, and somehow he let it slip out how much he admired her ice. Of course he didn’t call it ice, and she didn’t get sore. She just said she had a lot more of it up in her suite. And would he like to see the collection?

That’s when Jerry sobered up.

Here he’d been running off at the mouth, letting himself get half-crocked, and all the while he should have been figuring angles.

Now, when his chance came, he wasn’t ready. He’d have to watch himself.

But he wanted to go up to the suite, all right. It would be a good chance to case the setup. He wouldn't pull anything off tonight, anyway—just take a look around. If he played it close to the chest he might be able to come back. And next time he'd have a plan.

So he stood up and she stood up and the turbans pulled out the chairs, and they took the elevator.

The elevator hesitated after the twelfth floor and for a second Jerry was afraid they'd stop at thirteen. Not that he was superstitious or anything, but he just didn't like thirteen. But of course that was a lot of malarkey. Hotels didn't have thirteenth floors any more. The elevator left them off at fourteen.

Then he was in the suite. There was a plush layout for you—big rooms, all dim lights, and lots of fancy cloths hung over the furniture and draped on the walls; she must have brought the stuff with her. It looked like one of those harems you see in the movies.

Funny smell, incense or something. Jerry remembered what Sweet William had said about yen shee gow, and it was funny to think of this gorgeous dish being a hophead. But then it was funny that she could go for him, too; sitting him down on one of the big sofas and bringing him a drink with her own hands. Because the two servants had disappeared.

They were all alone in the dim coolness, and the drink wasn't strong. He know he could take it without feeling it. He could take anything, he could take her if she just moved a little closer. The way she smiled, and her soft voice going through him, and talking to him about how lonely it was to live like this, traveling from place to place with nothing but memories—

Then Jerry saw the guy standing in the corner and he wanted to jump. He was big and black and he had six arms.

The Ranee laughed at him. "Do not be afraid," she said. "She will not do you harm."

"She?"

"The statue. Durga, the goddess of our household. Kali."

Jerry stared at the statue before leaning back again. She had six arms, all right, and looked plenty mean. There was a string of white things around the statue's neck, and it took Jerry less than five seconds to make out what they were. Little ivory skulls. Human skulls. A hell of a necklace.

Thinking of necklaces made him think of the pearls. The Ranee was sitting next to him now, and something about the way she rested her head on his shoulder told him he could take her in his arms, if he wanted to. If he wanted to? Just feeling her near him, feeling the whiteness and the redness and the blackness all blending in heat and perfume was enough to stone him. But before he reached out, he had to look at the pearls.

They were there, resting against her throat, moving up and down—big and round and perfect. Eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve of them.

Twelve?

He'd counted ten, and Sweet William told him there were eleven. But that was before Sweet William went away.

There were ten the first day, and then the gray-haired man had gone away. After that, there were eleven. Then Sweet William went away, and now there were twelve—

She must have seen him jump, and he tried to smile and cover it up. He said, "You've got a better taste in jewelry than that statue of yours, if you don't mind my saying so."

And she smiled too, and said, "Kali is the goddess of the Thugs, you know. Each skull represents one of her victims."

Jerry stood up. She didn't try to hold him.

"The Thugs are stranglers, you know. They kill as a sacrifice. The cult was supposedly stamped out many years ago, but it still has its devotees. My late husband was a believer. He chose me as a bride because he looked upon me as a reincarnation of the goddess. Quaint, isn't it?"

Jerry looked at the necklace. She was close enough for him to make a grab for her, so he wasn't afraid. Besides, the servants were gone.

"So you killed him, huh? And you've been going around ever since, knocking guys off and adding to your string of pearls. That's what you did to the Greek, and to Sweet William. You’re crazy as a bedbug.”

The Ranee laughed. “How utterly absurd!” she said.

“Like hell it is,” Jerry said. “You just got me up here because you were scared I’d kick up a fuss if Sweet William didn’t come back. And maybe you had some loony idea of making me number thirteen in your necklace. Well, let me tell you—”

But Jerry Gibson never got a chance to tell her. Because all at once the servants were back, and one of them was holding his arms and the other one was wrapping something tight around his neck, something that squeezed and squeezed.

Jerry’s eyes began to bulge. The last thing he saw was the string of pearls around the Ranee’s neck. It wasn’t really a necklace, of course. He knew that now.

It was more like a choker.

Water's Edge

Connors thought Krauss' widow would he really stacked. He was hardly anticipating a used-up drab. Yet his interest in the woman went far, far deeper than the physical, and one day it was to lead him to the boat-house upon the—

The fly-specked lettering on the window read The Bright Spot Restaurant. The sign overhead urged Eat.

He wasn't hungry, and the place didn't look especially attractive, but he went inside anyway.

It was a counter joint with a single row of hard-backed booths lining one wall. A half-dozen customers squatted on stools at the end of the counter, near the door. He walked past them and slid onto a stool at the far end.

There he sat, staring at the three waitresses. None of them looked right to him, but he had to take a chance. He waited until one of the women approached him.

"Yours, Mister?"

"Coke."

She brought it to him and set the glass down. He pretended to be studying the menu and talked without looking up at her.

"Say, does a Mrs. Helen Krauss work here?"

"I'm Helen Krauss."

He lifted his eyes. What kind of a switch was this, anyway? He remembered the way Mike used to talk about her, night after night. “She’s a tall blonde, but stacked. Looks a lot like that dame who plays the dumb blonde on television—what’s-her-name—you know the one I mean. But she’s no dope, not Helen. And boy, when it comes to loving. . . .

After that, his descriptions would become anatomically intricate, but all intricacies had been carefully filed in memory.

He examined those files now, but nothing in them corresponded to what he saw before him.

This woman was tall, but there all resemblance ended. She must have tipped the scales at one-sixty, at least, and her hair was a dull, mousy brown. She wore glasses, too. Behind the thick lenses, her faded blue eyes peered stolidly at him.

She must have realized he was staring, and he knew he had to talk fast. “I’m looking for a Helen Krauss who used to live over in Norton Center. She was married to a man named Mike.”

The stolid eyes blinked. “That’s me. So what’s this all about?”

“I got a message for you from your husband.”

“Mike? He’s dead.”

“I know. I was with him when he died. Just before, anyway. I’m Rusty Connors. We were cellmates for two years.”

Her expression didn’t change, but her voice dropped to a whisper. “What’s the message?”

He glanced around. “I can’t talk here. What time do you get off?”

“Seven-thirty.”

“Good. Meet you outside?”

She hesitated. “Make it down at the corner, across the street. There’s a park, you know?”

He nodded, rose and left without looking back.

This wasn’t what he had expected—not after the things Mike had told him about his wife. When he bought his ticket for Hainesville, he had had other ideas in mind. It would have been nice to find this hot, goodlooking blonde widow of Mike’s and, maybe, combine business with pleasure. He had even thought about the two of them blowing town together, if she was half as nice as Mike said. But that was out, now. He wanted no part of this big, fat, stupidlooking slob with the dull eyes.

Rusty wondered how Mike could have filled him with such a line of bull for two years straight—and then he knew. Two years straight—that was the answer—two years in a bare cell, without a woman. Maybe it had got so that, after a time, Mike believed his own story, that Helen Krauss became beautiful to him. Maybe Mike had gone a little stir-simple before he died, and made up a lot of stuff.

Rusty only hoped Mike had been telling the truth about one thing. He had better have been, because what Mike had told Connors, there in the cell, was what brought him to town. It was this that was making him cut into this rat-race, that had led him to Mike’s wife.

He hoped Mike had been telling the truth about hiding away the fifty-six thousand dollars.

She met him in the park, and it was dark. That was good, because nobody would notice them together. Besides, he couldn’t see her face, and she couldn’t see his, and that would make it easier to say what he had to say.

They sat down on a bench behind the bandstand, and he lit a cigarette. Then he remembered that it was important to be pleasant, so he offered the pack to her.

She shook her head. “No thanks—I don’t smoke.”

“That’s right. Mike told me.” He paused. “He told me a lot of things about you, Helen.”

“He wrote me about you, too. He said you were the best friend he ever had.”

“I’d like to think so. Mike was a great guy in my book. None better. He didn’t belong in a crummy hole like that.”

“He said the same about you.”

"Both of us got a bad break, I guess. Me, I was just a kid who didn't know the score. When I got out of Service, I lay around for a while until my dough was gone, and then I took this job in a bookie joint. I never pulled any strong-arm stuff in my life until the night the place was raided.

"The boss handed me this suitcase, full of dough, and told me to get out the back way. And there was this copper, coming at me with a gun. So I hit him over the head with the suitcase. It was just one of those things—I didn't mean to hurt him, even, just wanted to get out. So the copper ends up with a skull-fracture and dies."

"Mike wrote me about that. You had a tough deal."

"So did he, Helen." Rusty used her first name deliberately and let his voice go soft. It was part of the pitch. "Like I said, I just couldn't figure him out. An honest John like him, up and knocking off his best friend in a payroll stickup. And all alone, too. Then getting rid of the body, so they'd never find it. They never did find Pete Taylor, did they?"

"Please! I don't want to talk about it any more."

"I know how you feel." Rusty took her hand. It was plump and sweaty, and it rested in his like a big warm piece of meat. But she didn't withdraw it, and he went on talking. "It was just circumstantial evidence that pinned it on him, wasn't it?"

"Somebody saw Mike pick Pete up that afternoon," Helen said. "He'd lost his car-keys somewhere, and I guess he thought it would be all right if Mike took him over to the factory with the payroll money. That was all the police needed. They got to him before he could get rid of the bloodstains. Of course, he didn't have an alibi. I swore he was home with me all afternoon. They wouldn't buy that. So he went up for ten years."

"And did two, and died," Rusty said. "But he never told how he got rid of the body. He never told where he put the dough."

He could see her nodding in the dimness. "That's right. I guess they beat him up something awful, but he wouldn't tell them a thing."

Rusty was silent for a moment. Then he took a drag on his cigarette and said, "Did he ever tell you?"

Helen Krauss made a noise in her throat. “What do you think? I got out of Norton Center because I couldn’t stand the way people kept talking about it. I came all the way over here to Hainesville. For two years, I’ve been working in that lousy hash-house. Does that sound like he told me anything?”

Rusty dropped the cigarette stub on the sidewalk, and its little red eye winked up at him. He stared at the eye as he spoke.

“What would you do if you found that money, Helen? Would you turn it over to the cops?”

She made the noise in her throat again. “What for? To say, ‘Thank you,’ for putting Mike away and killing him? That’s what they did, they killed him. Pneumonia, they told me—I know about their pneumonia! They let him rot in that cell, didn’t they?”

“The croaker said it was just flu. I put up such a stink over it, they finally took him down to the Infirmary.”

“Well, I say they killed him. And I say he paid for that money with his life. I’m his widow—it’s mine.”

“Ours,” said Rusty.

Her fingers tightened, and her nails dug into his palms. “He told you where he hid it? Is that it?”

“Just a little. Before they took Mm away. He was dying, and couldn’t talk much. But I heard enough to give me a pretty good hunch. I figured, if I came here when I got out and talked to you, we could put things together and find the dough. Fifty-six gees, he said—even if we split it, that’s still a lot of money.”

“Why are you cutting me in on it, if you know where it is?” There was an edge of sudden suspicion in her voice, and he sensed it, met it head-on.

“Because, like I told you, he didn’t say enough. We’d have to figure out what it means, and then do some hunting. I’m a stranger around here, and people might get suspicious if they saw me snooping. But if you helped, maybe there wouldn’t be any need to snoop. Maybe we could go right to it.”

“Business deal, is that it?”

Rusty stared at the glowing cigarette butt again. Its red eye winked back at him.

“Not all business, Helen. You know how it was with Mike and me. He talked about you all the time. After a while, I got the funniest feeling, like I already knew you—knew you as well as Mike. I wanted to know you better.”

He kept his voice down, and he felt her nails against his palm. Suddenly his hand returned the pressure, and his voice broke. “Helen, I don’t know, maybe I’m screwy, but I was over two years in that hole. Two years without a woman, you got any idea what that means to a guy?”

“It’s been over two years for me, too.”

He put his arms around her, forced his lips to hers. It didn’t take much forcing. “You got a room?” he whispered.

“Yes, Rusty—I’ve got a room.”

They rose, clinging together. Before moving away, he took a last look at the little winking red eye and crushed it out under his foot.

II

ANOTHER WINKING red eye burned in the bedroom, and he held the cigarette to one side in his hand so as to keep the light away. He didn’t want her to see the disgust in his face.

Maybe she was sleeping now. He hoped so, because it gave him time to think.

So far, everything was working out. Everything had to work out, this time. Because before, there had always been foulups, somewhere along the line.

Grabbing the satchel full of dough, when the cops raided the bookie joint, had seemed like a good idea at the time. He had thought he could lam out the back door before anyone noticed in the confusion. But he had fouled that one up himself, and landed in stir.

Getting buddy-buddy with that little jerk Mike had been another good idea. It hadn't been long before he knew everything about the payroll caper —everything except where Mike had stashed the loot. Mike never would talk about that. It wasn't until he took sick that Rusty could handle him without anybody getting wise. He had made sure Mike was real sick before he put real pressure on.

Even then, the lousy fink hadn't come across—Rusty must have half-killed him, right there in the cell. Maybe he'd overdone it, because all he got out of him was the one sentence before the guards showed up.

For a while there, he had wondered if the little quiz show was going to kick back on him. If Mike had pulled out of it, he'd have talked. But Mike hadn't pulled out of it—he had died in the Infirmary before morning, and they had said it was the pneumonia that did it.

So Rusty was safe—and Rusty could make plans.

Up 'till now, his plans were going through okay. He had never applied for parole—believing it better to sweat out another six months, so he could go free without anybody hanging onto his tail. When they sprung him, he had taken the first bus to Hainesville. He knew where to go because Mike had told him about Helen working in this restaurant.

He hadn't been conning her as to his need for her in the deal. He needed her all right. He needed help, needed her to front for him, so he wouldn't have to look around on his own and arouse curiosity when he asked questions of strangers. That part was straight enough.

But, all along, he had believed what Mike told him about Helen—that she was a good-looking doll, the kind of dame you read about in the paperback books. He had coked himself up on the idea of finding the dough and doing away with her, of haying a real ball.

Well, that part was out.

He made a face in the darkness as he remembered the clammy fat of her, the wheezing and the panting and the clutching. No, he couldn't take much more of that. But he had had to go through with it, it was part of the plan. He needed her on his side, and that was the best way to keep her in line.

But now, he'd have to decide on the next move. If they found the dough, how could he be sure of her, once they made the split? He didn't want to be tied to this kitchen mechanic, and there had to be a way . . .

"Darling, are you awake?"

Her voice! And calling him "darling." He shuddered, then controlled himself.

"Yeah." He doused the cigarette in an ashtray.

"Do you feel like talking now?"

"Sure."

"I thought maybe we'd better make plans."

"That's what I like, a practical dame." He forced a smile into his voice. "You're right, baby. The sooner we get to work the better." He sat up and turned to her. "Let's start at the beginning—with what Mike told me, before he died. He said they'd never find the money, they couldn't—because Pete still had it."

For a moment Helen Krauss was silent. Then she said, "Is that all?"

"All? What more do you want? It's plain as the nose on your face, isn't it? The dough is hidden with Pete Taylor's body."

He could feel Helen's breath on his shoulder. "Never mind the nose on my face," she said. "I know where that is. But for two years, all the cops in the county haven't been able to find Pete Taylor's body." She sighed. "I thought you really had something, but I guess I was wrong. I should of known."

Rusty grabbed her by the shoulders. "Don't talk like that! We've got the answer we need. All we got to do now is figure where to look."

"Sure. Real easy!" Her tone dripped sarcasm.

"Think back, now. Where did the cops look?"

"Well, they searched our place, of course. We were living in a rented house, but that didn't stop them. They tore up the whole joint, including the cellar. No dice there."

"Where else?"

“The sheriffs department had men out for a month, searching the woods around Norton’s Center. They covered all the old barns and deserted farmhouses too, places like that. They even dragged the lake. Pete Taylor was a bachelor—he had a little shack in town and one out at the lake, too. They ripped them both apart. Nothing doing.”

Rusty was silent. “How much time did Mike have between picking up Pete and coming back home again?”

“About three hours.”

“Hell, then he couldn’t have gone very far, could he? The body must be hid near town.”

“That’s just how the police figured. I tell you, they did a job. They dug up the ditches, drained the quarry. It was no use.”

“Well, there’s got to be an answer somewhere. Let’s try another angle. Pete Taylor and your husband were pals, right?”

“Yes. Ever since we got married, Mike was thick with him. They got along great together.”

“What did they do? I mean, did they drink, play cards or what?”

“Mike wasn’t much on the sauce. Mostly, they just hunted and fished. Like I say, Pete Taylor had this shack out at the lake.”

“Is that near Norton’s Center?”

“About three miles out.” Helen sounded impatient. “I know what you’re thinking, but it’s no good. I tell you, they dug things up all around there. They even ripped out the floorboards and stuff like that.”

“What about sheds, boathouses?”

“Pete Taylor didn’t have anything else on his property. When Mike and him went fishing, they borrowed a boat from the neighbors down the line.” She sighed again. “Don’t think I haven’t tried to figure it out. For two years, I’ve figured, and there just isn’t any answer.”

Rusty found another cigarette and lit it. “For fifty-six grand, there’s got to be an answer,” he said. “What happened the day Pete Taylor was killed? Maybe there’s something you forgot about.”

"I don't know what happened, really. I was at home, and Mike had the day off, so he went downtown to bum around."

"Did he say anything before he left? Was he nervous? Did he act funny?"

"No—I don't think he had anything planned, if that's what you mean. I think it was just one of those things—he found himself in the car with Pete Taylor and all this money, and he just decided to do it."

"Well, they figured it was all planned in advance. They said he knew it was payroll day, and how Pete always went to the bank in his car and got the money in cash. Old Man Huggins at the factory was a queer duck, and he liked to pay that way. Anyway, they say Pete went into the bank, and Mike must have been waiting in the parking lot behind.

"They think he sneaked over and stole Pete's car keys, so, when he came out with the guard, Pete couldn't get started. Mike waited until the guard left, then walked over and noticed Pete, as if it was an accident he happened to be there, and asked what the trouble was.

"Something like that must have happened, because the guy in the parking-lot said they talked, and then Pete got into Mike's car and they drove off together. That's all they know, until Mike came home alone almost three hours later."

Rusty nodded. "He came home to you, in the car, alone. What did he say?"

"Nothing much. There wasn't time, I guess. Because the squad car pulled up about two minutes after he got in the house."

"So fast? Who tipped them off?"

"Well, naturally the factory got worried when Pete never showed with the payroll. So Old Man Huggins called the bank, and the bank checked with the cashier and the guard, and somebody went out and asked around in the parking lot. The attendant told about how Pete had left in Mike's car. So they came around here, looking for him."

"Did he put up any struggle?"

"No. He never even said a word. They just took him away. He was in the bathroom, washing up."

"Much dirt on him?" Rusty asked.

"Just his hands, is all. They never found anything they could check up on in their laboratories, or whatever. His shoes were muddy, I think. There was a big fuss because his gun was missing. That was the worst part, his taking the gun with him. They never found it, of course, but they knew he'd owned one, and it was gone. He said he'd lost it months beforehand but they didn't believe him.

"Did you?"

"I don't know."

"Anything else?"

"Well, he had a cut on his hand. It was bleeding a little when he came in. I noticed it and asked him about it. He was halfway upstairs, and he said something about rats. Later, in court, he told them he'd caught his hand in the window-glass, and that's why there was blood in the car. One of the windows was cracked, too. But they analyzed the blood, and it wasn't his type. It checked with Pete Taylor's blood-type record." Rusty took a deep drag. "But he didn't tell you that, when he came home. He said a rat bit him."

"No—he just said something about rats, I couldn't make out what. In court, the doctor testified he'd gone upstairs and cut his hand open with a razor. They found his razor on the wash-stand, and it was bloody."

"Wait a minute," Rusty said, slowly. "He started to tell you something about rats. Then he went upstairs and opened up his hand with a razor. Now it's beginning to make sense, don't you see? A rat did bite him, maybe when he was getting rid of the body. But if any one knew that, they'd look for the body some place where there were rats. So he covered up by opening the wound with his razor."

"Maybe so," Helen Krauss said. "But where does that leave us? Are we going to have to search every place with rats in it around Norton's Center?"

"I hope not," Rusty answered. "I hate the damned things. They give me the creeps. Used to see them in Service, big fat things hanging around the docks . . ." He snapped his fingers. "Just a second. You say, when Pete and Mike went fishing, they borrowed a boat from the neighbors. Where did the neighbors keep their boat?"

"They had a boathouse."

"Did the cops search there?"

"I don't know—I guess so."

"Maybe they didn't search good enough. Were the neighbors on the property that day?"

"No."

"Are you sure?"

"Sure enough. They were a city couple from Chicago, name of Thomason. Two weeks before the payroll robbery, they got themselves killed in an auto accident on the way home."

"So nobody was around at all, and Mike knew it."

"That's right." Helen's voice was suddenly hoarse. "It was too late in the season anyway, just like now. The lake was deserted. Do you think . . .?"

"Who's living in the neighbors' place now?" Rusty asked.

"No one, the last I heard. They didn't have any kids, and the real estate man couldn't sell it. Pete Taylor's place is vacant, too. Same reason."

"It adds up—adds up to fifty-six thousand dollars, if I'm right. When could we go?"

"Tomorrow, if you like. It's my day off. We can use my car. Oh, darling, I'm so excited!"

She didn't have to tell him. He could feel it, feel her as she came into his arms. Once more, he had to force himself, had to keep thinking about something else, so that he wouldn't betray how he felt.

He had to keep thinking about the money, and about what he'd do after they found it. He needed the right answer, fast.

He was still thinking when she lay back, and then she suddenly surprised him by asking, "What are you thinking about, darling?" He opened his mouth and the truth popped out. "The money," he said. "All that money. Twenty-eight gees apiece."

"Does it have to be apiece, darling?"

He hesitated—and then the right answer came. “Of course not—not unless you want it that way.” And it wouldn’t be. It was still fifty-six thousand, and it would be his after they found it.

All he had to do was rub her out.

III

IF RUSTY had any doubts about going through with it, they vanished the next day. He spent the morning and afternoon with her in her room, because he had to. There was no sense in letting them be seen together here in town or anywhere around the lake area.

So he forced himself to stall her, and there was only one way to do that. By the time twilight came, he would have killed her anyway, money or no money, just to be rid of her stinking fat body.

How could Mike have ever figured she was good-looking? He’d never know, any more than he’d ever known what had gone on in the little jerk’s head when he suddenly decided to knock off his best friend and steal the dough.

But that wasn’t important now—the important thing was to find that black metal box.

Around four o’clock he slipped downstairs and walked around the block. In ten minutes, she picked him up at the corner in her car.

It was a good hour’s drive to the lake. She took a detour around Norton’s Center, and they approached the lake shore by a gravel road. He wanted her to cut the lights, but she said there was no need, because nobody was there anyway. As they scanned the shore Rusty could see she was telling the truth—the lake was dark, deserted, in the early November night.

They parked behind Pete Taylor’s shack. At sight of it, Rusty realized that the body couldn’t possibly be hidden there. The little rickety structure wouldn’t have concealed a dead fly for long.

Helen got a flashlight from the car.

“I suppose you want to go straight to the boathouse,” she said. “It’s down this way, to the left. Be careful—the path is slippery.”

It was treacherous going in the darkness. Rusty followed her, wondering if now was the time. He could pick up a rock and bash her head in while she had her back to him.

No, he decided, better wail. First see if the dough was there, see if he could find a good place to leave her body. There must be a good place—Mike had found one.

The boathouse stood behind a little pier running out into the lake. Rusty tugged at the door. It was padlocked.

“Stand back,” he said. He picked up a stone from the bank. The lock was flimsy, rusty with disuse. It broke easily and fell to the ground.

He took the flashlight from her, opened the door and peered in. The beam swept the interior, piercing the darkness. But it wasn’t total darkness. Rusty saw the glow of a hundred little red cigarette butts winking up at him, like eyes.

Then, he realized, they were eyes.

“Rats,” he said. “Come on, don’t be afraid. Looks like our hunch was right.”

Helen moved behind him, and she wasn’t afraid. But he had really been talking to himself. He didn’t like rats. He was glad when the rodents scattered and disappeared before the flashlight’s beam. The sound of footsteps sent them scampering off into the corners, into their burrows beneath the boathouse floor.

The floor! Rusty sent the beam downward. It was concrete, of course. And underneath . . .?

“Damn it!” he said. “They must have been here.”

They had—because the once-solid concrete floor was rubble. The pickaxes of the sheriff’s men had done a thorough job.

“I told you,” Helen Krauss sighed. “They looked everywhere.”

Rusty swept the room with light. There was no boat, nothing stored in corners. The beam bounced off bare walls.

He raised it to the flat roof of the ceding and caught only the reflection of mica from tar-paper insulation.

"It's no use," Helen told him. "It couldn't be this easy."

"There's still the house," Rusty said. "Come on."

He turned and walked out of the place, glad to get away from the rank, fetid animal odor. He turned the flashlight toward the roof.

Then he stopped. "Notice anything?" he said.

"What?"

"The roof. It's higher than the ceiling."

"So what?"

"There could be space up there," Rusty said.

"Yes, but . . ."

"Listen."

She was silent—both of them were silent. In the silence, they could hear the emerging sound. It sounded at first like the patter of rain on the roof, but it wasn't raining, and it wasn't coming from the roof. It was coming from directly underneath—the sound of tiny, scurrying feet between roof and ceiling. The rats were there. The rats and what else?

"Come on," he muttered.

"Where are you going?"

"Up to the house—to find a ladder."

He didn't have to break in, and that was fine. There was a ladder in the shed, and he carried it back. Helen discovered a crowbar. She held the flashlight while he propped the ladder against the wall and climbed up. The crowbar pried off the tarpaper in strips. It came away easily, ripping out from the few nails. Apparently, the stuff had been applied in a hurry. A man with only a few hours to work in has to do a fast job.

Underneath the tarpaper, Rusty found timbers. Now the crowbar really came in handy. The boards groaned in anguish, and there were other squeaking sounds as the rats fled down into the cracks along the side-walls. Rusty was glad they fled, otherwise he'd never have had the guts to crawl up there through the opening in the boards and look around. Helen handed him the flashlight, and he used it.

He didn't have to look very far.

The black metal box was sitting there right in front of him. Beyond it lay the thing.

Rusty knew it was Pete Taylor, because it had to be, but there was no way of identification. There wasn't a shred of clothing left, nor a shred of flesh, either. The rats had picked him clean, picked him down to the bones. All that was left was a skeleton—a skeleton and a black metal box.

Rusty clawed the box closer, opened it. He saw the bills, bulging in stacks. He smelled the money, smelled it even above the sickening fetor. It smelled good, it smelled of perfume and tenderloin steak and the leathery seat-cover aroma of a shiny new car.

"Find anything?" Helen called. Her voice was trembling.

"Yes," he answered, and his voice was trembling just a little too. "I've got it. Hold the ladder, I'm coming down now."

He was coming down now, and that meant it was time—time to act. He handed her the crowbar and the flashlight, but kept his fingers on the side of the black metal box. He wanted to carry that himself. Then, when he put it down on the floor, and she bent over to look at it, he could pick up a piece of concrete rubble and let her have it.

It was going to be easy. He had everything figured out in advance—everything except the part about handing her the crowbar.

That's what she used to hit him with when he got to the bottom of the ladder . . .

He must have been out for ten minutes, at least. Anyway, it was long enough for her to find the rope somewhere. Maybe she had kept it in the car. Wherever she got it, she knew how to use it. His wrists and ankles hurt almost as much as the back of his head, where the blood was starting to congeal.

He opened his mouth and discovered that it did no good. She had gagged him tightly with a handkerchief. All he could do was lie there in the rubble on the boathouse floor and watch her pick up the black metal box.

She opened it and laughed.

The flashlight was lying on the floor. In its beam, he could see her face quite plainly. She had taken off her glasses, and he discovered the lenses lying shattered on the floor.

Helen Krauss saw what he was staring at and laughed again.

"I don't need those things any more," she told him. "I never did. It was all part of the act, like letting my hair go black and putting on all this weight. For two years now, I've put on this dumb slob routine, just so nobody'd notice me. When I leave town, nobody's going to pay any attention either. Sometimes it's smart to play dumb, you know?"

Rusty made noises underneath the gag. She thought that was funny, too.

"I suppose you're finally beginning to figure it out," she said. "Mike never meant to pull off any payroll job. Pete Taylor and I had been cheating on him for six months, and he had just begun to suspect. I don't know who told him, or what they said.

"He never said anything to me about it beforehand—just went downtown with his gun to find Pete and kill him. Maybe he meant to kill me too. He never even thought about the money at the time. All he knew was that it would be easy to pick Pete up on payroll day.

"I guess he knocked Pete out and drove him down here, and Pete came to before he died and kept saying he was innocent. At least, Mike told me that much when he came back.

"I never got a chance to ask where he'd taken Pete or what he'd done with the money. The first thing I did, when Mike came home and said what he'd done, was to cover up for myself. I swore it was all a pack of lies, that Pete and I hadn't done anything wrong. I told him we'd take the money and go away together. I was still selling him on that when the cops came.

"I guess he believed me—because he never cracked during the trial. But I didn't get a chance again to ask where he hid the dough. He couldn't write me from prison, because they censor all the mail. So my only out was to wait—wait until he came back, or someone else came. And that’s how it worked out.”

Rusty tried to say something, but the gag was too tight.

“Why did I conk you one? For the same reason you were going to conk me. Don’t try to deny it—that’s what you intended to do, wasn’t it? I know the way creeps like you think.” Her voice was soft.

She smiled down at him. “I know how you get to thinking when you’re a prisoner—because I’ve been a prisoner myself, for two years—a prisoner in this big body of mine. I’ve sweated it out for that money, and now I’m leaving. I’m leaving here, leaving the dumb waitress prison I made for myself. I’m going to shed forty pounds and bleach my hair again and go back to being the old Helen Krauss—with fifty-six grand to live it up with.”

Rusty tried just once more. All that came out was a gurgle. “Don’t worry,” she said, “they won’t find me. And they won’t find you for a long, long time. I’m putting that lock back on the door when I go. Besides, there’s nothing to tie the two of us together. It’s clean as a whistle.”

She turned, and then Rusty stopped gurgling. He hunched forward and kicked out with his bound feet. They caught her right across the back of the knees, and she went down. Rusty rolled across the rubble and raised his feet from the ground, like a flail. They came down on her stomach, and she let out a gasp.

She fell against the boathouse door, and it slammed shut, her own body tight against it. Rusty began to kick at her face. In a moment the flashlight rolled off into the rubble and went out, so he kicked in the direction of the gasps. After a while, the moaning stopped, and it was silent in the boathouse.

He listened for her breathing and heard no sound. He rolled over to her and pressed his face against something warm and wet. He shivered and drew back, then pressed again. The unbattered area of her flesh was cold.

He rolled over to the side and tried to free his hands. He worked the rope-ends against the jagged edges of rubble, hoping to feel the strands fray and part. His wrists bled, but the rope held. Her body was wedged against the door, holding it shut—holding him here in the rank darkness.

Rusty knew he had to move her, had to get the door open fast. He had to get out of here. He began to butt his head against her, trying to move her—but she was too solid, too heavy, to budge. He banged into the money-box and tried to gurgle at her from under the gag, tried to tell her that she must get up and let them out, that they were both in prison together now, and the money didn't matter. It was all a mistake, he hadn't meant to hurt her or anyone, he just wanted to get out.

But he didn't get out.

After a little while, the rats came back.

A Way of LIfe

Twirling the top of his propeller beanie nervously, the next President. . . .

Robert Bloch, who needs no introduction in these pages, takes us to a future where men recall, tears in their eyes, the glorious story of fandom's early martyrs. John Henderson, next President of the United States, an authority who hands down pronouncements on the meaning of the scientific scriptures, makes a shocking discovery that threatens to change his world.

TWIRLING the top of his propellor beanie nervously, the next President of the United States peered through the curtain at Convention Hall.

"Now?" he murmured.

The girl beside him shook her head. "Not yet. Let them get the demonstration out of their systems." She smiled. "Are you happy, John?"

John Henderson nodded. "Yes, but scared, too."

"Don't forget, you're the next President," the girl reminded him.

"If I'm elected." Henderson grinned. "This was only the nomination, remember? And that NFFF crowd is tough."

"FAPA will win, though." Avis Drake squeezed his arm reassuringly. "How did you like Daddy's nominating speech?"

"Terrific. It really did the trick."

"Yes, didn't it? Listen to that demonstration."

Together they stared through the aperture in the curtain and watched the conventioneers parade through the hall.

Somewhere in the background the organ was playing a wild medley—everything from the religious Kyrie Ellison to the old traditional FAPA drinking-song, Yes, Sir, That's My Burbee. But it was impossible to hear the melodies plainly, for the fans were on the march, spilling down the aisles of Gernsback Hall and shouting Henderson's name. They were tossing their beanies, spraying one-another with zap-guns, waving copies of their state magazines. All of the delegations joined the demonstrations, clustering around the banners borne aloft by standard-bearers from every club in the land.

John Henderson peered at the legends. Here was the contingent from Silverbergh, there the flag of the Swamp Critters, and in the back of the hall rose the snowy emblem of a small group from the faraway North Pohl. Interspersed with the HENDERSON FOR PRESIDENT signs swirled other printed declarations—GRENNELL WAS A GOOD MAN BUT HENDERSON IS BETTER, and WHERE THERE'S A WILLIS THERE'S A WAY, and because there's always a joker in the crowd some place, BHEER IS THE ONLY TRUE GHOD!

But now Avis's father, Lionel Drake, had mounted the rostrum once more and was pounding for order, his gavel giving forth a rising rhythm.

Gradually the Big Name Fans found their seats. Lionel Drake was holding the microphone, uttering the short introduction.

"Ready?" Avis whispered.

John Henderson nodded. The girl put her arms around his neck and kissed his. cheek. "Go out there and pour it on," she murmured.

He heard Lionel Drake speak his name, heard the roar of the crowd, then stepped through the aperture of the curtains and faced the convention.

They cheered him, and when the cheers subsided he began to speak. There was a mimeographed copy of his talk on the lectern in front of him, but John Henderson found himself ignoring it.

He talked slowly, at first, eying the faces in the crowd. They were so young, so absurdly young! Many of them seemed scarcely out of their teens, and less than a third were in their thirties. Out of the entire assemblage there couldn't have been a dozen old people: Lionel Drake's gray head was singularly conspicuous. But then, Lionel Drake was one of the rare exceptions, one of the rare survivors. Why, he'd been alive in Ellison's day, in the actual time of Rog Phillips and Dave Kyle and Ackerman! Of course, he'd just been a baby and he'd never seen them, but he'd been alive. And so had hundreds of millions of others. What made old Lionel Drake so unusual was the fact that he'd stayed alive when the hundreds of millions perished. Lionel Drake had survived, and as a survivor he was one of the few remaining actual links with the distant past.

John Henderson found himself talking about that distant past now: speaking not from his prepared message, not from his head, but from his heart.

"You want to know my plans, my program," he was saying. "But the statement of my platform will have to wait. Today I have one thing, and only one thing to say to you. In the immortal words of the sainted Tucker—Fandom. Is a Way of Life."

He paused until the cheering subsided.

"Strange, isn't it, how that phrase has survived in a shattered century? Incredible as it may seem to us here today, it was first uttered less than a hundred years ago. We do not know the circumstances which gave it birth. We do not even know too much concerning its creator. The man that was Wilson Tucker, or Arthur Tucker, or Bob Tucker is today merely a legend; we know less of the actual facts of his existence than we do of Shakespeare, or H. G. Wells, or Aldous Julian Huxley and the other great fantasy and science writers of the more remote past.

"But the words survive. They survived in the old days, before fandom rose to bring light into the darkness of men's minds. When our ancestors—yours and mine—were a humble and persecuted minority—those words gave them strength. Strength to endure the jibes and the ridicule of the uneducated masses; the television-worshippers, the sports-lovers, the Cadillac-minded who ruled the world.

"You all know the story, of course; the story of fandom's early martyrs, gathering secretly in little bands to form the first fan-clubs and hold the first conventions. They had no power then, no recognition. They were jeered at and despised, mocked as wild-eyed visionaries and fanatics. And yet they persevered. They toiled over their crude mimeographs, turning out their magazines. Those magazines have long since crumbled into dust, but who amongst us can ever forget the names? Grue and Hyphen: Amazing and Astounding: Galaxy and Quandry and The Magazine of Fantasy and Science Fiction. Fantastic Universe, Startling, Confidential, Infinity, Dimensions—these names will never die!

"Nor will the names of their creators. And yet, they were not famous then. There was a John W. Campbell, yes, but no Campbellites to follow him. There was an Aitchell Gold, but no Aitchellians. And when St. Anthony Boucher was writing, of painting those marvelous works under the pseudonym of Francois Boucher, canonization was far-distant from his thoughts. Why, then, did these men continue in the great work? I like to believe it was because all of them followed a single inspiration, the inspiration found in that great motto of theirs and ours—Fandom Is a Way of Life.

"Surely that motto must have inspired the great fan scientists of that era: men like Asimov, E. E. Smith, Arthur C. Clarke, Dr. Barrett and Willy Ley. The immortal Heinlein, or Einstein must have known it when he created Heinlein's Theory of Relativity which resulted in the development of thermonuclear weapons.

"And yet, at the time, the masses laughed. Today we know that all science, all invention, sprang directly from the work of these men. We still have their hardcover books attesting to their knowledge of nuclear fission, rocketry, radar and all the other marvels of the First Age of Fandom.

“But the power they possessed fell into evil hands. The bombs fell and the intercontinental missiles landed. And from Moscow—which we know today as Moskowitz—came the war that ended the First Age of Fandom and almost ended the existence of all fankind.

“We are well aware, all of us, of the black years that followed. The years when men of good will—the few who survived—went underground. The years of plague and radiation and ceaseless surface warfare; the years of almost total disintegration and destruction. Fankind’s political structure, religious structure, social and economic structure vanished. Even the military structure could not long endure. And what was left? Only the faith of fandom. When they burned the universities, burned the libraries, burned the books—what remained? The treasured possessions of a handful of surviving fans. In the burrows beneath the ruins of cities; in rural fastnesses like buried Bloomington and faraway Weyauwega, the few existing mimeographs continued to turn.

“When survivors sought the surface of the world again, when the few millions left out of hundreds of millions walked the face of the earth once more, many found a fate worse than their fellows. They looked upon the shambles of civilization and went mad. There were those who turned upon their fellows and sought to enforce their rule through force. They warred upon one another and perished. There were those who tried vainly to re-establish the old order, but in vain. Fankind had lost faith in industrial science, in military science, in so-called political government and the religious creeds that sanctioned the horror of war.

“And it was then, we know, that Fandom came into its own at last. Fandom International—founded on friendship, on mutual knowledge and mutual faith in true brotherhood and trite scientific knowledge. Fans did not go mad. Fans did not resort to force. Fans were prepared for a new order, and a new day. Why? Because even through the time of darkness and destruction they clung to their motto—Fandom Is a Way of Life.

“It was Fandom, then, that rose to leadership. The children of the First Fans received the carefully-guarded knowledge of the past. They rallied to the organizations known as FAPA and—yes—the NFFF."

At the mention of the rival party's name, the crowd booed. John Henderson raised his hand for silence.

"Do not allow sentiment to overthrow reason," he cautioned. "We of the FAPA—the Fantasy Amateur Press Association—know that the NFFF is a deluded minority. The so-called National Fantasy Fan Foundation will never win a national or international election."

The crowd applauded, but Henderson overrode them. "Still, the NFFF are Fans. Fake-Fans, perhaps, but still Fans. They too believe that Fandom Is a Way of Life."

He paused, clearing his throat. "Remember, we once worked together, all of us. Our fathers helped to rebuild die cities, helped to restore reason. Using the scientific knowledge and the wisdom preserved in the science-fiction books, they brought order out of chaos.

It was the application of Fannish principles that rebuilt the world.

In the past thirty years we have gone far. Our world is still woefully underpopulated. Great cities, entire nations, are yet in ruins. But we make progress. Under the guidance and leadership of our local Fan Clubs, under the supervision of Big Name Fans like yourselves, we are reshaping fankind.

"First Fandom's dream of reaching the stars is still a dream. But once again the jet planes are beginning to soar—the great silver Heinliners streak across our skies. Once more we are building factories and laboratories; training our future leaders at Fredric Brown University, peering up at the planets from the Mount Richard Wilson Observatory, creating new developments like the Bradbury Ray.

"There will be no more war. Fandom has seen to that. Now that all of us are united as True, Serious Constructive Fans, our racial and political differences will never matter. Nor will religion divide us. For whether we choose to worship Ghu or Foofoo, whether we exalt the Poo or the Yobber, we unite in one belief. And it is this belief I intend to carry forward; it is this belief which will become the keynote of the coming campaign. Fandom Is a Way of Life!"

John Henderson bowed his head and stepped behind the curtains, not waiting to acknowledge the roaring applause from the crowd below.

He faced Avis Drake and her father with a wry grin. "Well, that's that," he sighed. "Now—what about that little vacation you promised me?"

The farmhouse stood just outside what had once been the city of Reading, in Pennsylvania. It was Lionel Drake's own private headquarters, and here John Henderson found the weeks of rest he needed before embarking on the presidential campaign.

There was work to do, of course: the Big Name Fan delegations from every state came to lay out their plans and to pledge Henderson's attendance at their rallies—the Midwestcon, the Oklacon, the Westercon and all the rest. And in the evenings, Henderson plotted strategy with old Lionel Drake.

But there were long golden afternoons spent wandering with Avis hand in hand over the enchanted countryside. For this was Pennsylvania, and magic ground—the land of Flarry Warner, of Bill Danner and Madle and Rothman and many another legendary figure from the distant past. The ghosts of Damon Knight and Judith Merril hovered in the haze.

Such notions were childish, Henderson realized, but at the same time he understood that he and Avis were in a sense seeking to capture childhood. They had never known what it was to be a child.

One day they talked about it.

"I never had anyone to play with," Avis confessed. "When I was born, just about everybody in Daddy's generation was sterile, because of living at the time of the radiation. Besides, Fandom was just getting established and sometimes we had to hide. There was still part of the old Armed Forces in existence, and their leaders were trying to take over the country. And the General Party was operating—you remember, General Motors and General Electric and all the rest?

"Daddy says that Fandom won because we were better organized for communication, with our tapes and shortwave and our mimeographs—but most of all, because fans trusted one another. And the military and industrial groups were always fighting amongst themselves. You must remember how it was when you were a boy; we had a new President every month or so, because of all the assassinations."

Henderson nodded. "That's why my folks went underground for a while," he said. "Out near Peoria. They say Philip Jose Farmer lived there, too, you know."

"Then you know what I mean," Avis told him. "Daddy was a psychologist and he helped found the new Fandom. Naturally, everybody was out to get him. Even some of the first Fan Clubs were against him—those Shaverites and Palmerites and the other religious sects. We kept moving from place to place, never stopping for years. So I never knew any other girls my age and I never had any toys. By the time I was seven or eight, Daddy had me slipsheeting and cutting stencils for fanzines. We must have sent out millions, before he really got an organization going and we took over the newspapers. Gradually his plans took hold, though, and we got our people into radio and general publishing. And with their help we won the first real election."

"Seems hard to realize that was only sixteen years ago," Henderson mused. "I was still in Peoria when it happened. Finishing up my courses in a private school run by an old fan named Shaw. Claimed to be a grandson of the great Shaw, but couldn't prove it, of course. Said his father had been a member of the old Hydra Club. He was a bug on psychology: always talking about Hubbard and his disciple, Freud. He got me interested in the field—and that's how I met your father. And you."

"It worked out wonderfully, didn't it, darling?" The girl squeezed his hand. "And it's going to be even better from now on. You'll win the election, and we'll be together, and—"

John Henderson shook his head. "Don't oversimplify things," he answered. "You know, that's one of our big problems today. Everything is oversimplified. Did you Know that there were over two billion people in the world at the time of the war, and almost a hundred and eighty million in this country alone? What's the population today? Maybe twenty, million, at the most. Nobody knows, really, because we've never had a census.

There are so many things we've never had, and must have. Public schools, for one thing. We can't go on educating our children in fan-groups forever. And we've got to teach them more facts and less legends. We've got to train more engineers and scientists and technicians and fewer artists and writers and multigraph operators. It's all very well to say we have half the population working the land and keeping us going, and that we have a few railroads running and some main highways in order, and even a fleet of Heinliners. But we need so much more! Why, it will take us another fifty years just to dig out the ruins of our cities, and then—"

"Please, you sound as if you were making a campaign speech," Avis protested. "You're talking like Daddy now."

"Your father is a wonderful man," Henderson said. "I don't know how I'll ever repay him for all he's done for me. He taught me, trained me, groomed me for this step by step ever since I was just a neo in the Beanie Brigade. He says he picked me for a future President, and I often suspect he picked me for your future husband."

"That happens to be my doing," Avis murmured. "Now, let's forget politics for a while."

And so they did, for the remainder of that afternoon and for the rest of a glorious week-end.

It was on the following Monday that disaster struck. Lionel Drake received the sudden shortwave message summoning him to FAPA Headquarters in Sturgeon—the new city which had risen on the outskirts of what had once been Philadelphia. And Avis accompanied him there for the day, leaving John Henderson alone at the farmhouse with a few servants and a secretary.

Henderson spent the morning going over his press notices in the current fanzines and preparing a statement denouncing the mutant theories of a rabid Van Vogt cult which had arisen to harass both FAPA and NFFF during the campaign. He did not go so far as to advocate the suppression of Van Vogt's books—it was a cardinal principle that everything rescued from the past be preserved and kept in print for educational purposes—but he cautioned fans everywhere not to take their reading too literally. "What would happen," he wrote, "if we accepted Bester and deCamp and Kornbluth as historians? We must remember that many of the Masters wrote in parable and allegory. Some of them, in their deep wisdom, saw fit to satirize their contemporaries and their times. Others, like the learned Poul, or Hans Christian Anderson, wrote outright fables. Van Vogt's extrapolations were not meant to be taken as gospel."

But were they?

Afterwards, in the early afternoon, Henderson slipped away and went for a walk. He did not choose the country path Avis had selected for their previous strolls, but struck off across the fields toward a cluster of abandoned farmhouses near what had once been a crossroads.

Henderson wanted to think. Here he was, a presidential candidate, a Big Name Fan among Big Name Fans, an authority who handed down pronouncements on the meaning of the scientific scriptures. But what did he know about it, really? Oh, he'd read all the books, of course—everything that had been salvaged from the rubble. The torn and battered Gnome Press editions, the dog-eared Doubleday relics now carefully preserved in a few remaining collections had long since been reprinted in the standard editions which served as texts in every fan-group school in the country. He'd studied them, just as the small contingent of technicians studied them; for clues to the past, for knowledge and guidance.

Henderson had never been one to question their authority. When excavators had come across actual college texts in the razed archives of the universities, they had collated them with the work of the great fan-writer Masters and found that these men based their work on sound scientific principles. This was definite proof that they wrote out of revealed wisdom. But some of their more advanced concepts—this business of mutant powers, of ESP, PSI, of anti-gravity, of space-travel—seemed unknown to the textbook writers.

Henderson had asked Drake and some of the others about this point. Drake told him that undoubtedly men like Heinlein and Mareulies and Howard Browne were in possession of still greater secrets than they had chosen to reveal at the time—given another thirty years and probably they would have gone to the government and offered formulae which could send men soaring to the stars. But they didn't have another thirty years. The governments of the world, misusing Heinlein's theory, had chosen atomic destruction instead.

That was the story.

But was it true?

Several things puzzled Henderson. He was no heretic, no Fake Fan, but he couldn't help wondering. If fans had been so persecuted and powerless in the old days, how was it that Heinlein had gone to the government in the first place?

Why was it that some of the Masters' work survived in hardcover books and the writings of others equally famous had never been found in the ruins? Why weren't there any copies of the first fanzines? Granted, almost everything had been destroyed in the years of warfare, and paper was most perishable—but surely somewhere a few samples should, have survived. The addresses of many of the Masters were known; why hadn't the reclamation parties and the excavators made special efforts to seek the collections of Don Ford, Bea Mahaffey, Redd Boggs?

As it was, nothing remained but their names. Henderson had to admit it was all hearsay. He didn't know if Don Ford had been related to Henry Ford, the automobile manufacturer. Was Bea Mahaffey a stern-faced old lady or a brassy blonde? Had there really been an omniscient genius like Redd Boggs or was he just a FAPA legend?

Henderson found himself approaching the crossroads. To his surprise he discovered that a small group of farmers and local citizens were engaged in clearing the area surrounding the demolished dwellings. An ancient bulldozer had swept a swath at one side and allowed access to the crumbling foundations of four or five structures.

He approached, idle curiosity mingling with sudden fancy. This was Eshbach country, wasn't it? Nobody remembered the exact location of the Lloyd Eshbach residence, but here the famous fan-publisher had lived and died. Suppose a miracle occurred, and one of these ruined houses turned out to be his home? Suppose the searchers uncovered a whole cache of fan-literature, something he could use in the campaign? It was a wild, impossible thought, of course, but suppose—

Henderson nodded at some of the diggers. "Need any help?" he asked.

A short, stocky man lifted his head and stared at him without recognition. He wore no beanie and was obviously just a farmer.

"Sure, if you want to lend a hand. Grab a shovel." He indicated a pile of implements at the side of the road.

Henderson selected a rusty specimen and clambered down gingerly into the nearest cleared foundation.

"What are you looking for?" he asked.

"Typewriters, I guess." The stocky farmer wheezed as he worked. "District headquarters had an idea we might find some business machines here. Gang of us been donating one afternoon a week to excavating, these past few years. Turned up quite a bit of stuff around Reading. Now we're getting at these villages and crossroads places. Been at this one a month. But we've got down far enough so's we may strike something today."

"Any idea who used to live here?"

"Dunno. Headquarters tells us this might have belonged to an old-timer name of Polk."

Henderson gulped.

Polk. Was his dream about to come true after all? He knew that name, knew it well. There had been a Polk in ancient fandom—Chester A. Polk.

Obviously the name meant nothing to the farmer or his companions. They were just doing an assigned job. They lent their muscles to a routine task, shovelling out debris, stooping to pick up battered artifacts. But Henderson dug like a demon.

He wasn't interested in the antique furniture, the broken springs, the shards of chinaware. He didn't join the group that puzzled over the wallpaper pieces, or even stop to examine what had once obviously been a television set. There was no more television today, Henderson knew, and ordinarily he'd have been interested in seeing what a machine had looked like.

But not now. Not when there was a possibility of finding something greater. Filing cabinets, perhaps, and maybe a desk with a locked drawer—

He dug, and the sweat poured down his face. The sun sank lower and the farmer climbed out of the pit to join his fellows.

"Guess we'd better call it a day," he said. "Mebbe we'll strike something next week. Getting right down to the basement level: see where we can pry up the floorboards. This house must have been burned, not blasted."

Henderson nodded, but didn't look up from his digging.

"Aren't you coming out, fella?" He shook his head. "I've got another hour to spare," he panted, "Mind if I just keep going?"

"Well, suit yourself." The farmer hesitated. "But remember, if you find any machinery, stuff like that, it's public property."

"I'll remember," Henderson promised. "If I turn anything up, I'll bring it in to your district offices."

They must have left, but he didn't pay any attention to their departure. Because he had reached the floorboards now, and he was prying them up, and then he was down in the basement area. He waded knee-deep in debris, and clouds of dust arose to choke him. He blinked in the gathering twilight. Here was the rusty remains of an old-fashioned furnace; there was a broken table and on it something that gleamed dully.

Typewriter? Henderson approached it, then gasped. It was a Gestetner. A mimeograph machine—its drum broken, its crank dangling! And beneath the table was a large metal box. He stooped and pulled it free of the rubble, wiped the dust from the top.

He read the lettering crudely daubed in black paint. Chester A. Polk—Private.

Files? This was a file, a portable, two-drawer file. And the drawers could be opened. Henderson tugged at the rusty handles, and it wasn't exertion that made his heart pound.

The top drawer came open. Yellowed folders cascaded forth. Henderson picked one up at random. It bulged with letters—typewritten letters, handwritten letters.

He looked at the date of the topmost sheet. April 1, 1956! He glanced through the message, then turned the page hastily and sought the signature.

Jim Harmon!

Jim Harmon, one of the oldtime Masters—the man who had first advocated Harmony, or Universal Brotherhood in Fandom, in the pages of the old PEON magazine!

What if he found some copies of PEON itself?

Henderson hastily pulled open the second drawer.

He found PEON. He found PEON, and HYPHEN, and INSIDE, and a complete mailing—a FAPA mailing, the 75th. This was the fanzine collection, the fabulous fanzine collection of Chester A. Polk!

There was no thought in Henderson's mind now concerning district managers or the necessity of turning this material in. There was only the need of gathering up the magazines, gathering up the few hardcover books at the back of the file, and taking them to a safe place where he could read them. The sun wouldn't set for over an hour yet. If he carried everything to that spot under the trees where he and Avis usually rested, he could go through his find at leisure. And then, when he went back to the farmhouse, he'd find Avis and Lionel Drake and tell them, show them. An hour was all he needed. Just one hour, and then—

It was almost three hours later that John Henderson staggered into the farmhouse.

Lionel Drake and his daughter heard the heavy footsteps in the hall, and Avis ran to meet Henderson as he leaned against the doorway.

"John, where have you been?" she murmured. "Daddy and I got back hours ago—nobody knew what had happened to you." She paused and stared up at his face. "What's the matter?"

Henderson didn't answer. He brushed past her, stumbled to the sofa, sat down, and buried his face in his trembling hands.

"For the love of Leiber, what's wrong?" the girl gasped.

Lionel Drake rose and walked over to the young man.

"Yes, what's the trouble?" he demanded. He nearly added, "You look as though you've seen a ghost," but there was no need to. For Henderson had produced a ghost. He pulled it out from his jacket pocket and extended it: a solid, palpable revenant in the form of a battered book.

Drake took it and read the title. "THE IMMORTAL STORM," he whispered. "A History of Science-Fiction Fandom by Sam Moskowitz," There was silence, then a sharp intake of breath. "Where did you find this?"

"Where I found the rest of the stuff," Henderson said, dully. "The copies of Oopsla and Inside and Skyhook and A Bas and all the others. In Chester Polk's basement." He nodded. "Yes, the Chester Polk. The one who got letters from Nancy Share and Joe Gibson and Earl Kemp and even William Rotsler. He went to Conventions. He played poker with Tucker, once. It's all there. Everything."

"Tell us about it," Avis soothed. "From the beginning. Daddy, isn't this marvelous?"

There was nothing in Lionel Drake's demeanor to indicate that he agreed. He stood there for a minute, holding "THE IMMORTAL STORM" in his gnarled hands. Then he put it down on the table.

"How about a drink?" he suggested. "After that we can talk."

Henderson accepted a drink, and downed a second one without an invitation. Then he just sat there and stared.

"Come on," Avis urged. "Tell us, now."

He didn't look at the girl when he replied. He stared at Lionel Drake.

"What is there to say?" he whispered. "You're not surprised, are you, Drake? You knew about the magazines—what they contained?"

The older man nodded silently.

"Other copies have been found before, I suppose; even copies of "THE IMMORTAL STORM?" And you and a few Big Name Fans have kept the discoveries from the rest—from fools like myself."

Avis Drake glanced at the two men in bewilderment. "What's all this about?" she asked.

Lionel Drake made a sudden gesture, but Henderson shook his head. "She might as well know the truth," he said. "It's about time somebody learned the facts. The way I learned them, this afternoon."

He faced the girl now, talked to her directly. "I found the old fanzines," he said. "And I read them. Oh, I couldn't go through everything thoroughly, and there are a lot of old letters, too, but I read enough to know what I'm talking about. For the first time in my life, I do know what I'm talking about. And that means everything I've ever believed in, everything I've been taught, everything I've tried to tell others as a candidate—is a lie.

"No, don't stop me. Your father knows. He and a few others have known all along, and deliberately withheld and distorted that knowledge, deliberately upheld the lies.

"First of all, fandom was never a persecuted minority. There were no martyrs, no dedicated group of scientists seeking a solution to the problems of the future. There were just men who wrote stories for publication—in the hard-cover books that survived and in the commercial magazines that have all been destroyed. Perhaps some of them were found again, but hidden away by your father and his friends.

"The men who wrote these stories were called 'pros' or even 'dirty pros' by the fans of their day. Some of them were talented writers, some of them even possessed sound scientific backgrounds—but they were not the inventors of the things they described. They were not even the greatest writers of their time.

“And the fans themselves were another, separate group. The legend has mixed up the commercial magazines with the fanzines. But fanzines were just amateur publications, privately mimeographed and distributed amongst a small circle. Most of the fans were quite young. Some of them were serious, yes, but not all of them. And they weren’t bent on saving the world. They poked fun at themselves half of the time. Do you know what I read in one fan magazine? It said, Fandom is just a goddam hobby.”

Henderson paused and glanced at the copy of “THE IMMORTAL STORM.”

“There’s more in the book. It tells about the very earliest fan organizations—how they fought and feuded, quarreled among themselves. The Big Name Fans weren’t supermen. Tucker was a motion picture projectionist. Wollheim became an editor. So did Lowndes—he never was a doctor, and ‘Doc’ was just a nickname.

“So you see, it’s all a myth, this story of Fandom keeping the torch of knowledge lighted in the darkness. They weren’t saints, they weren’t dedicated—just a gang of people who joked and bickered about a hobby. Yes, they had clubs and they had conventions, and they formed close friendships, and sometimes fans even married one another. But the rest is delusion. Lies and propaganda to feed the silly multitude—to elevate men like your father to power on the shoulders of stupid dupes like myself.”

Henderson poured himself another drink. Avis began a silent sobbing. Lionel Drake sighed heavily and sat down in the armchair opposite the younger man.

“There’s an old fannish saying,” he murmured. “Where ignorance is Blish, ’tis folly to be wise.” He paused, then continued. “What you say is true, of course. That’s the way things were, and a small group of us has always known. We did find fanzines from time to time, and we have concealed them. Also we deliberately helped to create the myth of Fandom. But not because we wanted personal power."

"What other purpose could you possibly have had?" John Henderson demanded. "Setting up a falsified version of history, suppressing the facts, making what almost amounts to a religious cult out of Fandom?"

"We had one purpose," Lionel Drake replied. "To restore the world to sanity."

"You call this sanity? Elevating juvenile antics to heroic status, putting laurel-Wreaths on the brows of money-grubbing writers, inventing a Golden Age out of whole cloth?"

"I do," said Drake. "Remember, I'm a psychologist. Oh, not one of the old-time, orthodox psychotherapists you read about. My field is mass-psychology, sociology perhaps. What I've done, and the others have done, is necessary.

"It's true we invented part of the story—the part concerning life before the coming of atomic warfare. But the rest, my boy, is true. You know it. Fandom did constitute the sole reliable nucleus remaining after the world was razed and ruined. As such, it formed a small operating-force that could help to restore order; at that time a very few men capable of operating a hand-cranked mimeograph could become a potent force. Remember, they trusted one another in an age where all men seemed surrounded by enemies.

"But rudimentary skill and simple trust were not enough. As a student of history, of sociology, we knew that. Every important group, every important political or religious or social movement, gains its strength from other sources; from., legend. It is belief in legend that made the old-time movements strong—in the labor unions it was the story of Joe Hill and the Wobblies; in the Nazi Party it was the story of Hitler languishing despised and ignored in prison; I needn't remind you of the early Christian martyrs, or of the Young Republicans and their stories of Lincoln the rail-splitter. Out of the legends come the songs and stories, the fables and the folklore that gives men faith. Faith in their destiny, faith in their future. Fandom had to find its legends in order to grow strong and succeed. An old psychiatrist named Jung pointed out the pattern common to all mythologies; demonstrated that men need heroes and sagas and epics to believe in, in order to survive in a civilized state."

"But you can't found a firm future on the basis of lies," Henderson whispered.

"Who says we can't?" Drake countered. "Our country was founded on the myths which sprung up around the Founding Fathers—Washington and the cherry tree, and all the rest of it. From the time of Romulus and Remus in ancient Rome, the myths have played their part in progress; giving men something greater than themselves to cherish as a heritage. And more important, in this instance, the legend has done its work.

"Fandom did help rebuild our world. Fannish forms of government have succeeded in restoring order. We no longer need armies in the nations founded on International Fandom. We have a working economy, yes, but it no longer rules the world through monetary power. For the first time since the days of Greece under Pericles, the artist and the creator play a respected and important role in life. Our commerce and our industry is slowly being rebuilt, but under sounder concepts than before. Educational facilities are increasing."

"You mean you're organizing means to spread more lies," Henderson retorted bitterly. "You've no real newspapers, no motion pictures, no television—"

"In time they will be restored," Drake said, calmly. "And so will the knowledge that we've retained for ourselves. Don't you think we know more than we've seen fit to reveal? We have the data with which to build atomic power-plants once more, to continue our rocketry experiments, perhaps to build an actual Moon-rocket within a generation. But our first concern must be to build a foundation for the better world to come. Yes, we choose to build it upon a myth—but surely it's a better myth than that which upheld the civilizations which have gone before. Would you want us to return to the old ways and the old myths—the Divine Right of Kings, die myth of Communism, or our own mindcrushing myth of the past which proclaimed that the Customer Is Always Right? Should we choose military mass-murderers as our new heroes, or exalt those who perverted pure science to the ways of destruction? The legend of the Big Name Fans preserved sanity in the world for the past generation. We can't abandon it now.

"I know what you're thinking, my boy. You'd like to quit the campaign, or go before the FAPA group and blurt out the truth. But what could you possibly gain? Isn't it better to aid in the cause—knowing that in the generation to come, men will continue to grow in knowledge and in achievement? The time will come when we can allow the legends to die; when we can take pride in present achievement, learn to dream about the future instead of the past. But for the moment mankind needs a dream of the past to counteract the nightmare reality of what actually occurred. That is the purpose of Fandom, the true and only purpose—to give men that dream and keep them sane."

Henderson glanced at Avis. The girl wasn't crying any longer. She was looking at him, waiting for his answer. In her eyes he read a curious mixture of love and loyalty, shame and fear. These emotions, he knew, were mirrored in his own gaze.

"If I go along with you," he said, softly, "I'm choosing the easiest way."

Drake opened his mouth to reply, but the girl spoke before him.

"No you aren't, darling," she murmured. "It will be the hardest way. To know the truth and yet not tell it. To carry the burden of guilt and deceit because it's necessary. To live a lie so that all other men can live the truth."

"Part of the truth," Henderson said.

"Yes, part of the truth. But their children—our children—can know it all."

Henderson rose and went to her. "Perhaps," he whispered. "We can try, anyway. I suppose we must try."

They walked outside together, out under the stars. Far overhead a Heinliner thundered across the sky. Henderson thought of the dreams that had made it a reality—the dreams, shattered for him forever, which he must help preserve for his fellow men.

Lionel Drake would help, Avis would help, and maybe he could endure the years to come. Fandom was still a way of life. Quite suddenly, John Henderson remembered another saying that had survived from the olden days—a saying he had read again in a fanzine just this afternoon. Now, for the first time, he grasped the ironic truth of its meaning.

Softly, still staring up at the stars, he quoted it aloud:

“It is a proud and lonely thing to be a fan.”

Try This For Psis

When this issue appears, Robert Bloch will be in New York, serving as master of ceremonies for the banquet of the 14th World Science Fiction Convention; and I doubt that anywhere in Manhattan, in night club or Broadway revue, will one find a more suave and witty m.c. (Or should a science fiction m.c. be an mc^2*?) Bloch's previous stories in F&SF have been surprisingly serious in theme and treatment: but now he casts a humorous eye (with a faintly bawdy twinkle in it) upon the much-publicized new science of psionics.*

ONCE UPON A TIME THERE WAS A time there was a sane scientist who had an ugly daughter.

The scientist's name was Dr. Angus Welk, and in the Anthropology Department of a large eastern university he was the brachycephalic head. He was, naturally, a staunch believer in the physical sciences. At the same time, he detested anything abstract. He had a particular hatred for that branch of scientific investigation known as parapsychology—the investigation of extra-sensory perception and psychokinesis. "There is absolutely no such thing as telepathy," he often declared. "It's all in your mind."

Nor was Dr. Welk content to let the matter rest there. He made a constant habit of challenging every investigator in the field of ESP or psi phenomena. He heckled them at lectures, he wrote indignant letters to psychiatric journals, he published a long monograph entitled Extra-Sensory Deception. And during his summer vacation, when his colleagues roamed over the New England states with their cameras, happily exposing film, Dr. Welk covered the same territory, happily exposing spiritualist mediums. So perhaps Dr. Welk was not completely sane.

And maybe his daughter, Nora, was not entirely ugly. True, everything about her was just a little larger than life-size. Her nose was a trifle big and her mouth was too wide, and her cheekbones were so prominent they might easily have run for public office. But in an era which bows down before the busts of Monroe, Russell, Lollobrigida and Ekberg, she possessed certain other attributes which might be considered outstanding. In fact, one might easily search the wide world over without finding her equal in either hemisphere.

It was not necessary, however, to conduct a global mission in order to discover Nora Welk's whereabouts. As a graduate student she served as her father's secretary, and also ran his household. Dr. Welk was a widower, and secretly considered himself fortunate in that his daughter had never shown the slightest interest in young men.

"When the right mate for you comes along," he often told her, "I'll let you know. I'll recognize him by his cephalic index, and we'll conduct a controlled experiment. A true eugenic mating, my dear. Won't that be nice?"

Nora used to agree that it would be just splendid, but as time went on she began to entertain doubts. Maybe that's because doubts were all she ever had to entertain—nobody asked her for a date, and whenever she timidly mentioned a young man's name in her father's presence he would denounce the individual as a dolichocephalic dolt.

Just how long they might have continued their sane, ugly life together is problematical—if a problem hadn't arisen in the shape of Frank Tallent.

Frank Tallent didn't have much of a shape. He was short, sandyhaired, and myopic, and weighed about a hundred and ten pounds, dripping wet—if he climbed on the bathroom scales with a heavy bar of soap in each hand.

But he happened to sit next to Nora Welk at a lecture one evening, and the damage was done.

All during the talk he kept staring at her profile, occasionally lifting his eyes to her face, and when the session ended he noticed that she seemed to have some trouble finding her purse.

As she groped about her, he touched her arm. “I beg your pardon, Miss,” he said. “But the purse is under your seat.”

Nora blinked at him. “I just looked there,” she declared.

Frank Tallent reddened. “I wasn’t referring to the wooden one,” he murmured. “If you’ll just get up . . .”

Sure enough, there was the purse.

Now it was Nora’s turn to blush. “Thank you,” she said. “I can’t imagine how it got there. I guess I was so interested in the speech I didn’t notice when it slid behind me.” She smiled at Frank. “It was an interesting speech, wasn’t it?”

“I thought it stunk,” Frank said, with more vehemence than grammar.

Nora’s eyes flashed. “Is that so? And just what was wrong with it, might I ask?”

“Why, that old goat doesn’t know what he’s talking about,” Frank answered. “Just because you can’t weigh it or measure it or put it under a microscope, he claims there isn’t any such thing as clairvoyance.”

“I suppose you know differently?”

“Of course I do.” Frank peered up at her through his glasses. “I’m taking a special course in the Psych Department, under Professor Seine. He’s probably the most famous authority on parapsychology in the country.”

Nora sniffed. “Professor Seine is a crackpot,” she declared. “And the old goat who delivered tonight’s lecture happens to be my father.”

She started to brush past Frank, but the young man reached out his hand and grabbed her by the elbow.

“Better empty out your purse first, before you go,” he said. “The stopper came out of your perfume bottle and your things are getting soaked.”

Nora halted and scrabbled in her handbag.

"You're right!" she exclaimed. "How on earth did you know—?"

"I'm a psychic sensitive." Frank answered, modestly. "Dr. Seine is using me to run experiments. I could see what was going on inside your handbag. It isn't a matter of actual eyesight, you know."

Nora started to nod, then shook her head. "Of course not," she agreed. "It isn't eyesight at all. You could smell that perfume leaking and you just jumped to conclusions. My father says that's how Professor Seine distorts all his data. He's explained everything to me—but of course, you wouldn't be interested."

"On the contrary, I'm very much interested," Frank protested. "Maybe you'd be good enough to tell me about your father's theories, Over a cup of coffee, perhaps?"

Nora hesitated a moment.

"I'll buy you a hamburger, too," Frank went on. "After all, you didn't eat any supper."

"How did you know that?"

"Psychic." Frank grinned faintly as he rose. Nora hesitated once more.

"Don't worry about your father," Frank went on. "He's backstage talking to the reporters, telling them what a fool Professor Seine is and what a courageous investigator he is."

"Is that supposed to be another demonstration of your psychic powers?" Nora inquired.

"Just a guess," Frank admitted. "But I'm right, aren't I?"

"Probably. Only you're wrong about my father and his theories. Let me tell you—"

So she told him over a hamburger, and over a cup of coffee, and over two cigarettes.

At the end of it all, Frank Tallent sighed. "I'm sorry," he said. "I've heard all these arguments before. Table-tipping and levitation isn't telekinesis, but a fake. Mind-precognition in dreams is just coincidence, and so forth. But the trouble is, I can do these things. I do them every day, with Professor Seine. He says Pm the most remarkable subject he’s seen since Lady, the Talking Horse.”

“Does he hypnotize you?” Nora asked, as they left the restaurant and walked along the darkened streets.

“Of course not. It’s just something that seems to come naturally. I never knew I had ESP or psi powers at all until I came to the university and got into his class. He asked for volunteers one day when he was demonstrating telekinesis with a pair of dice, and I got up and threw thirty passes in a row. After that he took an interest in me.”

“Who wouldn’t?” Nora scoffed. “If I could throw thirty passes in a row I’d go to Las Vegas and make a fortune.”

“It isn’t that easy,” Frank explained. “Apparently the subliminal mind is influenced adversely by the conscious mind when the element of personal gain enters into the situation. I had the same idea after throwing the passes, of course. I got into a little crap game with some of the boys in my dormitory.”

“What happened?”

“I lost eighteen bucks the first five minutes.”

“You see?” Nora nodded. “It doesn’t really work. That’s why none of these so-called mind readers ever make a killing on the stock market.”

“I explained about that,” Frank answered. “You can’t control the phenomena. And if you’re seeking some kind of reward, you freeze up. But the fact remains, I did throw thirty straight passes with those dice in the classroom.”

“Then either the dice were loaded, or you were.”

“Impossible. Professor Seine is an honest man, and I don’t drink.” Frank took the girl’s arm as they entered the park and halted near a bench. “If I could only make you understand,” he said. “Sit down here a moment. Maybe I can give you a demonstration.”

They took their places on a bench.

“Now,” Frank began. “Take your feet off the ground. That’s it. I’ll do the same. We’re sitting quietly, right? And the bench is firmly balanced on the grass, isn’t it?”

“Yes.”

“Watch this,” Frank said.

Suddenly the bench beneath them began to move. It tipped forward and the girl, with a gasp of astonishment, slid into his arms.

“What happened?” she murmured.

“Telekinesis,” he told her, tightening his embrace. “What do you think of it?”

“It’s wonderful,” Nora sighed, snuggling closer.

“Would you like another demonstration? How about a little supernormal perception?”

“Whatever you say.” Nora was beginning to feel quite conscious of this young man’s psychic aura; it positively made her tingle all over. She had never dreamed that a scientific experiment could be so interesting.

To her disappointment, Frank released her suddenly and stood up.

“All right,” he said. “Here’s what you do. I’m going to walk over there and stand under that tree, with my back to you. I want you to take something out of your purse and hide it while I’m not looking. Then it’s up to me to find it.”

Strictly in the spirit of scientific inquiry, Nora selected an old class ring from the bottom of her purse and tucked it under the inner pleat at the neckline of her blouse.

When Frank returned to her side he immediately placed his fingers on her throat and again Nora felt the tingling thrill she was learning to associate with parapsychoolgical investigation. As she felt his hand gradually descend, however, she became apprehensive.

“What do you think you’re doing?” she snapped.

“Why, looking for your ring,” Frank told her. “It is a ring you concealed, isn’t it?”

“Yes—but not there. It’s up there, under the neckline.”

“That’s where you intended to put it,” Frank answered, continuing his search. “But it slipped down. In fact, quite a ways down. Don’t worry, though. I'll get it."

"It can't be that far down," the girl protested.

"Oh, but it is. Hold still! Remember, this is just an experiment."

Even controlled experiments can sometimes get out of hand, and this particular experiment rapidly became uncontrolled. There was no doubt in either of their minds, however, as to the experiment's success. Within two minutes Frank had found Nora's ring, and before another five minutes had elapsed, they were engaged to be married.

Since Dr. Angus Welk did not possess psi powers, he was quite blissfully unaware of his daughter's clandestine engagement. This situation seemed ideal to both Nora and Frank. Their courtship was conducted in the park and at times in the last parking space at the rear of a drive-in movie. Since neither of them cared for motion pictures, they were free to continue their research into the supernormal, and Nora quickly graduated from the status of willing pupil to adoring convert. She soon learned that no matter what she hid nor where she hid it, Frank could seek it out unerringly. Just how long she might have continued as a subject for a wide field of investigations is problematical, had not an unforeseen crisis arisen.

The unforeseen crisis, in the person of Professor Seine, changed everything. The unforeseen Seine suddenly went off on a parapsychological wingding.

"It's murder, that's what it is!" Frank announced to Nora one late summer evening, after greeting her at the park entrance they had chosen for a trysting place. "Did you see tonight's paper? Did your father tell you?"

She shook her head. "No, I've just come from the office. Daddy stayed home all day today. What's the matter?"

"It's Seine. He's been grumbling about your father's attacks on him for months now. Says it's ridiculous that two men from the same university faculty should dispute with each other about a perfectly selfevident matter. And now he wants to bring the matter to a head. He issued a public challenge to your father today. Invited him to select a committee of six—anyone he wants—to witness a demonstration of parapsychological phenomena. He's coming to your father's house tomorrow with a subject, prepared to prove his case."

"That's terrible," the girl agreed. "Daddy's going to be awfully upset."

"He's not the only one," Frank muttered. "The subject Professor Seine selected for his demonstrations happens to be me."

"No—he couldn't!"

"He could, and he did. After all, I'm his star example. He wants to write this book about me, remember?"

"But why didn't you refuse?"

Frank paused and gulped.

"You could have refused," Nora continued, relentlessly. "Didn't we agree we'd keep our engagement a secret until you graduated, so Daddy would never know you were mixed up in these experiments? Didn't I tell you that he'd rather see me married to a psychopath than to a psychic sensitive? And didn't you promise me that you'd give up your investigations after you finished school and get an honest job in some laboratory where they do real psychological work—like ringing bells and teaching dogs to salivate?"

"Sure," Frank answered. "I wanted to make a good impression on your father. Approach him wearing a white smock and carrying a test-tube full of airedale saliva in one hand. But Professor Seine has convinced me, Nora. This work is more important. If we can control ESP and psi powers it means the opening of a whole new era. Your father's a scientist. Surely, if we demonstrate the truth to him, he'll understand."

Nora began to sniffle. "He's a scientist, yes, but as you once remarked, he's also an old goat. Can't you understand? No matter what kind of proof you present, he won't believe it. He'll just hate you for it and then we'll never get married." She sobbed aloud. "I don't think you really want to marry me, anyway. You just like to have somebody around to experiment on."

"That's not true, you know it isn't. I'm sure we're going to be married." Frank spoke gravely. "My supernormal percipience is never wrong. I've told you that sometimes I have these prophetic dreams, haven't I? And they always come true. Well, last night I had another. In this dream I saw you lying in bed. And you weren't alone."

"Let's not be vulgar," the girl murmured.

"What's vulgar about a baby?" Frank demanded. "You were lying in bed with this newborn child. Cutest little thing you ever saw—looked just like me."

"Boy or girl?" Nora asked, eagerly.

"That I can't tell you. The alarm rang and I woke up. You know how noises distract psi powers. Professor Seine has already warned your father about that—tomorrow's experiments must be conducted under fair conditions."

Nora put her hands on his shoulders. "You really intend to marry me, then," she said, softly.

"Of course I do. And the dream proves it."

"It proves something else, too, then," the girl said. "The experiments can't be conducted fairly."

"What are you getting at?"

"Listen to me, now. I know Daddy. If you go to him and demonstrate your powers, he'll just flip. On the other hand, if you flop, he'll be delighted. He'll feel so good about proving his case that he'll agree to anything. I know this isn't the Dark Ages, darling—we could get married without his consent, any time we want. But I happen to love him too, even if he is an old goat. And I don't want to spend the rest of my life in the middle of a family quarrel."

"Do you want to spend the rest of your life with a faker?" Frank snapped. "As far as I'm concerned, we are in the Dark Ages, until we successfully demonstrate the unsuspected powers of the human mind. Now Professor Seine's theory—" Nora stamped her foot. "I wish Professor Seine would stick his theory in a pigeonhole and forget it! What I want to know, will you play along with me or won't you? "

"There's nothing I'd rather do," said Frank, and meant it. "But Nora, I just cant. Don't worry, things will work out anyway. I saw our baby in a dream—"

"As far as I'm concerned, that's the only place you'll ever see it," Nora told him.

The girl turned and clattered out of the park. Frank sat down on a bench and groaned. He knew he was right. They were going to have a baby. But now he realized that it wasn't going to be accomplished through extra-sensory perception.

Professor Etienne Seine whistled with Gallic gaiety as he piloted his Porsche in the direction of Dr. Welk's big house just outside of town. The Professor, despite his position as a member of the psychological savant-garde, had not developed any ESP powers of his own. Consequently it was some time before he noted the dejected air of the young man seated at his side.

"What is it that there is?" he inquired, solicitously. "What sickens you? Is it that you dread the testing?"

Frank shook his head and attempted a reassuring smile. Evidently it was a failure, because Professor Seine continued to regard him quizzically.

"Is it that it is something you ate? Your stomach, she is upset?"

"My stomach, she is empty," Frank told him.

"Ah, that is best, mon brave." The Professor nodded gravely. "As we well comprehend, the success of ESP or psi experimentation can be imperiled by physical distractions. Eating and drinking spoil the victory. What is that which the poet says? 'There's many a slip between coupe and lip.' But be of cheer, we shall not fail. We shall convince the Doctor Welk and his committee, we shall convince the reporters—"

"Reporters?" Frank groaned. "Oh no!"

"Oh, oui!" Professor Seine gestured ahead as they rounded the driveway leading to the Welk mansion. "Regard them."

Frank regarded the waiting figures grouped on the porch. He recognized several of Dr. Welk's colleagues on the faculty, plus two or three young men with the inevitable notebooks clustered around the corpulent red-faced man who scowled down at them over the rims of his glasses. A glimpse of Dr. Welk's eyes was enough to terrify Frank, until he realized their bulging prominence was due to a trick of the spectacle lenses. From their thickness, it was reasonable to assume they had been ground at Mount Palomar.

"Myopique," the Professor murmured, apparently noting the same thing as he left the car and conducted Frank up the steps. "But he will see much, today."

Frank didn't answer. He was searching for a sight of Nora. The girl was not in evidence.

He hastily recalled himself to acknowledge introductions. In response to a question from one of the reporters, he enunciated his name slowly.

"Tallent," the reporter repeated, as he scribbled. "Didn't somebody write a book about you? Charles Fort, maybe?"

"Charles Fort was an old fool." The rasping voice belonged to Dr. Welk. "Except, of course, when he was young. Then he was a young fool."

Professor Seine laughed merrily. "It is this scepticism which we today shall overcome," he predicted. "If anyone advances anything new, people resist with all their might; they act as if they neither heard nor could comprehend; they speak of the new view with contempt, as if it were not worth the trouble of even so much as an investigation or a regard; and thus a new truth may wait a long time before it can make its way."

"Just the kind of nonsense I expected from you," Dr. Welk observed.

The Professor shrugged. "This is not my nonsense," he answered, mildly. "It is a statement of Gertie."

"Humph, I might have known. Gertie was a fool, too. Very unsound. All you have to do is look at his prefrontal lobes."

"This Gertie a friend of yours?" one of the reporters demanded, eagerly. But before the Professor could answer him, a disturbance made its appearance—and a very charming appearance it was—in the form of Nora.

This form was duly admired as the young woman passed among the group and distributed glasses of a pink liquid.

"I thought you gentlemen might like a little refreshment before you began the tests," she said.

"Hey, Bacardis!" exclaimed the reporter who wanted to know about Gertie.

The girl shook her head. "No, it's only fruit punch." She approached Frank and gave him a level stare. He started to open his mouth, but his throat went dry. Automatically he accepted a glass and drank. He wished now that Nora had stayed away. Her presence disturbed him greatly, and her aloofness disturbed him even more. He found it difficult to concentrate on what was going on.

Professor Seine had taken over now, and he was telling the reporters and Dr. Welk's committee a few things about telepathy, telekinesis, teleportation, clairvoyance, and dowsing. From a briefcase he extracted a mimeographed report of his past six months of experimentation with Frank—the card-runs, the work with dice, the psychometric data.

Dr. Welk cleared his throat for action. "Twaddle," he said. "Sheer twaddle. Nobody can read minds." He strode over to Professor Seine. "Go ahead and read my mind, I dare you to." He glanced at his daughter. "On second thought, maybe you'd better wait until Nora leaves. What I'm thinking about you is best not repeated in mixed company."

"But I do not read of minds," the Professor protested. "It is the young man here. He is the sensitive."

Frank smiled weakly. He didn't feel like a sensitive. He was numb. He watched Nora refill the glasses from a large pitcher and extended his own with an imploring look. Nora refused to meet his eyes. He couldn't tell what she was thinking. He couldn't—the realization came to him with a flash of horror—tell what anyone was thinking. His head was beginning to whirl.

"Let's go inside," Dr. Welk was saying, "and get this affair over with. I can't afford to waste much time with such tomfoolery—I've got a four o'clock appointment to trepan a gorilla."

He led the party into a large old-fashioned study, with book-lined walls; obviously this was his private den in which he was wont to pace and growl at will.

"You'll find I have made the arrangements we agreed upon," he told Professor Seine. "As I understood it, you asked me to conceal a deck of cards somewhere within the room, and also a packet of letters—"

"Would you care for another drink before you begin?" Nora interrupted, coming in from the hall with a full pitcher. "It's so hot today——"

"Sure," said the reporter who had asked about Charles Fort. "Say, you positive there isn't any liquor in this? Stuff tastes like it's got a kick in it."

"Not at all," Nora told him. "As I understand it, liquor affects the precognitive faculties, doesn't it, Professor?"

"Certainement," he responded. And as the company drank, Professor Seine proceeded to explain the theories he was to demonstrate.

Frank tried again to concentrate upon the conversation, but everything was blurry. Nora's face wavered before him as she poured the contents of the pitcher into his glass. He tried to whisper to her. "Darling, won't you at least say something to me? I'm so—"

But she had turned away, and now Professor Seine had his hand on Frank's shoulder and was propelling him to the table in the center of the room. He gestured at the crowd, indicating a row of chairs lined up against the far wall.

"And now, messieurs!" he began, "if you will be so good as to discover your seats, we shall make a commencement. First we shall have the card-run, as I have explained. The Doctor has undertaken to conceal a pack of playing cards here in this room. I shall now ask my subject to locate those cards."

He turned to Frank expectantly. Frank stood there—conscious of the perspiration bathing his palms, and of nothing else. He couldn't concentrate. The room wavered. It was Nora's fault—she had deliberately upset him so that the experiment would be a failure. He glanced nervously at Professor Seine. The gaunt investigator looked at him trustingly. It would be terrible to let him down now. It would be terrible to let himself down. Dr. Welk was scowling, murmuring to the committee and the reporters.

Frank closed his eyes. Immediately the room steadied. He began to get a vague impression. It didn't come quickly or clearly, as such impressions usually did, but it was coming.

Eyes closed, he moved forward. One hand swept the line of bookcases. He fumbled for a book, removed it, reached behind. From a space between the books and the wall he extracted a rectangular object. Opening his eyes, he gazed down at a package of playing cards.

His sigh of relief mingled with a sharp gasp from Dr. Welk.

"But that's not where I put them!" he exclaimed. "There must be some mistake—"

"Mistake?" Professor Seine smiled blandly as he took the unopened pack from Frank's hand. "You concealed of the cards, did you not? And my subject found of the cards, did he not? Let us proceed to the experiment."

Deftly he blindfolded Frank and placed him in the far corner of the room. Then, stepping briskly to the table, Professor Seine removed the pack, shuffled it, and extended it to the nearest committee member. Upon a whispered instruction, the committee member shuffled the pack again. A second committee member now laid the first card face down upon the table, in plain view.

Frank stood motionless.

"What do you perceive?" the Professor called.

Frank gulped. He clenched his fists.

"Eh bien, what is it that you see?" the Professor insisted.

Frank shuddered. "Must I tell?" he quavered.

"But well sure, you must! Describe the card, please!"

"All right," Frank muttered. "You asked for it. This card has the picture of a naked blonde lying on her back and kicking a heart in the air with both feet. I suppose it's the ace of hearts."

As the crowd gasped, Frank raced on. "And the second card, with the brunette and the pony, is the four of spades. The redhead and the sailor is the seven of diamonds, and the next one, with the three girls wearing the black brassieres, is the nine of clubs—"

By this time Professor Seine was at the table, rapidly turning over the cards. Frank was right: thence of hearts was followed, in turn, by the others as he'd described them.

"A wolf-pack, by George!" exclaimed one of the reporters, crowding up to the table. "And boy, what a wolf-pack. Look at this here Queen of Diamonds; how'd she get mixed up with the Jack? Hey, Doc, I didn't know you had anything like this around—"

"Neither did I," muttered Dr. Welk. "I mean, this is definitely not the deck I concealed. One of my students recently returned from a field expedition to Cuba. He brought back some curiosa for anthropological study and left them with me—"

"Yeah, sure," said the reporter. "We know how it is, Doc." He tried to riffle through the rest of the deck, but Dr. Welk snatched it away. "Perhaps we'd better get on with the next phase," he said. "We'll consider this sufficient evidence."

"Ah yes." Professor Seine bowed blandly. "There is now the matter of the letters." He removed Frank's bandage, and in a low voice murmured, "What arrives?"

"Damned if I know," Frank said. "I think you'd better call it off. Everything's going blank again."

"Here, have a drink." Nora was at his elbow, extending a glass. Frank was about to wave it away until he realized she was smiling. He drank gratefully, although his throat burned. She passed around the room, refilling glasses.

Finally the Professor rapped for attention. "My good colleague has been instructed to conceal some letters in this room. I shall now ask that the subject find these communiques and read of them aloud to you."

Frank shook his head. As he did so, the subliminal came to his aid. He walked waveringly to the desk, then paused. Dr. Welk's eyes narrowed, but as Frank moved away from the desk he gave a sigh of relief.

His bulging eyes widened again as Frank paused in front of a portrait of Whistler's Mother, then pushed it aside and began to manipulate the combination of a safe concealed behind the picture.

"That's not the place!" Dr. Welk shouted, rising. "And how did you know the combination, anyway?" Frank, moving as though in a trance, continued to twirl the dial. The safe swung open. Frank reached in and extracted a packet of letters, bound in faded red ribbons. He put his hand over them, his eyes closing.

"The first letter is dated June 12, 1932," he muttered. "And it begins like this: Dear Honey bug, It is morning now but I can still taste your kisses. If only the nights would never end—"

"Give me those!" Dr. Welk snatched the bundle from his hand and stuffed it into his coat.

"Aren't you going to tell us if he's right, Doc?" cried the nearest reporter. "What's with this 'Honey-bug' business?"

Dr. Welk's face blossomed with a sudden case of rubella. "These are positively not the letters I had in mind," he groaned. "Professor Seine, what is the meaning of this? Are you making mock of me?"

"Non," the parapsychologist protested. "I do not make the mock of you." He glanced nervously at Frank, who stood there goggling. "We will commence the next phase of the experiment, please." Professor Seine blinked and popped his hand to his mouth to stifle an unexpected belch. Several of the committee members noted the gesture and laughed raucously. Nora tittered in the background.

Professor Seine shrugged and made haste to continue. "Dr. Welk has arranged certain objects in his lavatory, is it not?"

"It is certainly not," Dr. Welk boomed. "What I do in the lavatory is no concern of this investigation."

"Why not, Doc?" asked the most persistent of the two reporters, lurching to his feet. "Now take me, for instance. I do a lot of reading in the—"

"Kindly shut your trap!" shouted Dr. Welk. "Professor Seine has reference to my laboratory. He asked me to arrange something on the table there, to test the subject's ESP powers."

"Ah yes," the Professor nodded. "It is as I say, the laboratory in which the good Doctor conducts of the experiments, and not the lavatory, in which the good Doctor—"

"Get on with it!" yelled Dr. Welk. "I'm stifling in here and I've got a splitting headache. I put some stuff out on the table. Your stooge has never been in my laboratory. He's supposed to guess what's in there. Now, go ahead!" Frank turned and put his palms to his forehead. He felt the room reel. His mouth opened, seemingly of its own volition. The words came. "Reading from left to right," he said, "I see a series of jars. The first one contains dill pickles. The second one contains a pickled foetus. The third one contains pure water."

He opened his eyes. "That's right, isn't it?" he asked.

Dr. Welk nodded reluctantly. "As far as it goes," he conceded. "But what about the fourth one?"

"Fourth one?" Frank frowned. "There is no fourth one."

"Oh yes there is," Dr. Welk exclaimed triumphantly. "Come along and I'll show you."

The group trooped down the hall at Dr. Welk's heels. He moved slowly and seemed to have some difficulty opening the laboratory door. But once inside he gestured at the table with a flourish.

"You see?" he announced. "Four jars!"

"Uh uh," said the eldest committee member. "Six."

"You're seeing double," his nearest neighbor told him. "There's only three."

"Three!" echoed Professor Seine. "Regardez donc!"

"Four, in plain English!" contradicted Dr. Welk. Then he stared. "Where'd it go?" he panted. "Where'd it disappear to? I could have sworn I had a fourth jar there. It was filled with a gallon of medical alco—"

"Anyone for punch?" murmured Nora, sweetly, as she appeared in the doorway with a refilled pitcher.

Frank bore down upon her. He brushed her aside and whispered hastily. “So that’s it, that’s what you did! Spiked punch! You knew I was affected by alcohol, you wanted to ruin the experiment. Well, I’ll show you—”

But he had no time to show her anything. Professor Seine was leading them back along the hall, and out of the house.

“We conclude with the dowsing,” he said.

“Dowsing?” The reporter who knew Fort’s name was instantly alert. “That’s where you find water with a forked stick, isn’t it? But what’s that got to do with psi?”

“It is an example of the clairvoyance, of a supernormal perceptive power,” Professor Seine told him, accepting a glass of punch. “The willow wand, she is not necessary; she is mere superstition. La radiesthisie—that which you name die dowsing—can be accomplished as well with a bent coat hanger, as you will quickly see.”

“Or just as poorly,” murmured Dr. Welk, lowering his voice so that Professor Seine could not hear him. “I took the trouble to get some of the boys from the Geology Department over here. You’ll find their reports inside. There’s no water on my land anywhere—it’s dry as a bone. Watch and see.” Professor Seine, for his part, had collared the reporters, both of whom were accepting their fifth glass of punch from Nora.

“This instrument you observe on the lawn,” he explained. “He is a portable well-digger I made rent of this morning. When my young friend discovers water, I shall avail myself of it to make the bore. Attend, he emanates from the house now with the coat hanger.”

Frank was emanating, but not very rapidly. A slow anger churned within him, mingling with the alcohol he had unwittingly consumed. Nora was giggling openly at him, but nobody seemed to notice it—the punch had done its work too well. Any attempt at extra-sensory perception seemed doomed; for that matter nobody was in a condition to attempt normal perception. The side-lawn was littered with straggling drunks as though a cocktail party had broken up and strewed the guests helterskelter across the sward.

Dr. Welk was shouting incoherently at him and waving his arms. “C’mon, let’s finish this up!” he called. “Don’t forget, I’ve got a four o’clock date with a gorilla!”

“This is not of the time for monkey business,” Professor Seine retorted. “I ask that you be silent as the grave. The subject must concentrate with the utmost.”

Frank raised the coat hanger. He took a deep breath, hoping to restore his sobriety. He had found water before; if there was a trace of moisture anywhere on this land, he knew the forces within him would inevitably lead him to it. The coat hanger would jerk, then point. And Professor Seine would drill. The Professor stalked behind him, panting now as he lifted the heavy portable driller with its long electrical cord trailing behind from its extension plug-in back at the house. The cord was three hundred feet long. Frank began to walk, slowly, his head bent.

“Stop!” murmured the Professor. “The cord, she is at the end of her rope.”

Frank retraced his steps. The coat hanger remained steadily outstretched before him. The crowd trailed behind, stumbling and giggling. Suddenly Frank wheeled abruptly and started for the house. He halted just under one of the bay windows and the coat hanger jerked down as if independently directed.

“Here,” Frank whispered.

Professor Seine began to rig his drill.

“No!” Dr. Welk protested. “No, there isn’t any water! I’ve had the place inspected, there can’t be! Don’t ruin my flower-beds—don’t you dare turn that thing on—stop him, somebody!”

But as the group converged on Frank and the Professor, the drill went into action. There was a whirring, a piercing of soft earth. And then—

A geyser spouted from the sod.

A wave of water spurted upwards, then fell in a flashing arc to drench the crowd.

Frank beamed at the girl.

“I did it!” he cried.

“Sucre!” ejaculated the Professor. “Sucre du Printempsl.”

“Look!” Frank grabbed Nora and shook her, holding her under the spray. “He’s got to believe me now, doesn’t he? I can do anything, liquor or no liquor. I can produce apports, poltergeists, phenomena, anything. I’ve got the power, see? I can levitate, teleport—just you watch me—”

“You damned fool!” Dr. Welk staggered over. “Know what you just did? You hit the city wuter muin!”

Professor Seine was frantically tugging at the drill. “It is immovable,” he gasped. “I cannot extricate it—”

“Here, let me try!” Frank tugged at it, then turned. “Never mind, I’ll levitate it.” He faced the drenched and leaping crowd. “Now watch!” he yelled. “I’ll prove I have psi powers once and for all—look at this!”

He allowed the darkness to surge over him, the blurry, alcoholic darkness. With his inner eye he could see the drill rising out of the ground as if of its own accord. He could see it lifting higher and higher. He strained to elevate it, watched it twirl above his head, and then the effort was too much. It was dropping, coming closer and closer. Frank tried to dodge, but he was too late. As the shrieking committee scattered in all directions, the drill landed on Frank’s head and the darkness closed in.

It took ten stitches to patch up his skull, but Nora patched up the rest. Before the sobered, sodden committee left the house they had agreed to keep silence on the entire affair—including their own part in it. Perhaps Nora’s admission about the spiked punch helped. At any rate, no one was willing to go on record as having participated in the debacle. As for the reporters, neither of them was inclined to turn in a story.

“Who’d believe it anyway?” said the one who was interested in Fort. “My city editor’s death on that kind of stuff. He wouldn’t recognize a flying saucer if his wife hit him with one.”

Professor Seine was happy, however. In his eyes the experiment was a complete success, and once he was assured Frank’s injury wasn’t serious, he even agreed to pay for the cost of repairing the damaged water main.

Dr. Welk's reaction was curiously complex. He had seen enough to modify his attitude on parapsychology—but at the same time he had his reputation to consider. Fortunately, as Nora pointed out, no one would know. She certainly wouldn't say anything, and neither would Frank.

The young man didn't learn all this until later. He sat up in bed at the hospital and listened to Nora's account.

"So you see, it all worked out for the best," she told him. "Daddy isn't angry at you for what happened. He feels you saved him, really."

"I saved him?"

Nora blushed. "Yes. I told him it was your idea to spike the punch that way."

"But darling—"

"Don't you see? It's all right now. We can be married, and you can continue your experiments in private, if you want."

"No I can't." Frank's tone was sepulchral.

"What do you mean?"

"That blow on the head. It did something to me. I . . . I've been testing. The power doesn't work any more. I can't tell what's written on my chart, and I don't even know what you have in your purse."

Nora sighed. "I don't know whether I'm happy or sad," she said, reaching for his hand. "But don't worry. Maybe it will come back when you're well again."

She was wrong, of course. It didn't come back. And some nine months after they were married—and Frank had an excellent job as assistant to Dr. Welk, cataloguing the pelvic bones of Australian aborigines—came the fatal hour.

As the young man paced the floor outside the delivery room, a nurse asked him the usual question. "Which do you think it will be?" she inquired. "Boy or girl?"

"Damned if I know," Frank groaned. "What do you think I am—a mind reader?"

The Real Bad Friend

It was really all Roderick's idea in the first place.

George Foster Pendleton would never have thought of it. He couldn't have; he was much too dull and respectable. George Foster Pendleton, vacuum cleaner salesman, aged forty-three, just wasn't the type. He had been married to the same wife for fourteen years, lived in the same white house for an equal length of time, wore glasses when he wrote up orders, and was completely complacent about his receding hairline and advancing waistline.

Consequently, when his wife's uncle died and left her an estate of some ninety-five thousand dollars after taxes, George didn't make any real plans.

Oh, he was delighted, of course—any ten-thousand-a-year salesman would be—but that's as far as it went. He and Ella decided to put in another bathroom on the first floor and buy a new Buick, keeping the old car for her to drive. The rest of the money could go into something safe, like savings and loan, and the interest would take care of a few little luxuries now and then. After all, they had no children or close relatives to look after. George was out in the territory a few days every month, and often called on local sales prospects at night, so they'd never developed much of a social life. There was no reason to expand their style of living, and the money wasn't enough to make him think of retiring.

So they figured things out, and after the first flurry of excitement and congratulations from the gang down at George's office, people gradually forgot about the inheritance. After all, they weren't really living any differently than before. George Foster Pendleton was a quiet man, not given to talking about his private affairs. In fact, he didn't have any private affairs to talk about.

Then Roderick came up with his idea.

"Why not drive Ella crazy?"

George couldn't believe his ears. "You're the one who's crazy," George told him. "Why, I never heard of anything so ridiculous in all my life!"

Roderick just smiled at him and shook his head in that slow, funny way of his, as if he felt sorry for George. Of course, he did feel sorry for George, and maybe that's why George thought of him as his best friend. Nobody seemed to have any use for Roderick, and Roderick didn't give a damn about anyone else, apparently. But he liked George, and it was obvious he had been doing a lot of thinking about the future.

"You're a fine one to talk about being ridiculous," Roderick said. That quiet, almost inaudible way he had of speaking always carried a lot of conviction. George was handicapped as a salesman by his high, shrill voice, but Roderick seldom spoke above a whisper. He had the actor's trick of deliberately underplaying his lines. And what he said usually made sense.

Now George sat in his dingy little room at the Hotel LeMoyne and listened to his friend. Roderick had come to the office today just before George left on his monthly road trip, and decided to go along. As he'd fallen into the habit of doing this every once in a while, George thought nothing of it. But this time, apparently, he had a purpose in mind.

"If anyone is being ridiculous," Roderick said, "it's you. You've been selling those lousy cleaners since nineteen fifty-six. Do you like your job? Are you ever going to get any higher in the company? Do you want to keep on in this crummy rut for another twenty years?"

George opened his mouth to answer, but it was Roderick who spoke. "Don't tell me," he said. "I know the answers. And while we're on the subject, here's something else to think about. Do you really love Ella?"

George had been staring at the cracked mirror over the bureau. Now he turned on the bed and gazed at the wall. He didn't want to look at himself, or Roderick, either.

“Why, she’s been a good wife to me. More than a wife—like a mother, almost.”

“Sure. You’ve told me all about that. That’s the real reason you married her, wasn’t it? Because she reminded you of your mother, and your mother had just died, and you were afraid of girls in the first place but you had to have someone to take care of you.”

Damn that Roderick! George realized he never should have told him so much in the first place. He probably wouldn’t, except that Roderick had been his best—maybe his only—friend. He’d come along back in ’54, in the service, when George had been ready to go to pieces completely.

Even today, after all those years, George hated to remember the way he’d met Roderick. He didn’t like to think about the service, or going haywire there on the island and trying to strangle the sergeant, and ending up in the stockade. Even so, it might have been much worse, particularly after they stuck him in solitary, if he hadn’t met Roderick. Funny part of it was, Roderick had become his intimate friend and heard everything about him long before George ever set eyes on him. Roderick had been down in solitary, too, and for the first month he was just a voice that George could talk to in the dark. It wasn’t what you’d call the best way in the world to develop a close friendship, but at the time it kept George from cracking up. He had someone to confide in at last, and pretty soon he was spilling his guts, his heart, his soul; telling things he hadn’t even known about himself until the words came.

Oh, Roderick knew, all right. He knew the things George had carefully concealed from everyone—the kids back in school, the guys in the army, the gang at the office, the card-playing friends and neighbors, even Ella. Most especially, Ella. There were lots of things George wouldn’t dream of telling Ella, any more than he would have told his mother, years ago.

Roderick was right about that. Ella did remind George of his mother. And when his mother died he’d married Ella because she was big and took care of him, and the way it worked out it was she who made most of the decisions. As a child he’d been taught to be a good little boy. Now he was a good little salesman, a good little potbellied householder, a fetcher-home of Kleenex, a mower of lawns, a wiper of dishes, a wrapper of garbage. Twelve years of it since the war. And if it hadn't been for Roderick, he never could have stood it.

Could he stand another twelve years of it? Or twenty, or thirty, or even more?

"You don't have to put up with it, you know," Roderick murmured, reading his thoughts. "You don't have to be mommy's boy any longer. This is your big chance, George. If you got rid of the house, you'd have over two hundred-fifty Gs in cash. Suppose you settled down on one of those little islands in the Caribbean. There's dozens of them, according to that travel guide I saw on your desk in the office today."

"But Ella wouldn't like that," George protested. "She hates hot climates. That's why we've never traveled south on vacations. Besides, what on earth could she do down there?"

"She wouldn't be going," Roderick answered, patiently. "She'd stay here. That's the whole point of it, George. You could live like a king there for a few hundred a month. Have a big house, all the servants you want. Plenty to drink. And the girls, George! You've heard about the girls. Every color under the sun. Why, you can even buy them down there, the way those old Southern planters used to buy slaves. Quadroons and octoroons and mulattoes—probably can't even speak a word of English. But you wouldn't have to worry about that. All you'd want is obedience, and you could have a whip to take care of that. They'd have to do anything you wanted, because you'd be their master. You could even kill them if you liked. The way you'd like to kill Ella."

"But I don't want to kill Ella," George said, very quickly, and his voice was quite loud and shrill.

Roderick's answering laugh was soft. "Don't kid me," he said. "I know you. You'd like to kill her, the same way you'd have liked to kill that sergeant back on the island, but you can't because you're chicken. And besides, it isn't practical. Murder is no solution to this problem, George, but my way is. Drive Ella crazy."

"Preposterous."

"What's preposterous about it? You want to get rid of her, don't you? Get rid of your job, get rid of taking orders from a wife and a boss and every stinking customer with enough cash for a cleaner who thinks he can make you jump. And here's your chance. The chance of a lifetime, George, sitting right in your lap."

"But I can't drive Ella insane."

"Why not? Take a look around you, man. It's being done every day. Ask the lawyers about the sons and daughters and in-laws of people who have money, and how they get the old folks put away in the asylum. Getting power of attorney from grandpa and grandma—things like that. Don't you think a lot of them help the deal along a little? You can drive anyone crazy, George, if you plan."

"Ella isn't the type," George insisted. "Besides, anything I did—don't you think she'd know about it and see through it? Even if I tried, it wouldn't work."

"Who said anything about you trying?" Roderick drawled. He seemed very sure of himself, now. "That's my department, George. Let me do it."

"You? But—"

"I wouldn't fool you. It's not merely a beautiful gesture of friendship. I want those West Indies, too. We can go there together. You'd like that, wouldn't you, George? The two of us down there, I mean, where we wouldn't have to be afraid of what we did, what people would say or think? I could help you, George. I could help you get hold of some of those girls. Do you remember that book you read once, about the Roman Emperor, Tiberius—the one who had the villa on the island, and the orgies? You told me about some of those orgies, George. We could do it, you and I."

George felt the sweat oozing down the insides of his wrists. He sat up. "I don't even want to think of such things," he said. "Besides, what if you got caught?"

"I won't get caught," Roderick assured him, calmly. "Don't forget, Ella doesn't even know me. I've steered clear of your friends all these years. I'm a free agent, George, and that's our ace in the hole. You've always treated me like a poor relation, never introducing me or even mentioning my name.

Oh, I'm not complaining. I understand. But now that little situation is going to come in handy. Let me think things out, work up a plan."

George bit his upper lip. "Ella's too sensible," he said. "You'd never get her upset."

Roderick laughed without making a sound. "Nobody is really 'sensible,' George. It's just a false front, that's all. Like the one you've built up." He was suddenly quite serious again. "Think about it. How many people would believe you were capable of even talking to me the way you have just now, let alone of carrying out any such ideas? Would your boss believe it? Or Ella, even? Of course not! To the world, you're just another middle-aged salesman, a Willy Loman type, only worse. A spineless, gutless, chicken-hearted, yellow-bellied coward. A weak-kneed sissy, a little pantywaist, a mommy's boy, a—"

"Shut up!" George almost screamed the words, and then he was on his feet with his sweat-soaked hands balled into fists, ready to smash at the voice and the face, ready to kill. . . .

And then he was back on the bed, breathing hoarsely, and Roderick was laughing at him without making a sound.

"You see? I knew the words to use, all right. In one minute I turned you into a potential murderer, didn't I? You, the respectable suburban type who's never gotten out of line since they shoved you into the stockade.

"Well, there are words for everyone, George. Words and phrases and ideas that can churn rage, trigger emotion, fill a person with incoherent, hysterical fear. Ella is no different. She's a woman; there's a lot of things she must be afraid of. We'll find those things, George. We'll press the right buttons until the bells ring. The bells in the belfry, George. The bats in the belfry—"

George made a noise in his throat. "Get out of here," he said.

"All right. But you think over what I've said. This is your big opportunity—our big opportunity. I'm not going to stand by and see you toss it away."

Then he was gone.

Alone in his room, George turned out the light and got ready for bed. He wondered if there was a threat hidden in Roderick's last words, and that startled him. All his life George had been afraid of other people because they were violent, aggressive, cruel. At times he could sense the same tendencies in himself, but he always suppressed them. His mother had made him behave like a little gentleman. And except for that one terrible interlude in the service, he had always been a little gentleman. He'd kept out of trouble, kept away from people that could harm him.

And Roderick had helped. He'd gotten out of the army at the same time George did, settled down in the same city. Of course, he didn't really settle down, inasmuch as he had no wife or family and never kept a regular job.

Still, he seemed to get by all right. In spite of his hand-to-mouth existence, he dressed as well as George did. And he was taller and leaner and darker and looked a good ten years younger. It often occurred to George that Roderick lived off women—he seemed to be that type, always hinting of sexual conquests. But he never volunteered any information about himself. "What you don't know won't hurt you," he'd say.

And George was satisfied with the arrangement, because as a result he could talk about himself. Roderick was the sounding board, the confessional booth, the one person who could really understand.

He'd drop in at the office from time to time when George was free, and sometimes he'd ride along with him for a day when George went out of town, or in the evenings when he called on prospects. After a few perfunctory overtures, George stopped trying to get Roderick to meet his wife. And he'd never mentioned Roderick to her—mainly because of the circumstances of their having been in the stockade together, and George had never dared tell Ella about that. So Ella didn't know about Roderick, and somehow this made everything quite exciting. Once, when Ella had gone down to Memphis for her mother's funeral, Roderick consented to move in with George at the house for two days. They got violently and disastrously drunk together, but on the third morning Roderick left.

It was all very clandestine, almost like having a mistress. Only without the messy part. The messy part was no good, though it might be different if you were on one of those islands and nobody could see you or stop you and you owned those girls body and soul; then you could have a whip, a long black whip with little pointed silver spikes at the end, and the spikes would tear the soft flesh and you would make the girls dance and little red ribbons would twine around the naked bodies and then—

But that was Roderick's doing, putting such thoughts into his head! And suddenly George knew he was afraid of Roderick. Roderick, always so soft-voiced and calm and understanding; always ready to listen and offer advice and ask nothing in return. George had never realized until now that Roderick was as cruel as all the rest.

Now he had to face the fact. And he wondered how he could have escaped the truth all these years. Roderick had been in the stockade for a crime of violence, too. But the difference was that Roderick wasn't repentant. Repentance wasn't in him—only defiance and hatred, and the terrible strength that comes of being untouched and untouchable. It seemed as though nothing could move him or hurt him. He bowed to no conventions. He went where he pleased, did what he pleased. And apparently there was a streak of perversity in him; obviously he hated Ella and wanted George to get rid of her. If George had listened to him tonight. . . .

The little vacuum cleaner salesman fell asleep in his sagging bed, his mind firmly made up. He was finished with Roderick. He wouldn't see him any more, wouldn't listen to any of his wild schemes. He wanted no part of such plans. From now on he'd go his way alone. He and Ella would be safe and happy together. . . .

During the next few days George often thought of what he'd say to Roderick when he turned up, but Roderick left him alone. Maybe he'd figured out the situation for himself and realized he'd gone too far.

Anyway, George completed his trip, returned home, kissed Ella, helped supervise the installation of the second bathroom, and finished up his paperwork at the office.

Being on the road had left him feeling pretty tired, but there came a time when he just had to catch up with his prospect list here in town, so he finally spent an evening making calls.

Since he was just plain fagged out, he violated one of his rules and stopped for a quick drink before he began his rounds. After the first call he had another, as a reward for making a sale, and from then on things went easier. George knew he had no head for alcohol, but just this once a few drinks helped. He got through his customer list in a sort of pleasant fog, and when he was done he had several more fast shots in a tavern near the house. By the time he put the car in the garage, he was feeling no pain.

He wondered vaguely if Ella would be waiting up to bawl him out. She didn't like him to drink. Well, perhaps she'd be asleep by now. He hoped so, as he went up the walk and started to unlock the door.

Before he could turn the key the door opened and Ella was in his arms. "Thank goodness you're here!" she cried. She was crying, George realized, and then he noticed that all the lights in the house were on.

"Hey, what's the matter? What's all this about?"

She began to gurgle. "The face, in the window—"

Alcohol plays funny tricks, and for a moment George wanted to laugh. Something about the melodramatic phrase, and the way Ella's jowls quivered when she uttered it, was almost painfully amusing. But Ella wasn't joking. She was frightened. She quivered against him like a big blob of Jello.

"I had this awful headache—you know the kind I get—and I was just sitting in the front room watching TV with the lights off. I guess I must have been dozing a little, when all of a sudden I got this feeling, like somebody was watching me. So I looked up, and there in the window was this awful face. It was like one of those terrible rubber masks the kids wear for Halloween—all green and grinning. And I could see hands clawing at the window, trying to open it and get in!"

"Take it easy, now," George soothed, holding her. "Then what happened?"

Gradually he got it out of her. She had screamed and turned on the big overhead light, and the face had disappeared. So she'd turned on all the lights and gone around locking the doors and windows. After that she'd just waited.

"Maybe we ought to call the police," she said. "I thought I'd tell you about it first."

George nodded. "Sensible idea. Probably was just what you thought—some kid playing a trick." He was quite sobered now, and thoughtful. "Which window did you see this through, the big one? Here, let me get a flashlight from the garage. I'm going to look for footprints."

He got the flashlight, and when Ella refused to accompany him, walked across the lawn himself. The flowerbed beneath the window was damp from a recent rain, but there were no footprints.

When George told Ella about it, she seemed puzzled.

"I can't understand it," she said.

"Neither can I," George answered. "If it was a kid, he'd probably have run off when you spotted him, instead of waiting to smooth out his tracks. On the other hand, if it was a prowler, he'd cover up his traces. But a prowler wouldn't have let you see him in the first place." He paused. "You're sure about what you saw?"

Ella frowned. "Well . . . it was only for a second, you know, and the room was so dark. But there was this big green face, like a mask, and it had those long teeth. . . ."

Her voice trailed away.

"Nobody tried any doors or windows? You didn't hear any sounds?"

"No. There was just this face." She blinked. "I told you about my headache, and how I was dozing off, watching that late movie. It was all sort of like a nightmare."

"I see." George nodded. "Did you ever stop to think that maybe it was a nightmare?"

Ella didn't answer.

"How's the head? Still aching? Better take a couple of aspirins and go up to bed. You just had a bad dream, dear. Come on, let's go to bed and forget about it, shall we?"

So they went to bed.

Maybe Ella forgot about it and maybe she didn't, but George wasn't forgetting. He knew. Roderick must be starting to carry out his plan. And this would only be the beginning. . . .

It was only the beginning, and after that things moved fast. The next afternoon, George was sitting in the office all alone when Ella called him from the house. She sounded very excited.

"George, did you tell the plumbers to come back?"

"Why no, dear, of course not."

"Well, Mr. Johnston is here, and he said they got a call to come over and rip everything out again. I don't understand it, and I've been trying to explain that it's some kind of mistake and—"

Ella sounded very upset now, and George tried to calm her down. "Better put him on, dear. I'll talk to him."

So Ella put Mr. Johnston on and George told him not to bother, there was a mix-up somewhere. And when Mr. Johnston got mad and said there was no mix-up, he'd taken the call himself, George just cut him off and got Ella back on the wire.

"It's all taken care of now," he assured her. "Don't worry about a thing. I'll be home early."

"Maybe you'd better get something to eat downtown," Ella said. "I've got such an awful headache, and I want to lie down for a while."

"You go ahead," George said. "I'll manage."

So George managed, but if Ella lay down, she didn't get very much rest. George found that out when he got home. She was quivering, her voice and body trembling.

"Somebody's trying to play a trick on us," she told him. "The doorbell's been ringing all afternoon. First it was Gimbel's delivery truck. With refrigerators."

"I didn't order a refrigerator," George said.

"I know you didn't, and neither did I." Ella was trying to hold back the tears. "But somebody did. And not just one. They had four of them."

"Four?"

"That's not the worst of it. Some man from Kelly's called and asked when I was going to move. They'd gotten an order for a van."

"Let me get this straight." George paced the floor. "How did they get the order?"

"Over the phone," Ella said. "Just the way Mr. Johnston did. That's why I thought at first you might have called." She was sniffling now, and George made her sit down.

"So you said," George told her. "But I asked Mr. Johnston about that. He happened to take that particular call himself. And he was quite positive the caller was a woman."

"A woman?"

"Yes." George sat down next to Ella and took her hand. "He claimed he recognized your voice."

"But George, that's impossible! Why, I never even used the phone once today. I was lying down with my headache and—"

George shook his head. "I believe you, dear. But who else could it be? What other woman would know that Johnston was the plumber who put in our bathroom? Did you mention his name to anyone?"

"No, of course not. At least, I don't remember." Ella was pale. "Oh, I'm so upset I can't think straight." She put her hands up to her forehead. "My head feels like it's splitting wide open. I can stand it. . . ." She stared at George.

“Where are you going?”

“I’m calling Dr. Vinson.”

“But I’m not sick. I don’t need a doctor.”

“He’ll give you a sedative, something for that head of yours. Now just calm down and relax.”

So Dr. Vinson came over, and he did give Ella a sedative. Ella didn’t mention anything about the calls, so he only went through a routine examination.

But afterwards, when she was asleep upstairs, George took Dr. Vinson aside and told him the story—including the part about the face in the window.

“What do you think, Doc?” he asked. “I’ve heard about such things happening when women start going through change of life. Maybe—”

Dr. Vinson nodded. “Better have her call my office for an appointment later in the week,” he said. “We’ll see that she gets a complete checkup. Meanwhile, don’t let yourself get upset. It could be somebody’s idea of a practical joke, you know.”

George nodded, but he wasn’t reassured.

The part that really bothered him was the business about Ella’s voice being recognized over the phone.

Next morning he left early, and Ella was still asleep. Down at the office he called Gimbel’s and then Kelly’s. After much confusion he was able to locate the clerks who had taken the orders. Both insisted they had talked to a woman.

So George called Dr. Vinson and told him so.

No sooner had he hung up than Ella was on the phone. She could scarcely speak.

A man had come from the Humane Society with a Great Dane. A West Side furrier, somebody Ella had never heard of, drove up with samples of mink coats—mink coats in July! A travel agency had kept calling, insisting that she had asked for information about a flight around the world. Her head was killing her; she didn't know what to do; she wanted George to phone the police and—

She broke off in the middle of her hysterical account, and George quickly asked what was happening. A moment later he realized he could have spared himself the question. The sound of what was happening was clearly audible over the wire: he recognized the hideous wailing.

"Fire engines!" Ella gasped. "Somebody called the Fire Department!"

"I'll be right home," George said, hanging up quickly.

And he went right home. The trucks were gone by the time he arrived, but a lieutenant was still there, and a detective from the Police Department.

Ella was trying to explain the situation to them, and it was a lucky thing George was on hand to straighten things out. He had Ella go upstairs, and then he told the men the story.

"Please," he said. "Don't press any charges. If there's any expense, anything like a fine, I'll be glad to pay it. My wife is under doctor's care—she's going to have a complete examination later in the week. This is all very embarrassing, but I'm sure we can straighten things out. . . ."

The men were quite sympathetic. They promised to let him know what the costs would be, and the detective gave George his card and told him to keep in touch with him in case there was anything he could do.

Then George got on the phone and squared things with the Humane Society, the furrier and the travel agency. After that he went up to Ella's bedroom, where he found her lying on the bed with all the shades pulled down. He offered to fix her something to eat but she said she wasn't hungry.

"Something's happening," she told him. "Somebody's trying to harm us. I'm frightened."

"Nonsense." George forced a smile. "Besides, we've got protection now." And then, to cheer her up, he told her that the detective had promised to put a watch on the house and tap the telephone.

"If there's anybody pulling any funny business, we'll catch him," George reassured her. "All you have to do is rest. By the way, Dr. Vinson said it would be a good idea if you stopped in for a checkup toward the end of the week. Why not call him for an appointment?”

Ella sat up. “You told him?”

“I had to, dear. After all, he’s your doctor. He’s in a position to help if—”

“What?”

“Nothing.”

“George. Look at me.” He didn’t, but she went on. “Do you think I made those calls? Do you?”

“I never said so. It’s just that Johnston claims he recognized your voice. Why would he want to lie about a thing like that?”

“I don’t know. But he’s lying. He must be! I never called him, George. I swear it! And I didn’t call anyone this morning. Why, I was in bed until almost noon. That sedative made me so dopey I couldn’t think straight.” George was silent.

“Well, aren’t you going to say something?”

“I believe you, dear. Now, try and get some rest.”

“But I can’t rest now. I’m not tired. I want to talk to you.”

“Sorry, I’ve got to get back to the office and clean up my desk. Don’t forget, I’m leaving town again tomorrow.”

“But you can’t go now. You can’t leave me alone like this!”

“Only for three days. You know, Pittsville and Bakerton. I’ll be back by Saturday.” George tried to sound cheerful. “Anyway, the police will keep an eye on the house, so you needn’t worry about prowlers.”

“George, I—”

“We’ll talk about it again tonight. Right now, I’ve got a job to attend to, remember?”

So George left her weeping softly on the bed and went back to his office. But he didn’t pay much attention to his job.

Roderick was waiting for him when he came in.

The other salesmen were out that afternoon, and there was no one else near the hot, stuffy little back-room cubicle George used for an office. He and Roderick were all alone, and Roderick spoke very softly. George was glad of that, at least, because he wouldn't have wanted anyone to hear the things Roderick told him. Nor, for that matter, would he have cared to have been overheard himself.

The moment he saw Roderick he almost shouted, "So it was you, after all!"

Roderick shrugged. "Who else?"

"But I told you I didn't want any part of it, and I meant it!"

"Nonsense, George. You don't know what you mean, or what you really want." Roderick smiled and leaned forward. "You talked to this Dr. Vinson and to the detective. Did you mention my name?"

"No, I didn't, but—"

"You see? That proves it. You must have realized who was responsible, but you kept silent. You wanted the scheme to work. And it is working, isn't it? I have everything all planned."

In spite of himself George had to ask the question. "How did you manage to imitate her voice?"

"Simple. I've called her on the phone several times—wrong number, you know, or pretending to be a telephone solicitor. I heard enough to be able to fake. She's got one of those whiney voices, George. Like this. I think I'll lie down for a while. My head is killing me."

It was uncanny to hear Ella's voice issuing from those sardonically curled lips. George's heart began to pound.

"You—you said you had plans," he murmured.

Roderick nodded. "That's right. You're going out of town for a few days, I believe?"

"Yes. Tomorrow."

"Good. Everything will be arranged."

"What do you intend to do?"

"Maybe you'd better not ask that question, George. Maybe you ought to keep out of this completely. Just leave everything to me." Roderick cocked his head to one side. "Remember, what you don't know won't hurt you."

George sat down, then stood up again hastily. "Roderick, I want you to stop this! Lay off, do you hear me?"

Roderick smiled.

"Do you hear me?" George repeated. He was trembling now.

"I heard you," Roderick said. "But you're upset now, George. You aren't thinking straight. Stop worrying about Ella. She won't really come to any harm. They'll take quite good care of her where she's going. And you and I will take good care of ourselves, where we're going. That's what you want to concentrate on, George. The Caribbean. The Caribbean, with all that cash in our pockets. A little boat, maybe, and those long, moonlit tropical nights. Think about the girls, George—those nice, slim young girls. They aren't fat and blubbery, always whining and complaining about headaches and telling you not to touch them. They like to be touched, George. They like to be touched, and held, and caressed, and—"

"Stop it! It's no use. I've changed my mind."

"Too late, George. You can't stop it now." Roderick was very casual, but very firm. "Besides, you don't really want to stop. It's only that you're afraid. Well, don't be. I promise you won't be involved in this at all. Just give me three days. Three days, while you're gone—that's all I need."

"I won't go!" George shouted. "I won't leave her! I'll go to the police!"

"And just what will you tell them?" Roderick paused to let the question sink in. "Oh, that would be a fine idea, wouldn't it, going to the police? Not on your life, George. You're going out of town like a good little boy. Because this is a job for a bad little boy—like me."

He was laughing at George now, and George knew it. Any further protest on his part would be useless. Still, he might have tried to do something about it if the boss hadn't come in through the side entrance at that very moment. Roderick stood up, crossed the room, slipped out the door and was gone. And George, staring after him, realized that his last chance had gone with him.

* * *

Things seemed a little bit better that evening. Ella had had no further disturbances during the rest of the day, and as a result she was considerably calmer. By the time they had finished a makeshift supper and got ready for bed, both of them felt a trifle more reconciled to the coming separation.

Ella said she had phoned Dr. Vinson and made an appointment for Friday afternoon, two days hence. George, for his part, promised to call her faithfully every evening he was away.

“And if you need me, I’ll drive right back,” he told her. “I won’t be much more than a hundred miles away any time during the trip. Come on now, I’ll finish packing and we can get some sleep.”

So they left it at that. And the next morning George was up and on the road long before Ella awakened.

He had a fairly easy day of it in Pittsville and finished his calls long before he had anticipated. Perhaps that’s why he started to worry; he had nothing else to occupy his mind.

What was it Roderick had said? What you don’t blow won’t hurt you?

Well, that wasn’t true. Not knowing was the worst part of it. Not knowing and suspecting. Roderick had told him he had everything planned. George believed that all right. And Roderick had told him he wouldn’t actually harm Ella. This part George wasn’t certain about; he didn’t know whether he could believe it or not. Roderick couldn’t be trusted. He’d proved it by the way he’d gone ahead with the scheme despite George’s protests. There was no telling what he might be capable of doing. After all, what did George know about the man? He might already be guilty of far greater crimes than the one he proposed.

George thought of Roderick with a knife, a gun, or even his bare hands.

. . . And then he thought of those same bare hands ripping away a dress, fastening themselves like hungry mouths on naked flesh. And he saw his face, like the face of one of those fiends in that old copy of Paradise Lost with the Dore etchings, the one his mother had owned.

The thought made his hands tremble, made his voice quaver. But he forced himself to be calm as he dialed the long-distance operator from his motel room, put through the call to the house.

And then he heard Ella's voice, and everything was all right. Everything was fine.

Yes, she could hear him. And no, nothing had happened. Nothing at all. Apparently, whoever had been playing those tricks had decided to stop. She'd been cleaning house all day. And how did he feel?

"Fine, just fine," George said. And meant it. His relief was tremendously exhilarating. He hung up, suddenly jubilant. Ella was undisturbed, and that meant Roderick had been scared off after all.

George went down to the bar for a few drinks. It was still early, and he felt like celebrating. He struck up a conversation with a leather-goods salesman from Des Moines, and they hit a few of the local spots. Eventually his companion picked up a girl and wandered off. George continued on alone for quite a time, blacking out pleasantly every now and then, but always remaining under control; he liked the good feeling that came with knowing he was under control and would always behave like a little gentleman. He had the right to celebrate because he had won a victory.

Roderick had told the truth in a way; for a while George had been tempted to let the scheme go through. But he had changed his mind in time, and Roderick must have known he meant it. Now Ella was safe, and he was safe, and they'd be happy together. Cutting and running to an island in the West Indies—what a pipe dream! George Foster Pendleton wasn't that kind of a person. And now it was time to find the motel, find his room, find the keyhole, find the bed, find the whirling darkness and the deep peace that waited within it.

The next morning George had a hangover, and he was pretty rocky as he drove to Bakerton. He made a few calls around noon, but just couldn't seem to hit the ball. So in the afternoon he decided to call it quits, because he still had Friday to finish up there.

He went back to his room intending to take a late afternoon nap, but he slept right straight through. He didn't wake up to eat supper or call Ella or anything.

When he awoke the next morning, he was surprised to find that Ella had apparently called him several times; he had slept right through the rings. But he felt good, and he was out making the rounds by nine.

He called Ella immediately after supper. Her voice was relaxed and reassuring.

"Did you go to the doctor today?" he asked.

She had seen Dr. Vinson, she told him, and everything was fine. He had checked her over thoroughly—cardiograph, blood tests, even head x-rays. There was nothing wrong. He'd given her a few pills for her headaches, that was all.

"Any other disturbances?" George asked.

"No. It's been very quiet here." Ella sounded quite calm. "When are you coming in tomorrow?"

"Around noon, I hope. Right after lunch."

"Right after lunch," Ella repeated. "I'll see you."

"Good night," George said, and hung up.

He felt very happy, and yet there was something bothering him. He didn't quite know what it was, but there was an uneasy feeling, a feeling of having forgotten an important message. Like when he was a boy and his mother sent him to the store for groceries, and he couldn't remember one of the items on the list.

George sat there, holding the phone in his hand, and then he jumped when he heard the tapping on the door.

He got up and opened it and Roderick came into the room. Roderick was smiling gaily.

"Always stay at the best motel in town, don't you?" he said. "Knew I'd find you here."

"But what—"

"Just thought I ought to take a run over," Roderick said. "You're coming back tomorrow, and I figured you'd better be prepared."

"Prepared for what?"

Roderick stood in front of the mirror and cocked his head. "I've been working hard," he told George. "But it's paid off. Like I told you, all I needed was three days."

George opened his mouth, but Roderick wasn't to be interrupted.

"While you've been snoozing away here, I've been up and doing," he chuckled. "No rest for the wicked, you know. Let me give you a quick rundown. Wednesday, the day you left, I made a few calls in the evening. The first one was to the savings and loan people—they're open Wednesday nights until nine, you know. I did the Ella impersonation and told them I wanted my money out as soon as I could get it. Talked to old Higgins himself. When he asked why, I told him I was planning on getting a divorce and going to Europe."

Roderick nodded to himself and continued. "Then I went around to the house and did the mask routine again. Ella was in the kitchen, drinking a glass of milk before she got ready for bed. When she saw me I thought she was going to jump right out of her skin. She ran for the telephone, and I guess she called the police. I didn't wait around to find out.

"Yesterday I figured it might be best to keep away from the house, so I went through the telephone gag again. I talked to Higgins once more and told him I needed the money at once, because you were deathly ill and had to have an operation on your brain. That was a neat touch, wasn't it?

"Then I talked to the bank, and after that I phoned a few stores and had them promise to make deliveries this morning. Just a few odds and ends—a piano, and two trombones from the Music Mart, and seventy-five dozen roses from the florist. Oh yes, as a final touch, I called Phelps Brothers and told them I wanted to stop in and look at a casket because I anticipated a death in the family."

Roderick giggled over that one, almost like a naughty little boy. But his eyes were serious as he continued.

"Finally, I called that old goat, Dr. Vinson, and told him I wanted to cancel my appointment. He couldn't quite figure out why until I told him I was leaving for Europe on a midnight flight. He wanted to know if you were going and I said no, it was a big surprise because I was going to have a baby over there and you weren't the father.

"After that, I went out to the house—but I was very careful, you understand, in case any cops should happen to be around. Lucky for me I'd anticipated them, because not only was there a prowl car parked down the street, but when I sneaked back through the alley and looked in the kitchen window, I could see this detective talking to Ella in the hall. So I got out of there. But it wasn't necessary to do any more. I could see that. Ella looked like the wrath of God. I don't imagine she'd had any sleep for two nights. And by today, word must have gotten around. Old Higgins in savings and loan will do his share of talking. So will Doc Vinson, and some of the others. And your wife will keep insisting to the police that she saw this face. Now all you have to do is go back and wrap everything up in one neat package."

"What do you mean?" George asked.

"I imagine they'll all be calling you. Your only job is to give the right answers. Tell them that Ella has talked about taking a lot of crazy trips. Tell them she wants to hide her money in the house. Tell Doc Vinson she's afraid he wants to poison her, or attack her, or something. You ever hear about paranoiac delusions? That's when people get the idea that everybody's persecuting them. Build up a yarn like that. You know what to tell Ella; she's so confused now that she'll go for anything you say. Mix her up a little more. Ask her about things she's told you, like trading in the Buick for a Cadillac. She'll deny she ever said anything like that, and then you drop the subject and bring up something else. A day or two—with a few more looks through the window at the mask—and you'll have her convinced she's screwy. That's the most important thing. Then you go to Vinson with a sob story, have her examined while she's scared and woozy, and you've got it made." Roderick laughed. "If you could have seen her face . . ."

George shook his head in bewilderment. Why was Roderick lying to him? He'd talked to Ella Wednesday night and tonight, and she'd been quite normal. Nothing had happened, nothing at all. And yet here was Roderick, coming a hundred miles and boasting about all kinds of crazy stuff—

Crazy stuff.

Suddenly George knew.

Crazy stuff. A crazy scheme to drive someone crazy. It added up.

Roderick was the crazy one.

That was the answer, the real answer. He was more than cruel, more than childish, more than antisocial. The man was psychotic, criminally insane. And it was all a fantasy; he'd started to carry out his delusions, then halted. The rest of it took place only in his disordered imagination.

George didn't want to look at him, didn't want to hear his voice. He wanted to tell him to go away, wanted to tell him he had just talked to Ella and she was okay, nothing had happened.

But he knew that he mustn't. He couldn't. Roderick would never accept such an answer. He was crazy, and he was dangerous. There had to be some other way of handling him.

All at once, George found the obvious solution.

"I'm all through here," he said. "Thought I might drive back tonight. Want to ride along?"

Roderick nodded. "Why not?" Again the childish giggle. "I get it. You can't wait, isn't that it? Can't wait to see the look on her foolish fat face. Well, go ahead. One good thing, you won't have to look at it very much longer. They're going to put her on ice. And we'll have the sunshine. The sunshine, and the moonlight, and all the rest of it. The tropics are great stuff, George. You're going to be happy there. I know you don't like insects, but even they can come in handy. Take ants, for instance. Suppose one of these girls disobeys us, George. Well, we can tie her to a tree, see? Spread-eagle, sort of. Strip her naked and rub honey all over her. Then the ants come and . . .”

Roderick talked like that all during the drive back home. Sometimes he whispered and sometimes he giggled, and George got a splitting headache worse than anything Ella could ever have had. But still Roderick kept on talking. He was going to have Ella locked up. He was going to take George to the islands. Sometimes it even sounded as if he meant the island, the one where they’d been in the stockade. And he was going to do things to the girls the way the guards used to do things to the prisoners. It was crazy talk, crazy.

The only thing that kept George going was the knowledge that it was crazy talk, and if anyone else heard it they’d realize the truth right away. All he had to do was get Roderick into town, stall him on some pretext or other, and call in the police. Of course Roderick would try to implicate George in the scheme, but how could he? Looking back, George couldn’t remember any slip-up on his part; he hadn’t actually said or done anything out of line. No, it was all Roderick. And that was his salvation.

Still, the cold sweat was trickling down his forehead by the time he pulled up in front of the house. It must have been close to midnight, but the front-room lights were still burning. That meant Ella was up. Good.

“Wait here,” George told Roderick. “I’m just going in to tell her I’m home. Then I’ll put the car away.”

Roderick seemed to sense that something was phony. “I shouldn’t hang around,” he said. “What if the cops have a stake out?”

“Let me check on that,” George said. “I’ve got an idea. If the cops aren’t here, you could give her one more taste of the rubber mask. Then I can deny seeing it. Get the pitch?”

“Yes.” Roderick smiled. “Now you’re cooperating, George. Now you’re with it. Go ahead.”

So George got out of the car and walked up to the front door and opened it.

Ella was waiting for him. She did look tired, and she jumped when she saw him, but she was all right. Thank God for that, she was all right! And now he could tell her.

"Don't say a word," George whispered, closing the door. "I've got a lunatic out in the car there."

"Would you mind repeating that?"

George looked around, and sure enough he recognized him. It was the detective he'd talked to after the fire alarm was turned in.

"What are you doing here this time of night?" George asked.

"Just checking up," said the detective. "Now what's all this you were saying about a lunatic?"

So George told him. George told him and he told Ella, and they both listened very quietly and calmly. George had to talk fast, because he didn't want Roderick to get suspicious, and he stumbled over some of his words. Then he asked the detective to sneak out to the car with him before Roderick could get away, and the detective said he would. George warned him that Roderick was dangerous and asked him if he had a gun. The detective had a gun, all right, and George felt better.

They walked right out to the car together and George yanked open the door.

But Roderick wasn't there.

George couldn't figure it out, and then he realized that Roderick might have been just crazy enough to pull his rubber mask trick without waiting, and he told the detective about that and made him look around under the front windows. The detective wasn't very bright; he didn't seem to understand about the mask part, so George showed him what he meant—how you could stand under the window on this board from the car and look in without leaving any footprints. The detective wanted to know what the mask looked like, but George couldn't quite describe it, and then they were back at the car and the detective opened the glove compartment and pulled something out and asked George if this was the mask he meant.

Of course it was, and George explained that Roderick must have left it there. Then they were back inside the house and Ella was crying, and George didn't want her to cry so he said there was nothing to be frightened about because Roderick was gone. And she didn't have to be afraid if somebody played tricks on her like imitating her voice because anyone could do that.

The detective asked him if he could, and of course he could do it perfectly. He was almost as good as Roderick, only he had such a splitting headache. . . .

Maybe that's why the doctor came, not Dr. Vinson but a police doctor, and he made George tell everything all over again. Until George got mad and asked why were they talking to him, the man they should be looking for was Roderick.

It was crazy, that's what it was. They were even crazier than Roderick, the way they carried on. There were more police now, and the detective was trying to tell him that he was the one who had made the calls and worn the mask. He, George! It was utterly ridiculous, and George explained how he had met Roderick on the island in solitary and how he looked like the fiend in the Dore book and everything, and how he was a bad boy.

But the detective said that George's boss had heard him talking to himself in the office the other afternoon and called Ella to tell her, and that she had talked to the police. Then when George went on his trip they'd checked up on him and found he drove back to town the night he got drunk and also the night he said he was sleeping in his motel room, and that he was the one who had done it all.

Of course they didn't tell him this all at once—there was this trip to the station, and all those doctors who talked to him, and the lawyers and the judge. After a while, George stopped paying attention to them and to that nonsense about schizophrenia and split personalities. His head was splitting and all he wanted to do was get them to find Roderick. Roderick was the one to blame. Roderick was the crazy one. They had to understand that.

But they didn’t understand that, and it was George whom they locked up. George Pendleton Foster, not George Roderick the naughty boy.

Still, George was smarter than they were, in the end. Because he found Roderick again. Even though he was locked up, he found Roderick. Or rather, Roderick found him, and came to visit.

He comes quite often, these days, moving in that quiet way of his and sneaking in when nobody’s around to see him. And he talks to George in that soft, almost inaudible voice of his when George sits in front of the mirror. George isn’t mad at him any more. He realizes now that Roderick is his best friend, and wants to help him.

Roderick still dreams about getting his hands on all that money and going away with George to the Caribbean. And he has a plan. This time there won’t be any slip-ups. He’ll get George out of here, even if he has to kill a guard to do it. And he’ll kill Ella, too, before he goes.

And then they’ll travel on down to the islands, just the two of them. And there’ll be girls, and whips gleaming in the moonlight. . . .

Oh, George trusts Roderick now. He’s his only friend. And he often wonders just where he’d be without him.

The Travelling Salesman

when the dogs howl and the seven geese keen mournfully, then comes—

BLACK ART is throwing a party, see?

His real name is Arthur Schloggenheimer, but we call him Black Art on account of him being a wizard. Sort of a gag. see, because he is really very serious and raises the dead and all that kind of stuff.

But every once in a while Black Art knocks oft from that old black magic and throws a big party. He is a good joe, even though screwy, and he has a lot of liquor so we always come to his brawls.

Well, this time we are silting around in the big French parlor he calls the Louis 0 Room. Black Art won't allow any mirrors or glassware in his pad, because if he sees his reflection then old John Q. Satan will foreclose his mortgage on him. There is Subconscious Sigmund, the headshrinker, and Floyd Scrilch and a lot of other big wheels, and we are all drinking Pernod out of paper cups and talking about Gilles de Retz and the Marquis de Sade and Howard Hughes and the other characters Black Art knows in the good old days.

I notice Black Art is nervous tonight, and when he gets nervous something always happens. I can always tell. To begin with, his beard usually stands up like there was a wind blowing tin it from across the stars, he says.

Well, tonight his beard is standing up so straight it damn near hits him in the nose. He gets up and walks over to the window, and I can see he is shaking all over. So I sneak across the room and see he is looking out at the moon.

Something flies across the moon. I can make out seven little specks.

“The seven geese!”

I hear him whisper it, and then there is an awful squawk as the birds fly past and the moon goes behind a big, black horned cloud.

“He is coming!” Black Art whispers. “I see the omens!”

Sure enough, a minute later there is a paradiddle on the front door. Everybody looks while Black Art goes and opens it.

A strange cat conies in.

Now there is nothing really wrong with this guy and the way he dresses. He is Lull and thin, and he has big sad eyes—but lots of finks look that way. He wears a set of black threads, plenty dusty, like a burlap bag with lapels. He carries a big bulging suitcase which is also dusty. There is something about the way he wheels in that makes you feel he is real dragged.

Everybody digs it. Here is somebody who travels a long, long way for a long, long time. A little cold wind runs around the room as Black Art doses the door. He looks at the dust on the guy’s shoes and at the dust in his eyes.

“I expected you,” he says. “I saw the signs.”

The stranger sighs like somebody letting air out of his tires.

“Then you know who I am?”

Black Art goes into his educated bit. “When the clogs howl and the seven geese keen mournfully from afar, I know. A man would be stupid indeed not to recognize you for what you are.”

“Yes.” The cat looks at all of us. “I am the Traveling Salesman.”

He sets the suitcase down with a thump anti dust flies all over the room. Floyd Scrilch comes up to him.

“What you mean, the Traveling Salesman?” he asks. “There’s lots of those characters around.”

The stranger smiles his tired smile. “Yes. But there’s only one Traveling Salesman known all over the world—the Traveling Salesman of the dirty jokes. And that’s who I am.”

He sits clown on the sofa very carefully, like part of him is made of expensive glass which he is afraid of breaking. Black Art hands him a drink and we all stand around.

“Thanks,” he says. “It’s cool to take five like this. Haven’t been in the city for years, you know. Just one damned rural route after another. I go from farm to farm, year in and year out. What an awful life I lead!”

“Yeah?” I say. “What about all those farmers’ daughters?”

“Nyaaaa!” yells the Traveling Salesman, real loud. He jumps up like he is being gnawed by mice. “That’s all they ask me. What about all those farmers’ daughters? I’ll tell you what!

“I’m sick of farmers’ daughters! I’m sick of lanners. I’m sick of their wives, their rickety farmhouses, their squeaky beds, their outdoor plumbing!”

I shrug. “Then why travel?” I ask him.

“Why?” snarls the Salesman. “Because I’m cursed, that’s why. Like the Flying Dutchman and the Wandering Jew.”

“Cursed?”

“By men. Men like you. Men who tell stories about the Traveling Salesman. You created me—you and your mass thought through the ages. After millions of men, their minds inflamed through telling bawdy tales, had thought about me in groups for hundreds of years—I just materialized. All those mass thoughts created a physical being. Me—the Traveling Salesman! And so I am cursed to wander.

“To wander, every night visiting a new farmhouse. Never a change of routine. A greasy supper. A fight over where to sleep. Then to bed. And there’s always some damn daughter . . .

“Those daughters! Dumb ones, fat ones, ugly ones—but they all have insomnia. Or cold feet. Or they snore.”

The Traveling Salesman begins to groan. We get closer.

"It's my fate to live through the details of every one of those thousands of stories men have invented around my legend. I must engage in a hundred foolish acts, a million excesses. In barns, in haylofts, in horse-stalls, even in cow-pastures. I have been accused, abused, subjected to every indignity by the demands of those lousy jokes. Nyaaaa!"

Everybody looks sympathetic and drinks while he shudders.

"We understand, dad." says Black Art, patting his shoulder. "Why not stay here and rest up for a few days? I'll lend you a pad."

The Salesman gets to his feet. "Thanks," he mumbles, trying to smile. "Mighty nice of you to ask me, but I really can't do it." He sighs. "Some party in Omaha just figured out a new story for me. Something involving a double bed, three daughters and a horse, yet. I have an appointment tomorrow to try it out. So I must grab a train."

He reaches down for his suitcase. Black Art lifts it for him.

"Hey!" he comments. "This is a real heavy drag! What's in this grip?"

The Traveling Salesman blushes. Then he looks sick.

"Bricks," he whispers.

"Bricks?"

The Salesman opens the door and turns around.

"Yes," he snarls. "Bricks! That's the real tragedy of it all. Here I am, one of the best salesmen on the road, and it means nothing. Nothing at all. I might as well carry bricks as anything else.

"Because," he says, and then he begins to scream, "Because in all the gawd-awful stories about the Traveling Salesman, nobody ever mentions that I sell anything!"

Weeping foolishly, the Traveling Salesman closes the door behind him and falls down the stairs.

Man With A Hobby

It must have been around ten o'clock when I got out of the hotel. The night was warm and I needed a drink.

There was no sense trying the hotel cocktail lounge because the place was a madhouse. The Bowling Convention had taken that over, too.

Walking down Euclid Avenue I got the impression that Cleveland was full of bowlers. And most of them seemed to be looking for a drink. Every tavern I passed was jammed with shirt-sleeved men, wearing their badges. Not that they needed extra identification; many of them carried the standard bowling-bag holding a ball.

When Washington Irving wrote about Rip Van Winkle and the dwarfs, he understood bowlers all right. Well, there were no dwarfs in this convention—just man-sized drinkers. And any sound of thunder from the distant mountain peaks would have been drowned out by the shouting and the laughter.

I wanted no part of it. So I turned off Euclid and kept wandering along, looking for a quiet spot. My own bowling-bag was getting heavy. Actually, I'd meant to take it right over to the depot and check it in a locker until train-time, but I needed that drink first.

Finally I found a place. It was dim, it was dingy, but it was also deserted. The bartender was all alone down at the far end of the bar, listening to the tail-end of a double-header on the radio.

I sat down close to the door and put the bag on the stool next to me. I signalled him for a beer. "Bring me a bottle," I said. "Then I won't have to interrupt you."

I was only trying to be polite but I could have spared myself the trouble. Before he had a chance to get back to follow the game, another customer came in.

“Double Scotch, never mind the wash.”

I looked up.

The bowlers had taken over the city, all right. This one was a heavily-built man of about forty, with wrinkles extending well up toward the top of his bald head. He wore a coat, but carried the inevitable bowling-bag; black, bulging, and very similar to mine. As I stared at him, he set it down very carefully on the adjoining bar-stool and reached for his drink.

He threw back his head and gulped. I could see the pasty white skin ripple along his neck. Then he held out the empty glass. “Do it again,” he told the bartender. “And turn down the radio, will you, Mac?” He pulled out a handful of bills.

For a moment the bartender’s expression hovered midway between a scowl and a smile. Then he caught sight of the bills fluttering down on the bar and the smile won out. He shrugged and turned away, fiddling with the volume-control, reducing the announcer’s voice to a distant drone. I knew what he was thinking: If it was beer I’d tell him to go take a jump, but this guy’s buying Scotch.

The second Scotch went down almost as fast as the volume of the radio.

“Fill her up,” said the heavy-set man.

The bartender came back, poured again, took his money, rang it up, then drifted away to the other end of the bar. He crouched over the radio, straining to catch the voice of the announcer.

I watched the third Scotch disappear. The stranger’s neck was red now. Six ounces of Scotch in two minutes will do wonders for the complexion. It will loosen the tongue, too.

“Ball game,” the stranger muttered. “I can’t understand how anyone can listen to that stuff.” He wiped his forehead and blinked at me. “Sometimes a guy gets the idea there’s nothing in the world but baseball fans. Bunch of crazy fools yelling their heads off over nothing, all summer long. Then come fall and it’s the football games. Same thing, only worse. And right after that’s finished, it’s basketball. Honest to God, what do they see in it?”

“Everybody needs some kind of hobby,” I said.

“Yeah. But what kind of a hobby do you call that? I mean, who can get excited over a gang of apes fighting to grab some kind of a ball?” He scowled. “Don’t kid me that they really care who wins or loses. Most guys go to a ball game for a different reason. You ever been out to see a game, Mac?”

“Once in a while.”

“Then you know what I’m talking about. You’ve heard ‘em out there. Heard ‘em yelling. That’s what they really go for—to holler their heads off. And what are they yelling most of the time? I’ll tell you. Kill the umpire! Yeah, that’s what they’re screaming: Kill the umpire!”

I finished the last of my beer quickly and started to slide off the stool. He reached out and rapped on the bar. “Here, have another, Mac,” he said. “On me.”

I shook my head. “Sorry, got to catch a train out of here at midnight,” I told him.

He glanced at the clock. “Plenty of time.” I opened my mouth to protest but the bartender was already opening a bottle and pouring a Scotch for the stranger. And he was talking to me again.

“Football is worse,” he said. “A guy can get hurt playing football, some of ‘em get hurt bad. That’s what the crowd likes to see. And boy, when they start yelling for blood it’s enough to turn your stomach.”

“I don’t know,” I said. “After all, it’s a pretty harmless way of releasing pent-up aggression.”

Maybe he understood me and maybe he didn’t, but he nodded. “It releases something, like you say, but I ain’t so sure it’s harmless. Take boxing and wrestling, now. Call that a sport? Call that a hobby?”

“Well,” I agreed, “people want to see somebody get clobbered.”

“Sure, only they won’t admit it.” His face was quite red now; he was starting to sweat. “And what about hunting and fishing? When you come right down to it, it's the same thing. Only there you do the killing yourself. You take a gun and shoot some dumb animal. Or you cut up a live worm and stick it on a hook and that hook cuts into a fish's mouth, and you sort of get a thrill out of it, don't you? When the hook goes in and it cuts and tears—"

"Now wait a minute," I said. "Maybe that's good. What's a fish? If it keeps people from being sadists—"

"Never mind the two-dollar words," he cut in. He blinked at me. "You know it's true. Everybody gets the urge, sooner or later. Stuff like ball games and boxing don't really satisfy it, either. So we gotta have a war, every so often. Then there's an excuse to do real killing. Millions."

Nietzsche thought he was a gloomy philosopher. He should have known about double-Scotches. "What's your solution?" I tried hard to keep the sarcasm out of my voice. "Do you think there'd be less harm done if they repealed the laws against murder?"

"Maybe." The bald-headed man studied his empty glass. "Depends on who got killed. Suppose you just knocked off tramps and bums. Or a floozie, maybe. You know, somebody without a family or relatives or anything. Somebody who wouldn't be missed. You could get away with it easier, too."

I leaned forward, staring at him.

"Could you?" I asked.

He didn't look at me. He gazed down at his bowling-bag for a moment before replying.

"Don't get me wrong, Mac," he said, forcing a grin. "I ain't no murderer. But I was just thinking about a guy who used to do it. Right here in town, too. This was maybe twenty years ago."

"You knew him?"

"No, of course not. Nobody knew him, that's the whole point. That's how he always got away with it. But everybody knew about him. All you had to do was read the papers." He drained his drink.

“They call him the Cleveland Torso Slayer. He did thirteen murders in four years, out in Kingsbury and around Jackall Hill. Cops went nuts trying to find the guy. Figured he came into town on week ends, maybe. He’d pick up some bum, lure the hobo down into a gully or the dumps near the tracks. Promise to give him a bottle, or something. Did the same thing with women. Then he used his knife.”

“You mean he wasn’t playing games, trying to fool himself. He went for the real thing.”

The man nodded. “That’s right. Real thrills and a real trophy at the end. You see, he liked to cut ‘em up. He liked to cut off their—”

I stood up and reached for my bag. The stranger laughed.

“Don’t be scared, Mac,” he said. “This guy must of blown town way back in 1938 or so. Maybe when the war came along in Europe he joined up over there. Went into some commando outfit and kept on doing the same thing—only then he was a hero instead of a murderer. See what I mean?”

“Easy now,” I said. “I see what you mean. Don’t go getting yourself excited. It’s your theory, not mine.”

He lowered his voice. “Theory? Maybe so, Mac. But I run into something tonight that’ll really rock you. What you suppose I been tossing down all these drinks for?”

“All bowlers drink,” I told him. “But if you actually feel the way you do about sports, how come you’re a bowler?”

The bald-headed man leaned close to me. “A man’s got to have some kind of hobby, Mac, or he’d blow his stack. Right?”

I opened my mouth to agree, but before I could answer him there was another noise. We both heard it at the same time—the sound of a siren down the street.

The bartender looked up. “Heading this way, sounds like, doesn’t it?”

The bald-headed man was on his feet and moving towards the door.

I hurried after him. “Here, don’t forget your bag.”

He didn’t look at me. “Thanks,” he muttered. “Thanks, Mac.”

And then he was gone. He didn't stay on the street, but slipped through an areaway between two adjoining buildings. In a moment he had disappeared. I stood in the doorway as the siren's wail choked the street. A squad car pulled up in front of the tavern, its motor racing. A uniformed sergeant had been running along the sidewalk, accompanying it, and he came puffing up. He glanced at the sidewalk, glanced at the tavern, glanced at me.

"See anything of a big, bald-headed guy carrying a bowling bag?" he panted.

I had to tell the truth. "Why, yes. Somebody went out of here only a minute ago—"

"Which way?"

I gestured between the buildings and he shouted orders at the men in the squad car. It rolled off; the sergeant stayed behind.

"Tell me about it," he said, pushing me back into the tavern.

"All right, but what's this all about?"

"Murder. Over at the Bowling Convention, in the hotel. About an hour ago. The bellboy saw him coming out of her room, figured maybe he was a grab artist because he used the stairs instead of the elevator."

"Grab artist?"

"Prowler—you know. They hang around conventions, sneak into rooms and pick up stuff. Anyway, this prowler leaves this room too fast. Bellboy got a good look at the guy and notified the house dick. The house dick found this dame right on the bed. She'd been carved, but good. But the guy had too much of a start."

I took a deep breath. "The man who was just in here," I said. "A big bald-headed guy. He kept talking about the Cleveland Torso Slayings. But I thought he was just drunk, or rib—"

"The bellboy's description checks with the one a newsie gave us just down the street from here. He saw him coming this way. Like you say, a big bald-headed guy."

He stared down at the bowling bag. "He took his with him, didn't he?"

I nodded.

He sighed. “That’s what helped us trace him to this tavern. His bowling bag.”

“Somebody saw it, described it?”

“No, they didn’t have to describe it. It left a trail. Notice how I was running along the sidewalk out there? I was following the trail. And here—take a look at the floor under the stool.”

I looked.

“You see, he wasn’t carrying a bowling ball in that bag. Bowling balls don’t leak.”

I sat down on the stool and the room started to spin. I hadn’t noticed the blood before.

Then I raised my head. A patrolman came into the tavern. He’d been running, judging from the way he wheezed, but his face wasn’t red. It was greenish-white.

“Get him?” snapped the sergeant.

“What’s left of him.” The patrolman looked away. “He wouldn’t stop. We fired a shot over his head, maybe you heard it. He hopped the fence in back of the block here and ran onto the tracks. And smack into this freight train.”

“Dead?”

The patrolman nodded. “Lieutenant’s down there right now. And the meat-wagon. They’re gonna have to scrape him off the tracks.”

The sergeant swore softly under his breath. “Then we can’t know for sure,” he said. “Maybe he was just a sneak-thief after all.”

“One way,” the patrolman said. “Hanson’s coming up with his bag. It rolled clear of the freight when it hit.”

The other patrolman walked in, carrying the bowling bag. The sergeant took it out of Hanson’s hands and set it up on the bar.

“Was this what he was carrying?” he asked me.

“Yes,” I said. My voice stuck in my throat.

I turned away. I didn't want to watch the sergeant open the bag. I didn't even want to see their faces when they looked inside. But of course, I heard them. I think Hanson got sick.

I gave the sergeant an official statement, which he requested. He wanted a name and address and he got them too. Hanson took it all down and made me sign it.

I told him all about the conversation with the stranger, the whole theory of murder as a hobby, the idea of choosing the dregs of life as victims because they weren't likely to be missed.

"Sounds screwy when you talk about it, doesn't it?" I concluded. "All the while, I thought it was a gag."

The sergeant glanced at the bowling bag, then looked at me. "It's no gag," he said. "That's probably just how the killer's mind worked. I know all about him—everybody on the force has studied those Torso Slaying cases inside and out for years. The story makes sense. The murderer left town twenty years ago, when things got too hot. Probably he did join up over in Europe, and maybe he stayed on in the Occupation countries when the war ended. Then he got the urge to come back and start all over again."

"Why?" I asked.

"Who knows? Maybe it was a hobby with him. A sort of a game he played. Maybe he liked to win trophies. But imagine what nerve he had, walking into a Bowling Convention and pulling off a stunt like that? Carrying a bowling bag so he could take the—"

I guess he saw the look on my face because he put his hand on my shoulder. "Sorry," he said. "I know how you feel. Had a pretty close shave yourself, just talking to him. Probably the cleverest psychopathic murderer who ever lived. Consider yourself lucky."

I nodded and headed for the door. I could still make that midnight train, now. And I agreed with the sergeant about the close shave, the cleverest psychopathic murderer in the world.

I agreed that I was lucky, too. I mean there at the last moment, when that stupid sneak-thief ran out of the tavern and I gave him the bowling bag that leaked. Lucky for me he never noticed I’d switched bags with him.

The Proper Spirit

If you enjoy a gentle, quietly humorous story that carries, scorpion-like, a sting in its tail—if, like me, you're especially pleased when such a story seems even better upon rereading, with foreknowledge of the sting—then I think you'll be delighted by this account of Mr. Cavendish's occult revenge upon his pestilential covey of ravening relatives.

MR. RONALD CAVENDISH WHEELED the laden tea-cart into the dining room. Depositing the entree and side-dishes on the table, he turned and surveyed himself in the sideboard mirror.

What he saw did not displease him. He was, he reflected—and so did the mirror—a gentleman of the old school. A cynic would have dismissed him as type-casting for a stage butler, but Mr. Cavendish took little heed of cynics.

The fashionable address of his old brownstone house, the solidity of the mahogany and sterling effects among its contents, the tangibility of his banked assets were all sufficient answers to cynics. Yes, and that included relatives.

Mr. Cavendish made a face at the mirror. It was not a nice face, and he wished his relatives could see it. Well, they'd be seeing it soon enough, over the dinner-table.

Here it was, six o'clock, and everything was arranged. Everything was ready for them.

Ready. Mr. Cavendish crossed hastily to the parlor. He'd almost forgotten something. The big Sarouk had been rolled back, and now he knelt on the bare floor and rubbed out the blue chalk-marks with his handkerchief. It would never do to let them see the pentagram. And while he was at it, he might just as well light some incense and get that faint odor out of the room. Someone could just possibly recognize it.

"There." Mr. Cavendish stood up, flexing his knee joints. After all, he was pushing sixty—or was sixty pushing him, eh? Might be a good idea to check on the affair of that fellow, what's-his-name, Doctor Faust. Perhaps there was a similar deal available to him without, of course, the element of risk.

Maybe tonight, after the family dinner, he could hold a little session and inquire of—

Ping!

Mr. Cavendish shot his cuffs and marched to answer the doorbell. He had just time to assume his "dear old Uncle Ronald" expression, and then they burst past him into the parlor.

Fat, simpering Clara, wizened little Edwin, sideburned Harry, and hennaed Dell. Last one in is a dirty dog—that would be Jasper, of course. He wheezed and he waddled and he joined the inane Medley of "Hello, Uncle Ronald," and "My, you're looking fit," and "Just like old times, the family all together under one roof again." Seats. Cigarettes. Tiny glasses of brandy. Ronald Cavendish saw to all the amenities, and even managed a smile when Edward lifted his glass and murmured, "To your good health."

Then, "Shall we go in to dinner?" he proposed. "I have everything waiting."

At the mention of dinner, Jasper was already on his feet. A greedy type. But then they were all greedy, Mr. Cavendish reflected, wistfully.

Take Clara. "My, what a lovely silver service." That was Clara. Her gimlet eyes peering from folds of fat needed only a jeweler's loupe to complete the picture as she took inventory down to the last penny.

Edwin, her husband, sniffed the brandy. “Napoleon or Armagnac, Uncle Ronald?” he asked. As if Mr. Cavendish would serve Napoleon to them, and before dinner, too! Edwin didn’t know, but he lusted to learn. It wasn’t money he wanted, but luxury.

Then there was Harry. “Squab under glass, by golly! You must have been playing the winners, eh, Unc?” Thus Harry, at sight of the breast of guinea hen. Harry with his racing form and his—ugh!—“Unc.” Harry was greedy for luck.

And Dell. Mr. Cavendish contemplated her kohled, cold eyes and the figure alternately swelled and svelte. He knew what she was greedy for. Right now she probably found it easily available during those afternoons when Harry was out at the track; in ten years she’d need money for gigolos, or whatever they called them nowadays.

Nowadays. That’s what Jasper was talking about. Mr. Cavendish forced himself to pay attention.

“Nowadays you seldom sit down to a meal like this.” Chomp-chomp. “Don’t know how you do it, Ronald, with Grace gone these seven years.” Chomp-chomp. “Rattling around in a big old barn like this, without servants or anyone to look after you. Wish you’d”—chomp-chomp—“move down to the Club with me.”

Yes, that was Jasper. Move down to the Club and let him take over. Lock, stock and barrel. He’d handle the sale of the house and the investments like a big, benevolent brother-in-law. Mr. Cavendish, who always prided himself on giving the devil his due, had to admire Jasper’s utter impartiality—he was greedy about everything.

So thinking, he addressed himself to a glass of warm milk and partook of French toast from a small casserole set beside his plate.

“Whassamatter, Unc, this chow too rich for you?” This from Harry, along with a gratuitous dirty look from wife Dell which he ignored.

“Touch of ulcers,” Mr. Cavendish said. “Doctor’s orders.”

“Doctor?” Clara brightened. “Have you been seeing Doctor Barton again? What did he say? Nothing serious, I hope. You know, lots of times they say it's ulcers, but it turns out to be stomach can—"

"Errumph!" Edwin knew how to turn her off, and he thought he was doing it just in time. "I'm sure Uncle Ronald takes good care of himself, dear. Seven years a widower, and you'd never know it from this table."

"Thank you," said Mr. Cavendish. "Might I help you to another guinea hen? There's plenty here for all."

"I'm ready," Jasper said. "And some of that sauce. Never tasted better. For an old bachelor, you do yourself proud. Of course, the chef at the Club —"

"How come you never remarried?" Dell asked. "The women would be after a man like you in droves. I mean, you're still sort of well-preserved like, and with all that moola—"

It was Harry's turn to issue an unlaundered glance. But Mr. Cavendish was not offended.

"You know the reason," he said. "I still have Grace with me whenever I want her."

Well, here it was. Mr. Cavendish braced himself for the onslaught.

Jasper was the first to walk over the barricade, armored in false geniality. "Really, Ronald," he said. "We're a bit disturbed, all of us. This morbid fancy of yours—that Grace is always with you—it's not sound."

"Neither are your assumptions," Mr. Cavendish answered, helping Jasper to his third portion, with more of the savory sauce. "My belief is neither morbid nor a fancy. Ever since the dawn of history, enlightened men have known it's possible for the departed to return when properly summoned. If you'd investigate the annals of psychic research, you'd understand that communication with the spirits is quite commonplace."

Clara offered a fat-lipped pout. "You see?" she addressed the others. "It's just like I said, not Uncle Ronald's fault at all. He's merely repeating what that crazy medium told him—the one he went to after Grace died. She's the one who filled him with all this nonsense."

Edwin was errumphing violently.

Mr. Cavendish smiled and served coffee. "It's true I went to a medium after Grace's passing. You all know that, and I shall not distress you by alluding to the hullabaloo you stirred up when you heard of it. But you needn't have worried. After a few visits I made a most gratifying discovery. I learned that a medium was unnecessary—I myself, am a psychic sensitive. Since then I have conducted my own investigations. I dare say I've managed to go further than most practicing mediums today."

"Ghosts!" Dell shuddered. "I hate to talk about 'em. Not that I believe in that stuff, understand."

"If you did, you'd not be subject to either fear or hatred," Mr. Cavendish assured her. "Actually, except for certain limitations, they're just like one of us. Take Grace, for example. The last time I saw her she seemed as real as you are."

"Be reasonable, Ronald," said Jasper. "You don't mean to tell us you spend all your time talking to the imaginary spirit of your dead wife?"

Ronald Cavendish finished the last of his French toast, took a sip of milk, and then lit the candles on the table.

Tapers put forth blossoms to flower against the shadows.

"I've told you no such thing," he declared. "True, at first I spent a good deal of time with Grace here. But—I blush to admit it—I tired of that. Of her, rather. Why, I asked myself, should I confine my companionship to Grace when there are so many other fascinating personalities available? After all, our marriage ended with her passing; where she is now, there's neither marriage nor giving in marriage. So for your information, I haven't summoned Grace for over four years."

"You mean you've given up all this malarkey?" Harry asked.

"Quite the contrary. It's just that there's such an infinite number of other contacts available to me." Mr. Cavendish smiled in the shadows. "I wish I could make you understand. Why, it's like having the combined libraries of all the world right here at your fingertips. It's like owning the greatest museum, the largest record collection. You've seen my pianoforte in the parlor, for example. Oftentimes during dinner I regale myself with the music of Handel and Haydn—played by the composers themselves.”

“Nuttier’n a fruitcake!” Dell murmured, but Mr. Cavendish affected not to hear her.

“Think of being able to summon the greatest shades in history,” he continued. “To be able to converse with Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, Napoleon, while listening to Chopin at the piano.”

“You mean them dead long-hairs come here and knock out tunes?” Harry was fascinated in spite of himself. “Say, about those spirits, now. Is it true they can see the future? I mean, like say if there’s gonna be a horse in the sixth at Belmont tomorra, you think maybe somebody like Michael Angelo or whatever could give you a tip?”

Mr. Cavendish smiled. “Perhaps,” he said. “Although I’ve never cared for racing.”

“Enough of this!” Even in the shadows, Jasper’s face loomed in mottled purple. “I’m getting dizzy myself, and no wonder. Ronald, you’re talking like a madman. And in such a case, we have no choice but to treat you as one.”

“Calling up the ghost of Napoleon!” Clara scoffed. “I’ll say he’s crazy, all right. Grace’s ghost isn’t good enough for him any more, he says. Suppose he wants us to believe he spends his evenings with Cleopatra.”

“A very much overrated female, I assure you,” said Mr. Cavendish, softly. “Of course, I may be doing the lady an injustice, owing to the language barrier. Although my opinion is not based upon our lingual activities alone.”

“You been playing around with the famous babes of history?” Dell grew suddenly animated. “That sounds kinda interesting, you know? I mean, I always wondered about some of them. Take this here: Madame Pompadour, and Anne Boleyn.”

Mr. Cavendish shuddered slightly. “I’d rather not talk about her he said. “When I summoned that particular young woman, I’d forgotten she had been decapitated. She appeared with her head tucked underneath her arm.”

Jasper punctuated his remarks with a resounding belch, then turned to Ronald Cavendish with the humoring smile generally reserved for those in their first or second childhood.

"Ronald, you've got to listen to us now. After all, we're your family. We've tried to be patient. Very patient." And he registered his interpretation of patience; his head cocked for all the world like a fat vulture perched on a limb above its victim.

"We've tolerated your eccentricities," Jasper continued. "But outsiders won't take so charitable a view. What will other people say when they hear such things?"

"Nothing," replied Mr. Cavendish. "Unless you tell them."

"I'm afraid the time has come when someone has to be told," Jasper answered. "After all, you're—burp!—responsible for a sizable fortune. If the banks and your brokers ever got wind of your ideas, they'd go wild."

Jasper had never been a brilliant speaker, Mr. Cavendish reflected, but this time he was apparently surpassing his most boring previous efforts. It appeared as though he had already put Edwin and Clara to dozing, and Harry slouched in his chair in a listless fashion. But for some reason, Mr. Cavendish himself was fascinated by what he heard.

"What are you driving at?" he demanded, suddenly.

"Well, it's not me, understand—it's all of us. We got together beforehand and talked things over. We agreed the best solution would be for you to step out of the active investment end. You aren't getting any younger, and perhaps the strain contributes to your—burp!—eccentricities. Time for you to sit back and take things easy. What I suggest is that you turn over your power-of-attorney to someone. Me, for instance. I can handle the estate for you without any trouble. You just sit back and enjoy yourself. This is serious, Ronald. I'm making you a fair offer. Surrender your power-of-attorney and go on living as you like. Call up all the spooks you want; we won't mind."

Jasper belched again, portentously. "If not, we'd have no choice. We'd be forced to call in an alienist. You know what that means. Why, on the basis of what we've heard here tonight alone, you'd be certified in jig time. Right, folks?"

He glanced down the table and noted that a slumber party was in progress. "Too hot in here," he complained. "Can't you open a window or something?"

"Presently," Mr. Cavendish said.

Jasper fumbled at his vest. "Sauce too rich for my blood," he murmured. "Got to watch that—doctor told me . . ." He slumped forward in a doze. Before drifting off he managed a weak wheeze. "What's the answer?"

Mr. Cavendish stood up. He leaned forward and spoke quite loudly, as if to waken his guests and make sure they heard every word.

"My answer," he said, "is no. No power-of-attorney, no alienist, no asylum. Do you hear that, my dear family? This is a farewell dinner. For tonight, having liquidated all my assets, I am flying to Tibet, to pursue my studies in the occult sciences.

"Yes," he continued, "this is a farewell. A long farewell. But I perceive you have already departed."

Indeed, they had. Slumped and seated in the shadows, there was no longer a semblance of sleep. Sightlessly staring at the skeletal remnants of the guinea hens, the family was quite dead.

Mr. Cavendish surveyed them, shuddered slightly, and prayed that no medium would ever be unfortunate enough to evoke them.

Then he moved around the table, glanced at his watch, and noted that he had less than an hour to reach the airport. He opened the sideboard door and extracted a bulging valise.

There. He was ready now. He stepped back to the table and bent over the tapers. "Out, brief candles," he said.

Mr. Cavendish was in the dark, but he was not afraid. Some of his best friends were in the dark. He'd met some very nice people under those circumstances. Madame Pompadour, Dell had said. Ha! He could have told her about Guinevere, and Montespan, and Helen of Troy. There was life in the old dog yet, and he had quite a way with the ladies.

Ladies. That reminded him of something. He couldn't leave without showing the proper spirit.

Mr. Cavendish chuckled. "Proper spirit" indeed! Why, he owed the entire success of tonight's party to the proper spirit.

It was time to express his gratitude for the guinea hen, with its most unusual savory sauce. Perhaps the kitchen was still occupied—at any rate, he'd make the gesture. Pure genius, his summoning a culinary expert for the family's last meal.

Mr. Cavendish tiptoed quietly to the kitchen door, opened it just a trifle, and whispered into the darkness.

"Thank you, Lucrezia," said Mr. Cavendish.

Welcome, Stranger

It was only a routine mission for Rel—but Earth's future hung upon his findings. So it was lucky for us he found only

REL LEFT THE mother-ship, shortly after the sun rose. It hovered only a dozen miles or so above the surface of the planet, scarcely beyond the range of visibility from below. There it would remain, until he returned at dusk.

Now he floated down in the little carrier, a bit giddy at first, as all four of his lungs gasped for oxygen in the thin atmosphere. When he neared the green surface below, he breathed more easily.

It was going to be all right, he told himself. There was nothing to fear. This was only a routine assignment after all, and not a very important one. If it had been important, Rel wouldn't have been chosen to carry it out. But this job was quite simple.

The planet he was approaching had been under careful observation for years. Others, much more skilful and intelligent than Rel, had landed here in the past. They had come away with data—data in the form of writings and recordings. The material was crude, as was to be expected from a primitive culture, but sufficient.

From it, Rel's people had learned all they needed to know. Apparently, there was no uniformity of culture here, and, for a time, Rel and his superiors were uncertain as to which group was dominant, which language to learn, which pattern of behavior to assimilate.

Repeated study and frequent visits finally gave them the necessary answer. Scout carriers, skimming above the land-surfaces again and again, corroborated their findings.

The most advanced group of mammals calling themselves men inhabited a large land-mass, bordered on two sides by great bodies of water. Known as the United States of America, its heartland was the Midwest. Here were cities, heavily-populated areas.

It was to one of these cities that Rel must go. A simple assignment, really—his Krala had outlined the situation quite logically.

"You have had the necessary training," the Krala told him. "You have learned the language—English. You have read the writings, listened to the recordings. Your briefing has been thorough, and you needn't anticipate any difficulty in passing as a man during a brief stay.

"As for outward appearance, that is no problem. Your skin can be bleached. A hair-covering has been prepared for your skull. We have acquired typical garments for you to wear, including clothing for the feet, called shoes, which will hide the webs. You will look like a man, talk like a man, act like a man. The rest is merely a matter of observation."

The Krala was right, of course. When Rel saw how he looked in disguise, he marveled.

"It's not so surprising, really," the Krala commented. "After all, there are many similarities between us and the inhabitants of this planet—just as the planet itself closely resembles our own. Atmospherically, organically, the resemblance is remarkable. The gravitational aspect is almost identical. That is why we are interested, of course. It's only a tiny place, and hardly important, but, perhaps, we might find use for it as a colony."

"I am to spend a day in observation," Rel said. "Is there any specific data I must acquire? Should I assess the physical and psychic potential, seek to discover what weapons these mammals possess?"

The Krala went orange in mirth. "Hardly! This is not an espionage assignment—we are already fully aware of the technology. It is crude—these mammals still deal with energy in terms of explosion and implosion.

Intelligence-wise they are retarded. No, taking over the planet by force does not constitute a problem at all. Your task is merely to render an opinion as to whether it's worth the effort."

"But you say you have learned conditions are ideal. Gravitation, temperature, oxygen-content are satisfactory. Natural resources are abundant. There is food, water, everything our people use to sustain life. Isn't that worthwhile enough?"

The Krala pinkened questioningly. "I speak now in kinetic terms. You know our policy in regard to colonization. A conquest by force entails far too great an expenditure of time and effort. The energy necessary to subdue aliens and rule over them is generally a waste.

Therefore, we have always approached a new planet with a view towards infiltration. If we find that the living-habits are congenial, we gradually dispatch our people. They melt into the existing population slowly, and in a generation or so, their numerical domination is complete. Only then do we reveal ourselves.

"Usually, by that time, our people have attained key positions of control, so that it is possible to conquer from within. Less effort is entailed. The less effort expended, the greater the life-force preserved. That's fundamental."

Rel listened, yellowing with comprehension beneath his bleach. "Then I am merely to observe if the present living-habits of these mammals would be congenial to our people?"

"Exactly—you are to spend a typical day as a typical human, or American—whatever the term is. Mingle with others. Take care that you're not detected, of course, but mingle. Eat and drink. Check your reactions carefully. Determine, if you can, what life would be like here for our people, during the time they'd spend in disguise. You will be the one to decide."

Rel felt himself glowing redly, but the Krala's final words dimmed him immediately.

"It's nothing to get scarlet about," the Krala said snappishly. "As I told you, the decision really isn't of any great importance. There are thousands of such worlds. If it were a vital matter, we wouldn't select you for the task. We'd send down many trained observers, instead of mere fledglings.

"But we haven't the time or energy to waste. So we selected you—just an average specimen—because your reactions will approximate those of the average specimens who might conceivably infiltrate here. We're willing to abide by your opinion. Now go to your Bezzter for final briefing."

Rel had gone to his Bezzter, and the details were arranged. The day chosen was one during which the mammals did no labor, but congregated in park areas for recreation. Therefore Rel could wander about freely, without having to leave the park, and still be assured of ample opportunity to mingle with mammals at a minimum risk to himself.

"But the carrier," Rel protested. "It will be observed, just as others have been in the past. Some of our data mentions such sightings—flying saucers, isn't that the term?"

He was reassured on that score immediately. The carrier would be undetected at dawn of a recreation-day, or Sunday, as it was called. Nobody came to park areas that early. From previous scouting-trips, a place had been discovered, where he could conceal the carrier during the time he spent in the park.

So it came to pass that, shortly before 8 a.m., on the morning of Sunday, June 3rd, Rel landed his carrier in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, at Washington Park Zoo.

He had noted the location of the caves very carefully as he descended, and steered the carrier until he hovered above the walled-off row. Selecting a center section, he dropped quietly and landed the vessel on an open stone surface, midway between a cave and the metal bars beyond.

The park was deserted. No men-figures were visible in any direction. Rel congratulated himself as he quickly dragged the light carrier toward the mouth of the cave. It was quiet and peaceful here. He bad to restrain himself from oranging under his bleach, as he thought of the welcome he would get if his coming were anticipated by men. Instead of slipping down unnoticed, there would be a reception committee, and . . .

The reception committee was awaiting him at the mouth of the cave. It was big and white, and it had four legs, armed with sharp claws, and a red throat, bordered by yellow fangs. It rose on its hind legs and roared, and Rel blackened with fear.

Instinctively, he crouched behind the carrier, shoving it forward and keeping it between himself and the white creature. The thing began to claw at the carrier—Rel wasn't alarmed, because the vessel was indestructible. He shoved the carrier into the cave, the creature retreating behind it. But the carrier didn't prove to be a sufficient obstacle, once it had passed the mouth. The white monster could burrow around the side and emerge. Roaring again, it did so.

Rel turned and fled. The great roaring beast lumbered after him. He ran toward the metal bars, hoping to vault them and escape to the park area beyond. The creature was right behind him, and he knew its paws were lifted to rake and rend. He leaped for the bars—and the ground fell out from under him.

Rel hadn't noticed the moat. He landed with a thud. The white horror growled down at him from the edge, but made no effort to follow. Slowly and painfully Rel got to his feet. He began to climb up the bars.

Now roars resounded from the caves on either side. The open spaces before them were suddenly filled with more monsters—black ones, grey ones and immense brown ones that walked on two legs and howled fearsomely. Rel inched his way up to the top of the bars—and the metal spikes dug into his chest.

He almost fell then, but managed to hook his legs over the projections. The bottom part of his garments tore on the sharp points. He jumped to the grass on the far side and lay there, panting, for a moment.

Then he rose and staggered away, until the roaring was faint in the distance behind him.

He walked through the park, his four lungs slowing to a point where they resumed their normal function. He came to a narrow black strip, running between two sections of grass, and began to cross it.

There was a deafening sound, and an enormous, clumsy, mechanical vehicle, moving on wheels, rushed past him. Its gleaming snout missed striking his waist by a matter of inches. “Hey, whyinell doncha look where yer goin’ ?” a voice from within shouted.

Rel reached the safety of the grass beyond and ran away. He came to a large open area, where the grass was thin, and halted at its edge. There was no way of telling what function this space was intended for—best not to attempt crossing it. Besides, he had expended enough effort already. He decided to lie down and rest.

How long he rested he had no idea. The sun was already high when he opened his eyes once more, aroused by the sound of shrill shouts.

A large group of mammals now occupied the open area before him. They seemed smaller, somehow, than he’d expected. Then he realized why—they were the progeny, the immature offspring. More than a dozen of them milled around the field—some clustered at one end, where one of their number wielded a club, the rest taking up apparently arbitrary position at a greater distance.

In the center, a young mammal hurled a round weapon at the mammal holding the club. This mammal did not dodge, but attempted to strike down the weapon with his stick.

The rest of them yelled.

It was, Rel realized, some sort of a game.

From time to time, the creature with the club succeeded in hitting the round weapon, whereupon he ran furiously from man to man in the field. Then all of the mammals yelled.

Rel ventured closer, observing. It was indeed a game of sorts—a primitive, meaningless game, but a harmless one. And it required a certain degree of coordination and dexterity to hurl the round weapon, strike it, run. Others in the field caught the weapon and tossed it back and forth.

“Mister—get out of the way!”

One of the mammals was yelling, apparently at him. Rel smiled to acknowledge the greeting, looked up, blinked, and was hit in the head by the round weapon . . .

He must have been stumbling for hours in a daze. The park was full of people now, happy and carefree in the midst of nightmare. For nightmare it was—to Rel, at any rate.

The beings were everywhere. They raced along the narrow strips in their huge machines—automobiles, Rel now remembered. He had heard of them. But he hadn't learned about the smaller, even noisier and more dangerous, vehicles with two wheels, which darted between them, roaring like the beasts of the caves.

He hadn't learned about the other two-wheeled vehicles that made no noise. These traveled along the grass, propelled by young mammals and several times Rel was almost knocked down by them. He could, however, avoid the four-wheeled quiet vehicles, which were pushed by females.

These moved slowly. Each contained an object which was not quiet, however—an object that made an appalling outcry. Rel managed to catch a glimpse of the noisemakers and saw that they were the redfaced spawn of this race. Their racket was hideous, and often they had an acrid, unpleasant odor. Why the adult mammals gazed at them so proudly he didn't know.

Nor did he know why the mammals—male and female alike—gazed proudly or fondly at one another. Granted their appearance was not altogether hideous, the majority were far from handsome. As he had been warned, some of the males inhaled nauseating stenches from tiny tubes held in their mouths. This was called "smoking".

Many males, as well as many females, wore curious transparent shields before their eyes—again, as he had been informed, for their own pleasure. Apparently, these shields increased their faulty powers of vision.

Rel's highly developed aesthetic faculties were repelled by the men with the tubes and the females with the shields. When, behind the bushes at a corner of the park, he beheld a man put down his tube and embrace a female wearing a shield, he felt a wave of almost intolerable disgust. Apparently, incredibly, the two were mating!

Rel moved away. It was already afternoon. His legs ached, his webs were sore in the confining foot-garments. The heat was intolerable. And his stomachs were empty.

He looked for a vacant space. There, under the trees, were benches and tables. Large groups of mixed mammals congregated here, making loud noises. But there was a vacant seating-place.

Rel rested, watching the table at his left where several old mammals and a group of young ones were obviously feeding.

The oldest male looked up and noticed him. “Hey, mister!” he called. “You hungry, maybe?”

Rel recognized the word. It had to do with food. He was tempted. Besides, it was his duty to mingle, wasn’t it? He nodded.

“So come by us—we got plenty left over here. Mamma, give the mister a plate.”

Rel accepted the paper plate, and the elderly female heaped it with food.

“Go ahead, eat up,” urged the old male. “Sauerkraut and Polish sausage. Also gives bratwurst. You like bratwurst?”

Rel took the implements he was handed. Knife and fork—he knew about them had studied their use. The food was hot.

“What’s your name, Mister?” Rel blinked and gulped before replying. He had selected a name, or, rather, the Krala had selected one for him.

“John Smith,” he said.

“Schmidt, huh? I’m Rudy Krauss.” A huge hand gripped Rel’s—gripped and squeezed painfully. “From Third and Burleigh is where we live. You know, where the bus bends?”

Rudy Krauss beamed at him. “Here, how about a beer?” He laughed thunderously. “I’m a little schnozzled up, you know, all day I been at it, and we gotta drink it up. Come on, you help.” Rel was thirsty. He drank, coughed, drank again. Rudy Krauss refilled the glass. He went on talking, and, apparently, all Rel had to do was nod—nod and drink, nod and drink.

Everything blurred. It was getting dark now, but the blurriness was more than twilight. When he stood up, Rel found that he was wobbling.

He had to stand up because the kids wanted him to. The young mammals were called kids, he discovered. Butch and Jeanie insisted that he go with them to the playground, whatever that was, and push them on the swings.

"Sure, he'll make a push for you, ain't so?" Rudy Krauss boomed. "Here, before you go, drink up. The beer is almost all." So he drank again, and then they were leading him over to the metal tangle, and they sat in something suspended by metal chains, and he was pushing, and they were going away and coming back, and Butch bumped into his stomachs and he had to sit down. So now he was sitting in one of the things, and they pushed him, back and forth, higher and higher, and everything was blurry and going around and around.

He thought he was going to die before they stopped. It was quite dark now and people were leaving, and he ran away toward the caves. Climbing over the metal bars was torture, and, again, he forgot about the moat and fell into it. Again, the white monster growled and waited, but Rel dodged it somehow and reached the carrier, wheeling it out safely. Then, miraculously, he was back at the mother-ship and the Krala was greening at him.

"Look at you!" he said, lividly.

"Scratches, bruises, torn garments! What happened, were you in physical combat?"

"No," Rel answered, greyly. "I was enjoying myself—the way men do. We were wrong about them. They're monsters. They keep ferocious pets for their amusement, they allow their young to hurl weapons at one another, their social and sexual habits are intolerable. We could never learn the language properly—the specimen who spoke to me sounded entirely different from the recordings we have heard."

The Krala meditated. "Those difficulties can be overcome with proper training," he decided. "I'm interested in the fundamentals of survival. What would we find for food and drink?"

“Food and drink?” Rel wobbled and colored kaleidoscopically beneath his ravaged bleach. He spoke slowly and painfully. “Their beverage is called beer. It swells the head and the stomachs and distorts vision. Their nourishment is called pickles, and bratwurst, and Polish sausage, and salami, and potato salad, and knackwurst, and sauerkraut and—”

Suddenly Rel was transparent—then he was very, very sick.

The Krala nodded. “Very well,” he murmured. “You have brought me the answer. Obviously, we cannot adapt.”

MANY LIGHT-YEARS behind, on the planet Earth, by Third and Burleigh, Rudy Krauss rested in bed. It had been a nice picnic, he decided. And that stranger, that young feller, he was nice, too. He seemed to like Mamma’s cooking and the good beer.

So thinking, the saviour of the planet turned on his side, belched appreciatively and went to sleep.

How Bug-Eyed Was My Monster

Something very unusual happens to me the other night. It is around ten o'clock and I am standing in a tavern.

This in itself maybe isn't so unusual. But what makes it unusual is that this is the night when Fast Mickey saves the world.

Fast Mickey is the bartender at this juice-stand, and I don't suppose anybody figures at the time that he is going to be the cat who saves the world, but most of us regulars already know he is blue-blade sharp. Lots of uptowners come into the tavern just to talk to Fast Mickey—real hep characters like bigshot professors and skull doctors and even some used-car dealers.

He is most particular-wise the favorite of the headshrinkers. In fact, on this evening he is entertaining a whole gang of them, including Subconscious Sigmund.

Subconscious Sigmund always brings his troubles to Fast Mickey. "You bartenders are really the best psychiatrists," he says. "You listen to people's troubles every day of the year and hear more confessions than we do. You're the original father-image and medicineman rolled into one. Maybe you can help me out."

Fast Mickey smiles and nods. "Sure," he says. "You want I should probe your psyche or whatever? OK, just climb up here on the bar and stretch out. Just close your eyes and relax now, and tell me the first thing that comes into your mind—"

The reason I remember all this is because I am standing right next to them, trying to catch the ball game on the radio. And here it is, the ninth inning, all tied up, and the Bums are at bat, and—And then, it happens.

The studio announcer cuts in with a fast pitch of his own.

“Flash!” he hollers. “We interrupt this broadcast to bring you a bulletin from the Disassociated Press!”

Everybody listens carefully, because we know they won’t interrupt a ball game unless it’s really important.

“Maybe they got a cure for some disease,” I say.

“Could be that Russia is dropping the H-Bomb,” Subconscious Sigmund suggests.

“It must be more important than that to cut into the Bums game,” says Fast Mickey. “I figure it’s an announcement that Marilyn Monroe is gonna make The Brothers Karamazov.”

We were all wrong.

The studio announcer is really yelling. “The Unidentified Flying Object over the city is now identified as a genuine flying saucer. Landing in the corner of Central Park, it is presently discharging a passenger. Eye-witness reports agree that the creature emerging from the saucer is definitely an extraterrestial. It is about nine feet tall, covered with green fur, and has multiple tentacles. Please stand by for further bulletins now coming in.

One of the cats down the bar starts to cackle. “It’s a gag, that’s what it is—like this here Invasion From Mars bit they do years ago. There ain’t no such thing as a flying saucer.”

“Mass hallucination, apparently,” says Subsconscious Sigmund. “Who can believe that business about multiple tentacles? Covered with green fur, indeed!”

“I don’t know about the tentacles,” I tell him. “But if you want to check on that green fur bit, come around early some morning and look at my tongue.”

“stand by!” yells the announcer again. “Latest bulletin on the creature from the flying saucer. It is definitely outside the strange craft now, walking across the Park. According to what is coming over the wire to us here in the studio, it is being met by the Mayor’s Welcoming Committee and three squadcars armed with riot guns. Oops—what's that again? Our report says it is brushing off the Mayor's Welcoming Committee with one tentacle and brushing off the riot guns with another. Apparently bullets have no effect on this organism. It is overturning the squad cars and heading for the street. The crowds are running."

"I'll say they are!" squawks Fast Mickey, all of a sudden. "Turn off that radio and you can hear them. I just happen to remember—Central Park is only two blocks away from here!"

This is true. With the radio off we can hear noise from outside—cats are howling and scampering off to their pads.

"It's no fake, then," Subconscious Sigmund mutters. "A monster is in our midst. Somebody must stop him!"

"Don't look at me," I tell him. "I am allergic to monsters. In fact, I once lose a good job working for a politician because I refuse to attend his monster rally."

"This creature lands on earth for a definite purpose," Subconscious Sigmund says. "If after all these years of flying saucer reports, one actually comes down, it means there's an important reason. The creature must want something."

"Well, it isn't the keys to the city, apparently," says Fast Mickey. "And it isn't a night in the pokey, either."

"Of course not," Sigmund tells him. "They're handling him all wrong. This calls for a psychologist. Such as me. I'm going out and reason with him."

"Wait!" yells Fast Mickey.

But Subconscious Sigmund doesn't wait. He grabs up the little portable couch he carries around with him for curb-service and dashes out the door.

The rest of us sit and wait. Pretty soon there is more shrieking outside the door and then we hear some awful crashes. There is a pretty chick at the other end of the bar whose name is Estrellita Shapiro and who weighs about 120 pounds soaking wet.

This I find out all of a sudden, because after the first big crash she jumps into my lap and upsets a drink all over her.

"Save me!" she yells. "The monster is coming this way!"

Sure enough, the door opens, but it isn't the monster. It's Subconscious Sigmund, and he is beat down to the seat. His clothes are torn, his glasses are broken, and half of his goatee is missing.

"Hear that crash a minute ago?" he pants. "The creature just rips down a four-story office building. It goes scrabbling around inside with its big green tentacles. It's looking for something all right."

"You probe its mind?" asks Fast Mickey.

"Not me! I wouldn't probe its mind with a ten-foot pole!" yells Sigmund. "It takes one look at me when I get close and starts to grab. So I do the only sensible thing."

"Which is-?"

"I run like hell," Subconscious Sigmund says. He looks at us. "I suggest we turn out the lights and lock the door, but fast. If it ever decides to come after me—"

Suddenly he leaps up.

"Yeow!" he remarks. "Here it is now!"

And here it is, coming right through the door.

The radio report is mostly right. The creature is nine feet tall, it is covered with green fur, and it has lots of long, slimy feelers. Also it has eyes that bug out. Only it doesn't walk, really. It sort of writhes and twists and skootches its way along.

It is really awful. It looks like Elvis Presley with tentacles.

For a second it stands in the doorway and then it opens up its mouth and starts making sounds. And the sounds are even worse than Elvis Presley.

By this time Subconscious Sigmund and the other head-shrinkers and customers are under the bar, in back. I would be there too, only this Estrellita Shapiro is hanging onto my neck and trying to crawl down the top of my shirt. She almost makes it, too.

But Fast Mickey just stands there. He isn't scared a bit. He looks up at this bug-eyed monster and listens to its sounds. Then he reaches down behind the bar and pours a drink. He hands it over.

The monster doesn't pay any attention. He starts wriggling down the aisle towards me.

Fast Mickey shakes his head. He turns around and opens the cash register, hauls out a wad of lettuce and slaps it down next to the drink. The monster doesn't even look at the loot. He keeps right on moving.

All at once Fast Mickey races around the end of the bar and comes up to where I'm sitting with Estrellita Shapiro. He yanks her off my lap and shoves her over to the monster.

The monster wriggles right by her.

"No use," whispers Subconscious Sigmund, from under the bar. "I know what you're doing—trying to find out what the creature is after. It isn't money, it isn't liquor, it isn't women."

"What else does anybody come in here for?" Fast Mickey says.

"This isn't somebody," Subconscious Sigmund groans. "It's a being from another worldsomething weird, alien, uncanny!"

The monster is making nasty growling noises now. But all of a sudden Fast Mickey smiles. He turns around, walks right up to the monster, and grabs it by a tentacle. Then he pulls it along with him to the end of the room and disappears.

Two minutes later the monster is gone. It just walks out through the tavern again and up the street. No more shrieks, no more crashes. And when we turn on the radio we are just in time to hear a report that it is back in the flying saucer and the flying saucer is taking off.

That's the end of it, of course. We're all out in the open again, and Fast Mickey is setting up drinks on the house, and then the reporters come and interview him on saving the world.

Fast Mickey is very modest. "Nothing to it," he says. "When Subconscious Sigmund describes the creature as uncanny, I suddenly understand. Taking a trip in a flying saucer is probably just like taking a long drive in an automobile. Sooner or later, you’re going to want something. I just figure out what it is and take him there.”

“Brilliant psychology,” says Subconscious Sigmund. “But how do you ever arrive at this conclusion?”

“Because I am a bartender, not a psychiatrist,” Fast Mickey tells him. “And I know that anybody who comes into a tavern wants one of four things. If it isn’t liquor, or money, or women, then it has to be the other. You see,” he says, lifting his drink, “it’s all a matter of elimination.”

Dig That Crazy Grave!

The tale of a six-man jazz combo led by the famous JoJo Jones—a tale of the long moan of the cat on the oh-so-cool tin roof—a tale of jive jargon and kicks and being hep and letting them send you and letting it pour out—but mostly a tale of the big kick.

WHEN PROFESSOR TALMADGE heard about JoJo Jones coming to town, he was very excited. He called Dorothy right away.

"We've got a date tomorrow night," he told her. "JoJo Jones is opening out at The Mirror Club."

Dorothy was excited too. "Darling, what a break! Do you think he'll help you on the book?"

"Could be. Anyway, we're going to see him."

Talmadge picked Dorothy up about nine and they drove out. Word must have got around fast, because there was quite a crowd on hand. Talmadge recognized a lot of kids from the college, and several of them recognized him. Some of them did so directly—with a "Hi, Professor!"—and others merely did a double-take and then whispered to their companions. Everybody seemed genuinely surprised to see him—no one, of course, knew he was writing a book on. jazz.

Except Dorothy, and they hugged their secret together as they took a table just off the edge of the dance floor. It was nearly a quarter to ten, but the bandstand was still deserted. Talmadge could sense the restless anticipation of the crowd, and he and Dorothy shared it.

Then all at once the combo filed in. The manager of The Mirror Club went up to the microphone and made a little announcement, and JoJo Jones took over.

Everyone in the place stared up at the men on the stand, but the musicians didn't stare back. They sat down—six men in blazer jackets—and unpacked their instruments slowly from battered cases. Clarinet, trombone, horn, bass. One of the men drifted over to the piano and diddled a few notes. JoJo Jones set up the drums.

All six musicians had pale faces, and they wore a look of boredom. They seemed oblivious of the audience, and of one another.

Dorothy shook her head. "Are you sure this is the JoJo Jones?" she asked Talmadge. "I mean, he looks so young."

"He was just a kid when he started out," Talmadge reminded her. "They all were. Bix and Tesch and the Chicago crowd, and B.G." Then he remembered that Dorothy was not really a jazz buff, so he interpreted—"Bix" was Bix Beiderbecke, "Tesch" was Frank Teschemacher, and "B.G." of course was Benny Goodman. Unconsciously his manner became professorial, for Talmadge was neither a jazz buff nor an aficionado. He was a student, and to him it was always a matter of accurate data. He told Dorothy that Muggsy Spanier's first name was really Francis—in exactly the same tone of voice he'd use to tell her that Ulysses S. Grant's first name was really Hiram.

Dorothy giggled. "Do you suppose JoJo Jones dyes his hair?" she wanted to know. "I expected an old man with a long white beard. Couldn't this be someone else using the same name?"

"I can't answer that one until I've heard them play," Talmadge said. "Looks like they're starting now."

They were seated, poised and ready, as JoJo Jones raised his drumstick. Then came the down-beat, and the answer flooded forth.

It was the JoJo Jones, all right. From the first paradiddle on, it was unmistakable. The sidemen may have changed, but not the style nor the arrangements. Here was the JoJo Jones of the fabulous Twenties, the JoJo Jones who had recorded for Okeh and Vocalion and the old Brunswick company.

Talmadge had the records, Dorothy had heard them many times, and she recognized the music. So did the crowd. They didn't attempt to dance. This rhythm went to the head, not to the feet. The audience was content to listen. Talmadge nodded, wondering how a six-piece outfit could pour such power into oldies like High Society, Nobody's Sweetheart, Muskrat Ramble. Jojo's drumming wove its way through vintage arrangements, and when Talmadge closed his eyes there was an illusion of tremendous volume. So much so that when the set finally ended, the sudden silence hit like a cymbal-crash.

Talmadge blinked and looked over at Dorothy.

"Wow!" she said. "This boy doesn't fool; does he?"

"Like it?"

"Tremendous."

Then their voices were lost in the buzz of surrounding conversation. Talmadge smiled because he knew what was going on. This college crowd took jazz as seriously as French students take their politics—and in as many schisms. "Chicago jazz" fans would argue with the devotees of Dave Brubeck, and the apostles of Dizzy Gillespie clashed with the Gerry Mulligan followers. It was an interesting sociological development, this jazz-cult, and Talmadge was putting the whole thing into his projected book.

A clarinet cut through the confusion and a second set was on. The sound changed subtly, because now Jones was playing the jazz of the Thirties—the jazz of the Dorsey Brothers and Artie. Shaw and Duke Ellington. A touch of Dixieland, a torrent of what used to be called "swing"; the drive, the intensity, rocked relentlessly through the room.

The crowd shouted, and the white faces on the bandstand suddenly came alive. Jojo gave a signal and they skipped their intended break, going right into another set.

The Forties this time. Glenn Miller and Stan the Man Kenton, and then the "new sound." Faster and faster, solo after solo, offbeat and offbar, and into the stuff from the bottom of the cage at Birdland. Jojo was moving them along with his drums, through the Forties and then into the Fifties, stepping up the tempo as he time-traveled them relentlessly.

Talmadge watched that pale white face, the face that was almost blank with inner concentration, and tried to read the expression. Where had he seen that look before? Only on the faces of women during ecstasy. Only in dreams, when the statues come alive and move, and the great hands from the sky reach down to pluck at your entrails and play them like a bass; when they jam the mouth of the. trumpet in your eye and the valves move of their own accord to blow your brains out.

It was happening now. He could feel the tram sliding up and down his spine; he could hear the piano in his head as the left hand marched mercilessly across the sponge inside his skull. And Jojo was tomtomming on his eardrums. Jojo was playing him now, the band was playing the audience like an instrument—a great instrument that screamed and shouted and moaned the long moan of the cat on the oh-so-cool tin roof.

Shave and a haircut, two bits.

Was it really over?

Yes, because Jojo's jacket was now drenched with sweat, and his palms were red where the nails had dug into them, and his legs were stiff with tension; but the sound had ceased.

The players began filing off the bandstand, working their way through the crowd of bobby-soxers—jailbait, man!—and earnest adolescents with fountain pens and copies of "Downbeat" opened at a picture spread.

Talmadge watched Jojo Jones as he brushed past their table on the way to the bar. He would have liked to stop him, but felt this wasn't the right time. Dorothy apparently thought differently. She reached up and tugged at the musician's sleeve.

"Care to join us for a drink?" she asked.

Jojo looked down at her. Evidently he liked what he saw because he nodded and pulled out a chair.

Dorothy introduced herself. “Dorothy Daniels. And this is Professor Talmadge—he’s been wanting to meet you for years. He’s writing a book on jazz.”

“Take five, man.”

JoJo Jones extended his hand and Talmadge grasped it. The hand was cold. Jojo didn’t return his smile, because he was staring at Dorothy.

“—of course I’ve heard all your old records,” she was saying. “But I just couldn’t believe it was you until I heard you play. I mean, you’re so young.”

Jojo shrugged. “I’m forty-eight. Don’t let the crewcut and horn-rims fool you. And Figgy is over fifty.”

Talmadge interrupted. “Figgy? You don’t mean Figgy Newton on trumpet?”

“That’s the cat.”

“I thought I recognized the style, but I wasn’t sure. The crewcut fooled me too.”

“Standard equipment, Dad. Crewcut, horn-rims. Musician’s Local won’t let you book into a place without you look like this Dave Garroway character.”

The waitress came and took their order. Two boys walked over and asked for autographs, but they didn’t stay. When the drinks arrived, Jojo turned to Talmadge and asked, “What’s this I dig about a book?”

Talmadge smiled. “Seems as if nearly everyone is doing a book on jazz these days. I thought I might as well get into the act. Not the usual history, though—the sociological approach.”

“Sounds like a real crazy bit.”

“Perhaps we could get together some time. I’d like to ask you a few questions.”

“Glad, Dad.”

“Are you free tomorrow? During the day?”

Jojo shook his head. “This cat loves his pad. I don’t howl and prowl until the cool of the evening.”

Dorothy leaned forward. “I don’t mean to be rude,” she said, “but why do all you musicians talk that way?”

“Stock arrangement. Like the cheaters and the hair-do. Give the square his share.” Jojo’s eyes met hers. “You dig me?”

“I dig you,” Dorothy said. “The most.”

“Solid gone for real?”

“I dig you,” Dorothy said, “enough to know that it’s all a silly, stupid act. You’re a grown man and a great musician. You don’t have to wear a loud jacket and crop your hair and hide your eyes behind horn-rims. You don’t have to hide your thoughts behind this juvenile jive-jargon, either. Why do you do it?”

“For a kick, chick. Strictly for kicks.” Jojo wasn’t smiling now. “but you wouldn’t know about kicks, would you, doll? That Columbus cat was wrong—the world is square.”

Talmadge coughed. “Er, that’s one of the things I’d like to discuss with you at some future time,” he said. “The position of jazz musicians and devotees as a self-constituted in-group, with their own vocabulary and idiom.”

“Sounds real nervous, man.” Jojo stood up. “Thanks for the sauce. Now I’ve got to trample back up there and play pretty for the people. Stick around until after, we’ll have a ball.”

Talmadge opened his mouth to acknowledge the invitation, but Dorothy cut in. “No, thanks,” she said. “We really must be going.”

Jojo nodded calmly. “You don’t like the juke, don’t spend your nickels,” he said. And walked away.

Dorothy rose and Talmadge followed her out.

“Something upset you?” he asked. “No. But I’m afraid all this smoke has given me a headache.” She paused. “You can stay if you like.”

“Oh, there’s always another time. Maybe we can stop in again next weekend.”

"Yes." But she didn't sound enthusiastic about it, and when they were in the car riding back, Talmadge questioned her.

"What got you angry all of a sudden?"

"I wasn't angry, darling. But there's something about that man that irritates me. He's such a phoney. It gets on my nerves to see him act like a character out of a cheap movie."

"He told you why he does it. The customers expect that sort of thing."

"Nonsense! Remember the night we met Benny Goodman? He doesn't talk that way. Lots of fine jazz musicians don't—they aren't all a bunch of dope addicts or eccentrics, you know that. And not all jazz fans are peculiar, either. Those kids who came up asking for autographs were perfectly normal and well-behaved. But your JoJo Jones seems to be putting on a deliberate act. I got the feeling he was sitting back and laughing at us all the time."

"Don't underestimate the man. You heard him give what amounted to a musical history of jazz tonight—from Oliver right up to the day after tomorrow. He knows what he's doing."

"That makes him even more of a hypocrite."

"Wait until we sit down and really talk with him, get to know him better."

"Sorry, count me out." She was shivering beside Talmadge in the car, and her voice shivered, too. "There's something wrong about that man."

"But you have to admit his playing is out of this world."

"Too far out." Dorothy shuddered again. "Please, let's talk about something else."

They talked about something else, but Dorothy went right on shivering during the ride home, and when Talmadge kissed her good night her lips were still trembling.

Talmadge's lips trembled when he walked into The Mirror Club the following Saturday. It was past one, and as he expected, the band had just finished for the night. He'd anticipated this might be a good time to catch JoJo Jones in a free moment, while he was sitting around and relaxing after cutting the last set. Sure enough, the drummer was perched on a stool at the bar.

But Talmadge hadn’t expected to see Dorothy Daniels sitting next to him.

He had called her three times during the week, asking for a date, and she had put him off each time. He’d phoned again this evening, suggesting they go out as they always did on Saturday nights, and once again she had stalled. He’d believed her when she said she had a headache and would stay home.

Yet here she was, sitting next to JoJo Jones. And smiling. And leaning forward. And putting her hand on his arm in that familiar gesture he knew so well. Talmadge noted that she was wearing the blue dress, the lowcut one that she claimed always embarrassed her because of what happened if she didn’t remember to keep sitting back. Well, she wasn’t sitting back now.

Talmadge’s lips trembled, and for a moment he thought of turning around and walking out before anyone noticed him.

Then it was too late, because Dorothy was laughing at something Jojo had said, and she looked around, spotted him, and waved.

He went over to the bar.

“Hi, Dad!” said Jojo.

Talmadge nodded. “How’s it going?” he asked, not particularly caring what he said just as long as he could say something and see if he could keep his voice under control.

“Great, man! This is a real gone spot—we’ve had ’em climbing the walls every night, haven’t we, sugar?”

“Right, Pops.”

That was Dorothy talking. Dorothy—this girl in the lowcut blue dress, leaning over and letting everybody and his brother take a look. Dorothy—this stranger with the heavy makeup and the unfamiliar bright red fingernails that were long and pointed like the claws of a cat. A real crazy cat.

Talmadge heard himself say, “Every night, eh? Is that right, Dorothy?”

"You heard the man."

Jojo grinned at him. "Don't get me wrong, Dad—I ain't been queering your solo. Just giving the chick a kick. She likes to sit up on the stand when we give out—sort of get the feel of it, you know? Now she can really dig. Now she can get with it, can't you, baby?"

"The most," Dorothy said. "Darling, you'll have to try it yourself one of these nights."

Talmadge nodded but didn't answer. Then Jojo stood up. "Sit down, toss the sauce. I'll be flying back."

He walked off in the direction of the Men's Room. Talmadge took a stool and deliberately stared down the front of Dorothy's dress.

"Every night you've come here," he murmured.

"Well, what of it?" Dorothy didn't look at him. "I got to thinking that maybe I was wrong, that maybe I'd done the man an injustice. I drove out and listened again. He saw me, came over and talked. That's how it started."

"How what started?"

"Nothing. Nothing like what you're thinking. We just talked. He's different when he's alone. None of this hep stuff then. He talks about music and sensation and what it does to you, what it does for you. But you wouldn't understand that. You couldn't. You have to sit up there with the band and let them send you. Feel them send the crowd. That's the big kick."

Talmadge nodded again. "You're for kicks now too, is that it?"

"Just this one. Just listening, and letting the crowd pour it on to you. You sit up there behind the music, and they let. go with everything they've got—you feel it coming up, beating against you in waves. All the emotions. All the energy. All the desire, and the frustration, and the aching just pours out. You can almost taste it."

"Sounds like it's habit-forming."

He was trying to play it for laughs, but she seemed serious. "That's what Jojo says. He's been doing it for thirty years now. Claims that's all that keeps him alive, keeps him young." She smiled. "I'm beginning to understand musicians a little better now, I guess. Not the commercial ones, but the real cats, like Jojo and his boys. The ones who're willing to play in little offbeat spots like this, or ride the crummy busses for one-night stands in Fallen Armpits, Nebraska. The ones who won't join the big outfits or cut hit records, because they aren't interested in money if it means playing commercial jazz. Like Jojo says, they're out for kicks. And once you've felt that big kick, you know why."

She looked up, pausing abruptly, and Talmadge realized that Jojo was back. He stood behind them quietly, and the rest of the boys were with him. Talmadge recognized Figgy Newton; at close range it was possible to detect the telltale wrinkles and the pasty pouches under the eyes. It was also possible to detect the acrid reek that hovered over the entire group, and Talmadge began to realize what they'd been doing out in the Men's Room. The youngest of the group, the kid who played piano, still had a butt in his mouth. He took a final puff, sucking in air noisily along with the last drag of charge, then ground the reefer under his heel.

Jojo put his hands on Dorothy's shoulders. "We're putting the show an the road," he said. "Flying down to Figgy's pad. Gonna be a big bash tonight." As Dorothy rose, the musician turned to Talmadge. "You want in?" he asked.

Talmadge looked at Dorothy. She turned away, fumbling with her purse.

"No, thanks," he said. "I've got to be running along. Some other time."

"Sad, Dad." Jojo waved genially.

"I'll call you tomorrow," Talmadge said. Dorothy didn't answer, and he hated himself for having said it. But he had to. Just as he had to walk out now, pretending nothing had happened, pretending that he didn't care.

He was all set to pretend again the next day, when he called Dorothy at her apartment. But he needn't have bothered, because she wasn't there.

She wasn't there in the morning, nor in the afternoon, nor that night. And she didn't come in late, either.

Talmadge would have known: he was waiting for her, parked outside her building for five hours.

He called her office Monday morning, determined to have it out with her, but that was no good either. The girl who answered the phone said that Miss Daniels was no longer with the company.

So Talmadge went out to The Mirror Club again on Monday night. Dorothy hadn't lied about one thing. She really did sit up there behind the band.

And Talmadge sat down below, watching her, watching them, watching the crowd, feeling the music flow down and the emotion flow up. After a while he just watched Dorothy's face—the white face, white with a pallor the makeup could only partially hide. And no amount of makeup could hide the glassy immobility of her stare, nor its startling resemblance to the faces of the musicians in the combo.

Maybe it was because they were all on charge, or even horse. Maybe it was because they all slept days and stayed up nights. Maybe it was because they never ate, only drank. Or maybe it was because they had been sitting up there so long, playing so hard, and drinking in all that raw emotion. Night after night after night of kicks. The big kick. It had got them, and it had got Dorothy.

When the break came, Talmadge didn't wait for her to leave the stand. He walked right up and hailed her.

"How about a kind word?" he called.

She scowled. "Go away," she said.

"But, Dorothy, I've got to talk to you—"

"Save it for a sick friend."

She rose and moved away down the platform, to join Jojo and the boys as they filed off. She nudged Figgy Newton in the ribs and murmured something Talmadge couldn't catch. He laughed and glanced at Talmadge out of the corner of his eye. Nobody else bothered to look at him.

Talmadge brushed through the crowd to get to the other side of the stand. He made it just in time to catch Dorothy by the arm. She wheeled around, facing him, and he got a closeup of her face. It was like a clown-mask with eyes.

"Dorothy, what's happened? They told me you quit your job—"

"We're closing tonight. Off to Buffalo."

"You're going away?"

"You dig me. We're going."

"When did you decide? Dorothy, what's happened to you, anyway?"

She gave a little offkey laugh. "What is this, the $64,000 Question?"

He could smell the charge now. She was loaded.

"Dorothy, come on home with me. We have to straighten things out."

"It's all straight, gate. Straight, great. Straight and flying right. Excuse please, man. Got a call for a ball."

And then she slipped from his grasp and was gone, out the side door, following the others.

Going out to the cars, Talmadge thought. Out for a charge, or a jolt and a bolt, or a quick kick in the back seat. The hot images poured down on him in waves, scalding his eyeballs.

He had to sit down; He found a place at the bar and heard himself ordering. One fast drink. Two fast drinks. One more for the road, and then he could go out to the parking lot and find her. It was time for a showdown.

No, too late. Talmadge blinked as he heard the downbeat. JoJo Jones and his combo were back on the bandstand, and although he couldn't see them from his seat out here at the bar, he could hear the band at work. He could hear the braying and the squealing and the thumping and the tinkling and the booming. That's all it was, heard at a distance. Just noise, an animal bleating, savage and senseless. And the walls and the floor shook with a boom-boom-boom.

That would be old Jojo on the drums. Boom-boom-boom. Jojo's drums and his heart.

The rhythm was senseless, but it didn't have to make sense. It was mindless but it didn't have to reach the mind. It could reach something else—the body, the nerves, the dark places where the blood runs swiftly. The blood obeyed, the body obeyed, the heart pumped faster, and everything began to pour out. The beat cut into you and made the opening so the sound could pour in, and when the sound poured in everything else poured out. Simple displacement. You couldn't hold both. So you took the sound and gave up yourself.

The drums did it, of course. Talmadge remembered the drums—the basis of all ritual, all magic. Drums made the savages dance around the fires, drums drove them to die in battle, drums thundered on the hills when they gathered to invoke the dark forces of the night. In every age, in every culture, the drums ruled. They ruled and they rolled and they rocked round the clock.

It was magic.

Talmadge got up and walked to the doorway, staring into the ballroom. He could see Jojo up there on the platform, bending over his tomtoms. Jojo's face was a mask that wizards wear; it was catatonic trance; it was every known name and learned label for one and the same thing—the eternal ecstasy of the magician in complete communion with his worshippers. Communion and control. He ruled the drums and the drums ruled them. They danced like puppets, like jerky automatons.

Talmadge shook his head groggily. His eyes searched for Dorothy. Then he realized she wasn't on the platform with the band. She must still be outside in one of the cars.

He made for the doorway. The cool air—cool, man, real cool!—hit him hard. He scuffed along the driveway—kicks, Dad, kicks!—and he peered into the dark recesses of the parked cars. He was way down at the end of the line—long gone, cat!—when he saw her white face. It was lolling against the rear seat of an old heap backed against the side wall of the roadhouse.

Talmadge called to the girl but she didn't answer.

He opened the door of the car but she didn't stir.

He climbed in and sat down next to her, but she didn't open her eyes or look up. Not even when he put his arms around her, not even when he took her hand, not even when he held his breath and placed his palm over her heart.

There was something wrong with her heart. Something wrong with the rhythm. The beat was missing. She wasn't getting with it. Wake up, doll, this is a ball!

But the doll didn't wake up. The white doll would never wake up. It just crumpled grotesquely in Talmadge's arms, and he was stroking one of the limp arms and then looking at it in the light—looking at the place where one of the magicians had stuck a pin into the doll. Maybe there was a little too much H on the end of the pin. Maybe this doll had a weak heart. Those things happened. Every once in a while they happened.

Talmadge swallowed hard. Then he leaned out of the window and was sick. After that he sat there for a long time, just holding the doll in his arms. He was trying to think things out—about magicians, or was it musicians? And the way some of them lived—the dedicated ones, the ones who went in for kicks.

After a while he thought he had it straight.

By this time the music had stopped and the cars were pulling out of the parking area all around him, so he knew the place must be closing down for the night.

It was time to go back inside and tell them.

Talmadge put Dorothy down on the seat and walked back into The Mirror Club.

The lights were going out over the bar, and the bartender was putting on his coat. Back in the ballroom only a single bulb burned over the bandstand.

Talmadge walked in just as the boys were packing up. Figgy and the horn and the tram were closing their little black cases—their little black cases that looked like coffins. And Jojo was getting ready to cart away his drums.

They all had that waxen look under the light, but there was something else—something Talmadge recognized now. He could sense the repletion, the satiation in their stare. They'd had plenty to drink tonight. Plenty of emotion, plenty of vitality, plenty of kicks. They'd taken it from the audience, and they'd taken it from Dorothy. That's why they'd slipped her the H—to restore her vitality, so that they could drink it up again. That's how they got their kicks—drink the audience, drink the dolls, and if nothing else was available for nourishment, drink each other or even themselves.

He thought of all the "real gone" musicians who were really gone these days. Gone forever, because they had doped and drunk themselves to death. They had died for licks and kicks—lived a little and then died a lot.

Talmadge looked up. Apparently he had been saying these things out loud for quite some time—because JoJo Jones was standing next to him and trying to steer him over into the shadows. But he had to go on.

"—used to wonder, like Dorothy did, why you were such an in-group. All dressing alike, looking alike, living the same way. Shunning the daylight, but always keeping that youthful appearance year after year in spite of drugs and alcohol and sex and sensation. I might have guessed it was magic, and that the language you use is a part of it—like the old secret code the witchcraft cults taught their followers. I might have guessed that, but I never expected to find Dracula wearing horn-rims."

"Take five, man, you're dragged." Jojo was smiling at him, smiling his white smile.

Talmadge shook his head. "You're the one who's going to be dragged," he said. "Dorothy's dead."

"Dorothy—?"

"I found her out in the car. Somebody slipped her a jolt, didn't they? Weil, her heart gave out."

"Murder, man!"

"That's the word for it. Murder. The law is going to call it just that, Jojo. But you and I know better, don't we? We know the real name for what you did. The real name for what you are—all of you who need those kicks to keep you alive. You don't drink blood the way they're supposed to do in the fables. You drink the essence, the vital energy."

Now the others were standing around the table, making a ring of white faces in the darkness, and Talmadge could hear them muttering.

"What gives with this cat? Monkey on his back?"

"Sounds like a gorilla, maybe."

"Dig him, Jojo?"

Jojo stood up. His voice was low, but it echoed hollowly in the empty ballroom. "He's got real crazy news. Dorothy's dead."

"The chick? But we were laughing it up in the car, just this last break—real groovy."

"The needle slipped."

"Oh-oh!"

"This cat is purring murder. He's ready to run to the law and do a vocal."

"Can't have that, man."

"And that's not all she wrote. Dig this. Cat thinks we're vampires."

"Vampires?"

"You know. Those real gone characters, they pad down in coffins."

"Man, that's the most!"

"What we gonna do?"

"Well, we can't let him sing."

"We got to ditch that chick before we blow town."

"Why riot ditch 'em both?"

"Now?"

"Now."

Talmadge started to get up, but JoJo Jones pushed him back. Then somebody was behind him, holding his arms. And somebody else put a big cold hand over his mouth and held it there. It didn't cover Talmadge's eyes, though, and he could see the others advancing on him, holding their instrument cases ready. As they got closer, he could smell the charge.

Then they were hitting him, and he tried to struggle but it was no good. They hit him silently but very hard. Just before he passed Out he thought he could feel something sting against the side of his throat, and a voice from far away said, “Maybe he has something there, Dad. We. ought to try this vampire kick.”

After that there was a long pause. From time to time Talmadge would come to, long enough to realize that things were happening. Once he was being carried, and once he was jolting along in a car . . .

The last thing Talmadge heard was Jojo’s voice, chuckling as he murmured, “Dig that crazy grave!”

Terror Over Hollywood

What had happened? What would be the fate of this beautiful woman who had come so close to the frightening secret of "the top ten" ?

Robert Bloch, well known Science Fiction and Fantasy writer, returns with this startling explanation for the survival of Hollywood's legendary indestructibles. Have you never wondered why some actors go on, year after year, long after even younger men withdrew admitting their age?

THE first time I saw Kay Kennedy was at Chasen's, several years ago.

She wasn't Kay Kennedy, then. In fact, I can't even remember what name she was using during that period—something like Tallulah Schultz. And she wasn't a brunette, either, but a blonde. MM had just come into vogue, and like Mamie van Doren and Sheree North and five thousand others, this girl had platinum hair and a bra-cup size far along in the alphabet.

I ran into her quite by accident, because she happened to be sitting at the bar with Mike Charles when he hailed me.

"Sweetheart! C'mon over—I wanna murmur sweet nothings in your shell-like ear." He rose unsteadily as I approached, gripped my arm, and slapped me on the back.

I have been in Hollywood many years, and I still do not like to be addressed as "sweetheart" by other males, nor do I enjoy being slapped on the back.

But I grinned and said, “Hi, lover-boy!” and punched him in the ribs. As I say, I have been in Hollywood many years.

“What’ya drinking?” he asked.

I shook my head.

“Oh, that’s right, you don’t drink, do you?” He turned to his blonde companion. “Funny, this character never takes a drink. Doesn’t eat, either. What do you do, boy—live on H?”

I sighed. “Ulcers. A bland diet.”

He laughed again. “That’s right. You’re a producer. Bland diet for you. Lucky I’m a director. Blonde diet for me.” Then he turned to the girl, mumbled her name so that I couldn’t catch it, and said, “Darling, I want you to meet Eddie Stern—the sweetest guy in the industry.”

I smiled at her and she smiled at me, and it meant absolutely nothing. That is, it meant nothing to me and I was fairly certain it meant nothing to her. Nobody ever remembers the names of the independent producers. A few, like Selznick and Kramer and Huston, get established through publicity channels, but most of us are anonymous.

So this little blonde pirouetted her eyelashes and exhaled and I was prepared to let it go at that. But all at once she opened her mouth and said, “Edward Stern. Of course. I’ve seen your pictures ever since I was a little girl. MOON OVER MOROCCO, and LONELY CITY, and—”

She rattled off the names of eight films, without once wrinkling her blank forehead.

I confess I wrinkled mine. “What are you?” I asked. “A child prodigy?”

“I just happen to like movies,” she told me. “I study them, don’t I, Mike?”

The director pinched her arm. “That she does, that she does,” he agreed. He grinned at her. “Baby, how’d you like to be my star pupil? I guarantee you’ll be working under an experienced teacher.”

“I’m going to be a star, some day.”

“Sure,” Mike said. “I promised you, didn’t I?”

"I'm serious," she answered. And she was. She faced me. "That's why I'm interested in every phase of production. And I've always admired your work, Mr. Stern. I rank you right up there with Hal Wallis."

I nodded "So you know his name, too, eh? Frankly, that surprises me."

"She probably knows his wife's name," Mike said, in a disgusted voice.

"Of course. He married Louise Fazenda. She was in RAIN OR SHINE, with Joe Cook. And Mr. Chasen, who runs this restaurant, was Joe Cook's stooge in the same picture."

That threw me. The girl wasn't pretending, she did know pictures. I've known Hal Wallis since before he married Louise, but the general public doesn't. For that matter, how many people remember Louise Fazenda? She's gone from common consciousness even though some of her contemporaries—Crawford, Cooper, Gable—are still around.

I decided it might be worth my while to talk to this girl after all. But Mike Charles had other ideas.

He stood up and grabbed my arm. "Come on over here a minute, pal," he said. "Little private conference, huh?" As he pulled me away he called back over his shoulder, "You don't mind, do you, precious? Order y'self another drink."

We moved toward the end of the bar, and I said, "Where'd you find her, Mike? She interests me."

"That goat?" He laughed. "Don't waste your time. Just another movie-struck kid. Reads the Reporter in bed." He sobered. "Look, I got serious business with you."

"Go ahead. I'm listening."

"Ed, I want a job with you."

"Directing?"

"What else? You know I'm good. You know my credits."

"So does everyone else in town, Mike," I told him. "Why haven't you picked up something in the last six months?" I stared at him, "Is it the drinking?"

"No. I never used to drink at all, you can ask anyone. I just started after DOOMED SAFARI, when the word went out that I was poison with the majors. You heard about that, don't try and kid me."

"All right," I said. "I heard. But I never did find out why."

"Silliest damned thing. I just committed the unpardonable sin, that's all. DOOMED SAFARI was one of these African things, see? And as usual, we had a sequence where the hero and the heroine are making their escape down one of those rivers. So I goofed."

"How do you mean, goofed?"

"Well, I was going to be arty and different, so I did the whole sequence without including a single shot of crocodiles slithering off the banks into the water." He sighed. "Naturally, you just can't get away with making an African picture without that shot in it. Ever since then I've been dead. Like that guy over at MGM years ago who made the mistake of calling Lassie a bitch."

I didn't know whether he was ribbing me or not; Mike was always a great ribber. But he was serious about one thing. He wanted a chance.

"Please, Ed," he murmured. "I've got to make another picture soon. I've been around for twelve years, but you know this business. Twelve months without a credit and I'm washed up for good. Help me."

"I don't have anything lined up at the moment," I answered, truthfully.

"But you know I'm good. You know about the three times I've been runner-up for the Academy—"

I shook my head. "Sorry, Mike. Nothing I can do."

"Ed, for the first time in my life, I'm begging. I belong in the industry, I've been around ever since I was a kid. Started as a grip, went on to cutter, spent eight years as an assistant until I got my chance. Then twelve years on top. And now they slam the door in my face. It isn't fair."

"It's Hollywood," I said. "You know that. Besides, I'm just a little independent producer. I don't swing any weight in this town. Why come to me?"

He was completely sober now. His eyes rested on me steadily and his voice dropped. “You know why, Ed. It isn’t just that I want an assignment from you. I’d like to have you talk to your people about me.”

“My people?”

“Don’t try to play dumb. I hear things. I know what you’ve got. And I want in. I think I deserve in, on my record. I belong.”

I couldn’t face his eyes any longer. I turned away. “All right, Mike, you might as well know. I did talk to my people, as you call them, several months ago. We studied your case thoroughly. And—they voted you down.”

He uttered a short laugh, then smiled. “As they say in Mexico, that’s the way the cojones bounces. Thanks for trying, anyway, Ed. See you around, sweetheart.”

I got out of there because I didn’t want to spend any more time with Mike Charles. I wanted to talk to his girl again, yes, but at the moment I couldn’t stand being around him. For some reason I felt as if I’d just passed the sentence of death upon him.

Perhaps it was foolish of me to take that attitude, but when I read about his suicide the following month, I wasn’t surprised. A lot of them commit suicide after coming to me. Particularly if they know—or guess—the truth.

But Kay Kennedy didn’t commit suicide.

I don’t know who she hooked up with after Mike Charles hung his brains on the ceiling with a .38, but he was the right one, for her. Within a year her name was Kay Kennedy, and her hair was its natural reddish brown. I began to watch her. One of an independent producer’s main jobs is to watch people who are coming up in the field. Watch and wait.

I watched and waited another year before I ran into her again. It happened at Romanoff’s, one evening.

She’d already had her first big success, in SUNSHINE, and she was sitting at one of the good tables with Paul Sanderson when I came in.

Paul halloed across the room and I went over, and when he introduced her he didn’t mumble her name. And this time she didn’t flutter her eyelashes, either.

“I’ve been waiting for a chance to see you again, Mr. Stern,” she said. “Of course, you probably don’t remember me.”

“Yes I do,” I told her. “Did you know Joe Cook had Chasen with him on the stage, in HOLD YOUR HORSES, and FINE AND DANDY?”

“Certainly,” she responded. “But I don’t think he was in ARIZONA MAHONEY when Cook did it for Paramount. That was a little stinker, by the way.”

“Yes it was,” I agreed. Paul Sanderson stared at the two of us, then rose. “I think I’ll leave you two lovebirds for a moment,” he said. “Besides, I have to go to the men’s room.”

He got up and stalked away.

“My new leading man,” Kay said. “Of course, he isn’t exactly new, is he?”

I shook my head. “Been around about as long as Gilbert Roland, I guess. But he still looks good, doesn’t he?”

“Very.” She gazed up at me. “How do they do it?”

“How does who do what?”

“You know what I mean. How do some of them manage to hang on forever? People up there in the Top Ten, box-office leaders year after year. Don’t they ever get any older?”

“Of course they do. Look at the ones who die off—” Her eyes narrowed. “That’s what you want me to do, isn’t it? That’s what you want everyone to do. To look at the ones who die off, and forget about the dozen or so who are always around, always have been around. The ones who remain stars for fifteen, twenty, twenty-five years and still play leads. And a few directors and producers, too—deMille, people like yourself. When did you come to Hollywood, Mr. Stern? 1915, wasn’t it?”

“You’ve been reading my mail,” I said.

She shook her head. “I’ve been talking to people.”

“What people?”

“Well, your friend Mike Charles, for instance. Your late friend.” She paused. “The night I met you, after you went away, Mike got pretty high.

And he told me a couple of things. Said there was a little inner group out here that controlled the situation. They called the shots on the top people, decided who stays and who goes. And he said you were in with that group. He said you'd just given him the word that he'd have to go."

"He was pretty high that night, like you told me," I murmured.

"He wasn't high the night he killed himself."

I took a deep breath. "Some people get delusions. That's one of the steps along the suicide route."

"This was no delusion." Kay Kennedy watched me calmly. "I want to know the truth."

I toyed with a napkin. "Suppose there was something to the story?" I asked. "Oh, nothing preposterous, like an inner sanctum arrangement where a few key people controlled all the big plums in Hollywood—you can see on the face of it that's ridiculous. No director or producer or star can depend on a contract or publicity to keep going; the public has to make the final decision. But let's suppose that there are a select few whom the public cherishes, and that there are ways to stay in that group. Let's even go so far as to say that I might know something about the method." I stared at her. "If so, why should I tell you?"

"Because I belong in that group," Kay Kennedy whispered. "I'm going to be a star, a big star. And I'm going to stay on top forever."

"Big talk, little girl."

"I talked just as big when I was a little girl. Go ahead and laugh? That's what my parents did. But I made my father quit his job and bring me to the Coast. He worked nights in a factory to give me dramatic lesson fees, until he died six years ago. And my mother took his place, at the same factory, so I could still have my tuition. She died last year, of the same thing. Silicosis. That factory wasn't a healthy place."

She lit a cigarette. "Do you want to know the rest? Do you need to know the rest? The names of the clowns like Mike Charles who I let push me around on the way up? The names of the hole-in-the-wall agents, the greasy bookers, the stag promoters, the casting-directors for blue films? Do you want to know how I got my first decent address, my first wardrobe, my first car? Or would you rather hear about that nice guy in the Air Force I bounced because he insisted on getting married and having a family?"

I smiled at her. "Why bother? As you say, I've been out here since 1915. I've heard the same story a thousand times."

"Yes. But that's not all the story, Ed Stern. There's another part, the most important part. I am an actress, and a good one. I'm going to be a better one in another year or two. Do you think the studio would take a chance on me with a property like Paul Sanderson unless they knew I was going to make it? I'm ready to hit the top, because I'm prepared. And that's the way I like to be—always prepared. So now I want to know one more thing. When I hit the top, how can I stay there?"

I glanced across the room. Paul Sanderson stood there, deep in conversation with two men who obviously would never be escorted to one of Mike Romanoff's tables. They were short, swart, and stocky, and their hands were shoved deep in the pockets of their trousers. Paul was smiling at them as he spoke, but they weren't smiling back.

Kay Kennedy followed my gaze. I grinned at her.

"Why don't you ask Paul when he gets back?" I suggested. "Maybe he can tell you."

"Then you won't."

"Not yet, Kay. I don't think you're ready yet. If you get to be as big a name as you say you will, then perhaps there's a chance. Until then—"

"All right." She returned my grin. "But I did find out what I wanted to know. Mike, Charles told the truth, didn't he? There is a secret."

She glanced across the room. "And Paul knows it too, doesn't he? But the reason you suggested I ask him is because you're sure he wouldn't tell."

"Something like that."

She focussed her attention on me again. "Funny about Paul Sanderson. I might have guessed he'd be one of your people, as Mike put it. He was the first star I remember seeing in the movies, way back in the '30s. And here I am today, all grown up and playing opposite him, and he doesn't look a bit different."

"Makeup," I said. "Those Westmore boys are great."

"Oh, it's not that. I know he wears a toupee. But he's so different on the set and off. When he's working he never gets tired, never complains. I can be dying under those lights and he isn't even sweating."

"You learn to relax," I said.

"Not that much." She leaned forward. "You know, all the time we've been together on the picture, he never made a pass at me?"

"How come he's taking you out?"

"Flack's idea. Good publicity." She paused. "At least, I thought that's all it was until tonight, when we got together. And that's what I meant when I said it was funny about Paul Sanderson. He's been on the make for me all evening long. And he's drinking, too. If I hadn't worked with him and gotten to know him, I'd swear it wasn't the same guy. Flow do you explain that?"

"I don't," I told her. "Let's ask him." I turned and gazed across the room. But Paul Sander? was gone. So were the two men.

I stood up very quickly. "Excuse me," I said. "I'll be right back."

But she wasn't buying. "You saw them too?" she murmured. "Those men with him? Think there's something wrong—"

I didn't answer her. I was walking across the room. I didn't bother with the hat-check girl, but went outside and grabbed the first attendant I saw. "Mr. Sanderson," I said. "Did he come out just now?"

"Just leaving." He pointed to a black limousine rounding the exit-lane.

"That's not his car."

"He was with a couple of other men."

I jabbed him in the ribs. "Get my car, fast."

Kay Kennedy dug her hand into my left arm. "What's happening?"

"That's what I intend to find out. You go back inside and wait. I'll return —I promise."

She shook her head. "I'm coming along."

The car rolled up. There was no time to argue if I wanted to keep the limousine in sight. “All right, get in.”

We made the exit. The limousine had turned right and was picking up speed. I trailed it. The car cut left, going still faster. I followed.

“This is exciting,” Kay told me.

I didn’t find it so. It took all my concentration to keep up with the car ahead—and more speed than I could summon here in town. A delay or a ticket would be fatal now. I twisted and turned, always a full block behind, as the limousine swerved and doubled and sped forward until it reached the canyon entrance far to the north. Then it really began to move.

“Where are they taking him?” Kay gasped. “What are they trying to do —”

I didn’t answer her. I had my right foot on the floorboards and both hands on the wheel; my eyes were on the hairpin turns, and I kept thinking, the damned fool, I knew I couldn’t trust him, I never should have chosen him in the first place.

But it was too late for self-reproach now, too late for anything at all unless I could overtake the car ahead. By now they must have known I was following, of course, and that probably decided them. They’d reached the top of the canyon when it happened.

I didn’t see anything because my car was a good two hundred feet behind as they rounded the last curve. But I heard it. A muffled sound, in three bursts.

Then we rounded the turn and I could see the limousine pulling away, going down the straight stretch on the other side of the canyon. Its taillights were like two little red eyes winking in farewell.

I didn’t try to follow it any further.

Instead I pulled up at the edge of the road, pulled up alongside of the black, huddled figure that had been tossed from the speeding car like a discarded doll.

This doll had a hole in its forehead, and another in its chest, and a third in its belly. It was limp and shapeless, and its limbs were doubled up grotesquely beneath the torso.

Kay started to scream and I slapped her face. Then I got out of the car and picked up the doll. I opened the rear door and dumped it into the back seat.

Kay didn’t look at it, and when I climbed in front again she didn’t look at me. She just kept sobbing over and over again, “He’s dead, they killed him, he’s dead.” So I slapped her again. That sobered her. She put her fingers up to the side of her face and said, “Your hands are cold.”

I nodded. “I’m glad your powers of observation arc returning,” I told her. “Apparently you lost them for a moment just now. Or else you might have noticed something. Paul isn’t dead.”

“But I saw him—that hole in his forehead—the way he was lying there, after they threw him out of the car—” She started to glance toward the back seat, but I grabbed her shoulder.

“Never mind,” I said.

“Take my word for it. He’s still breathing. But he won’t be for long, if we don’t get him to a doctor.”

“Who were they?” Kay murmured. “Why did they do it?”

“That’s a question for the police to answer,” I replied. And started the car again.

“Police.” She whispered the word, but she might just as well have shouted it. I knew what she was thinking. Police, publicity, scandal, Parsons, Hopper, Graham, Skolsky, Fidler.

“Do—do we have to go to the police?” she whispered.

I shrugged. “No, we don’t. But the doctor will. Bullet-wounds must be reported.”

“Isn’t there some doctor who’ll keep his mouth shut? I mean—”

“I know what you mean.” I drove grimly, turning back onto the highway and heading through Bel Air. “And I know a doctor.”

“You’ll take him there?”

“Perhaps.” I paused. “On one condition.”

“And that is?”

I glanced at her. “No matter what happens, you forget all about this business tonight. Never ask any questions, either. No matter what happens.”

“Even if he—dies?”

“He won’t die. I promise you that.” I looked at her again. “Now, do you promise me?”

“Yes.”

“All right,” I said. “Now I’m going to drop you off home.”

“But shouldn’t you get to the doctor first? He’s lost a lot of blood—”

“No questions,” I reminded her. “Home we go.”

So I dropped her off. Getting out of the car she was very careful not to turn her eyes in the direction of the back seat. “Will you call me?” she murmured. “Let me know how it—turns out?”

“You’ll know,” I assured her. “You’ll know.”

She nodded vaguely, and I drove away. I went straight to Loxheim and told him the whole story.

Dr. Loxheim was understanding, as I knew he would be.

“Gambling debts, no doubt,” he nodded. “The verdammten young fool. But it iss difficult to find someone completely trustworthy. And now you must find another. It will take time, and until then we must be very careful, all of us. Have you told Paul?”

“Not yet,” I said. “First I thought we’d better get rid of the body.”

“Leave that to me.” Loxheim smiled. “There will be no trouble. I am sure that the ones who did the killing won’t talk.” Then he frowned. “But what about the girl, this Kay Kennedy?”

“She won’t talk, either. I have her promise. Besides, she’d be afraid of the publicity.”

Dr. Loxheim puffed on his cigar. “Does she know he’s dead?”

“No. I told her he was merely wounded.”

He expelled smoke rapidly. “Still, she knows he was thrown from a moving automobile. She heard the shots. She at least saw his forehead, if not the other wounds. And this iss Friday night. Do you think she’ll be able to remain silent when she sees Paul Sanderson walk on the set on Monday morning?”

I lifted my hands. “What else could I do under the circumstances?” I asked. “But you’re right. When she sees him Monday, it will be a shock.”

“A great shock,” Loxheim agreed.

“Do you think I’d better be on hand then?”

“Definitely. I think you had better be on hand from now on, to watch her.”

“Whatever you say.”

“Good. Now leave me There is much to be done.”

“Want me to help carry in the body?”

Dr. Loxheim smiled. “That will not be necessary. I have carried them in before.”

Monday morning must have been pure hell for Kay Kennedy. I was on the set, working with Craig, the free-lance who was bossing the camera assignment. I watched Kay when she came in, and she looked all right.

I watched her when Paul Sanderson showed up, and she never cracked. Maybe that was because she’d noticed I was there. Anyway, she managed to get through the morning, somehow. At noon I dragged her to lunch.

We didn’t eat at the commissary. I took her over to Olivetti’s, in my car. No point in detailing the course of events. What matters is that we talked.

“I think I’ve got it figured out,” she told me. “Ever since Saturday, when there was nothing in the papers, I’ve been thinking.”

“There wouldn’t be anything in the papers,” I reminded her. “Who was there to tell them?”

“Oh, somebody would,” Kay Kennedy said. “If Paul Sanderson had to stop production on a picture for a month or two, they’d cook up a story to explain things to the press. But there wasn’t a word. So I guessed the truth.”

“Which is?”

“Which is that the man who was with me the other night, the man who got shot, wasn’t Paul Sanderson at all. Remember, I was telling you how different he seemed to be off the lot, almost as if he were another person entirely? That's it, of course. He was another person. Paul Sanderson's double."

I didn't say anything.

"That's right, isn't it?"

I avoided her gaze. "Remember what you promised me—no questions?"

"I remember. And I'm not asking you questions about the other night. I'm not asking you if the double died, or if he was already dead when you talked to me. I'm not asking how you got rid of the body. I'm merely asking you about Paul Sanderson, who wasn't really mixed up in this affair at all. Now, was he?" She ground her third cigarette into the ashtray.

"You smoke too much," I said.

"And you don't smoke at all," she told me. "And you don't drink, and you haven't even touched your sandwich. Try and pretend this doesn't mean anything to you!"

"Very well," I said. "It means a lot to me. More than you know or can possibly guess." I leaned forward. "Are you sure you want me to answer your questions?"

"Quite sure."

"Very well. The man was Paul Sanderson's double. Had been for several years. As you yourself observed, Paul is getting along. He has to save himself for his work. When it comes to public appearances, going to parties and making a show for the usual publicity routine, the double took over. He was well-paid, perhaps too well. Apparently he gambled a lot. Apparently he welched a lot—or at least, once too often. Does that explain things?"

"Some of them. Why his voice sounded a bit different, for one thing. Although he had an uncanny physical resemblance to Paul."

"He was carefully selected," I told her. "And there was a bit of plastic surgery, too. A very competent doctor—"

"The same doctor you were going to take him to the other night?" she asked.

I realized I'd said too much, but it was done.

"Yes."

“Would his name happen to be Loxheim, by any chance?” My mouth hung open. “Who told you?”

She smiled at me. “I read it. Remember when I said I’d been doing a lot of thinking since Saturday? Well, I did a little checking, too. On Sanderson. And on you. I got hold of your press-book at the studio Saturday afternoon. It’s all down there in black and white. Black and yellow, really. Some of your press-clippings are pretty old, darling. Like that one from way back in 1936, when you had that accident playing polo. At first they thought you were going to die, but a few days later was this notice about your being moved from Cedars of Lebanon—to the private hospital of Dr. Conrad Loxheim.”

“He’s a wonderful man,” I said. “He pulled me through.”

“1936,” Kay Kennedy said. “That’s a long time ago. You were an independent producer then, and you’re an independent producer now. At least, everyone says you are. How come you’ve never made a picture on your own since then?”

“But I have, dozens—”

“Your name has been listed as an associate,” she corrected me. “Actually, you haven’t financed a thing. I checked.”

“So I dabble a bit,” I conceded.

“And yet you’re still a big man in Hollywood. Everybody knows you, you swing a lot of weight behind the scenes—and this in a town where nobody stays on top unless he’s active.”

“I have connections.”

“Like Dr. Loxheim?”

I tried to keep my voice down. “Look, Kay, we made an agreement. You’re not to ask questions. What do you want to know these things for, anyway?”

She shook her head stubbornly. “I told you the reason why the other night. You’ve got a secret I intend to learn. And I’m not letting go until I find out.”

Suddenly she put her head down on the table and began to cry.

"What's the matter?"

Her voice came to me, faint and muffled. "You hate me, don't you, Ed?"

"No. I don't hate you. I admire you. You've got guts. You showed it this morning when Sanderson came in. You showed it the other night when you snapped out of your shock. And I'll bet you've showed it all through the years, on the way up."

"Yes." The far-away voice was a little girl's voice now. "You understood, didn't you, Ed? When I told you about my folks, I mean? I wasn't being hard-boiled. I didn't want to see them die. It—it tore me to pieces inside. Only there's a part of me that can't be hurt. The part that makes me keep going, makes me keep reaching for the top. No matter what I have to do to get there. Oh, Ed, help me!" She lifted her face. "I'll do anything you want, I promise. You can take charge of my career, I'll ditch my agent, give you any cut you want, fifty-fifty, even."

"I don't need money."

"I'll marry you if you like, I won't—"

"I'm an old man."

"Ed, isn't there something I can do, some way I can prove myself? Ed—what's the secret?"

"Believe me, the time hasn't come to me again. We'll see." Maybe ten years from now, when you're established. Right now you're young, beautiful, everything is just beginning. You can be happy. I want you to be happy, Kay, honestly I do. And that's why I won't tell you. But this much I promise. Keep going. Make good, the way you intend to. And in ten years, come to me again. We'll see."

"Ten years?" Her eyes were dry now, her voice harsh. "You think you can fluff me off like this for ten years? Why, for all I know, you'll be dead by then."

"I'll be around," I promised. "I'm tough."

"Not tough enough," she flashed. "I'll wear you down." I nodded. She was right, of course. I could see that. She wasn't going to be stopped.

"And if I don't get the truth out of you," she continued, "I'll go to Loxheim myself. Something tells me I ought to meet that man."

I nodded again. "Maybe you're right," I said slowly. "Perhaps you ought to meet him, soon."

It wasn't easy for me to sell Dr. Loxheim the deal. Still, when I gave him all the facts, he finally had to agree.

"We have too much at stake to take any chances," I said. "You know that."

"What about the others?" he reminded me. "They are entitled to a say in the matter."

"Let them take a vote, of course. But it's the only way."

"You think this girl iss worthy?"

"Of course I do. Normally we'd take her in anyhow, after another eight or ten years. She's on her way up, you'll see. The only thing is, like I've explained, she won't wait. So we get her now."

"If the others are willing."

"If the others are willing. And they'll agree."

They did agree. We called a meeting that very night, at Loxheim's place, and everyone showed up. I told my story, and Paul supported me. That was enough.

"When does this happen?" Loxheim asked.

"The sooner the better. I'll make the necessary arrangements right away. You can expect her in about a week." And it was a week, to the very day, that I brought her in. Right after her picture was finished. Right after she was scheduled for a four-week vacation. Right after I'd personally escorted her over to Frankie Bitzer, my agent, and had him sign her up on a long-term.

After that we went for a drive.

"Where are you taking me?" she asked.

"To Loxheim's place."

“Ed—does that mean I’m going to find out the secret?”

“That’s right.”

“What made you change your mind?”

“You.”

“You do like me a little bit, don’t you?”

“I said so, didn’t I? And if I didn’t like you, I wouldn’t be letting you in on the secret. I’d have you murdered instead.”

She laughed, but I didn’t join in. Because I was telling her the truth.

Dr. Loxheim was waiting for us downstairs in his office, and he was very cordial. I’d made Kay promise not to ask questions until he had finished his examination, and she cooperated magnificently. He took a blood-test and a skin-graft, and did a tape-recording of her voice and even snipped off a lock of her hair.

Then he went on to a case-record session that lasted over an hour. He was very thorough, of course: not only did he get her complete history, plus all the names of acquaintances, but also a sort of inventory of her personal tastes—including some color choices and the brand-names of her cosmetics and favorite perfume.

All this was unnecessary, really, but he was the methodical type and wanted to be prepared for any emergency. I could see his point; if something went wrong and we had to make a fast, last-minute switch, he’d have the necessary data on hand.

But nothing had ever gone wrong in the past, and I was fully confident now. Besides, Kay didn’t object. She thought she was being psychoanalyzed, I guess.

Finally, when it was all over, she stood up.

“Well, I’ve answered a lot of questions,” she said. “And now it’s my turn to ask a few. First of all—when do I find out about this secret?”

She was looking at me, but it was Dr. Loxheim who answered her. “Why, right now, my dear,” he said. Coming up behind her, he deftly inserted the needle at the base of the brain.

I caught her as she fell, and we carried her into the surgery.

It takes about four weeks for the entire process. I’m afraid poor Loxheim didn’t get much rest.

As for me, I was busy on my own—quieting her studio, spreading the carefully-prepared story about her incognito vacation in Canada, and doing my own private interviewing. I spent a lot of time interviewing, but finally I came up with someone who satisfied me.

Then I had nothing to do but wait until the 29th day, when I could see her. Loxheim had kept her under drugs and sedation throughout, of course, but he assured me that for the past twenty-four hours she’d had nothing.

“She is quite normal,” he assured me.

“Normal?”

“A figure of speech.” He smiled. “I mean, I believe she iss in a condition where she iss capable of assimilating the truth.” He paused. “Are you sure that you don’t want me to tell her?”

I shook my head. “This time it’s my responsibility.”

“You will be careful of shock? She has come through everything wonderfully thus far, but one never knows. You remember how Jimmy took it when he found out—?”

“I remember. But he’s all right now. They get used to it, once they realize the significance.”

“But she iss still so young.”

“I warned her.” I sighed. “God knows, I tried. And I’ll tell her now, in my own way.”

“Good luck,” said Dr. Loxheim.

I left him and went into her bedroom.

She was resting quietly. Her head was on the pillow, but no sheet covered her body—just the long gown. Her eyes were open, of course, and they looked the same to me. Everything looked the same. Her voice hadn’t changed, either.

“Ed!” she said. “He told me you were coming, but I didn’t believe it.”

“Why shouldn’t I come?” I smiled down at her. “You’re well again. Didn’t he tell you that, too?”

“Yes. I didn’t believe him then, either.”

“You can believe me, though. You’re well, Kay. Come on, sit up! You can get up if you like. You can get dressed and go home, anytime you want to now.”

She sat up very slowly. “That’s right,” she murmured, in a small voice. “I can sit up. But Ed, there’s something funny about it. I don’t feel anything. That’s why I wasn’t sure, Ed. I don’t seem to have any feeling. I’m just—numb.”

“It’ll go away,” I assured her. “Once you get out, get some exercise and fresh air.” She stood up, and I grabbed her arm. “Take it easy, now,” I cautioned. “You haven’t been on your feet for a long time—bound to be a bit stiff. It’s like learning to walk all over again.”

Her feet moved jerkily, but she had coordination of a sort. I helped her to a chair. She sat down as if she had never done so before in her life. Her eyes went out of focus, briefly, then steadied. “There,” I said. “You see?”

“Yes. I’m okay, I guess. But Ed, I still don’t feel. I mean, it’s like my foot is asleep, only all over.”

“Don’t worry about it.”

“And that’s not all, either. Ever since I’ve been awake, I’ve stayed awake. For days and days. I told Dr. Loxheim about it, asked him to give me some kind of sedative, but he wouldn’t do it. Claimed it was dangerous. So I’ve just stayed awake, night and day. Peculiar thing is, I don’t seem to be tired.”

I nodded.

“In fact, I don’t seem to be anything. I’m not a bit hungry. Or thirsty. And I don’t even—”

She hesitated, and I patted her shoulder.

“I know all about that, too. It doesn’t matter.”

“Doesn’t matter?” She frowned. “Ed, what happened to me? Dr. Loxheim wouldn’t tell me a thing. I know he did something to me in the office—when was that, how long ago? And I think I had an operation. A long, long operation, or many operations. I just can’t remember.” She paused. “When I woke up, this last time, and stayed awake, I tried to remember. But I couldn’t.”

“That bothered you?”

“Yes. And something else bothered me even more. I wanted to cry, and I couldn’t.” Her eyes were wide as she looked up at me. “Ed, tell me the truth. Did I go off my rocker? Am I in some kind of sanatorium?”

I shook my head.

“Then what happened? What happened to me?”

I smiled. “What you wanted to happen. You learned the secret.”

“The secret?” She remembered, all right. I could tell she remembered everything up until the time the needle hit home, so I wasn’t worried any more. She’d come through, and I’d be able to talk to her now.

“Yes,” I said. “Loxheim’s secret. Our secret. The secret you wanted to learn, so that you could get into the Top Ten and stay there. Don’t forget, Kay, you said you were willing to do anything if you could make it. Well, you have. So you mustn’t be frightened.”

“What did Loxheim do to me?” she asked. Her voice was calm, controlled. “Who is he, anyway?”

I sat down next to her. “I’m somewhat surprised you don’t know,” I said. “You seem to be such an expert on motion pictures. Still, I guess the technical experts never rated much attention, particularly back in the early days of the talkies.

“That’s when Loxheim came over here. He did some work on animation for a couple of studios, about the time Cooper and Schoedsack were turning out KING KONG. His specialty was lifesize figures; he had a few original processes of his own that were too expensive for the Germans to try. Well, they turned out to be too expensive for us to try here. It was marvelous stuff; not just papier-mache and machinery, and not just clockwork either. After all, he was a physician and a brilliant one. Surgery and anatomy and neurology—the works. But there was no place for him in spectaculars.

“He opened up a little clinic in Beverly Hills as soon as he managed to get a license to practice, and went back to surgery. Plastic surgery—that was the most profitable. Built up a few faces and along with them, a reputation. He made money. And on the side, he continued his studies. And gradually, he perfected the process?"

"What process?"

"Let him explain it. I still don't pretend to understand all the technical jargon. What I do understand is what the process has meant to me. And to the big names—the stars you were wondering about, the ones who seemed to be able to go on forever. People like Sanderson, and a dozen others.

"We formed sort of a closed corporation, Kay. Just a few of us—those able to afford the kind of an oneration that costs two hundred thousand dollars to perform. Those who could see the advantages of remaining on top for twenty years or longer, staying young and fresh while their doubles went out and did the routine things to allay everyone's suspicion. You never suspected it, did you Kay? Even after you found out about Sanderson's double, you never suspected Paul. You yourself told me he didn't drink, didn't sweat under the lights, never got tired, never made love. And still you didn't realize the truth. I can tell you also that he never eats, never sleeps. Because he doesn't have to. Not with his brain and vital organs harnessed to synthetic nervous system in a synthetic body."

Her hand went to her mouth, then dropped.

"That's the secret, darling. The big secret of the biggest names. Only a few of them keep going, because only a few of them were willing to take the risk, pay the price. Only the ones who placed fame and stardom above the petty pleasures of so-called 'living'. Only the ones who were willing to give up eating and drinking and sleeping and loving—because they ate, drank, slept and loved fame alone.

"You said that's the way you felt, Kay. You weren't willing to wait ten years until you were old, ready for the junk-heap. You begged to have the secret now. And you have."

Kay stood up. She moved jerkily, like a doll.

"Easy," I said. "You'll have to learn how to control yourself. Not that you'll chip or break—the housing is almost indestructible. But there's a different balancing-system, and the ears lack the semicircular canals. Also your depth of focus is altered."

She gaped at me. "I thought I was mad," she said. "But I was wrong, wasn't I? You're the crazy one, Ed. Admit it. Telling me I'm some kind of automaton—"

"Take a pin," I suggested. "You'll find you won't bleed."

"Where is Dr. Loxheim? I want to see Dr. Loxheim at once."

"Relax," I said. "He'll be in presently. You can have all the proof you want. Tonight we'll call a meeting and get the whole gang in, Paul and the rest of them. Sort of get acquainted a bit. All but Betty—I forgot, she's turned off this month."

"Turned off?"

"Yes. That's part of it, don't you see? To rest. Conserve energy. Let the doubles do the work, between pictures. You last longer. Of course we can't allow any star to remain on top more than twenty, twenty-five years at the most, because then the public would get suspicious. After that, they just retire. But they can last indefinitely, if they rest. Loxheim says maybe two or three hundred years. Without aging, mind you. So it won't be so bad, once you get used to it. Ask Paul."

She reeled across the floor. "Paul. Betty. They're all friends of yours, eh?"

"Associates, darling." I smiled. "That's my secret. You asked me once how it was that I was still a big name in Hollywood, yet hadn't made many films on my own in years. It's because I happen to have these associates. All of them are indebted to me for the opportunity to remain on top. All of them work through my agent, Bitzer. I get my percentage. Just as I will from you."

She was trying to open the door now, trying not to hear me. I felt very sorry for her, but I continued to smile. I had to remain calm, for her sake.

"Don't do anything rash, Kay," I advised her. "Think it over. Tomorrow you'll feel better. Then you can meet your double and we'll start making the necessary plans."

“Double?”

“Certainly. I told you a double is necessary. I have selected an extraordinarily talented young lady for the role. Not only does she bear a remarkable physical resemblance to you, but she also has considerable histrionic ability of her own. Through studying your pictures she’s managed to pick up most of your mannerisms, and the rest she can acquire from firsthand observation. She has your voice down pat from Loxheim’s tape-recording, and she’s memorized all the material you gave him on your life, habits, and tastes. You’ll supplement that. Work things out together.”

I paused. “And by the way, I don’t think we need worry about her behaving foolishly on her own, like Paul’s double did. This young lady happens to have a criminal record, and I know about it. Also she knows that I know. So you see, she’ll stay right in line. I think you’re going to like her. I certainly hope so, because you’ll probably be living together for a good many years.” I walked over to the door and drew her away. “Might as well stop trying,” I said. “The door is locked.”

Now she faced me and I read unreason in her eyes.

“Double,” she whispered. “So that’s it! Now I begin to understand. It’s a trick, isn’t it? You’ve got a double, all right, and you and Loxheim and this agent Bitzer are all in on it together. Paul Sanderson too, probably. You think you can drive me crazy—or at least get people to think I’m crazy, if I tell them such a story. And meanwhile, you pull a switch, put this double in my place, pocket the money.”

I put my hands on her shoulders. Staring her right in the eyes, I shook my head.

“No darling. That’s a wonderful idea for a plot, but it isn’t true. What’s true is that you’re an automaton now. And once you face the fact, you’ll find it isn’t as bad as you think. I know.”

“You?”

“Of course. Why do you think I control the secret? Because I was the first. Loxheim was my friend, and after the accident in the polo game, he came to me at the hospital where I lay dying. I gave him permission to take me to his clinic, gave him permission to experiment. When it was successful, I realized what he had—what could be done with the process, once the right people were approached. And through the years I've done just that. There are only a dozen or so, as I say, but we're the insiders. We're the secret rulers of Hollywood, the walking shadows, the dreams that never die. We're the immortals who welcome you now to our company."

She wasn't ready yet, she couldn't accept. I saw it in her eyes.

So I took my hand away from her shoulder, fished in my pocket, and pulled out the pin.

"Here," I said. "Test yourself."

She stared down at the pin and her face worked. "No," she murmured. "It's another trick. It's all a trick, a trick to drive me crazy. I'm not a robot, it can't be, how can you stand there and smile at me, how can you lie like that, stop smiling, stop it, stop it—"

And then she reached out and swept the pin from my hand as her arm came up. Her nails clawed at the side of my face.

After that she stood there and screamed until I pressed the top of her head. The scream died away and she collapsed. I left her where she fell and picked up the phone.

Loxheim answered. "Well?"

"Hysteria, of course. But she'll be all right. I think we can call Bitzer tomorrow and tell him to sign her with the studio for a new deal. Be down in a moment."

I hung up. Then I opened the closet door and got out her new box—the one Loxheim had built, with the velvet lining and the airholes. The respiratory system still works on oxygen principle.

I fastened the loops around her neck and hung her up. Just before I closed the lid I took another look at her. She was great. And she'd look just as great ten years from now, or twenty. Like a million bucks. A million bucks at the boxoffice.

She belonged in the Top Ten, all right.

For the first time I was satisfied I'd done the proper thing. I put her away and headed for the door, whistling.

Just before I went out I remembered something. I walked over to the mirror and sure enough, there it was. Poor kid, I didn't blame her for getting upset, seeing it was the first time.

When she clawed me, she'd ripped a few strips of plastic off my cheek, exposing what was beneath.

I stood there looking at the bright, gleaming metal for a moment, then turned away and started downstairs.

Alternate Universe

The drug from the new mescalin derivative had opened a doorway to a parallel world existing in a dimension side by side with our own. But was it a better world?

STANLEY HUNTER strolled into the office wearing a pearl-gray homburg and matching gloves.

“Nice day for sex,” he remarked.

Tom Morton merely grunted. He had heard his bachelor partner voice this sentiment before—in fact, he voiced it every day, rain or shine.

Fortunately for the business affairs of Bio Laboratories, Stanley Hunter confined himself to the sale s-promotion end. Maybe his consuming interest in human biological affairs helped him to sell biological products to pharmacists.

Tom Morton didn’t much care, as long as he was permitted to devote his own attention to research and experiment. He picked up a small vial from the desk and squinted at it.

“What have you got there?” asked Stanley Hunter. “Some new aphrodisiac, I hope?”

“Not exactly,” Tom answered. “In fact I don’t quite know what this is. Some off-trail derivative of mescalin hydrochloride. The boys from the lab just sent it in for testing.”

“Mescalin?” Stanley Hunter sounded a little vague. “Isn’t that the stuff junkies use when they want to climb the walls?”

“Melons Huxley isn’t a junkie,” Tom told him, scowling. “This drug has unusual properties—you must, have read about it. It. expands the threshhold of consciousness, alters the time-sense. From some reports, it even gives the illusion of time-traveling. And the potentials of a new derivative like this; have never been explored.”

“You’re going to monkey around with it, eh?”. Stanley Hunter murmured. “I suppose that means you’ll be cluttering the place up with a lot of guinea-pigs again.”

“Not at all,” Tom assured him. “There’s only one way to test this preparation, and that’s subjectively.”

“You mean you intend to swallow the stuff?” his partner groaned. “Be careful, boy! Remember the time I decided to take a nip of cantharadin—”

“Don’t worry, it can’t harm me in this quantity.” Tom’s eyes gleamed behind the spectacles. “Think of the possibilities, man! Suppose we could alter our perception sufficiently to really travel in time—there’s no end to what might happen.”

“Maybe so.” Stanley Hunter tipped his homburg. “Go ahead and pi ay around with it this afternoon if you like.’ As for me, there’s no time like the present, I always say. And I intend to make the most of if.”

“Off to the races?” Tom inquired.

“Just off.” Stanley Hunter whistled and sauntered toward the door. “Take it easy, now. Don’t mess with the mescalin.”

He made his exit, but Tom was scarcely aware of his departure. Already he had pen and notebook ready. He buzzed his receptionist and instructed her not to disturb him with any calls, then drew the blinds and sat down behind his desk again. He uncorked the vial.

400 mgs. of a new mescalin hydrochloride derivative, swallowed at—let’s see now—1:30 p.m. April 12th.

He made the notation, then hesitated.

Actually, this was all very unscientific. What he ought to do was bring in a volunteer, rig up a whole series of testing devices to check reactions, conduct the experiment in the presence of a physician. That was the scientific way.

But then Tom, being a true scientist, was unscientific. He wanted, more than anything else, to enjoy the thrill of a new discovery; the intimate, personal thrill of being first. The first to explore a new realm of hyperconsciousness, a new dimension of awareness, a new world of sensation. If Stanley Hunter thought this was a nice day for sex, then why wasn't it a nice day for something completely novel, something transcending sex?

Tom blinked at the thought. Sex. Hadn't he better call Ann first, just in case something could happen? But no, there was no sense in needlessly alarming her. And besides, she generally took a nap in the early part of the afternoon. He could tell her all about it tonight. But right now—

TOM raised the vial to his lips, and drank.

For a moment nothing happened.

For an hour nothing happened.

For a century nothing happened.

Except that Tom was aware he couldn't estimate duration—moment, hour, century were all the same. He tried to focus his eyes on his wrist-watch, but he couldn't find it. He couldn't find his wrist, he couldn't find his arm, he couldn't find his body.

He had no body.

He just was.

Where were the glowing colors Huxley and the others had written about? Where were the strange sounds, the weird visions? Tom was conscious only of himself, swirling in emptiness.

But he was conscious, was himself. He could still reason logically. This wasn't the usual mescalin reaction because he hadn't swallowed the usual compound. He’d taken something new. This was something new.

All at once, he was back in his own body again, back in his own office. He could feel, he could see.

Everything remained unchanged. There was. a slight humming sensation, a faint vibration, and his vision wavered just a trifle as though what he saw was being projected by a faulty television-tube. But there were no hallucinations. He was aware of a normal self in a normal world.

For a moment he was conscious only of a terrible disappointment. To have expected so much and then to get no reaction at all!

Tom stood up, and then it happened.

He burned.

He began to burn all over. That’s the way Stanley Hunter had said he felt, the time he swallowed the cantharadin extract. That’s the way Tom himself had felt, with Ann, on their honeymoon.

A nice day for sex.

No reaction, eh?

Tom began to tremble. This stuff had a reaction, all right. A totally unexpected one, but it was there. He felt like a satyr, like Pan, like Elvis Presley doing a second chorus.

His hand reached out to press the buzzer. He’d get his secretary in here, that’s what he’d do, and—

No. Ann wouldn’t like that.

Besides, he didn’t have to. Because he had Ann, didn’t he? Ann was home right now, in bed, taking a nap.

All he had to do was sneak out the side-door, hail a cab, drive home, open the door, tiptoe upstairs—

And something had happened to his time-sense after all, because he was doing those very things, doing them so rapidly he was scarcely conscious of a moment elapsing.

On the other hand, maybe his consciousness was completely preoccupied with the burning sensation. All he could think of was his body.

Now he was going through the downstairs hallway, noting the table next to the stairway. No letters on it. Good. He wasn't in the mood to stop and read any letters, anyway. All he could think of was his body. And hers.

HER body was on the bed, in the bedroom. The shades were down, but he could see her. The gorgeous gleaming. It was warm, and she hadn't bothered to wear anything.

Ann, sleeping. The gorgeous gleaming. The burning. Should he wake her up? Yes, but in his own way.

Tom set about it, and apparently she had no objections to his methods. In fact her cooperation was altogether—and mutually—satisfactory.

Then the burning subsided and there was only the gorgeous gleaming, and Ann giggling, "Oh, Tom you surprised me!"

"Didn't I, though?"

"Yes." She sighed, snuggling gracefully, then stiffened. "But think of the chance you're taking! What if he found out?"

"He?"

"Stanley, of course."

"Stanley Hunter? You mean my partner? What's he got to do with us?"

"He'd have plenty to do if he knew about this." Ann giggled again. "Don't forget, he's more than your partner. He also happens to be my husband."

"Stanley—your husband?"

"Maybe you have your dates mixed, darling. Is today the day you planned to sneak in on some other girl, you bachelor wolf, you? Get with it, boy—this is Ann Hunter you're talking to."

Tom tried to read her face in the dimness. "Are you kidding?" he gasped. "Darling, you're my wife."

"It'll never stand up in a court of law," Ann assured him. "Come on, stop teasing. Or if you must tease, think of another way. Like this, for instance."

Ann thought of another way, and Tom pretended he did, too. But actually all the while he was conscious of reeling instead of reality.

He was the bachelor and Ann was married to Stanley. But that was impossible! He knew who he was, what had happened. He didn't have anything wrong with his memory. He recalled meeting Ann four years ago. Why, Stanley had even introduced them. Maybe Stanley had gone with her for a while before then, but he had no intentions of ever marrying her. And he hadn't married her. Tom did. He remembered their wedding-day, their honeymoon, everything. Stanley was still a bachelor. Just this afternoon he'd walked into the office and—

The office. That's where Tom had swallowed the mescalin derivative.

It all came back to him now, and so did the consciousness of that faint humming vibration. The room was shimmering, even Ann's gorgeous gleaming rippled in waves.

"Darling, what's the matter?"

"Nothing. Got to go now."

THEN everything speeded up like a fast film, or a tape-recorder being run at double speed. What he said and what Ann said sounded like gobbling. He was dressing, walking, running, hailing a cab, riding, zooming up in the elevator, opening the door, falling into his chair behind the desk. He was falling, falling, falling—

And he landed.

Landed in his own office, landed at precisely 3:10 by the watch on his wrist, which was ticking normally now without the slightest suggestion of a humming noise in the background to interfere.

There was no vibration, no burning sensation. All Tom knew was that he was tired, and drenched with perspiration.

He reached for the carafe on the desk and poured himself a glass of water.

What a nightmare!

Then he stared down at the empty vial. Suppose it hadn't been a nightmare? He'd swallowed the stuff, hadn't he? And passed out for a little over two hours?

But any other explanation was absurd. The whole thing was a trick of the subconscious. Sure, that was the answer. The old subconscious. Instead of expanding perception this drug expanded the imagination.

Tom nodded wisely at himself in the silver, mirror-like reflection of the water-carafe. Then he leaned forward and stared.

Even the blurred image showed the red stains on his mouth and face.

He rubbed a finger across his lips, then brought his hand away. He recognized the lipstick smudges, and now he could smell a familiar perfume. Ann's perfume.

So he had been somewhere.

Where?

The answer was beginning to form. He'd hoped for a timetravelling effect, but the drug didn't exactly work that way.

Suppose, instead, it opened another doorway? A doorway to a world of if, a parallel world existing in a dimension side-by-side with our own, an alternate universe?

In this world, Stanley had married Ann and rented the same house Tom would have picked.

Now he was getting confused, because it wasn't a question of "would have picked"—Tom had picked the house in the present world. If this was the present world.

TOM had to find out. He knew he had to find out at once, or he couldn't stand it. Maybe it was a toxic reaction from the drug; but he knew he was on the verge of flipping.

But what to do? He couldn't just get on the phone and call Ann and ask her if he was really her husband in this world.

"Get a grip on yourself," he muttered. "There's an easier way. A sensible way."

And he found it. Carefully wiping the rest of the lipstick from his face, Tom buzzed his secretary. "Mr. Hunter still out? All right." He hesitated; then took a deep breath. "Did my wife call?"

"No, Mr. Morton."

Tom clicked off, the grateful sigh rushing from his lips. "No" meant "Yes." It meant yes, he was married, Ann was his wife, he was in this world.

The best of all possible worlds, he told himself.

All this business of yearning for new sensations was nonsense. He ought to be content with what he had. Ann, for example.

And right now, even without the burning sensation to incite him, he was pleased to go home. With the curious feeling of retracing his footsteps, he left by the side entrance, hailed a cab, and drove to his house.

This time the sense of duration was normal. There was no humming or buzzing to interfere with his thoughts as he rode.

The mescalin derivative, now—what was to be done about it? Should he go ahead and set up an orthodox full-dress experiment?

No. Too dangerous. If what he had experienced was any indication, it would be better to forget the whole thing. Tell the boys in the lab they'd come up with a dud.

Maybe the doors had better remain closed. It was an ugly place. Best if no one else ever blundered into it.

Actually, he couldn't even tell Ann what had happened. She wouldn't like the idea of being an unfaithful wife, even in another world.

Tom made up his mind as he paid the cab-driver and went up the front steps.

His eyes searched out the name-plate in tire mailbox. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Morton. That resolved all his doubts.

He was in the right world at last. And at the right time. Upstairs Ann might still be in bed, gorgeously gleaming. And he could tiptoe in and awaken her—

Tom did tiptoe, into the hall.

He got as far as the stairs, then glanced at the little table. There were no letters on it.

But resting on the table-top were Stanley Hunter's gray homburg and his matching gloves.

Tom paused, staring.

This was it, then. He was in the right world, at the right time. And he could go upstairs and surprise his wife and his partner and raise a big stink and dissolve the firm and dissolve the marriage and—

The alternative? There was an alternative. A whole universe of alternatives, in fact. And somehow, in the light of what he had just discovered, it might not be so ugly after all.

A nice day for sex, eh?

Tom hesitated a moment longer, then smiled—and tiptoed out of the house again.

He wondered how long it would take the boys out in the lab to mix up another batch of that mescalin derivative.

THE END

Crime In Rhyme

A whimsical murder mystery? We didn't think it was really possible. Well, here's Mr. Bloch proving us wrong. Meet an extraordinary blend of the White Rabbit and a tough private eye . . .

MISS KENT APPROACHED THE cottage door and rapped sharply. It was really a darling place, she decided; for some reason it reminded her of the home of the White Rabbit in Alice in Wonderland.

When the door opened to reveal the occupant of the cottage, Miss Kent could not restrain a gasp. Aside from the length of his ears, the man standing before her might have passed for the White Rabbit himself. He was small, pale, pinkeyed, and his face ran largely to nose; his mouth was wobbly and his chin almost negligible. Also he was wearing a checkered weskit, and even as Miss Kent gazed at him he consulted his watch.

"I'm looking for Rickie Lane," she announced.

The man blinked at her and smiled. "Won't you come in, please?"

Miss Kent entered and found herself in a paneled hallway with mid-Victorian furnishings which heightened die resemblance to the world of Lewis Carroll and Tenniel illustrations.

"I am Archibald Pope," the little man said. "You must be Miss Kent, the lady who wrote about die secretarial position."

"That is correct," she admitted. "Is Mr. Lane at home?"

The little man nodded. "If you'll be good enough to step in here—" He waved her through a doorway and into a large parlor equipped as an office. Filing cabinets lined the walls, and the center of the room was dominated by a large desk on which stood an electric typewriter and a fluorescent lamp.

Little Mr. Pope walked over to the desk and sank into the chair behind it.

"Now, then," he said. "If I might have a look at your references, please?"

Miss Kent hesitated. "But I understand it was Mr. Lane who needed a secretary."

"So he does." The small man inclined his head. "I am Rickie Lane."

"But—"

Mr. Pope sighed. "You are disappointed because I choose to work under a pseudonym?" he asked. "Considering the somewhat—er—violent nature of my writing, it seems advisable."

Miss Kent flushed slightly. "It's not that," she confessed. "I hope you don't think me rude, Mr. Pope, but you just don't look like a writer."

Mr. Pope uttured a delighted chuckle and leaned back, running his hands through his white hair.

"Exactly, my dear lady!" he crowed. "I don't look like a writer, do I? Thanks to the photographs on the back of dust jackets, we all know what a writer looks like today. He is a scowling young Neanderthal with an unshaven chin that bristles nearly as much as his crew-cut. He wears a white T-shirt, and possibly a dog tag nestles against his hairy chest. That's your modern writer, eh?"

Miss Kent nodded. "If I remember correctly," she murmured, "there is just such a photograph on the back of all the Rickie Lane books."

"Indeed there is," Mr. Pope agreed. "Posed by a professional model—or, to be specific, a Greek gentleman my agent found washing dishes in a restaurant in Soho. Although completely illiterate, it happens that he resembles a writer. In some cases, his illiteracy would increase the resemblance. At any rate, I agreed to the deception in the interests of commerce."

“I understand,” said Miss Kent.

“Perhaps you’re disappointed?” Mr. Pope asked, softly. “I have had that trouble with secretaries before. They come to me with visions of working with a burly young brute, a hulking he-man who responds to the sight of a blonde the way Pavlov’s dogs responded to the dinner bell. If you had any ideas along these lines, then perhaps you won’t care to continue this interview.”

Miss Kent shook her head. “On the contrary,” she told him, “I’m greatly relieved.” Fumbling in her purse, she drew out a sheaf of letters. “My references,” she said.

“Thank you.” Mr. Pope barely glanced at them before placing the correspondence on his desk. “I presume you arc experienced in typing, filing, taking dictation and all the requirements my Times advertisement specified. But that’s secondary. What I am interested in is this—if you didn’t seek me out with the notion of taking a position under a virile creative man, then just what reason did you have for applying?”

“Because I am a Rickie Lane fan,” Miss Kent told him, earnestly. “I’ve read all your books.”

“Have you, indeed?” Mr. Pope glanced over at the bookshelf and smiled. “Read them all, eh? Then perhaps you’ll be good enough to favor me with your opinion. What did you think of the first one?”

“Mr. Mutin Takes a Gun?” said Miss Kent. “It hit the target, with me.”

Mr. Pope smiled. “How about Mr. Fyfe Takes a Knife?”

“Ripping.”

“And Mr. Frazer Tabes a Razor?”

“Keen.”

“Then there’s Mr. Flubb Takes a Club.”

“Smashing.”

“And my latest, have you read that—Mr. Saxe Takes an Axe?”

“Sharp and cutting. Penetrates deeply into your characters. Opens them up and lets the reader see what’s inside.”

Mr. Pope sat back and beamed.

"I am delighted to see that you are so perceptive a critic," he told her. "You may consider yourself hired as of now, if you wish. What do you say to room and board and twenty pounds a week?"

"Why, that would be wonderful, Mr. Pope." Miss Kent hesitated slightly. "But I'd intended taking a room in the village—"

"Nonsense, my dear girl! You'll stay here, of course. Plenty of room, and I can assure you I'm an excellent cook. I fancy a diet of cold mutton is not altogether to your taste, and the village inn offers little else."

"Yes, but—"

Mr. Pope glanced down at himself and smiled wryly. "I assure you there's nothing to fear from me," he said. "And if it's the neighbors you're worried about, we have none for a half mile around. I gather from your references that you are alone in the world—hence, I see no possibility of any scandal. And since I often find it necessary to work at night, your presence here will offer added convenience to us both."

Miss Kent fluffed her blonde curls nervously. "Very well," she answered. "I accept your offer. When do we begin?"

"Immediately," said Mr. Pope, rubbing his hands together briskly. "My next manuscript is due at the publisher's in a fortnight."

"How thrilling!"

Mr. Pope sighed. "I can hardly agree, inasmuch as I have yet to write a single line."

"What seems to be the problem? Can't you think of a plot?"

The little man shook his head, "I see you don't understand," he said. "To me a plot is relatively unimportant. You've read my work, and the stuff other writers turn out. What does the plot consist of? Rickie Lane is a private eye who writes in the first person singular—although not quite as singular as some others I could mention. He stumbles on the corpse of a beautiful woman, and since he is not a necrophile there is only one thing to do. He must solve the crime. During the course of the story he beats up various thugs and is in turn beaten up; he is approached by various voluptuous and full-breasted females and he approaches them in turn.

Eventually he discovers that the most voluptuous female of all is the killer, and he shoots her in the end, or the navel, or the ensuing melee. The plot, you see, is secondary to the real problem."

"But I should think the real problem is finding the murderer."

"For the reader, yes. But not for the author. His problem, in writing the story, is to find the crime."

"I never thought of it that way before." Miss Kent nodded. "But it makes sense, doesn't it?"

"Of course it does. That's where I got the whole idea for my series. One day a phrase just happened to pop into my head—a common phrase which often passes unnoticed. Poetic justice. It was then that I began to think of crime in rhyme. My titles came about inevitably. But in each case the murder itself was the most important element."

"You had to plot perfect crimes?"

Mr. Pope shook his head, "imperfect crimes," he said.

"I'm afraid I don't understand."

"There's no trick to plotting a perfect crime," he explained. "Scotland Yard tells us a murder is committed in real life once every twelve minutes. Further statistics reveal that a good half of these murders remain unsolved. Ergo, one unsolved murder every twenty-four minutes; sixty perfect crimes committed each and every day, or close to twenty-two thousand a year."

"You're quite an expert," Miss Kent beamed.

"I should be. After all, it's my business. And as an expert I assure you that the perfect crime is the least of my problems. It's trying to invent a crime that looks perfect but contains a basic flaw or error in commission—a flaw that Rickie Lane can discover and which leads to his solution of the killing."

"Now I'm beginning to see what you mean," Miss Kent said. "And that's what you're looking for now?"

"Desperately," Mr. Pope admitted.

"I'm afraid such matters are a little out of my ken," the girl told him, "But perhaps if we were to talk about it—"

Mr. Pope rose. “Later,” he said. “But I see I have been a poor host. Let me get your valise from the hall and show you to your room. Undoubtedly you would like to freshen up a bit after your trip. That train from London is abominable.”

He led her upstairs and into a quite comfortable apartment. “The bath is at the end of the hall,” he informed her, “just past my room and die storeroom. I’ll leave you to your own devices for a time while I take a turn about the garden. The sunset may provide inspiration.”

He bowed and withdrew.

Miss Kent didn’t bother to unpack. She waited until Mr. Pope had left the cottage and then sought out his room. For a time she was quite busy there, pausing in her efforts only to cock an ear for the sound of footsteps. Hearing nothing, she continued her activities, then transferred her attention to the storeroom.

It was necessary for her to force the lock, but this she did both expertly and effortlessly. Once inside, Miss Kent found herself amply repaid for her trouble—so much so, indeed, that she soon became completely engrossed. In fact, she forgot to listen—until it was too late.

She knew it was too late when she looked up and saw Mr. Pope standing in the doorway.

“Well, well,” he observed mildly. “What have we here?”

Miss Kent faced him serenely. “What haven’t we here?” she asked. She pointed to an array of objects unearthed from a small trunk in the corner. “A .38 Webley automatic—the same weapon you described in Mr. Munn Takes a Gun. A pearl-handled dagger with more than a suspicion of rust on the tip—just like the one mentioned in Mr. Fyfe Takes a Knife. And this straight-razor could not have got all these stains even if it had been legitimately used by a sufferer from chronic hemophilia. It reminds me of the murder weapon in Mr. Frazer Takes a Razor. Certainly there’s no doubt about the blood on the end of this club—it is exactly as depicted in Mr. Flubb Takes a Club. As for the axe, it might be the former property of Miss Lizzie Borden, but I rather think it is the original specimen described in Mr. Saxe Takes an Axe.”

Mr. Pope pursed his lips speculatively. “Quite right on all counts,” he said. “I see there is little sense in any further attempts to conceal my methods. Like all true literary artists, I rely heavily on personal experience in my work. The autobiographical approach, you might say. I find it best to derive the bulk of my writing from life.”

“From death, you mean.”

“As you will, dear lady.” Mr. Pope shrugged. “Let us not quibble over details.”

“Details? You’ve virtually admitted to committing five murders.”

“Over a five-year period,” Mr. Pope said, gently. “Allow me to refresh your memory as to the statistics. My contribution to them is slight—merely one out of nearly twenty-two thousand per annum. And in return, my contribution to the world of crime literature is great.”

He took a step forward and his voice grew stronger. “The killer instinct is basic in us all,” he told her. “Even a young lady like yourself gets a vicarious thrill from reading a gory mystery, and so do beardless youths and gentle clergymen and elderly dowagers. Yours is a harmless sublimation, but the urge is there—an urge strong enough to set you reading. But consider, if you will, how much stronger the urge must be to set a man writing this sort of thing.”

“That’s no justification,” Miss Kent protested.

“I do not need justification,” Mr. Pope replied. “My work speaks for itself. During the past half dozen years I have moved about the country under various names and disguises, and as a result of my endeavors five women have met an untimely end. But think, for a moment, of all the lives I must have saved! Think of the girls like yourself who found harmless outlets for your own homicidal tendencies in my books; think of the young men who used me as a surrogate for their own violent impulses, and the oldsters who refrained from killing their spouses and sought satisfaction through my work. Why, I must have averted hundreds of tragedies! That’s the practical way to look at it. And from the purely critical standpoint you admitted that my work was—what did you say?—ripping, keen, smashing, eh?"

"Bloody awful," Miss Kent snapped, "if you must know the truth."

"Now, now," Mr. Pope chided. "Temper, dear child! Let us have none of that. You remind me of someone I once knew in Herts. When she—"

"The widow," Miss Kent interrupted. "The one they thought shot herself while looking through her husband's gun collection. You used that situation in your first book."

"So I did."

"And there was the girl in Rainham, and the woman in Manchester, and the chorus girl in Brighton—"

"Say no more," Mr. Pope murmured. "You have told me enough. Enough to realize that it was not idle curiosity which caused you to enter my storeroom, nor accident which brought you here. You, my dear lady, are nothing but a copper's nark."

Miss Kent drew herself up proudly. "I am nothing of the sort," she snapped. "I happen to be an employee of Scotland Yard."

"Then I take it I have been under suspicion for a considerable period?"

"That is correct, Mr. Pope, or whatever your name is. The variety of names and disguises you assumed threw us off for a time. Then somebody noted that within a year after the commission of each crime a new Rickie Lane mystery appeared. Similarity of weapons gave us the clue. We've had difficulty tracking you down, because your publishers work only through your agent, and he seems singularly elusive."

"I have no agent," said Mr. Pope. "He is as fictitious as the rest of my disguises." He paused. "Where are you going?"

Miss Kent edged towards the door. "I intend to ring up the Yard," she replied firmly.

"Can I not persuade you to change your mind? After all, think of the hundreds of slayings I've prevented—"

“I am thinking of the five you committed,” she told him. “I warn you,” she went on, as Mr. Pope inched forward, “you’d better not try to stop me. My superiors know I’m here.”

“But nobody knows I’m here,” he reminded her. “They’ll come looking for a Mr. Pope. Needless to say, I shall be long gone.”

“You can’t get away with it. You ran that advertisement for a secretary —”

“As bait, to draw Scotland Yard out, in the event that they suspected. It means nothing.” He strode quickly to the door and slammed it shut. “Now, then,” he said.

“I shall scream!”

“But not for long.” Mr. Pope stepped forward. There was a moment of brisk struggle, but the little man proved surprisingly strong. Within a few minutes Miss Kent lay on the floor, arms tied behind her and the useless screams dying in her throat.

“Hot work,” Mr. Pope observed. “I had better get rid of this muck before I continue.” Thoughtfully he removed the white wig, disclosing his head with its close crew-cut. Off came the spectacles, the putty nose, the built-up mouth, and the protruding teeth. In another moment he peeled off his weskit, sighing gratefully as he emerged from the garments to stand before her in a T-shirt. “That’s better, eh?” he said. He flexed his muscles tentatively.

Miss Kent shuddered. “Why, you look just like the pictures on the dust jackets!” she exclaimed.

“True.” He smiled down at her. “The Greek dishwasher in Soho is another invention of mine. I find the role excellent protective coloration. That is why, even if your police come seeking Rickie Lane, they shall never find him. They don’t know what he really looks like, or what he really is. They don’t know about any of us.”

“Any of you?”

The smile became a wolfish grin. “Yes. I told you the secret, but you didn’t realize it. About those of us who write murder stories, and who gain fame and fortune because our stories are so convincing. Naturally, we all write from life. And—oddly enough—most of us look alike too. Lombroso's old theory about criminal types, you know."

"But that's impossible! I've seen photographs of—"

"Yes. Of course you have. Do you think I'm the only one who's clever enough to use a make-up kit? Or to change my name? Most of the others use pseudonyms, too." His voice sank to a whisper. "Think for a moment. Who is Ellery Queen, really? Or Carter Dickson, or H. H. Holmes, or—"

"You can't mean it, not all of them!"

"Merely a theory, my dear. I speak only for myself when I tell you that your real detective-story writer conceals his identity and the crimes on which he bases his fictional narratives. I told you before that my chief problem is to concoct an imperfect crime—fundamentally, I am so constituted that I can ordinarily think only in terms of perfection. For I am a detective-story writer, and that means I am a master criminal."

Miss Kent writhed and tugged at her wrists.

"This time you won't succeed," she threatened. "They'll find you."

"Find who?" Mr. Pope shrugged. "My present disguise is abandoned. They'll never recognize me in my new one. And if they seek out Rickie Lane, their trail will end at that restaurant in Soho. Besides, they'll have quite a time discovering that you were the victim of foul play, not a suicide."

"Suicide?" Miss Kent gasped.

"Precisely. There will be an explanatory note, downstairs—everything is arranged. I perfected my plans during a walk in the garden just now, after I remembered that I had this."

He stopped and groped for a moment in the corner of the room, coming up with a length of hempen coil in his hands.

"I shall just throw one end over the beam here," he said.

"Wait!" Miss Kent begged.

He nodded regretfully, then shook his head. "I know how you feel, dear lady," he told her. "But there really isn't any time to spare. I told you my next manuscript is due at the publisher's within a fortnight. Ars longa vita brevis, you know."

Bending forward, he made a knot and fastened the loop about her throat.

The manuscript of Mr. Pope Takes a Rope reached the publishers precisely on the day of the deadline. When it appeared in print the critics were enthusiastic and the public ecstatic.

If Scotland Yard failed to share in die general enthusiasm it was merely because its operatives were trying in vain to unravel a knotty problem involving a noose, an apparent suicide, an abandoned cottage, and an untraceable gentleman who looked like a White Rabbit.

Meanwhile, bloodthirsty readers of Rickie Lane mysteries await the next volume in the series. As usual, there is no hint as to what may be forthcoming.

But just recently, in Cornwall, a debonair, mustachioed gentleman took up lodgings in the boarding house of an attractive divorcee.

The other morning he had occasion to step into the shop of the neighborhood ironmonger.

"My name is Mr. Stammer," he announced, "and I should like to purchase some household tools—"

Luck Is No Lady

Frankie hung onto the bar with both hands. If he let go, he might fall down. He didn't want to pass out, because this old Professor guy was talking to him. If he listened, maybe the old guy would keep on buying the drinks.

"Luck," said the old Professor guy. "That's what makes all the difference in the world. Five years ago I was a respected member of the faculty here at the university. Today, owing to the vicissitudes of fortune—"

He paused and sighed. Frankie sighed, too. "I know what you mean," Frankie said. "I ain't used to being on the bum myself." Which was a lie, because Frankie had always been a bum. But he wanted to stay friendly; he wanted another drink. And sure enough, the old guy was signaling the bartender. He pulled out a half dollar and held it up in the air.

"Heads or tails," the Professor said. "Who can tell which it will be when I drop this coin on the bar? I can't. You can't. And neither can the bartender. A mathematician will say the chances are even, either way. Professor Rhine will tell you the odds can be modified. But no one knows. And there you have the Mystery of the Universe. None of us can foresee what luck will bring. Behold!"

Frankie had his eyes in focus now and he watched the coin drop. It hit the bar, bounced, then stood still—balanced on edge.

"Luck!" chuckled the old Professor guy. "Sheer luck, operating all around us, governing every move of our lives. If Lincoln had stooped to tie his shoelace at the moment Booth fired his shot—if the bird had not appeared when Columbus faced the mutineers—if! But we're all victims of Tyche."

"Tight," Frankie said. "I know I'm tight."

"You misunderstand. I was speaking of Tyche. Fortuna, the Romans called her. One of the Fates, a sister of the Parcae."

"Never met the dame."

"I can well imagine that." The old Professor guy smiled at Frankie over his glass. "But the ancients realized her importance. They held an annual festival in her honor. June twenty-fourth, I believe, was the date. I've seen her represented with a cornucopia in her hands, standing on a ball—"

"Let's have a ball," Frankie muttered. "One more drink and I'm gonna be all set for a ball."

"You shouldn't drink so much," the old guy told him.

Frankie shrugged. "Why not? What else is there to do? I ain't never had the breaks, not once. Look at me—a lousy, washed-up wino. I shake like an old man, and I'm only thirty-three. If I just got a decent chance—"

The Professor guy was nodding. "I know," he said. "I could tell you a similar story. And so could every man. One man takes his last hundred dollars and buys a shack on the beach—six months later they find him there, dead of starvation. Another does the same thing—six months later they strike oil on the shore, and he sells his property for a million plus royalties. One man walks down the street and finds a fat wallet in the gutter. Another walks down the same street a moment later, just in time to be hit by a falling cornerstone. Fortune is a fickle goddess, my friend. But who knows? Being fickle, she may reverse her attitude and visit you with wealth and happiness."

"Nuts!" said Frankie.

"There speaks the scientific mind," said the old Professor guy. "But I'm not so sure. If I could only learn the secret of what attracts Fortune, I'd ask for nothing else. Perhaps it's just a matter of real belief, or of worship. Fortune is a goddess and goddesses demand adoration. Being female, she requires constancy. Could it be that the so-called fortunate ones are merely those who have learned this secret and swear fealty to Fortune in return for her favors?”

“I dunno,” Frankie mumbled. “Me, I’d go all-out for any dame who’d change my luck.”

He picked up his glass, swallowed, then turned. But the old Professor guy had stumbled out. The bartender came up, shaking his head. “Funny how it hits them all of a sudden,” he said.

“Yeah,” Frankie answered. “But what gets me is why a guy like him hangs around this joint.”

“I dunno about that,” the bartender said. “We get some pretty classy trade, on account of the game in back.”

Then Frankie remembered. Sure, there was a back room here. Roulette, dice, the works. He’d never been back there because he never had a stake. But come to think of it, people had been crowding through all evening, passing behind him. Like the bald-headed jerk walking by now, and the college boy with the glasses, and the dame in red.

The dame in red—there was a real item!

Frankie hadn’t paid any attention to dames for a couple of months now. When you’re really on the juice, you get so dames don’t interest you. But this one did.

She wore this red sort of evening dress, and her skin was white as marble, and her hair was jet-black. Like her eyes. She looked at Frankie when she passed, and she smiled.

She smiled at him. The way he looked mustn’t have bothered her.

Frankie was high, or he’d never have done it. But he was high, so he floated after her. Floated to the door of the back room and stood behind her while the eye looked her over and gave the nod. And Frankie went right through to the back with her—the eye didn’t try to stop him. In fact, Frankie had an idea the eye was looking at him more than at her.

The room in back was bigger than he’d thought, and they had quite a layout. That crummy bar up front was only a blind. This was the McCoy—three big tables for roulette and four pool tables in the corners, for dice. And there must have been fifty people at least.

It was smoky back there, but not noisy. Even the dice-players were quiet, and when the wheel was spinning at a table you could notice the sound of the ball clicking. Frankie followed the dame in red over to one of the roulette tables. Lots of fat faces here, well-dressed citizens with plenty of moola. Big piles of chips in front of some. Little piles in front of others. And the wheel in the middle turning, the wheel with the thirty-six numbers and the 0 and the double-0, the wheel with the red and the black. Every time it turned, some of the piles would get smaller and other ones would get bigger.

Why?

Here it was, the thing the old Professor had been blabbing about. Fortune. Luck.

Some of the guys must have had a G or more in chips in front of them, and they kept on winning. Some of the others kept on losing and buying more: a dollar for whites, ten for reds, twenty for blues.

But win or lose, everybody was excited. Frankie could feel it coming off them in waves, the excitement around the table. Everybody watched every spin, every play. He watched, too, and felt the pressure. If he only had a stake now!

He looked over at the dame in red. She wasn't playing either, just standing and looking, same as him. Not quite the same, because she wasn't excited. Frankie could tell from the way she stood there, like a statue, sort of. Nobody else paid any attention to her, even though she was the hottest-looking dish in the joint. You'd think they didn't even know she was there, the way they ignored her and kept their eyes on the table, on the little silver ball bouncing around on the rim of the wheel.

And she watched, but her eyes never changed. She didn't clench her fists or breathe hard or even look interested, really. It was almost as if she knew who was going to win and who was going to lose.

Frankie stared at her, stared hard. All at once she turned her head and looked at him again. Those eyes were like a couple of black stones. He wanted to look away, but she looked away first. Her eyes glanced down at the floor.

Frankie bent over to see what she was looking at. And then he noticed it.

There was a chip lying there, right at his feet. It must have fallen off somebody's stack. Frankie bent over and picked it up, held it in his hand. A blue chip—twenty bucks. He could cash it in right now. There was some luck for you!

He started to look around for one of the cashiers who went through the crowd with their little boxes strapped on, but he couldn't spot one. And the stick was going into his act. "Place your bets, ladies and gentlemen—"

Why not? Twenty bucks found, that was luck. And maybe luck would hold. Twenty could get you forty. But which should he play, the red or the black?

Frankie looked over at the dame again. She had a red dress, that was a hunch. But her hair was black and her eyes were black. The black eyes were staring at him now—

Sure, he'd play the black. Frankie started to put his chip down, but his hand wasn't steady and the chip got away from him. It rolled and landed smack on number 33.

He made a move to reach out, but the stick said, "The bank is closed," and the wheel was spinning, and all he could do was stand there and watch. Twenty bucks tossed away like nothing, a rotten piece of luck. The wheel went round and round, the ball went round and round, the room went round and round.

The ball stopped. The wheel stopped. And the room stopped, too, so Frankie could hear the stick saying, "Thirty-three, black."

His number!

Then it started. The stick pushed this big stack of chips his way. And the dame in red smiled, so he put half the chips back on red. Red came up. He left the stack there and red came up again. Three straight wins in a row and he couldn't lose.

But the dame in red shook her head and edged away from the table, so he scooped all his chips together and gave them to the cashier. The cashier paid him off in twenties and fifties and hundreds. Three thousand and twenty bucks, cash!

Frankie stuffed it in his pockets, hurrying through the crowd because he wanted to see the dame again, thank her, maybe even give her a split.

The eye held the door open for him and the dame walked out ahead, and he called, "Hey, wait a minute!" and the eye looked at him.

"What's that, buddy?"

"I wasn't talking to you," Frankie said. "I was talking to the dame."

"What dame?" asked the eye.

Frankie didn't answer, because he could see her going out the front door of the tavern. He caught up with her on the corner. The fresh air hit him, made him feel slightly sick, but he floated over to her and said, "Thanks. You brought me luck."

She just smiled, and in the dim light her eyes were darker than ever.

"Here." He scooped out a handful of bills. "I figure you got this coming."

She didn't take the money.

"I mean it," Frankie said. "Go ahead." Then he stopped. "What's the matter, you deaf or something?"

No answer. That was it, all right. Imagine a classy dame like that, deaf. But couldn't they read your lips?

"Where you headed for?" Frankie asked her. Still no answer.

Maybe the dame was a dummy, too. No wonder she didn't have any boy friend.

"Wanna come with me?" Frankie asked. It didn't make sense that she would—a dame like her being picked up by a crummy bum. But nothing made sense any more; besides, he was too tired for sense. All he knew was that he had to get some rest and sober up. If she wanted to come with him, let her. Nobody'd say anything at the fleabag where he stayed. But he had to sleep now, had to.

He began to walk and sure enough, she followed him. Not a sound out of her, not even the clicking of high heels, because she was wearing sandals. No rings, no jewelry to clank. A beautiful dish, but like a statue.

And she stood like a statue in the middle of his dirty room.

Was she waiting for him to make a pass at her? All he knew was that he was tired, terribly tired. He dragged himself across the room, plopped down on the bed. He knew he couldn't stop himself from falling . . .

He must have slept that way all night, with his head in her lap. And she must have just sat there, not sleeping. Because it was morning now and she was looking down at him and smiling.

She smiled while he washed and shaved and changed into his other shirt. He tried to talk to her again, but she didn't answer. Just smiled and waited, waited until he put on his coat and picked up his hat.

"Come on," he said. "I'm hungry."

They went downstairs and out onto the street. Frankie was going into the Ace Lunch until he remembered he had three grand in his pocket. Why not eat in one of those nice big restaurants over on Main? But he couldn't go to a place like that, looking the way he did.

"Wait a minute," he told her. "I got shopping to do first."

She waited, smiled and waited, while he went into the Hub and bought himself an outfit. Everything from shoes up to a twenty-dollar hat. The ready-made fit perfectly and he looked like a million bucks for only a hundred and thirty.

The clerk was plenty polite, but he ignored the dame. Frankie didn't notice this so much, but afterwards in the restaurant the waitress acted the same way—brought him a glass of water and a menu, but nothing for her.

But it turned out she wouldn't eat anything, anyhow. He pointed at the menu and she just shook her head.

So he ended up eating alone. Then he sat back and tried to figure things out. Here he was with almost three grand still in his pocket. But he had her, too. Miss Can't-hear, Miss Can't-talk, Miss Won't-sleep, Miss Won't-eat. How about that, now?

She smiled at him and Frankie smiled back, but he was beginning to wonder. Sure, she brought him luck, but there was something screwy about her—something awful screwy. He'd have to find a way to shake her before he got in some kind of trouble.

He walked out of the restaurant and she tagged along. Usually he headed for a park-bench in the morning, but now as he got ready to cross the street he stopped. The dame was holding his arm and looking up at a sign, ACME-METAL PRODUCTS COMPANY. So what?

There was another sign in the front window of the building. She was staring at it. MEN WANTED.

He tried to take another step, but she held him. And now she was pointing. Frankie blinked. Was that what she meant? Did she figure on him going in there and asking for a job?

He could, of course. That'd been his line years ago. Still had his social security card, and he could probably get back in the union somehow, even in spite of the bum rap on him. But how could she know that? And what made her think he'd go back to being a working stiff, now that he had all that dough in his kick?

So Frankie shook his head. But she kept right on smiling and her arm kept right on tugging at his sleeve.

All at once he got an idea. "Okay," he said. "I'll do it. But you wait here." He pointed to the doorway, and sure enough, she walked over and stood there. He brushed past her to go inside and she gave him a big smile.

Once he got inside, Frankie started to smile, too. He knew what to do now. This joint must have a back entrance. He'd just slip out the other way. Simple.

Only this guy was standing in the hall, and he spotted Frankie and said, "You a machinist 'r a metalworker?"

"Coremaker," Frankie said. It slipped out natural, before he could stop it. "But I'm not union—"

"Neither is this plant, buddy. Come on in, fill out an application. Got a rush order, the boss's crying for help, and this town's murder when it comes to getting experienced—"

Before he knew it, the guy had him in the office and a fat character named Chesley was handing him a form.

Frankie was getting ready to tell him off when the door opened behind him.

They came in fast, two of them, walking like a couple of wound-up toys. Both of them had bandanas over their mouths. They must have put them on outside in the hall, before they'd pulled their rods.

Their rods were out now, and pointing. And one of them said, from under his bandana, "Stick 'em up and don't move."

There was Frankie and this Chesley and an old bookkeeper guy and the man who'd brought him into the office. They all got their hands up in a hurry.

"Over against the wall," said the first bandana-mouth. "Make it snappy." He walked over to the big wall-safe and waited.

They started moving. The old bookkeeper guy looked like he was ready to pass out. In fact, all at once, he did pass out.

"Catch him!" Chesley yelled. "He's got a bad heart!"

Both of the bandana-mouths turned and watched him fall. Frankie was watching, too. He didn't notice the big wastebasket in front of him until he walked right into it.

The basket went over with a clatter and rolled. It hit one of the gunsels in the shins. Frankie stumbled because of his tangling with the basket and fell forward. He grabbed for something to hang onto. And that turned out to be the nearest gunman's neck. All at once this fellow and Frankie were down on the floor in a heap and Frankie saw the gun in front of him. He reached for it because he was so scared he couldn't think to do something sensible like not grabbing the gun.

The other crook saw him grab for it and he jerked away from the safe. Just then the rolling wastebasket hit him in the shins. This startled him and he gave out a yell and turned. But now his back was to Chesley, and Chesley jumped him. Frankie got this crook's gun away from him, with a hard crack on the wrist, and covered both of the men while Chesley turned on the burglar-alarm.

There was plenty of excitement for the next half hour. When the cops got through talking to Frankie, there were reporters. When the reporters got through, there was Chesley again, and Frankie never did have to fill out that form.

Chesley was delighted that Frankie would be working for him, starting tomorrow.

Frankie was so confused he ended up walking out the front door. By the time he realized what he was doing it was too late to turn around. And there she was. She had been waiting for him all this time, and now she spotted him.

Like the old Professor guy said, everything was luck. The roulette wheel, and stumbling over the wastebasket, and now this job and a new, decent life ahead of him. Blind luck.

He stared at her. Now what? She was always around when things happened.

Frankie asked her to come to him with a jerk of his head, and she smiled. They walked down the street together and he bought some luggage and then he went into the Ardmoor and took a furnished suite, just like that. Two hundred clams a month, but no questions asked. The clerk didn't even look at her, and the bellboy took them up without a word, or even a know-it-all grin.

He flipped the kid a half dollar and then sat down on the bed. She stood in the center of the room and smiled.

"This is it, huh, kid? Well, make yourself at home."

He tried to light a cigarette, but it got on his nerves to see her just sitting there, smiling like a statue carved out of stone. Maybe the dame was feebleminded . . .

What he needed was a drink. A nice little drink before dinner. There was a cocktail lounge right downstairs in the Ardmoor, one of those high-class places, all dim and quiet. Peaceful as a church. A place where you could relax and drink.

Frankie stood up. “Wait here a minute,” he said. “I’m gonna go down to the lobby and buy a paper.”

She didn’t try to stop him—just smiled.

He walked downstairs and into the lounge. The bartender asked him what’ll it be and Frankie almost said, “Glass of musky,” before he remembered he didn’t have to drink rotgut muscatel wine any more.

“Rye on the rocks,” he said.

It tasted good.

“Do it again,” Frankie told the guy.

The guy did it. And this one tasted good, too. Everything was good here. The nice, soft darkness and the nice, soft music in the background. A guy could relax.

“The same,” Frankie said to the bartender.

He was feeling better and better. Why not? With his luck, nothing could go wrong. Not even with the dame.

Or because of the dame.

It hit him on the third drink. It had been in the back of his mind all along, and with the third drink it didn’t seem so crazy. The dame in red was Lady Luck.

“Hit ’er again!” Frankie said to the bartender.

What had the old Professor guy said? Maybe if you believed in her enough, she’d come to you. And he’d sort of had that feeling last night. It was screwy, but then luck is always screwy. Like the Professor said, some guys get all the breaks and others always wind up with the wrong end of the stick.

Sense or not, it had happened to him. He had Lady Luck right where he wanted her, on his side.

"One more," Frankie said.

It was the strangest, greatest feeling in the world, just sitting there and knowing that luck was with him now, smiling on him. Blind luck, dumb luck, but always smiling. Ready to give him everything and anything he wanted.

Frankie began to think about all the things he'd wanted during all the years he'd been wanting. One of those snazzy English cars. A place up in the woods maybe, with a private lake for fishing. And when he'd been in stir, he'd wanted a blonde more than he'd wanted anything else. Like that one sitting over there at the end of the bar.

She was a tall dame with bare legs. She had one of those fancy cigarette-holders and there was class written all over her. Kind of a doll Frankie'd never even had the nerve to look at twice.

But now, why not? Things were different now. He had luck with him. If he wanted something he could have it. Maybe she sent the blonde on purpose, knowing how he felt.

That was it. All he had to do was lean over and say, "How about a drink, baby?" Or maybe, "Would you care for a drink?" That would sound better, classier.

Sure it sounded classier, and it worked, too. She was moving over. Frankie stood up, feeling a little dizzy, and helped her onto the stool. Then he sat down again and had another and he felt fine, just fine.

He kept feeling better and better. Easy to talk, now. Her name was Margot. Not Margaret, but Margot. Only you said it "Margo." The "t" was silent. Silent like the dame in red, waiting upstairs. Maybe he ought to get back to her. But what for? She didn't eat; you don't have to feed Luck. Luck was free, everything was free and easy now.

It was easy to talk to Margot, too. Easy to tell her how lucky he was. How everything he touched turned to gold, like this King Midas or whatever the guy's name was they named that flour after.

So Frankie told her, and they drank, and he said how he'd just moved in, and how he'd foiled the robbery today and how he'd won all that dough last night. Only this was just the beginning, wait and see.

She said she'd like that—waiting and seeing. She called him "Frankie-boy," and said she was afraid she was getting just a wee bit drunkie.

Then the bar started filling up. And Frankie said how's for getting a bottle and taking it up to his room and drinking in peace?

And she said oh she didn't know about a thing like that, but he could see she was only stalling, and sure enough she finally said yes.

So the bartender wrapped a bottle and she carried it because it was hard for him to walk. And they went up the stairs and he leaned on her and he could feel how warm her skin was under her sleeve and he knew this was it, this was what he wanted more than anything.

But in the hall he remembered and told her to wait right where she was for a minute. He went around a corner and down a corridor until he came to his door.

Frankie unlocked it. She was still sitting there, smiling at him—hadn't moved a muscle since he left.

He stumbled over to her and he said, "Thanks. Thanks a million. But you gotta get out now or she'll see you. We wanna be alone, understand?"

She just sat there, not hearing. So he yelled it at her. And then he pulled her up and pushed her over to the door. It was like lugging a statue, but he made it. And he headed her down the hall past the blonde in the corridor, hoping she wouldn't see the blonde.

Only she must have, because she looked at him and stopped smiling. She stood there and her black eyes got that stony stare in them as she looked right through him.

He tried to grin and gave her a little push. "Go on," he said. "Come back tomorrow. Tha'sa good girl."

Then she was walking away and Frankie was walking away, back around the corridor to pick up the blonde and steer her into his room.

"Who were you talking to?" Margot asked. "Yourself?"

"Never mind," said Frankie.

She didn't mind and they had a drink together. And just to show her he wasn't handing out a line, he showed her his roll.

After that things were even better between him and the blonde. She said she liked him much, much more than a lot. But he was so loaded and so sleepy, he had a hard time keeping his eyes open.

Funny thing, just about then Frankie thought he heard somebody knocking on the door. He figured maybe it was the dame in red. But before he could even try to find out, he passed out.

When Frankie woke up, it was morning, full bright daylight. The blonde was gone. So was the dough; so was his new luggage, even. He found a dollar and thirty-five cents change in the back of his suit. And that was it, brother, you've had it.

He'd had it, all right. Because before he could pull himself together, the house manager was on the phone complaining, telling him he was to vacate the premises at once on account of disturbing the neighbors during the night.

Frankie tried to say something about a refund then, remembering that a buck thirty-five was all that he had left, but the house manager said one more word and he'd call the cops. Besides, he didn't want an ex-con for a tenant.

Frankie's head was splitting; he couldn't figure out how the guy knew about that.

Not until he got downstairs and bought a paper and saw the story about the robbery could he figure it. EX-CONVICT FOILS HOLDUP was the headline, and he read the story under it that was all about himself. All about himself, because some smart-aleck reporter must have checked the news files to see what he could find out about Frankie and ran across his name in an old story written at the time he got sent up.

So there was no sense going around to see Chesley for his job now. And the dough was gone, all on account of that dizzy, double-crossing blonde—

So it was gone. So what? That was just the breaks of the game. He could get more, with his luck.

With his luck.

But she was gone, too! And she was luck!

They must have thought Frankie was insane when he ran back to the Ardmoor and yelled to the manager about a dame in red. The manager hadn't seen her, of course. Nobody had seen her. Nobody but Frankie.

He went back to the restaurant and to the old flop, went everywhere he'd been. Nobody talked.

What had the old Professor guy called her? Fortuna, the fickle goddess. Fickle. Only he'd been the one who was fickle. He'd ditched her for a blonde, thrown her out for a double-crossing thieving blonde.

Frankie went up and down the streets all day, looking for the dame in red. But he never saw her. His feet got tired and his head hurt and he kept talking to himself.

Finally, he decided to try the tavern. That's where he'd met her in the first place. She might be hanging around in the back room, where the Wheel of Fortune turned.

It was getting dark and Frankie was a wreck. What with his hangover, and all that walking, and the funny feeling inside of him—not knowing what was real any more—he could hardly see.

He was just about a block away from the joint, when he blinked and straightened up. Somebody was coming out of the front door and it looked like the dame in red.

Frankie started to run. The dame was walking away, fast, and this time he could hear the hard click of high heels. Now that he was closer, he could tell it wasn't the dame in red.

Then he saw who it was. It was the blonde—Margot! She'd been in there, playing the wheel on his dough!

She was walking away fast in the other direction and wasn't yet aware of him sprinting towards her. He caught up with her just alongside an alley, and that was good, too.

Now Frankie knew that even though he hadn't seen the dame in red that morning, she was still with him. Because she'd arranged for him to find Margot again. So luck was still in there pitching for him.

So he knew just what to do.

He reached out and grabbed the blonde by her pony tail and yanked her into the alley, fast. She turned around and saw him, her mouth dropping open and her eyes getting as big as they could get.

"Where's the dough!" Frankie shouted, yanking her head back and forth. "Where's my dough!"

The blonde couldn't answer, because she was shaking so. But her bag fell out of her hand and landed on the bricks. It opened and a lot of lipstick and such spilled out of it. She pointed in the direction of the bag, gasping.

Frankie gave her one last angry shove. Then he got down on his knees and rummaged through the things that had fallen from her bag. He came up with a dollar or two in small change.

"You lost it!" Frankie yelled. "You lost it all! Talk about tough luck—"

Then he looked at her.

She was sitting on the alley pavement where she'd landed, sitting there with her back up against the wall. When Frankie had given her that shove, she'd banged her head, banged it hard, too, because there was blood running down the side of her face.

Frankie bent over and started to feel her forehead. But her head fell forward at his touch and Frankie could see right away that she was dead.

Frankie got out of the alley, fast. He wanted to run, but there was no place to go. When they found the blonde, he knew that they'd trace her back to the hotel, identify her, and tie him in, sooner or later. And with the tough luck he was suddenly having, it might as well be sooner.

In Frankie's hand was the mound of loose change. Just enough to buy a couple of drinks, maybe. So he walked down the block, went into the tavern, and slid onto his regular stool.

The old Professor guy was there, and Frankie wanted to tell him the story. He wanted to tell him because maybe the Professor could settle something for him that was very important. Had there really been a dame in red, or had Frankie imagined the whole deal?

So Frankie started talking to the Professor real fast, spilling it all out. The Professor was pretty loaded, just like Frankie had been the night before, but he seemed to get the drift.

“Hallucination,” he said. “It’s all in your mind. Reality in such cases becomes purely subjective. But is there an objective world? That, my harried friend, is the question.”

And then he set his glass down on the bar and stared at the door to the back room.

“Wait a minute,” he said. “Who’s she beckoning to?”

“I don’t see anybody,” Frankie told him.

“Then she must be looking for me,” the Professor said. He climbed down off the stool and staggered his way to the door. In a minute Frankie saw him standing there, moving his lips and gesturing, as if he were talking to someone. Then he nodded his head and held the door open for someone to go ahead of him into the back room and to its games of chance.

Frankie still couldn’t see anyone, but then he remembered what the Professor had said about Fortune being a fickle goddess and all that. So maybe she had a new friend now, who maybe would treat her better. On the other hand, the Professor could have caught this hallucination business from him like you catch measles or a cold in the chest. But maybe they were both crazy. Maybe the whole thing was just in their imaginations.

Maybe he’d even imagined murdering the blonde. By this time, Frankie didn’t know just what to believe. Until all at once he could hear the sirens outside, and he knew that at least a part of it hadn’t been his imagination.

The sirens got louder, and Frankie picked up his glass.

“Here’s luck,” said Frankie.

And then the cops walked in.

The Cure

when your girl goes mad in the jungle, there's just one thing to do

IT MUST HAVE BEEN after midnight when Jeff awoke.

The hut was dark, but moonlight streamed through the doorway. As Jeff rolled over, he could see Marie standing beside his hammock.

She was stark-naked.

The long golden flame of her hair shone against the whiteness of her breasts, and there were little flecks of light dancing in her eyes.

Jeff held out his arms and she moved forward, smiling.

Then the knife came down.

Jeff caught the reflection of the moonlight on the steel, caught it just in time to twist his body to one side. There was a harsh, ripping sound as the blade of the machete slashed through the coarse canvas of the hammock.

He grappled with her, his hands sliding across the warm weight of her body, slippery with sweat. Marie made sounds deep within her throat and slashed at him again. The machete bit into Jeff's ankle, and he screamed.

Then a dark form blotted out the moonlight from the doorway, hurtled forward, and pinned Marie from behind.

"Senor, you are all right?"

"I guess so." Jeff clambered out of the hammock, gasping at the sudden surge of pain in his ankle as he found the lamp and lit it.

Luiz was standing behind the naked girl, pinning her arms to the wall. He stood quite calmly—a little man with a brown face and long black bangs who could have passed for a wooden Indian. A wooden Indian with a machete of his own in his hand, pressed against Marie's naked throat.

"Yes, senor?"

"No!" Jeff muttered. "Don't!"

Luiz shrugged and let the machete fall but did not release the girl. There was no expression in his muddy brown eyes.

Marie began to whimper.

"I'll kill you, Jeff, I swear it! You thought I didn't know, but I do. The money came, didn't it? You and Mike have the money. You're going to run away and leave me here to die. But I won't let you. I'll kill you first, I'll kill you——"

"Hey, what goes on here?"

Mike came into the hut, wheezing from his climb up the ladder. He stared at them.

Jeff shrugged. The words came hard, but they came. "It's Marie," he said. "She flipped her wig."

"Came at you with a machete, huh?"

"That's right. She thinks we got the dough and we're planning to pull a sneak."

"Maybe it's fever."

"Look at her," Jeff said.

Mike looked at Marie. Her eyes were rolling and saliva dribbled out of the corner of her mouth.

"Guess you're right." Mike sighed. "It isn't fever. So now what do we do?" "I don't know. She'll have to be watched." Jeff turned to Luiz. "Lucky you came along," he told the Indian.

Luiz nodded. "I see her come out of hut with machete, so I walk behind. She look bad. Is a sickness in the head, no?"

"Yeah. A sickness in the head. We'll have to take her back to the hut and tie her down on her cot."

"Let us do it," Mike suggested. "You'd better look after that ankle of yours. It's bleeding bad. If there was only a doctor around——"

Jeff grunted. "She needs a doctor worse than I do," he said. "I've seen this coming on for weeks. This is no place for a dame. No wonder she flipped. If that dough doesn't get here soon, we'll all flip."

Mike and Luiz got Marie out of the hut, carrying her down the ladder. Jeff limped over to the bureau and looked for some brandy. He wanted to sterilize the wound. In this jungle damp even a scratch could be dangerous. He found the bottle and was all set to pour some on when Luiz came back. He had something in his hand. The stained rag looked like some kind of poultice.

"I fix," he said. "Muy bueno."

"What is it, one of your native messes?"

A hint of reproach shone in the muddy eyes. "I am not native, senor. I am the Spanish, no?"

"All right, you're Spanish." Jeff lay back in the hammock as Luiz bound his ankle. The poultice burned.

"Marie all right?" he asked.

"Senor Mike, he ties her tight," Luiz answered. Then he paused. "Why you not let me kill her? She try to kill you."

"Because she didn't know what she was doing. She's out of her head."

"But she hurt you. I do not let anyone hurt the senor. He is my jefe."

"That's all right, Luiz. You're a good boy." Jeff sighed. "Now go away and let me rest."

The Indian slipped away, and Jeff fell into a troubled sleep. It must have been midafternoon when Mike climbed the ladder to his hut again and Jeff awoke to find him standing there.

"How is she?" he asked.

Mike grunted. "Listen," he said. "You oughtta be able to hear her screaming from here."

"That bad, huh?"

"Plenty bad. Hollering about the dough at the top of her lungs. If these Indians understood English, we'd be in real trouble. We've got to get her to a doctor quick."

Jeff sat up, slapping at a mosquito. "I can't travel with this leg," he said. "Besides, we have to wait here for the dough. Then we can go down to the coast, take a freighter to Belem. It's a big city—they've got psychiatrists there."

"You mean Marie needs a headshrinker?"

"That's right." Jeff sighed.

Mike looked at him. "I wonder how long it'll take before your foot heals," he said. "Maybe the smart thing to do is take her now. For all we know, the dough won't arrive for another month. We can't keep her tied up all the time, can we?"

"But I told you, I can't travel now."

"You don't have to," Mike answered. "Luiz and I could take her to Belem." "And leave me here all alone?"

"Somebody'd have to stay anyway, to get the dough when it comes."

Jeff blinked at his partner. "You'd trust me?"

"Sure, why not?" Mike smiled. "We're buddies, aren't we? We pulled the job off together, didn't we? Of course I trust you with the dough—ain't you always trusted me with Marie?" He wiped the sweat from his forehead. "So let's do it this way. Luiz and I will take Marie down to Santarem in the piragua. From there we can catch some tramp steamer into Belem. We still got a grand or so stashed away, and that ought to be enough. I'll slip a few bucks to the skipper and nobody'll pay any attention to Marie no matter what she's yelling about. In Belem I'll hunt up a good headshrinker, get her fixed up. One of those private hospital deals, I figure. By the time you get the money she'll be okay again. That's the way you want it, isn't it, Jeff?" "Yeah." Jeff sighed. "That's the way I want it."

And that’s the way it was. They left the following morning, Mike, Marie, and Luiz. Luiz didn’t quite know what it was all about, but he listened to Jeff’s instructions very carefully and promised to come back and report as soon as he could.

“You rest,” he told Jeff gravely. “I tell women to look after you, fix foot. No worry ’bout anything, eh?”

Jeff nodded, and after they departed he drowsed.

He nodded and drowsed, drowsed and nodded, and the days slipped by. The women in the village came with his food. They cleaned his hut and they fanned him with leaves during the heat of the day, and they changed the poultices on his ankle.

But something must have been wrong with the wound, because the fever came back. Jeff lay in his hammock, listening to the rain, and tried to pretend that none of this was real. And yet it was real; it had to be real.

You spend a year planning the armored-truck job, you and Mike together, and you know it’ll work. You figure all the angles, and you know you can get away with the dough—but then what?

If you’re smart, you can pull a big job and not get caught; it’s afterward that the trouble starts, when you try to get rid of the loot. They trace the bills and catch up with you.

Finally you work a deal. You make contact with a man named Gonzales in Cuba. He’ll dump the bills in exchange for pesos, in exchange for a third of the split. Meanwhile you have to hide out. Not in Cuba, because something might go wrong, and not in any city. So you think it over and decide to hole up somewhere out of the way—somewhere nobody goes if they have any dough or any sense. The godforsaken backwaters of Brazil, the jungle. You’ll wait there until Gonzales sends the dough.

So you pull the job, and it goes off okay, even if you have to plug a guard on the truck. You got your fake passports. You grab a freighter. You land in Porto de Moz.

Then you get lucky. You run into a wooden Indian named Luiz on the beach, and he takes a shine to you, wants to be your servant because you buy him the first pair of shoes he ever owned in his life. You treat him like a Spaniard, not like an Indian, and this makes him your slave for life. He tells you he'll take you upriver, to his village. He brings you in his piragua, real proud to return home with three Norteamericanos. He's a big shot now. He gets you installed in huts, and all you got to do is wait for the runner with the mail to bring you your dough.

That part makes sense.

But why did you bring Marie?

Because she wanted to come, and because you wanted her. That's why you pulled the job in the first places for Marie. You wanted her, and you had to have her because she was the most beautiful woman in the world. Not one of those cheap pushovers, but a big-time TV singer, real class. She didn't soil her hands with punks; it took real dough to get her to roll over and play tricks.

You told her about the job and promised her everything she ever wanted—down in South America she could live like a queen on the loot. And you took her along because you were scared to wait and send for her later. You brought her here.

Here, where it rained all the time and the mosquitoes were murder. Here, where the huts were set on stilts, planted in filled oil drums to keep the ants away. But the ants came anyway, and they bit. And the fish in the river bit, too, so you couldn't even bathe. And at night the Indians pounded on drums and played flutes. You sweated in the heat and shivered with fever and ate goat meat and drank brandy, and you waited. Luiz tried to be a good servant, but he was just a wooden Indian, even if he did speak English. He ran off to the jungle like the rest of them, and maybe he drank blood and used poison darts.

But that was crazy.

It was all crazy, and no wonder Marie flipped. Waiting for the runner with the dough, week after week. And the rain dripping on the roof, dripping on your skull, hour after hour, day after day, night after night.

Where was the damned runner? Where was Luiz? Where was Marie?

The fever broke at last, and then Jeff remembered where Marie was. She was in Belem, with Mike and Luiz. He hoped they'd found a good skull doctor for her so she'd be all right. Once she got out of here, got away from the jungle, she'd snap back. It was just that the jungle was no place for a woman. Funny, he wasn't sore because she'd taken a cut at him with the machete. A person can't help it when they flip.

But Jeff knew that if he didn't get that dough soon he'd flip himself. Now that his ankle was all right again he spent all his time sitting in the doorway of the hut, staring out at the river. The waiting was awful. There was nothing to do, nobody to talk to, and he had only one bottle of brandy left.

Finally came the evening when he knew he was cracking up. He decided to tackle the brandy. He hadn't been able to sleep decently for a week, and maybe the brandy would help. If it didn't, tomorrow he'd set out for the coast alone. He couldn't stand this any longer.

The brandy was like fire, like the moonlight. It was like the drums pounding out there in the clearing. Jeff was very drunk, so drunk that he forgot once again that Marie and Mike and Luiz were gone. He couldn't find his shoes, and he began to crawl around the floor of the hut looking for them. Luiz must have put them away. "Luiz!" he shouted. "Luiz!"

And then, all at once, Luiz was there.

Luiz was there, and everything was all right. Jeff stood up, reeling, and stared at the little brown man with the muddy eyes. Good old Luiz, the perfect servant! He'd take care of everything now, he was back. . . .

He was back.

Jeff sobered, remembering.

"What happened?" he murmured.

Luiz shrugged.

"A bad thing, senor."

"Marie, did something happen to Marie?" Jeff gripped the edge of the table.

"She is all right," Luiz said.

Jeff relaxed. "Okay, then. I can take anything else, I guess. What happened—did Gonzales double-cross us about the money?"

"No, the money came, senor."

"You have it?"

"No. Senor Mike, he had it in the piragua. They think I am asleep, but I see him counting it when we go down the river. He tells your woman the runner brings it before they leave here. Now he will run away with her, after he kills me."

"Why, the dirty, stinking rat——"

"Please, senor, do not alarm yourself. This Senor Mike then creeps toward me with his knife, to kill. But I am awake and waiting for him with my own machete. We fight. The money falls in the river—it is a sad thing, no? But your honor is saved, for I kill the Senor Mike very dead."

Jeff began to sweat. "I see. The dough's gone, my double-crossing partner is gone, and Marie——"

"She is all right. I do just what you say."

"Took her to Belem alone?"

Luiz shrugged. "Please, senor. I am simple man. I have not the education to go alone to Belem. But I tie up your woman and take her back up the river, to my friends. I find the headshrinker there."

"In the jungle? But——"

"Look." Luiz unwrapped the bundle from his waist, and something rolled forward onto the table. "Better than you get in Belem. Is a good job, no?" Jeff stared at the object on the table. It was a good job, all right. Marie's head was no bigger than an orange.

The Tempter

Dr. Jensen had treated a good many mentally ill patients. But plain Mr. John Smith had the most complicated mind and body on Earth. Or anywhere in the Universe—for that matter!

DOCTOR JENSEN was just lighting his cigar when the stranger walked into his office and sat down directly opposite him.

This annoyed him very much, because the girl in the outer office had strict orders not to admit anyone without an appointment. People didn't just walk in on him—it took several weeks and a series of interviews before a prospective patient actually got to see the Doctor. After all, he wasn't running a mitt-camp. He was a prominent psychoanalyst who owned two apartment buildings outright, and had a mortgage on a third. Even his receptionist knew better than to intrude on him without a signal, and the Doctor seldom buzzed her except after office-hours. Lately, he hadn't buzzed her at all.

The Doctor had been anticipating the solitary enjoyment of his cigar. It was a pure Havana filler costing one dollar, much better than the cigars Sigmund Freud could have afforded. Doctor Jensen realized that cigar-smoking helped increase his resemblance to Freud, as did the goatee he so carefully cultivated. A clever touch, but then Doctor Jensen was a clever man. Aside from that, he really enjoyed his cigars, despite what Freud had to say about oral eroticism.

So he was genuinely irked when the stranger appeared.

"Yes?" he said.

"Yes what?" asked the stranger.

Paranoid, the Doctor told himself. But he smiled, ignoring the question. "You wished to see me?" he asked.

"It's necessary," said the stranger.

"What seems to be your difficulty?"

"No difficulty," the stranger assured him promptly. "It's the others who are difficult."

Delusions of persecution, the Doctor noted. He blew a perfect smoke-ring and asked. "What others?"

"The ones who don't believe me. The ones who won't acknowledge my identity. They must know who I am, at least subconsciously. In fact—"

"Who are you?" the Doctor demanded.

"The Devil," said the stranger.

Doctor Jensen stared more intently at the blond, asthenic-looking man who stood quietly facing him with his hands in his pockets. There was nothing at all diabolical about his appearance, and that made his psychosis twice as interesting.

During the course of his professional career, Doctor Jensen had met one Julius Caesar, one Napoleon, two Joans of Arc and innumerable Saviors. But he'd never had a Devil seek him out before.

"Might I have your name?" ho. asked.

"Satan. Satan the Tempter."

The Doctor blew another smoke-ring. "Your—uh—human name, please."

"John Smith."

"Now, really—" For a moment Doctor Jensen almost lost his professional aplomb. But a hand came out of the stranger's pocket, bearing a social security card and a driver's license. Both were made out to John Smith, and both listed an address on the West Side.

"That makes trouble, too," the stranger complained. "You know, sometimes it's easier to get people believing I'm the Devil than it is to tell them I'm John Smith."

"But you really are John Smith," said the Doctor, "You know that, don't you?"

"Suppose I put It this way. I was John Smith until I became possessed. Now I'm Satan the Tempter."

An automatic system of checks-and-balances began to function in Doctor Jensen's cortex. The stranger's suit was shabby, but he had an unusually interesting delusion. There probably wouldn't be much of a fee, but the case had its unique aspects. And finally, the Doctor told himself: think what a paper I could write on it! It's just what I need for the lectures—a natural for publicity.

That decided the matter. Doctor Jensen smiled and waved his cigar. "Sit down," he invited. "We'll go into your problem more fully. You'll find me a most sympathetic listener."

When John Smith finally departed, armed with a mild sedative ("Can't you give me something that will make me sleep without dreaming, Doctor? Every night I go straight to Hell!") he had an appointment set up for the following afternoon.

And Doctor Jensen had a miscellany of notes to pore over—more accurately, to puff over, with the aid of a fresh cigar. He sat there now and reviewed his somewhat unorthodox shorthand style.

"B. 7979, Pawtucket R.I., f. butcher, m. clerk, l sib., sister, dec. age 10, sc. fvr. No maj. phys. ill., disab. Ed. grmmr., hi sch., then thtre. usher. 4F draft (fit. ft., rupt.) unmarrdappar. htrosxl. Last 10 yrs. prnter. (Check: "printer's devil").

Nothing there. But some of the responses to the word-association test had been interesting—so interesting, in fact, that he'd circled them in red pencil.

"BLACK—pit."

"RED—burn."

"PUNISH—my duty."

"MAN—enemy."

The patient had a psychotic-type fixation, beyond any possible doubt. Doctor Jensen read the rest of his notes and reviewed what John Smith had told him.

The dreams had begun about a year before. The patient had been tormented night after night by sleep-induced visions of mingled flame and darkness, conveying a sense of confinement that was not claustrophobia but just a feeling of being "sealed off, way under the earth."

At first John Smith had been mortally terrified, screaming himself awake. And then, gradually, the fear vanished, and the darkness and the flames became familiar, recognizable. John Smith came to realize that he belonged in the dreams. Finally had come the true realization of his identity.

"Don't you see, Doctor? That's the only way I, or any of the others, can reach upper earth. By contacting the sleeping, defenseless minds of men and gradually taking over their bodies."

"What others?" Doctor Jensen had asked.

"The demons. Fiends are confined, of course. They have their eternal, infernal duties below. But the demons roam abroad, seeking living souls. Surely you've heard of demoniac possession."

"You must have done considerable reading in the field," Doctor Jensen observed.

But John Smith shook his head. "No reading," he replied. "What I know I've learned from first-hand experience. And that kind of knowledge is always the best."

Doctor Jensen nodded, but he didn't believe it. The pattern seemed obvious. John Smith, job printer in a large shop, unmarried, without close friends or family ties—such a man might easily spend many hours of his time in the public library, reading up on obscure religious and metaphysical concepts. A man who might get to brooding about his vanished youth (and, perhaps, his potency: better check that angle, too) and his personal obscurity. Every psychiatrist worth his forty-minute hour knew that the latent aberrations of the subconscious could be drawn from dreams and transformed into power-symbols. In Smith’s case the dreaded nightmares had become the springboard for delusions of grandeur and John Smith had become the Devil.

Simple. Probably much too simple. But Doctor Jensen would probe more deeply.

“Precisely what do you do?” he asked, “when you feel you’re the Devil?”

“I tempt people,” John Smith told him. “That’s my mission. To tempt others to Evil, so that I may snare their souls for my own. Not the truly virtuous, of course—they’re a waste of time. I seek out those who have already succumbed to sin. The most likely prospects, those who need only a final nudge.”

Doctor Jensen talked on as he scribbled. “Do you enjoy being the Devil?” he asked.

John Smith shrugged. “Yes, I do,” he declared. “I do, because I am Satan. But the other part, the human part—sometimes it takes hold and realizes it can’t stand the dreams and the knowledge. That’s the part that wants your help. Oh, how can I explain it?”

“You don’t need to explain it,” the Doctor smiled, as he wrote down schizo and underlined it in his notebook.

It was then that he’d made the appointment for the following day. John Smith had been pathetically grateful, and insisted that Doctor Jensen take twenty dollars.

Jensen, tom between telling him that his usual fee was thirty dollars or just refusing the money altogether, finally pocketed the amount and dismissed his new patient.

After all, twenty dollars was twenty cigars, was two bottles of good Scotch, was one-fifth of a night with that new girl Miss Charlene had called him about. And a rose was a rose was a rose.

So Doctor Jensen put aside his notes now and went out for the evening, during the course of which he partook of all three of the pleasures which had come to mind when he accepted the money.

And thus hygienically refreshed, he returned to his office the next day and awaited, late in the afternoon, the coming of his new patient. He wanted more word-association tests, he wanted free-fantasy, he wanted an immediate transference. He put John Smith on the couch and started him talking.

One month and fifteen sessions later, John Smith was still talking. And Doctor Jensen had learned nothing. Oh, he had all the data on John Smith's humdrum and utterly Smithsonian existence as a man. But the Devil eluded him.

He couldn't uncover the traumatic incident that had been the source of the fantasies. And that was what he needed in order to do a successful monograph or, at the very least, a successful lecture. Was—Doctor Jensen permitted himself to wonder—because he actually didn't know how to conduct a really successful analysis? Was it because he'd gotten into the habit of merely going through the motions, striving to keep his patients rather than cure them?

The thought irritated him. And one afternoon, following a trying day during which he'd been forced to commit a regular hundred-dollar-a-week analysand to an institution, Doctor Jensen lost control. He began to question his patient directly and to make positive statements.

"You say you're the Devil. The Devil in John Smith's body, which you entered during sleep. Why? Why choose that particular body? What purpose have you on earth? It makes no sense."

The man on the couch smiled. "Sense. What is 'sense' ? Perhaps I chose the body because it is so nondescript—as average as the name. I'm less conspicuous that way, for my purpose. And my purpose is, as I've told you, to tempt mankind and to snare souls."

Doctor Jensen bit off the end of his cigar—and to blazes with the symbolic content of the act. "All right, if you're convinced of that, why did you come to me and beg to be relieved of your delusion?"

"It's not a delusion. Not to me it isn't. It's only a delusion to the John Smith personality who originally sought you out. He doesn't matter any more, for I'm in complete control now."

"Very well." Doctor Jensen leaned forward, his jaw muscles tightening. "You're the Devil. You're sure of it, and you're satisfied to be the Devil. So why do you keep coming back here to me?"

Still smiling, the man on the couch put his hands in his pockets. "Because I have another purpose, Doctor. I'm here to snare your soul."

"My soul?" Doctor Jensen felt the irritation grow. He didn't have to take this sort of thing from a charity case. "What if I told you I don't believe in the soul, or an afterlife, or the Devil?"

"I know," said his patient. "That's what makes it so easy."

"Easy?"

"At first I thought it might be difficult. Although you're obviously ripe for Hell, the problem of temptation seemed formidable. No sense offering you riches because your profession, as you practise it, brings you wealth. As for the pleasures of the senses, you have ample access to them all. But there's pride and hatred and the urge to kill—"

Doctor Jensen stiffened. Projection, he told himself. "Let's talk about those things," he said, softly. "Have you ever wanted to kill someone, John Smith? Did you ever want to kill your father because of what he did to your mother, or—"

John Smith laughed. "No, Doctor. I've never had the urge, any more than I had parents. I've never wanted to kill, or torture, or rape, or indulge in any act of violence. Those are human failings, not diabolical ones. Those are the traits that condemn humans to Hell, where I extend punishment.

"I have pride, yes—the pride of Lucifer, Prince of Darkness. But that pride is based on the realization that I'm above human vices and greeds. I have my hatred, too—hatred of being eternally condemned to associate with evil humanity. But I've no urge to kill. That's your problem."

Doctor Jensen bit the end of his cigar again, and cut his lip. It was extremely painful, and for a moment something rose unbidden to the threshold of consciousness; something strangely similar to the urge to kill. Then he remembered that he himself had once undergone a complete analysis, that he was a pillar of his profession, and that the patient on the couch before him could be numbered among the least important of men.

He forced himself to smile tolerantly upon his patient, saying, "Very well. But you aren't very convincing, you know. If you're the Devil, where are your supernatural powers? You don't walk through walls or vanish in a puff of smoke. To be blunt, you hardly impress me."

John Smith sighed. "I should think you'd understand," he said. "If I walked through the wall right now—and I assure you I can, quite easily—you wouldn't believe the evidence of your own senses. Your so-called professional training would lead you to label the phenomenon as pure hallucination.

"As for vanishing in smoke or similar devices, it's all a matter of keeping abreast of the times. Some hundreds of years ago, when my reality was widely acknowledged, people expected such feats and were not too startled or surprised. But today I'd merely attract unwelcome attention. And my strength lies in remaining anonymous. In a prosaic body I come and go as I please, tempt and snare, tempt and snare."

Doctor Jensen was impatient again. "Whom do you tempt and whom do you snare?" he snapped. "Every day you come and lie here on my couch, you lie and lie—"

"Father of Lies. That's the association, isn't it?" John Smith sat up and nodded. "But I assure you, I speak the truth. I've winnowed and won many souls since my sojourn in this body. Fat bankers and red-necked military men, and rich women like perfumed hogs, and drunken foundry-workers and fraternity brothers and a transvestite in the subway and a boy who smothered his baby sister and a girl who—"

"Baby sister," snapped Doctor Jensen. "Quick now! Did you ever try to smother your baby sister?"

John Smith grinned. “No,” he said. “You don’t believe me, do you? But I speak the truth. Truth is the weapon I’ve chosen to snare your soul.”

Doctor Jensen took a quick look around his office, to reassure his sense of reality. “That’s enough for today,” he declared. “But don’t be discouraged. I’ll cure you yet.”

His patient shook his head slowly. “Truth is my weapon,” he repeated. “And the truth is that you’ve never cured anyone in your life.”

“Now see here—”

“I do see. I see everything. Your methods are not sound, Doctor Jensen. You’ve never really corrected a neurotic, psychotic or psychosomatic disorder. You don’t care to. Your policy is to make your patients permanently dependent on you, so that they remain patients. At times you’ve managed to relieve them of superficial tension, together with most of their cash. But you don’t care.”

“How dare you intimate a thing like that?”

John Smith grinned again. “Pride is one of your sins, and hatred is another. Hatred you express in your extortionate attitude toward the tenants of your apartment buildings. Hatred you scarcely managed to mask when you railroaded Doctor Klauss out of the profession two years ago by falsely testifying under oath that he supplied narcotics to confirmed addicts.”

Doctor Jensen rose. “Where’d you find that out?” he gasped. “Nobody knew—”

“I know.” John Smith walked over to the window, and stared down at the streets of the city like a saturnine gargoyle. “I know everything. I know about the girls you visit at Miss Charlene’s, I know about your secret files, I know about the ten thousand in cash you got from old Ligget’s nephew for having him committed to the asylum. I know about every dirty action, every filthy thought in your miserable life. Your life, motivated by pride and hatred and the urge to kill.”

Doctor Jensen gripped Smith’s shoulder, his voice rising above the traffic murmur from the street far below. “Now I’m beginning to understand,” he muttered. “It was all a gag, wasn’t it? You came here to get next to my girl, get at my files. You’re a spy, aren’t you? Who sent you? Was it Klauss or some of those old women who’ve been after my hide?”

John Smith turned. “Take your hand off my shoulder,” he said. “I dislike being touched.”

Doctor Jensen’s face contorted violently. “You dislike being touched, eh? You, with your nonsense about the Devil, coming here and trying to make a fool out of me, trying to wreck my career!” His hand moved from John Smith’s shoulder, rose to his neck. “I could kill you—”

And before he knew it, Doctor Jensen was killing him. Both hands up now, tight around the throat, and John Smith was the asthenic type, no match for a powerfully built man bent on murder. He was making harsh gargling noises but he kept right on smiling, and Doctor Jensen knew he would have to wipe that smile off his face, forever.

Then they were stumbling forward, and the window was open, and Doctor Jensen felt an emotion so pure it was almost an ecstasy. It came from the realization that he was killing, and it was a wonderful feeling of release, with everything turning red.

Only he must have stumbled against the window itself, because there was a bump and a wrench and a crash. He tried to release his grip but it was too late.

Doctor Jensen and John Smith toppled out of the window together and crashed nine stories to the pavement below.

Even in death’s coming, Doctor Jensen retained his basic convictions. He admitted John Smith had been right in a way. He’d hit on Doctor Jensen’s weak points, for there was pride, there was hatred, there was an urge to kill. Come to think of it, John Smith had even tempted him into killing.

But that was as far as Doctor Jensen would go—as far as his swirling thoughts could go before he hit the pavement. He still didn’t believe in God, or the Devil, or an afterlife.

That’s why it was so particularly shocking, after a moment of black concussion, to find himself up and walking down the long dark corridor. That’s why it was so shocking to reach the end of the corridor and gaze through the open door at the radiant reaches of fiery fury beyond.

That’s why it was so shocking when Doctor Jensen saw the figure standing inside the doorway, smiling a greeting.

“Hello,” said John Smith.

Sock Finish

Hollywood was filming an "epic" of the Good Old Days. They needed an oldtime comic who epitomized silent slapstick So hasbeen Artie Ames had his chance for a comeback. A nostalgic tale of the "cat's pajama" days when "life was just a bowl of cherries

THE NAME OF THE VICTIM WAS Artie Ames. I doubt if you remember him. I didn't, arid when he walked into my Beverly Hills office that afternoon and announced himself to my girl, I couldn't have cared less.

Of course, I didn't know he was a victim, then.

Let's get one thing straight: I try to see the people who come into the office, but I'm an agent. When I'm on the job, my first duty is to my clients. And an agent's office is Mecca for every Arab in Hollywood. Hollywood is full of Arabs without camels, Arabs with three-humped camels, Arabs with caravans of millions of imaginary camels, all looking for agents.

So I let Artie Ames sit on the mourner's bench in my outer reception room while I spent the afternoon slaving over a hot telephone. I was working out a deal with Dick Melvin, at Metromount. He wanted to sign one of my properties, Tommy Nolan, as juvenile lead for a big Cinemascope turkey they were cooking up for the Thanksgiving trade. He'd already tested Nolan and liked what he saw, and now it was just a matter of working out the minor details, such as the price. We hassled back and forth for a while and finally I nailed him down on the third callback and was just getting ready to hang up when he insisted on talking about the plot of the picture.

It turned out that he was going to do one of those "Good Old Days" things—not a biog, but a general story on Hollywood in the 1920s. "We were going to work it up as The Mack Sennett Story," he told me. "Only you know what would happen. We'd put out a big buck for rights, and then we'd have to change the whole thing, anyway. So we'll just sort of keep the feel of the period, get me? Lots of slapstick stuff, and we may hire Chester Conklin or a few of the other oldtimers who're still around. But the guy I'm really trying to get hold of is Artie Ames." Something clicked then, and it wasn't the receiver. I took a deep breath. "Artie Ames?" I said. "Why, he happens to be in my office right now."

"You handle him?"

"Why not?" I said, which wasn't really an answer, either way.

"Can you get him over to Semple in Casting tomorrow morning?"

"Why not?" I said again.

"It isn't really much of a deal, just a bit," he told me.

"What do you mean, it isn't much of a deal?" I revved the motors just a trifle. "You want Hollywood in the 1920s? You want the spirit of slapstick comedy? The genuine spirit, the authenticity, the whole soul of the era can be summed up in just two words—Artie Ames. And you say it isn't much of a deal."

"We may go five grand," he answered.

"Talk about that later," I assured him. "You tell your man Semple to expect Artie Ames at nine."

I hung up fast, buzzed my girl, and told her to admit Artie Ames in three minutes. Then I sat back to do a little fast exercise in total recall.

Because I still didn't remember Artie Ames. Oh, the name rang a bell, once it was associated with the silent slapstick comedies. But I couldn't place the face. I scanned flickering images of all the two-reel clowns—Lupino Lane, Billy Dooley, Larry Semon, Lloyd Hamilton, Bobbie Vernon, Charlie Chase. I thought of the other mustached comics, like Jimmy Adams and Jimmy Finlay son, and Conklin, of course, and that great little Englishman, Billy Bevan. I came up with Al St. John before he turned into a western stooge, and Hank Mann, and even Max Davidson. I even conjured up a picture of the old trademark of Educational Comedies—The Spice of the Program.

But it wasn't until I thought of the music that I remembered my man.

They used to play jazz accompaniments for the comedies in the old silent days. Things like Running Wild and Barney Google and Raggedy Ann and Don't Bring Lulu: jerky, syncopated rhythms to synchronize with the jerky, syncopated antics of Jack Duffy or Snub Pollard, or his sister Daphne. I don't know what they played for Buster Keaton, but Langdon usually drew I'm Just Wild About Harry, and Harold Lloyd was associated with Collegiate after The Freshman came out. Chaplin, naturally, had Charlie My Boy.

Artie Ames usually had San.

I placed him now. Artie Ames—two-reelers during the late Twenties. Just before talkies came in. A little guy—they were all such little guys, Stan Laurel and Monty Banks and the rest—with a peculiar makeup. He always looked like the political cartoon figure of Mr. Taxpayer or the Average Man—balding, bespectacled, bemustached, bewildered. Carried an umbrella and wore a stiff high-crowned derby. And as he raced around, the organist played San. Sure, I remembered Artie Ames.

Then he came in, and I didn't remember him at all.

I don't know just what I expected to see. Certainly I'm aware that a performer looks different offscreen and out of makeup. I wasn't anticipating the exaggerated eyebrows, the unnatural dark circles under the eyes, the pasty-white complexion, the sagging shoulders, the shuffling walk, the nervous flutter of the fingers.

On the other hand, I was more or less prepared to greet an elderly man, possibly even a shabby one. As far as I knew, Artie Ames went out with the talkies almost thirty years ago, and I expected that time would have taken its toll.

But Artie Ames was a complete surprise: he was a total stranger.

To begin with, he wasn't nearly as short as I'd remembered him to be. He held himself erect, he was neither hangdog nor fidgety, and he was wearing a suit made by my own tailor, who turns them out at $200 apiece. On top of all that, he wasn't old. Oh, you wouldn't peg him as a youngster, but he could pass for a man in his forties. And a well-preserved man at that, with a full head of graying hair and a face devoid of wrinkles or pouches. He didn't resemble his screen characterization of thirty years ago, and he didn't appear to be ready for a nursing home either.

When he opened his mouth to greet me by name I got the biggest surprise of all.

Artie Ames had a basso profundo voice.

Then it all came back to me, of course. The voice—that's what killed him. It was wrong for talkies, wrong for a slapstick comic playing a Timid Soul character. Sound slaughtered his career, just as it eventually slaughtered the career of a great artist like Buster Keaton. Now I remembered.

He told me all about it during the next few minutes. How he did bit parts, went out with tab shows during the early Thirties, how he made a whole series of films in Europe—for, he hastened to assure me, he was still popular abroad. "After all," he said, "I was only twenty-nine when sound came in. And a man has to do something."

"A man has to eat, too," I suggested.

He didn't like my suggestion. I could tell from the way he drew himself up stiffly in his chair. "That's never been a problem," he answered. "I own a bloc of lots down near Long Beach. No buildings on them—just oil wells."

Which, of course, explained the $200 suit. But it didn't explain what Artie Ames was doing in my office today. He cleared that up himself, immediately.

"Suppose you're wondering what I want with you," he said. "I'll make it short and sweet. The grapevine tells me that Metromount is casting for a flick about silent pics. And the word is out that they want Artie Ames. Think you can represent me?"

I didn't waste time stalling. "I already represent you. Report to Semple, in Casting, at nine tomorrow."

He didn't even blink. "I heard you were a bright boy," he said. "I guess I heard right."

"You'll test," I told him. "But don't talk contract until you check with me. It's some kind of a bit, and they mentioned five. Maybe we can raise the ante."

"Don't worry," he nodded. "The reason I came to you in the first place was because I found out you're handling young Nolan on the same deal. I know you've got an in there. But perhaps I can help matters along in my own way. Wait and see."

He bowed out, and I spent the next forty-eight hours waiting and seeing.

On his next appearance, Artie Ames was wearing another $200 suit, and a high-priced grin on his face. He told me just what the grin was worth.

"Twenty-five grand," Artie Ames exulted. "That's what Melvin said he'd go for. And he called in Sid Belter, right after he saw the test, and told him to build up my part. In fact, I'm going to work with him on the movie sequences and fatten the part myself. Use a lot of my old routines. And Melvin says he's got an idea for building all the promotion around me—make a comeback vehicle out of it. Said I didn't have to worry about my voice, either. Engineers can handle that now. You should have seen them in the screening room! They were crazy about me—I had 'em rolling in the aisles!"

Well, I've heard that kind of talk before. But the next day, when we went to Melvin's office to sign the contract, I found out that Artie Ames was telling me the truth. Dick Melvin was excited. And they were going to angle their publicity around the oldtime comic.

When I saw the actual contract, made out for the $25,000 figure, my respect for Artie Ames went up several notches. He was nobody's fool. And who knows?—perhaps I had myself a valuable property. Once in a while those hasbeens make a big comeback.

Artie Ames seemed to think so, when he signed for the deal. “Give me that pen,” he said. “This marks the beginning of a new career.”

I nodded.

How could I know that he was signing his own death warrant?

It’s a standing gag in the Industry that Hollywood people are the biggest suckers for their own publicity. That’s why they believe their own ads in the trade papers and their own puffs in the columns.

Maybe so. And this may have contributed to my respect for Artie Ames in the month that followed. He certainly got a big enough buildup, Melvin and his crew of hired assassins at the studio went all out. Ames was interviewed, he was quoted, he was profiled, he was shoved into guest appearances—all carefully staged so as to get in a mention of the forthcoming picture, of course. But there was plenty about just plain Artie Ames, too. The name was getting around to a new generation. And after seeing his picture pop up all over the place, and reading copy on him day after day, I couldn’t help but be aware of him.

Still, I like to believe that part of my growing affection for the man was based on his own personality, I came to know him fairly well. He dropped in at the office frequently, we managed a few luncheons together, and I even spent a couple of evenings out at his big house near Malibu.

I found out that Artie Ames was lonely. In spite of his money—and he really had it—he’d never married. And unlike many of his age group, he didn’t care to associate with his contemporaries. Not for him those little social gatherings where former stars sit around and reminisce.

“Who needs those horses’ necks?” he scoffed. “They’re washed up, finished.” Ames always lapsed into the slang of the Twenties when he got excited. “Why should I waste my time listening to the sad story of how they faw down go boom? Far as I’m concerned, life is just a bowl of cherries.”

That’s something else I found out about Artie Ames. He had never retired. In his own mind he was still a star. He had never stopped being a star. He showed me his press-books. The clippings were up-to-date. The fact that most of the rave reviews of the past twenty-five years were printed in French or Spanish or Italian didn’t faze him a bit. All he knew was that somewhere people still enjoyed his work. Whether they called him “Artie” or “Arturo” didn’t matter. He was a comedian, he worked for an audience, and laughter knows no language barrier.

“I’m going to show these smart alecks around town how wrong they were,” he insisted. “When they see the routines I’ve worked up for this picture, they’ll be sorry about passing me up all these years. Comedy doesn’t change. The good stuff is always good. And there isn’t much competition any more. What have they got today? They got Lou Costello! Jerry Lewis!”

Here he went into an impromptu imitation of the latter, and for a moment I was amazed by the startling transformation in the man. He aped Jerry Lewis perfectly. His miming captured Lewis’s gestures and facial expressions precisely, but caricatured the caricature. He managed to burlesque Lewis’s burlesquing. And all done so easily, so assuredly.

He could discuss the theory of comedy with the same ease and assurance. Of course he talked about the old days, but he did so with complete authority. He spoke about the grotesques—Kalla Pasha, who was too hairy, and Mack Swain, who was too fat, and Slim Summerville, who was too thin, and Ben Turpin, whose eyes were too crossed. He explained the difference between the exaggerations of a Ford Sterling and the unappreciated subtlety of Charlie Chaplin’s brother, Syd. His conversation was spotted with allusions to half-forgotten figures—Charlie Murray and Louise Fazenda and Mabel Normand and the team of Hale and Hardy. Yes, Alan Hale had worked with Oliver Hardy before Stan Laurel came along—but that priceless bit of knowledge isn’t likely to win anybody $64,000 on a quiz show.

Still I was interested, and more interested when he demonstrated some of the comedy bits he'd planned.

So was the studio.

I was on hand when they started filming. Artie Ames had been assigned to the First Production Unit, because they planned to shoot his stuff in advance of the rest of the picture. He wasn't in the "story" of the film itself: he merely appeared in the scenes revolving around the oldtime moviemaking.

Seeing him in action took me back thirty years. Oh, the studio was new, and the sound stage was modern, and the technicians used all the latest equipment—but Artie Ames was unchanged. In costume and makeup, he was the comic of 1929, and the routines he'd worked out were definitely of that vintage.

The amazing thing about it was that he was funny. Not only to me, but to everyone on the set—to the props, the grips, the gaffers, and the bit players. More important, he was funny to Dick Melvin and to Sid Belter, the writer. Several times during the first day's shooting, he "broke up" the rest of the cast, just by his ad libs. It was all strictly pantomime stuff, you understand, but with the perfect timing and the deft precision common to many of the silent comedians who worked without benefit of a crew of gag writers, or even the assistance of a written script.

"Wonderful!" Melvin exulted to me. "At this rate, he'll steal the picture." Then he scowled darkly. "Have to do something about that," he muttered to himself. "Miss Swivel-hips won't like it."

Sid Belter chewed his pipe. "Don't worry, sweetheart," he said. "You saw the script. She's all taken care of. Plenty of close-ups, lots of nice, simple, two-syllable dialogue. The audience will know who's the star."

"Well, they're not going to remember her when this character is on the screen," Dick Melvin said. "Maybe we made a mistake, letting him build up those routines."

"Forget it," Belter answered. "He's great. Just what we needed. Besides, he works fast—we'll have all his stuff in the can before the week is out, except for the one scene with Miss Swivel-hips. And we can always chop it up, later.”

I didn’t say anything. I was beginning to worry a little, because I’d forgotten that this was supposed to be a starring vehicle for Miss Swivel-hips, as they called her.

Perhaps it would be safer if that’s what I called her, too. Actually, her real name doesn’t matter—she never used it anyway. None of the Miss Swivel-hips of Hollywood ever use their real name. It’s part of the pattern.

Miss Swivel-hips was a gorgeous blonde. She used a screen name, and like most Hollywood blondes, she was originally a brunette. Her history was standard, too. Product of the usual broken household, violated at the age of nine, or was it ten (her astrologer would probably know the exact date), and married in her teens to some Okie motorcycle cowboy or the equivalent. A few years of knocking around, some dubious experiences as a model, and then—Hollywood and the golden transformation.

Now, of course, Miss Swivel-hips had already arrived. Her every word, opinion, or wisecrack was dutifully chronicled in the public prints, her manifold romances detailed, and her acting skill extolled. The fact that words, opinions, wisecracks and even the romances were mainly the creations of press agents didn’t really matter. Nor did her acting skill, which was virtually non-existent. What did matter was that Miss Swivel-hips commanded $150,000 per picture. Her contract was real—possibly the only real thing about her, except a 39-inch bust and a torso that was rapidly becoming a trademark.

So, when the day’s shooting was completed, and Artie Ames gave me a perspiring welcome in his dressing room, I was more concerned about Miss Swivel-hips than I was with my client’s immediate reaction.

“How’d you like it?” he greeted me. “Wasn’t it the cat’s pajamas?”

I nodded, wincing a little at the dated slang. Maybe Artie Ames was the cat’s pajamas, but I couldn’t help thinking of another pajama-clad cat who wouldn’t much care for his performance.

“Told you I could do it,” he said, as he applied cold cream to his face. “Wait’ll you see what I’ve got lined up next. We’re going to do one of the old chase sequences. You know—twelve guys in a tin lizzie, running up the side of buildings—everything. Melvin’s all excited. He’s worried because he thinks I’m too old to take those prat-falls, but he doesn’t know me. I’ve still got plenty of tricks to show him.”

I wondered if Artie Ames was acrobatic enough to take another kind of a fall, in case Miss Swivel-hips decided to pull the rug out from under him.

And as he hurried through a change of clothes, I decided to broach the subject tactfully.

“You’re doing a swell job,” I said, truthfully. “But don’t forget, they may do a little cutting later on. After all, you’re not officially the star of this picture.”

He grinned at me. “Don’t you worry about the star of the picture,” he told me. “I met her yesterday, when we went over plans for the scenes we’ll be doing together.”

“What did you think of her?” I asked.

“Great gal. A real trouper, that kid. Of course, she needs a little polishing, but she’s got the real savvy—and she’s willing to learn.”

This was news to me. “Glad to hear it,” I said. “It’s important to get along with her, so play it diplomatic.”

Artie Ames grinned again. “Don’t you worry about that part,” he murmured. “I’m doing all right. Reason I’m changing in such a rush is that I’ve got a heavy date with her tonight for dinner.”

“Business?”

“Who said anything about business? Believe me, this is strictly for pleasure.” He managed a third grin for himself, in the mirror. “And if you don’t believe it, read Lolly’s column tomorrow.”

Then he dashed out.

And the next day, like a good little boy, I read Lolly’s column. And Hedda’s and Sid’s, and all the others’.

Artie Ames hadn't been kidding. He and Miss Swivel-hips had done the town. One of the tabs even carried a picture of the two of them dancing, and I must admit they didn't make such an incongruous couple. He was close to thirty years her senior, but the picture didn't show it. And in many a Hollywood calendar the months of May and December are juxtaposed.

During the next ten days I didn't see anything of my client, but I got plenty of reports. Melvin kept me informed of Artie Ames's progress on the set—"Terrific, sweetheart, absolutely terrific!"—and the gossip columnists kept me informed of his progress around and on the town.

By the time the ten days were up, they were printing direct quotes from Miss Swivel-hips herself. Romance? "No comment." Engagement? "We're very good friends." What had happened to Miss Swivel-hips's supposed marriage to a wealthy Texas promoter? "Artie Ames has taught me that a laugh is worth more than a million dollars any day."

I couldn't quite believe it, but I had to. And I stopped worrying about Artie Ames. One of the movie magazines ripped out its inside spread and substituted a hastily written article titled Old Hollywood Meets the New, and filled it with pictures of the twosome at the beach, at her house in Bel Air, at the races. AP and UP were running squibs now, and it was getting to be news. Plenty of human interest in it, of course—even better than the days when Chaplin used to squire around some young leading lady. Because Miss Swivel-hips was an accepted celebrity and Artie Ames was making a comeback. It was quite a story while it lasted.

And all the while they were fattening him up for the kill.

When the axe was sharpened, the victim couldn't see the blade for the glitter.

He came running into my office all excited. "Did you hear about it?" he demanded. "Did you hear the news?"

"What news?" I swiveled around, facing him. "Tommy Nolan tells me the picture's almost finished, if that's what you mean. It'll be in the can before the end of the month."

"Never mind that," Artie Ames panted. "I'm talking about my footage."

"You still have a couple of scenes to shoot with your leading lady," I said. "Is that what you're so hopped up about?" I hesitated. "Or are you two planning a little announcement of some kind?"

He almost blushed. "Well, I really shouldn't say anything," he mumbled. "She wants to wait until the picture's finished, see? Oh, she's a great kid—the cat's meow! You ought to see us Charleston—"

"This is an announcement?" I inquired.

"Oh, I forgot." I could see the excitement mount again. He was practically dancing across my carpet. "It's the Sullivan show—they're going to do a special preview bit on the Ed Sullivan show, next month! It's all set. And they're using one of my scenes!"

I stopped swiveling and sat up straight. "Big deal," I said.

"It must be, or else Melvin wouldn't have gone to all that expense. Know what he did? He had my scene processed in advance—stuck on the sound track and a special musical score, just for TV showing. This is it, kid!"

This was indeed it, if true.

"They're running the print tomorrow morning at eleven, for Dick Melvin and all the big shots," Artie announced. "You be there?"

"I wouldn't miss it for the world," I assured him.

And I didn't.

The next morning at eleven I was sitting in one of those nice, soft executive chairs in the Producer's Screening Room. Melvin had a cigar, Artie Ames had a cigar, I had a cigar—everybody had a cigar except Miss Swivel-hips. But she was there, big as life, at Artie's side, to witness his moment of triumph.

The lights went off, the projector began to hum—and the axe fell.

You know what the poet said? "This is the way the world ends—not with a bang, but a whimper."

Well, the poet never worked in Hollywood, or he'd have changed his story. If he'd been sitting there in the projection room with us, he'd have seen the end of Artie Ames's world and heard the sound that came with it.

Artie Ames's world ended that morning with a squeak.

It ended with a squeak, it ended with a blat, it ended with the idiot music you hear accompanying the cartoon antics of a half-witted dog.

We stared up at the vaunted chase sequence that Artie Ames had told me about, and we heard the sounds: the squeals, the brays, the barks, the cackles. When the driver of the flivver pressed the horn, some genius in the engineering department had put die blat of a foghorn on the sound track. When Artie Ames climbed out, the very pathetic picture of Mr. Average Man faced with insuperable difficulties, and cranked the motor—explosions, machine-gun fire, and the ironic mockery of an atomic bomb explosion. Ames faced the camera to deliver one of his rare lines of dialogue and I wondered how they'd corrected that bass voice of his. I found out as his mouth opened and a squeak emerged.

It was the nasty, subhuman vocalization of a tape recorder run in reverse.

No words emerged—just an insane gibberish.

And the gibberish continued throughout the sequence. The sequence itself was cut drastically, and some clever craftsman had speeded up the action until what remained was a frenzied flicker of paranoid distortion. Artie Ames's pantomimic bits were projected in a lightning-like fashion that gave him the appearance of an epileptic in full seizure. And all the while, out of his mouth, came this Silly Symphony, this Loony Tune noise.

Funny? Yes, it was funny—the way a four-year-old child thinks it's funny when the mouse puts a cannon muzzle in the cat's ear and blows the top of his head off. It was funny-grotesque, it was funny-idiotic, and most of all it was funny-cruel.

The sequence was mercifully short, much shorter than the originally filmed version, and I remembered Melvin's remark about "chopping." Only he hadn't chopped—he'd butchered. He'd ripped out the closeups, torn out the pantomime, and given the victim the voice of a pig, squealing in slaughtered agony.

When the lights went on again, I didn't look at Artie Ames. Nobody wants to see the face of a murdered man.

And Artie Ames had been murdered. They'd killed him up there on the screen. They'd killed him, and his art, and the whole genius of silent comedy. They'd laughed at the laughter, burlesqued the burlesque, ridiculed the ridiculous.

"How about that?" Melvin boomed. "Pretty tricky stuff, eh? The boys did a good job. This ought to slay em."

I didn't like to hear that talk about wanton destruction.

And neither did Artie Ames.

"Hey, what's the big idea?" he demanded. "You massacred a perfectly good scene."

"Massacred?" Dick Melvin's eyebrows were twin half-moons of arched astonishment. "I thought it was funny as hell. How about you, Sid? Dave, what did you think? Eddie? Mike?"

Sid and Dave and Eddie and Mike and all the others on Dick Melvin's payroll chorused together that in their personal opinions the scene was funny as hell.

Nobody bothered to ask how funny hell was, even though the hell was there, in Artie Ames's eyes.

"You doublecrossed me," he said. "You cut out all the good stuff. You speeded up the film. You put in those noises. You took out all the sympathy, all the audience identification. You made me into a goof."

"Now wait a minute, sweetheart," Dick Melvin said. "This is the picture business, remember? I'm handling production, and I know what I'm doing. I've seen the rushes we've shot so far, and I'm working for a balance. Had to cut out a lot of your stuff, Artie, because it made the picture top-heavy. Put too much emphasis on that oldtime atmosphere." He put his arm around the comic. "Tell you a little secret, sweetheart. You're just too good, that's all. Too damned good. Now if we were making like say a documentary about the silent movies, what you did was just fine. Hit the whole spirit of the times—just like they did it in 1927. But we're filming a story, see? A story about this boy and this girl, and how they get together and have a fight and get together again. Got to keep the emphasis where it belongs."

"But couldn't you let what you did use alone?" Artie Ames was pleading now. "Even if you cut me to one or two scenes, couldn't you let the stuff stand?"

Dick Melvin shook his head. "You didn't listen to me, sweetheart," he said, patiently. "I told you we weren't making a documentary. You do 1927 comedy, but this isn't 1927. Today's audiences, they don't care about that oldtime stuff. To them it's cornball, something to laugh at. So we're giving it the treatment—showing we can laugh at it too. Don't think I can't appreciate your kind of talent: Lord knows, I wish we had the kind of audiences who appreciated real comedy when they see it. But we can't take that chance. Got a million and a half tied up in this little epic. So I have to keep an eye on the old B.O. And I can't take the story line away from Miss Swivel-hips, either. Can I, darling?"

He turned to her, but Artie Ames cut in ahead of him.

"What do you think?" he demanded. "Don't you agree with me?"

She fluffed her curls. "Well, I don't know, Artie. After all, Mr. Melvin is the producer. He can tell what's best for the production."

Artie Ames stared at her. "But honey," he blurted. "You know what this is going to mean to me. We talked it all over. This could be my big chance—my comeback vehicle. It can make me a star again, a big star. Then you won't have to be ashamed of me. And after we're married—"

What had Artie Ames said about Miss Swivel-hips? Something to the effect that she was "the cat's meeow" ?

Well, the cat was meeowing now.

"Never mind that! We're talking about the picture, and Mr. Melvin is right. You can't go around hogging scenes in my picture—"

"Our picture," Artie Ames said. "Remember how we talked about it, honey? This is going to be our picture."

The cat had claws, too.

"Come off it! I've got a career to protect, and I'm not going to let them pad out scenes for some sawed-off little nobody in a funny hat." The cat was spitting, now.

"Grow up, Artie! We had our kicks, but you ought to know the whole deal was a publicity setup. You're a cutie and all that, but the party's over. Take a good look at yourself in the mirror sometime and then you'll see why that marriage stuff is definitely out."

Artie Ames couldn't have faced a mirror then. He couldn't face anybody. He turned to Dick Melvin, but the producer stared down at the floor.

"I get it," Ames said, and his voice was never deeper. "The old buildup routine. And I suppose that stuff you've been handing the papers about my comeback is just a lot of hooey, too."

"Well." Dick Melvin cleared his throat. "You know how it goes Artie. We figured we had a good angle to tie a story to, and we used it. Did a great little job, too—look at all the ink we got! And don't forget, we have played up your name, plenty. Maybe you'll get yourself another couple of deals out of this, after the picture is released."

"You mean after they see me in scenes like the one you just ran?" Artie Ames shook his head. "Don't try and kid me. I'm washed up, really washed up."

Then came the moment I dreaded. He looked at me and said, "Well, what about it? Are you going to let them get away with it? I've got a contract."

I opened my mouth, but Dick Melvin cut in ahead of me. His voice was harsh. "Damned right you've got a contract, Artie, and a good one. Twenty-five grand we laid out, for a job any walk-on could do with a little makeup and coaching. But we bought your name, so we could use it for the publicity angle. Your contract doesn't entitle you to write, direct, produce, cut, or edit. It calls for you to be on the set when we want you—and to do what we want you to do. So stop trying to push us around. This isn't 1927, like I said before."

Artie Ames shrugged. "All right," he said. "It's your nickel. But I'm walking out."

“Go jump, for all I care,” Melvin snapped. “But remember this—you’ve got one more scene to shoot. The pie wagon bit. You said you wrote it, and we want it, and we’re going to shoot it. What we do with it after that is our business. But next Tuesday you be on location in Malibu, bright and early, and no tricks, either. You’re going to give us exactly what the contract calls for.”

“Forget the scene,” Artie Ames said, and he was begging now. “Just go ahead and do whatever you like. But leave me alone. Please.”

“We want that scene,” Melvin told him. “It’ll make a sock finish.” Artie Ames nodded and shuffled out. It wasn’t the comedy shuffle he used when he worked. This was a different kind of a shuffle—a blind one. He walked out of that screening room like a zombie.

Dick Melvin sighed and looked at me. “Sorry we had to give him the business,” he said. “But he ought to have figured how it would be.” He frowned. “Guess he took it pretty hard. Maybe you better go after him. He might be, you know, in a mood.”

“Maybe he’ll kill himself,” Miss Swivel-hips said, and her voice held more excitement than concern.

I stared at her. “How could he?” I asked. “You can’t kill a corpse. And he died here half an hour ago.”

“Cut the melodrama,” Melvin muttered. “Just see that I have a live actor on location Tuesday morning. He’s got to come through with that sock finish for us.”

Now I know what the score is. Maybe Dostoevsky or somebody like that could get away with a murder yarn about killing a man’s soul. And maybe he could peddle a bill of goods about how more than a man’s soul was killed—how a whole golden age of entertainment was slaughtered by a new era. But I can’t. And if that’s all there was to the Artie Ames bit, I wouldn’t waste your time and mine by trying to tell it.

But there’s more to it. Not much more—just enough.

You see, I went after Artie Ames, I went after him, and I kept after him, and I stayed with him all during the long weekend.

It wasn't easy. He wanted to drink, and I wouldn't let him. He wanted to take sleeping pills, and I hid the bottle. He wanted to cry—and this he did.

"They're all against me," he said. "I haven't got a friend left in the world."

"I'm here," I reminded him.

"Sure. You're here. Because you want to protect that precious contract. Not for die money, but because a deal is a deal, and you can't afford to let your reputation as an agent suffer."

"That's not true," I told him. "I understand. I'm all for you, Artie. To me you're one of the all-time greats."

"What's the use?" He blinked at me. "I might as well stop kidding myself. For more than twenty years I've been sitting around, giving myself the needle, telling myself that I was still a star. Banana oil!" He grinned wryly, and it was not a pleasant thing to see. "Banana oil! They stopped saying that in 1929. Forgot it, just like they forgot me. This is a new generation, isn't it? A generation that likes Miss Swivel-hips and her kind of talent. I don't belong here. You want comedy, see a cartoon. Let the little animated pictures hand you a fast boffola."

I gave him a drink then, but just one. "Now listen to uncle," I said. "Stop this self-pity stuff right now and get hold of yourself. You're Artie Ames. Maybe you're forgotten, maybe you're getting kicked around, but as long as I believe in you—as long as you believe in yourself—you've got a chance. There's just one thing you must remember. You're a trouper. A real trouper, out of the old school. The show must go on, that sort of thing."

"Laugh, clown, laugh!" he said, bitterly.

"All right, make fun of it. But the tradition's real. And sometimes the laugh backfires. Look at the way they sneered at Al Jolson—a beat-up old guy with a collapsed lung, box office poison, all the rest of it. He showed them. And you can show them, too. You want to win their respect? Then keep your own self-respect. Go out to Malibu next Tuesday and play it straight. Give them the scene, just as you wrote it. Give them everything you've got. You're Artie Ames—always remember that. And don't let yourself down."

Well, it sounded like the old college try, and the funny part of it was, it worked.

He perked up. I checked on him Sunday, and Monday night after I closed up shop I dropped in on him, just to see if he was in shape.

What I saw scared me, at first. In a three-day weekend he looked as if he'd aged twenty years. No, his hair hadn't turned white and his face didn't show any new wrinkles. It was just his expression—the way his eyes stared and the way he twisted his mouth. He was definitely an oldtimer, now, riding a one-way ticket.

But his deep voice was vibrant, and his gestures were animated, and he greeted me as if he was really living again. When I heard him speak, I was fooled completely. I'd forgotten that you're supposed to be afraid of a suddenly animated corpse.

"All set," he said. "Been running through the routine this afternoon. And you know what I'm going to do tonight?"

I shook my head.

"I'm going to bake me some pies," he crowed.

"Pies?"

"Sure. You know the way the bit goes, don't you? Your juvenile, Nolan, has just quarreled with Miss Swivel-hips, see? He's her director, and to make her sore he casts her in this Keystone-comedy thing, where she does this scene with me. I'm the comic driving the pie wagon and she's after me with an umbrella. I'm heading for the old cliff, but I'm too sore to notice—I quit driving, climb in back of the truck, pick up a pie, and let her have it. Right in the mush."

"The old custard pie routine, eh?"

"Melvin said we had to have one, to make it look like real slapstick. But it isn't custard, of course. It's blueberry. Photographs better. They've got to be real gooey to splatter just right—prop man was asking me what kind I wanted, and I told him I'd make up a batch myself. Always did in the old days."

He couldn't stop talking now, any more than he could stop twitching his mouth. "I can still hurl 'em, too. Been practising up. I used to be one of the best in the business. Almost as good as Arbuckle. Old Fatty—he was tops. He could sail two at once, one in each hand, and never miss."

I nodded. "This I've got to see," I said. "Tell you what. Suppose I pick you up tomorrow morning and drive you out to Malibu and watch the shooting."

He twitched his mouth at me, and I guess it was supposed to be a grin. "I get it. Want to show Melvin you're delivering the goods, eh? Well, why not? Come on along."

"It's not that," I said. Then I paused. "You sure you feel all right?"

"Of course. Feel great! Snapped right out of it. You gave me the word, didn't you? No sulking. Laugh, clown, laugh. The show must go on. Give Melvin his sock finish."

There was nothing else I could say, so I went away. But I worried all night, and when I showed up next morning I wasn't sure he'd be there.

But he was ready, and when I honked the horn in the driveway he came out carrying his big box of pies. He even clowned a bit for me, balancing the box ever so delicately as if it contained the Crown Jewels. And he bowed.

"Artie Ames rides again," he said. "The Last Roundup. On to the guillotine."

He never was any good at dialogue, I told myself. He was a silent comic. Or had been. Now he was just an animated corpse, a grotesque little old man who chattered frantically and twitched his mouth at me as we drove out to the roped-off location area at the edge of the big bluff overlooking the beach.

"Funny feeling," he said. "This is it, you know. The end. I'll never do it again after this one is finished. Today I'm putting on my makeup for the last time."

"Stop it," I muttered. "You'll get another break. When the picture is released, I can line up plenty of work for you."

He shook his head. "Breaks ran out for me years ago. Melvin was right. This isn't 1927 or even 1929. The new gang is in the saddle. Assembly-line producers like Melvin. Cheap dialogue writers like Sid Belter. Blondes with box office busts like Miss Swivel-hips. All they need me for is a sock finish."

But I was still worried, Dick Melvin was very cordial, very glad to see me and Artie Ames, He was busy with the location-unit director and the studio police, and he didn't seem to notice how Artie Ames looked when he arrived. I was glad of that, because I was sweating it out, wondering if the comic was really on the verge of a crack-up. I only hoped he'd do the scene right on the first take and get out before there was any trouble.

Miss Swivel-hips was ready, emerging from the makeup tent, and somebody drove the pie wagon into position while the cameramen lined up their shots. The scene called for Artie Ames to drive the wagon slowly toward the edge of the bluff while Miss Swivel-hips pursued him with the umbrella. Then he'd appear at the rear of the wagon and hurl the pie. Actually, of course, the wagon would have a driver up front. They'd stop action then and shoot another scene where the pie wagon apparently went over the cliff. That would come this afternoon.

Dick Melvin explained it to me, and to Miss Swivel-hips, who seemed calm enough. And then Artie Ames came on. The old Artie Ames, in makeup, carrying his pies over to the wagon and loping back in a way that got a laugh out of the camera crew.

His painted mouth smiled at Melvin and Miss Swivel-hips and me. They didn't notice anything wrong. I was beginning to feel a bit better, too. Maybe he'd carry it off yet.

Melvin must have felt the relief too, because he patted Artie Ames on the shoulder and said, "How about it, sweetheart? Want to take a dry run, or should we just roll 'em right away?"

Artie Ames gave him his clown’s grin. “I’m ready if you’re ready,” he said. “I always did it in one take hack in ’27. Don’t worry—this one will be right.”

So they lined up, and Miss Swivel-hips ran into camera range, whacking Artie Ames over the head with a big old-fashioned umbrella. And he gave little hops, wincing comically—the Beast belabored by Beauty—and then he floundered into the pie wagon as it started to move.

Miss Swivel-hips chased the wagon, brandishing the umbrella. The wagon headed slowly for the edge of the cliff.

Then something odd happened. A body dropped out of the cab of the wagon. I recognized the regular driver. He fell easily, as though pushed off-balance, and picked himself up at once. He hadn’t been hurt.

Still, it was enough for the director to yell, “Cut!” And the cameras stopped turning.

But the wagon kept on rolling, and all at once Artie Ames appeared at the rear. He stood there grinning, balancing a pie in one hand. Miss Swivel-hips stopped and stared up at him. She looked statuesque and lovely.

Artie Ames peered down, as the wagon rolled away toward the cliff-edge. The direct sunlight hit his face, and I could see the white, clownlike makeup. Beneath it I could see his lips twitching, and I could see his eyes.

There was nothing funny about the way he looked.

Then he said something. I guess I’m the only one who heard it, because a moment later he hurled the pie, and a moment after that the pie wagon went over the cliff, and Artie Ames went with it.

That was the end. The end of the scene, the end of the picture, the end of Dick Melvin’s production, and the end of Miss Swivel-hip’s career., But Artie Ames had the last word.

“To hell with that laugh, clown, laugh business!” he yelled. And then came the pie—the pie that hit Miss Swivel-hips in the face, the pie that Artie Ames had made himself—and carefully filled with TNT.

He gave them their sock finish, all right.

Broomstick Ride

Witches and warlocks on the strange, new planet! There had to be a reasonable, scientific explanation of this phenomena.—But was there any scientific explanation?

IT was close to midnight when they gathered at the crater. Night raised its head across the pitted plains and the twin moons opened their green eyes to stare down into the crater's depths.

The pit was deep and dark. Forbes crouched on the rim with his companions and his mind was full of ds. Deep, dark, dank, dismal, dolorous. Yes, he thesaurized. and also dreary, deathly, damned and doomed. To say nothing of diabolical.

Right now, crouching at the crater's edge, he mentally reviewed the work of Shakespeare, William. Macbeth was what he had in mind. Macbeth on the blasted heath. If this wasn't a blasted heath, then all his concepts were awry. A blasted heath at midnight, with two moons instead of one.

Just behind him in the darkness, the three technicians checked the controls of the recorder-units. Visio and audio extended full-range to cover 360° scan on a half-mile sweep, with a 20-20000 frequency. Fourteen lenses played upon the heath, the crater rim, and the crater depths.

"Picking up anything yet?" Forbes whispered.

"Not yet. But if anything happens—"The technicians tone implied, for himself and his companions, that nothing was expected to happen. They couldn’t quite understand what they were doing on a blasted heath at midnight, setting up their sensitive equipment to record emptiness and silence.

Forbes couldn’t blame them. This was supposed to be just a routine field-trip.

“You’ll check Pyris,” the Director had told him. Cartography did a run on it, and Doyle will give you the details. The atmosphere, I understand, is positively Earthlike, and it’s a Class I planet—one of the anthropomorphic cultures. Doyle places it at about 900 spans behind us, and there are even language similarities. We’ll want audio and visio records of course and an element analysis. Just a preliminary survey in case we find mineralogical possibilities worth exploiting. Strictly a routine checkup.”

And Doyle hadn’t added much more. “Outside of the craters and vegetation you’d think you were on Earth—a thousand spans ago, of course. The natives wear clothes, they have a primitive government, a religious pattern complete with totem and taboo, everything. Better get a hypnolearn on the language.”

Forbes took the hypnolearn, and that started him wondering. The language wasn’t English, but there were odd similarities. And odd references—some of them so odd that Forbes spent the last week before departure checking Central Data files. He had covered all the available filmscannings from 1500 to 1700 Oldstyle.

The comparison between life on Pyris and life on Earth in post-feudal times proved surprisingly apt after Forbes landed. He had paid a formal call upon the Kal, or ruler, and sued for permission to “visit” the planet. Gifts and courtesies had been exchanged, and then Forbes had taken his technical crew into the desert to study life in the villages. A small force remained aboard the ship which landed close to the Kal’s fortress.

For three days Forbes and his men had taken records of daily existance in the mines and the subterranean grottoes where all the food for the planet was grown. He reviewed his conversation with the “peasants”—that’s what they’d be called on Oldstyle earth, and that’s how he thought of them now.

He remembered the hints of curious beliefs which the workers of Pyris held. They were afraid to dig in certain grottoes, they kept away from the pits after dark, and they whispered of certain things which meant nothing to the men in Forbes' crew.

But he had scanned the Oldstyle past on Earth, and that's how he'd run into Shakespeare, and similarities. The similarities excited him sufficiently to have his equipment set up in what he thought was the logical spot at the logical time. The blasted heath at midnight.

NOW Forbes crouched there and waited for what appears on blasted heaths.

It came.

Audio got it first, faint and far away. The rush of matter through atmosphere, and above it the shriller sounds, splintering the silence.

One of the technicians, Kalt, began to mutter. "Bedamned!" Voices. Voices in the sky!" Visio took over now. The delicate cameras were on target, automatically focussing and feeding out infra and ultra to record what human eyes could not as yet perceive. And then the distant objects came into the range of normal viewing.

"Look!" Kalt whispered to his companions. "Pyrans. Up there, in the sky. And what are they riding on?"

Forbes could have told him. Forbes could have told him what comes to blasted heaths at midnight, and what they rode upon. But he kept silent, rather than disturb them at their work.

A month ago he himself would not have been disturbed, but since then he'd done that filmscan. And now he knew about witches.

They rode on broomsticks to the Sabbat, swooped from the skies—witches and warlocks, wizards and sorceresses, coming in coven to adore Satan, the Black Master of the Flock.

Of, course, all this was ancient superstition, and earthly superstitions besides. It had no basis in reality.

But he was seeing it now.

The broomsticks—were those long shafts really broomsticks?—soared overhead and then descended into the crater. The riders (were those frowsy hags really witches?) cackled and shrieked, their voices echoing below the crater rim.

Now fire blazed below, and the flames blazed blue as the crones cast powder upon the pyres. The hags were naked now, their anointed bodies shimmering in the smoke.

"Bedamned!" muttered Kalt again, like the sensible modern technician he was. Forbes reflected that the man didn't even know the meaning of the word he used. It was merely a common-place expression. Once it had been a jocular curse—"I'll be damned!" And before that, back in the ancient days of 1500-1700 Oldstyle, it had a literal meaning. It was, in those times, an acknowledgement of fact. People were damned. They did sell their souls to Satan. And they danced around fires and chanted while the smoke swirled. The damned danced.

They were dancing now.

Forbes recognized the ritual from what he'd scanned. He knew about the unguent cast on the fire, the ointment on the naked bodies, about belladonna and aeon he and other forgotten drugs.

He knew about the rituals they chanted in the Pyric tongue. Of course they could not be adoring Satan—he'd go over the audio records very thoroughly in the future—but at the moment he thought he could detect repeated shouts of a word resembling "Sire".

But everything else was familiar, dreadfully so. When the figure stepped out of the shadows, wearing a hood crowned with kort-horns, Forbes was reminded of the Master of the Sabbat, who wore the Sign of the Goat or the antlers of the Black Stag. Here it would be a kort, of course, for it was the only quadreped on Pyris.

THE Master of the Sabbat, whatever his Pyric title, was leading the chanting now. And he brought the kort into the firelight and he wielded the knife and filled the bowl and gave all to drink of the sacrifice. Then the smoke swirled up and the voices howled and—

The temrars came. Forbes recognized the soldiers of the Kal as they rose along the opposite rim of the crater. He recognized their breastplate, their spears and swords and the two-man slings which hurled arrows of steel.

The arrows were speeding now, through the smoke. And the Kal's men clambered down the sides of the crater. The crones wailed.

Then came another shout—from behind.

Forbes turned, but too late. Another group of temrars had crept up in the darkness, to pinion the arms of his crew. And they used their swords now—not on the men, but on the receptors and the equipment. In a moment, audio and visio were wreckage.

The tall, spade-bearded leader confronted Forbes, placed his hand on his heart in salute, and murmered, "You are to follow me. It is the wish of the Kal."

Forbes heard Kalt protesting, and cut him off with a curt gesture. He remembered that he was the guest of an alien culture and a primitive one. They had already destroyed his records and they were perfectly capable of destroying him. just as they would probably destroy the witches in the pit below. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live. Wasn't that an old biblical injunction? Strange, that there should be this similarity.

And there were more similarities to come, as Forbes and his companions were escorted, on kort-back, across the nighted plain. Forbes could close his eyes and easily imagine himself transported across space and time to ancient Earth. The clank of armor, the thud of hoofbeats, the remorseless tread of the iron legions returning victorious to the castle of the king—all were part of another world. A world of conquerors and commoners, of mage and magic.

Forbes couldn't repress an ironic grin. He, the selfstyled representative of modern intergalactic culture, was a prisoner of these superstitious savages. A single sweep of a sword had shattered the finest and most delicate scientific recording instruments yet devised. This wasn't his world —it was a world of force and cunning and he'd do best to deal with it on those terms.

Perhaps he'd treated the Kal too lightly. Certainly the Pyric people feared their ruler. They gave him their toil, their allegience, their taxes and their daughters. He owned the mines and the grottoes and was worshipped like a god.

So perhaps those who opposed the Kal would find new gods to worship. Sire, or whatever he was called, would be more than a Devil. He'd be Kal's chief political opponent. No wonder his soldiers sought the witches out.

THEY came to the valley and the citadel of the Kal. Rising within the walls of stone was the great fortress, its silhouette serrated against the sky. The company made its way through narrow streets to broader avenues, down the ramps and into the castle proper.

And here, in one of the stone antechambers, Forbes found Siddons, the ship's astrogator. and the other members of the crew.

"They came for us an hour ago," dons said. "No, they didn't try to force their way inside—locks were closed, anyhow. But they summoned, and we didn't resist. There's a guard around the ship now, but none of them went in, or even tried to enter. I don't understand it."

Forbes mustered a show of confidence. "We'll find out all about it when I see the Kal."

"The Kal will see you now." It was the spade-bearded temrar who spoke, who led Forbes away alone and gestured to the others to keep back.

Forbes followed him down a long corridor, then halted as the temrar indicated a small door. "Please to enter," he said.

Nodding, Forbes opened the door, stepped inside, and faced the Kal.

The hairy little fat man was seated behind a large table. His pudgy hands rested on the table-top and cradled a silver shape.

He tucked it away in the folds of his sleeve as Forbes entered and nodded at him gravely.

"I had you brought here for your own protection," the Kal said. "Your lives are in danger."

"From what?"

"The wrali. Or, as you would call them, witches."

"Why should they harm us?"

"Because you threaten their way of life. And unless you leave, they will destroy you. That was the purpose of their rites this evening—to summon Sire, the Evil One."

Forbes smiled. "But that's superstition," he said. "They can't harm us with spells or enchantments. Surely you don't believe, for example, that a witch or one of your wrali can kill a man by sticking pins into his image or melting it over a hot fire. Or do you?" The Kal's voice, like his face, was inscrutable. "It is not a question of what I believe. It is a question of what my people believe. And is it not true that once there were men who believed in witchcraft on Earth?"

"True." Forbes hesitated. "But how would you know that?"

"Because the wrali have a legend. According to that legend, the inhabitants of Pyris come originally from Earth."

"Our Earth?"

"Exactly. Haven't you noticed the similarities in language, in concept, in the system of government corresponding to olden days? And isn't our wrali-worship of Sire similar to the witch-worship of Satan?"

The Kal smiled now. "I'm not the ignorant barbarian you think me to be—it is only through choice that I appear so. And you might do well to ponder our legend.

"The tale is this. Long ago, on your Earth, witches were persecuted, burned, hanged, torn to pieces, because they believed in Satan, or Sire. And a certain group, facing extinction on your planet, invoked the Evil One to save them. He granted their desires. They mounted their broomsticks and flew into space—flew here, to Pyris."

Forbes blinked. “You don’t believe that, do you?” he asked.

“Legends are interesting, you must admit. They do offer explanations.”

“I’ll have another.” Forbes considered for a moment. “On our Earth, long ago, science was as suspect as witchcraft. Scientists performing experimentsor investigations could be accused of black magic and executed just as witches were.

“Now suppose a certain man, or group of men, working in secret, managed somehow to hit upon the principles of atomic propulsion and space-travel—just as we know the alchemists investigated atomic theory? And in order to escape from a hostile environment, they actually built a ship and came here? Whereupon a clique of warriors among their descendants determined to seize the power of government, gradually debased the people and enslaved them—planting such crude legends to keep them in the grip of superstition?”

The Kal shrugged. “You find that theory more attractive than witchcraft, eh?”

Forbes met his gaze. “It’s logical. Somewhere in this world the sources of scientific knowledge must still exist, suppressed only to maintain the present rulers in control. I rather suspect that the wrali understand some of it. I saw them ride to the meeting tonight on broomsticks, and I’m thinking now that those broomsticks contained individual power-packs.”

The Kal shrugged again. “I see there are no secrets to the trained scientific mind. But now that you know the story, I must ask you to leave, for your own safety. “The wrali fear you and may take drastic measures.”

Forbes bowed his head. “Very well. We can take off immediately, if you release us.”

“You will be escorted to your ship. Is there anything you need, any service you require?”

“No, thank you.” Forbes hesitated. “It’s just that I’m sorry. Sorry to see a world still existing in such savagery as yours, when it isn’t necessary. That men here are still ruled by ignorance and superstition."

The Kal tugged at his beard. "But suppose there were truth to the legends? Suppose that Sire, or Satan does rule here and that science dares not oppose magic? That this world stays in barbarism because it is the Evil One's wish to rule, and that science must bow before sorcery lest everything be destroyed?"

Forbes smiled. "You know that's nonsense," he replied. "I can't accept that, any more than you can."

"Yet you'll go now and leave us to our savagery?"

"I have no choice."

"Very well, then." The Kal inclined his head. Forbes went to the door and the Kal spike to his temrar, gave orders for safe escort back to the ship.

THE door closed, and the Kal was alone in the little room. He stared into the flame from the brazier, then extracted the gleaming object from his sleeve once more. He turned it over and over with his pudgy hands and after he had examined it quite thoroughly he merely sat and waited.

After a time the door opened again. A Pyran came in, wearing a hood crowned with kort-horns.

"They are gone?" asked the Kal.

"Back to the ship. Soon they depart."

"I am sorry about tonight," the Kal said. "I trust the temrars did not actually hurt anyone, but they had to make it convincing. If Earth ever suspected that the government and the wrali work together, then nothing could stop them from returning. As it is, I think we deceived them and they are gone for good."

The hooded one stood stockstill and his head was cocked as though he were listening. "I can sense them now," he murmured. I can reach the one called Forbes, on the ship. He is thinking of his report. He will put in a request for an expedition to come back here. He wants to bring a new government from his planet and civilize all Pyris." The hooded one sighed. "It is as I told you it would be. Your plan has failed."

The Kal rose. "I'm sorry," he said. "I tried to save them. First I told him the truth about how we came to Pyris, and about the power of magic. But he didn't believe me. He preferred to think it was all science, disguised as legend."

"Then it must be ended my way," the hooded one declared. "We work together, wrali and temrar, although the people do not know. We work together to keep this planet in ignorance, keep our race from civilization and science—because with science, worship of the Evil One would cease. And that was the ancient promise we made when we came here—that our people would always worship. We must keep that promise in order to survive.

"So we cannot let this Forbes come back and bring his cursed science here. We must do things my way. Give that to me."

The Kal handed the silvery object to the hooded one. "Is it time?" he whispered.

The hooded one cocked his head again. "I can sense it now," he said. "The ship has taken off. It climbs swiftly. Thousands of miles."

The hooded one bent over the brazier as the flames roared up. Carefully he thrust the silvery object into the crimson coals. The flames licked, tasted, then consumed with incredible speed. In a moment the object melted away.

"What happens now?" whispered the Kal.

The hooded one shuddered. "Ten thousand miles away," he murmured. "Now!"

Ten thousand miles over Pyris the space-ship exploded, melted into nothingness.

And down below the Kal murmured sadly, "We had to do it, didn't we? To save our planet from the scientists. Because they don't believe in the Power of Evil. They don't believe you can kill by sticking pins into an image—or by melting an image over a hot fire—"

THE END

1958

Daybroke

He had no name—or couldn't remember it. But the things that he saw that morning, the agonized world would never forget.

UP IN the sky the warheads whirled, and the thunder of their passing shook the mountain.

Deep in his vaulted sanctuary he sat, godlike and inscrutable, marking neither the sparrow's or the missile's fall. There was no need to leave his shelter to stare down at the city.

He knew what was happening—had known ever since early in the evening when the television flickered and died. An announcer in the holy white garb of the healing arts had been delivering an important message about the world's most popular laxative—the one most people preferred, the one four out of five doctors used themselves. Midway in his praise of this amazing new medical discovery he had paused and advised the audience to stand by for a special bulletin.

But the bulletin never came; instead the screen went blank and the thunder boomed.

All night long the mountain trembled, and the seated man trembled too; not with anticipation but with realization. He had expected this, of course, and that was why he was here. Others had talked about it for years; there had been wild rumors and solemn warnings and much muttering in taverns.

But the rumor-mongers and the warning-sounders and the tavern-mutterers had made no move. They had stayed in the city and he alone had fled.

Some of them, he knew, had stayed to stave off the inevitable end as best they could, and these he saluted for their courage. Others had attempted to ignore the future, and these he detested for their blindness. And all of them he pitied.

For he had realized, long ago, that courage was not enough and that ignorance was no salvation. Wise words and foolish words are one—they will not halt the storm. And when the storm approaches, it is best to flee.

So he had prepared for himself this mountain retreat, high over the city, and here he was safe; would be safe for years to come. Other men of equal wealth could have done the same, but they were too wise or too foolish to face reality. So while they spread their rumors and sounded their warnings and muttered in their cups, he built his sanctuary; lead-guarded, amply provisioned, and stocked with every need for years to come, including even a generous supply of the world's most popular laxative.

DAWN came at last and the echoes of the thunder died, and he went to a special, shielded place where he could sight his spyglass at the city. He stared and he squinted, but there was nothing to be seen—nothing but swirling clouds that billowed blackly and rolled redly across the hazed horizon.

Then he knew that he must go down to the city if he wanted to find out, and made due preparations.

There was a special suit to wear, a cunning seamless garment of insulated cloth and lead, difficult and costly to obtain. It was a top secret suit; the kind only Pentagon generals possess. They cannot procure them for their wives, and they must steal them for their mistresses. But he had one. He donned it now.

An elevated platform aided his descent to the base of the mountain, and there his car was waiting. He drove out, the shielded doors closing automatically behind him, and started for the city. Through the eyepiece of his insulated helmet he stared out at a yellowish fog, and he drove slowly, even though he encountered no traffic nor any sign of life.

After a time the fog lifted, and he could see the countryside. Yellow trees and yellow grass stood stiffly silhouetted against a yellow sky in which great clouds writhed and whirled.

Van Gogh's work, he told himself, knowing it was a lie. For no artist's hand had smashed the windows of the farmhouses, peeled the paint from the sides of the barns, or squeezed the warm breath from the herds huddling in the fields, standing fright-frozen but dead.

He drove along the broad arterial leading to the city; an arterial which ordinarily swarmed with the multicolored corpuscles of motor vehicles. But there were no cars moving today, not in this artery.

Not until he neared the suburbs did he see them, and then he rounded a curve and was halfway upon the vanguard before he panicked and halted in a ditch.

The roadway ahead was packed with automobiles as far as the eye could see—a solid mass, bumper to bumper, ready to descend upon him with whirring wheels.

But the wheels were not turning.

The cars were dead. The further stretches of the highway were an automotive graveyard. He approached the spot on foot, treading with proper reverence past the Cadillac-corpses, the cadavers of Chevrolets, the bodies of Buicks. Close at hand he could see the evidence of violent ends; the shattered glass, the smashed fenders, the battered bumpers and twisted hoods.

The signs of struggle were often pitiable to observe; here was a tiny Volkswagen, trapped and crushed between two looming Lincolns; there an MG had died beneath the wheels of a charging Chrysler. But all were still now. The Dodges dodged no longer, the Hornets had ceased their buzzing, and the Ramblers would never ramble again.

It was hard for him to realize with equal clarity the tragedy that had overtaken the people inside these cars—they were dead, too, of course, but somehow their passing seemed insignificant. Maybe his thinking had been affected by the attitude of the age, in which a man tended to be less and less identified as an individual and more and more regarded on the basis of the symbolic status of the car he drove. When a stranger rode down the street, one seldom thought of him as a person; one's only immediate reaction was, "There goes a Ford—there goes a Pontiac—there goes one of those big goddam Imperials." And men bragged about their cars instead of their characters. So somehow the death of the automobiles seemed more important than the death of their owners. It didn't seem as though human beings had perished in this panic-stricken effort to escape from the city; it was the cars which had made a dash for final freedom and then failed.

He skirted the road now and continued along the ditch until he came to the first sidewalks of the suburbs. Here the evidence of destruction was accentuated. Explosion and implosion had done their work. In the country, paint had been peeled from the walls, but in the suburbs walls had been peeled from the buildings. Not every home was leveled. There were still plenty of ranchhouses standing, though no sign of a rancher in a gray flannel suit. In some of the picturesquely modern white houses, with their light lines and heavy mortgages, the glass side walls remained unshattered, but there was no sign of happy, busy suburban life within—the television sets were dead.

Now he found his progress impeded by an increasing litter. Apparently a blast had swept through this area; his way was blocked by a clutter of the miscellaneous debris of Exurbia.

HE WADED through or stepped around:

Boxes of Kleenex, artificial shrunken heads which had once dangled in the windows of station-wagons, crumpled shopping-lists and scribbled notices of appointments with psychiatrists.

He stepped on an Ivy League cap, nearly tripped over a twisted barbecue grille, got his feet tangled in the straps of foam-rubber falsies. The gutters were choked with the glut from a bombed-out drugstore; bobbie-pins, nylon bobby-socks, a spate of pocket-books, a carton of tranquilizers, a mass of suntan lotion, suppositories, deodorants, and a big cardboard cutout of Harry Belafonte obscured by a spilled can of hot fudge.

He shuffled on, through a welter of women's electric shavers, Book-of-the-Month-Club bonus selections, Presley records, false teeth, and treatises on Existentialism. Now he was actually approaching the city proper. Signs of devastation multiplied. Trudging past the campus of the university he noted, with a start of horror, that the huge football stadium was no more. Nestled next to it was the tiny Fine Arts building, and at first he thought that it too had been razed. Upon closer inspection, however, he realized it was untouched, save for the natural evidence of neglect and decay.

He found it difficult to maintain a regular course, now, for the streets were choked with wrecked vehicles and the sidewalks often blocked by beams or the entire toppled fronts of buildings. Whole structures had been ripped apart, and here and there were freakish variations where a roof had fallen in or a single room smashed to expose its contents. Apparently the blow had come instantly, and without forewarning, for there were few bodies on the streets and those he glimpsed inside the opened buildings gave indication that death had found them in the midst of their natural occupations.

Here, in a gutted basement, a fat man sprawled over the table of his home workshop, his sightless eyes fixed upon the familiar calendar exhibiting entirely the charms of Marilyn Monroe. Two flights above him, through the empty frame of a bathroom window, one could see his wife, dead in the tub, her hand still clutching a movie magazine with a Rock Hudson portrait on the cover. And up in the attic, open to the sky, two young lovers stretched on a brass bed, locked naked in headless ecstasy.

He turned away, and as his progress continued he deliberately avoided looking at the bodies. But he could not avoid seeing them now, and with familiarity the revulsion softened to the merest twinge. It then gave way to curiosity.

Passing a school playground he was pleased to see that the end had come without grotesque or unnatural violence. Probably a wave of paralyzing gas had swept through this area. Most of the figures were frozen upright in normal postures. Here were all of the aspects of ordinary childhood—the big kid punching the little kid, both leaning up against a fence where the blast had found them; a group of six youngsters in uniform black leather jackets piled upon the body of a child wearing a white leather jacket.

Beyond the playground loomed the center of the city. From a distance the mass of shattered masonry looked like a crazy garden-patch turned by a mad plowman. Here and there were tiny blossoms of flame sprouting forth from the interstices of huge clods, and at intervals he could see lopped, stemlike formations, the lower stories of skyscrapers from which the tops had been sheared by the swish of a thermonuclear scythe.

He hesitated, wondering if it was practical to venture into this weird welter. Then he caught sight of the hillside beyond, and of the imposing structure which was the new Federal Building. It stood there, somehow miraculously untouched by the blast, and in the haze he could see the flag still fluttering from its roof. There would be life here, and he knew he would not be content until he reached it.

But long before he attained his objective, he found other evidences of continued existence. Moving delicately and deliberately through the debris, he became aware that he was not entirely alone here in the central chaos.

Wherever the flames flared and flickered, there were furtive figures moving against the fire. To his horror, he realized that they were actually kindling the blazes; burning away barricades that could not otherwise be removed, as they entered shops and stores to loot. Some of the scavengers were silent and ashamed, others were boisterous and drunken; all were doomed.

It was this knowledge which kept him from interfering. Let them plunder and pilfer at will, let them quarrel over the spoils in the shattered streets; in a few hours or a few days, radiation and fallout would take inevitable toll.

NO ONE interfered with his passage; perhaps the helmet and protective garment resembled an official uniform. He went his way unhindered and saw:

A barefooted man wearing a mink coat, dashing through the door of a cocktail lounge and passing bottles out to a bucket-brigade of four small children——

An old woman standing in a bombed-out bank vault, sweeping stacks of bills into the street with her broom. Over in one corner lay the body of a white-haired man, his futile arms outstretched to embrace a heap of coins. Impatiently, the old woman nudged him with her broom. His head lolled, and a silver dollar popped out of his open mouth——

A soldier and a woman wearing the armband of the Red Cross, carrying a stretcher to the blocked entrance of a partially-razed church. Unable to enter, they bore the stretcher around to the side, and the soldier kicked in one of the stained-glass windows——

An artist's basement studio, open to the sky; its walls still intact and covered with abstract paintings. In the center of the room stood the easel, but the artist was gone. What was left of him was smeared across the canvas in a dripping mass, as though the artist had finally succeeded in putting something of himself into his picture——

A welter of glassware that had once been a chemical laboratory, and in the center of it a smocked figure slumped over a microscope. On the slide was a single cell which the scientist had been intently observing when the world crashed about his ears——

A woman with the face of a Vogue model, spread-eagled in the street. Apparently she had been struck down while answering the call of duty, for one slim, aristocratic hand still gripped the strap of her hatbox. Otherwise, due to some prank of explosion, the blast had stripped her quite naked; she lay there with all her expensive loveliness exposed, and a pigeon nested in her golden pelvis——

A thin man, emerging from a pawnshop and carrying an enormous tuba. He disappeared momentarily into a meat market next door, then came out again, the bell of his tuba stuffed with sausages——

A broadcasting studio, completely demolished, its once immaculate sound stage littered with the crumpled cartons of fifteen different varieties of America's Favorite Cigarette and the broken bottles of twenty brands of America's Favorite Beer. Protruding from the wreckage was the head of America's Favorite Quizmaster, eyes staring glassily at a sealed booth in the corner which now served as the coffin for a nine-year-old boy who had known the batting-averages of every team in the American and National Leagues since 1882——

A wild-eyed woman sitting in the street, crying and crooning over a kitten cradled in her arms——

A broker caught at his desk, his body mummified in coils of ticker-tape——

A motor-bus, smashed into a brick wall; its passengers still jamming the aisles; standees clutching straps even in rigor mortis——
